TO THE QVEENES MOST EXCELLENT MAIESTIE, OVR MOST REDOVTED, MOST HAPPIE, AND TRVE SOVERAIGNE LADIE ELIZABETH, BY THE grace of God Queene of England, Fraunce, and Ireland, principall defender of the faith, and next vnder God, the onely, absolute, and full supreame head ouer all causes Ecclesiasticall and temporall through her Maiesties dominions:

Geffray Fenton prayeth a perpetuall increasing of the spirite of Gods holy feare, and a continuall going on and confirmation of that godly course vvherein vvith so long peace and happines, her Maiestie hath gouerned the subiects and peoples of her Realmes and seuerall iurisdictions.

IT is not vvithout reason nor contrarie to example, that I presume to offer vp to the peculiar and graue vievv of your Maiestie, these my compositions and labors: for that the generall argument being historicall, a doctrine vvherein your Maiestie farre aboue all other Princes hath a most singular insight & iudgement, and the particular partes conteining discourse of state and gouernment, in vvhich God hath expressed in the person of your Maiestie a most rare and diuine example to all other Kings of the earth for matter of pollicie and sound administration: All lavv of reason, of equitie, and of other impression vvhat so euer, do chalenge to appropriate the addresse and iustification of this vvorke to your Maiestie only, in vvhom, for your inspired science & spirit to iudge of Monuments and euents of times, and for the felicitie of your gouernment in seasons so perillous & conspiring, all Kings, and Kingdomes, and nations rounde about you, rise vp to reuerence in your fourme of gouerning, that propertie of vvisdome and vertue, vvhich it seemes God hath restrayned to your Maiestie onely, vvithout participation to any of them: And in that regarde they holde you that sacred and fixed Starre, vvhose light God vvill not haue put out, though the deuises of men on all ſides are buſie to dravv clovvdes and darke vayles to obſcure it.

I am alſo encoraged to make this oblation to your Maieſtie by the example of many notable vvriters, both of the primitiue times and in all ages and poſterities ſucceeding, ſuche as for the grauitie and fidelitie of their penne and ſtyle vvere cherished vvith the greateſt Princes of thoſe dayes, and vnder the authoritie and countenance of their names, their vvorks vvere vvith reputation and credite inſinuated into many peoples, nations, and regiments, The ſame being an effect due to the vertue and pietie of great Princes, for that as it is God that giueth vviſdome and ſcience to men, So it is authoritie that chiefly shovveth it to the vvorld, euen as the earth norisheth the roote of a tree, but the comfortable Sunne doth much to bring foorth the bloſſoms. So many are the teſtimonies and examples of this, and ſo familiar vvith your Maieſtie is the doctrine of hiſtories and information of times, that by ſo much leſſe neede I to ſtande vpon authorities of antiquitie, or declarations relatiue, by hovv much more is knovven to be happily laied vp in your Maieſties breſt, and effectually expreſſed in the forme of your gouernment and reigne, all that vvhich learning and bookes can ſet dovvne by rule and precept, your Maieſtie being the onely conſecrated Lampe from vvhom all other dominions about you do dravv their light, or rather that terreſtriall Sunne, vpon vvhoſe influence God hath appoynted to depend the motions of all the Regions and Climats of the vvhole common vveale of Chriſtendome: A calling and authoritie vvhich all other Potentates do honor in you vvith ſo much the more merite and reuerence, by hovv-much amid ſo many occaſions and oportunities to ambition, they proue your equitie, pietie, and moderation of minde, to exceede all examples of former Princes and times, and farre ſurmount all humaine exſpectation: for that hauing as it vvere a ſoueraigne povver ouer them & theirs, you do notvvithſtanding diſpoſe of things according to the lavv of meaſure and right. In regard of vvhich diuine properties, accompanied vvith your Maieſties other vertues vvhich God hath made infinite in you, and your felicitie vvhich is the revvarde and effect of the ſame, I may vvith good comelineſſe reſemble the gratious reigne of your Maieſtie touching theſe regions of Chriſtendome, to the happy time & dayes of Cæſar Auguſtus Emprour of Rome: vvho, after a long and generall combuſtion and harrying of the vvhole vvorlde vvith blood and vvarres, did ſo reforme and reduce the Regions confining his Empire, that vvith the Scepter and ſeate of peace he much more preuayled then euer he could haue done vvith the ſvvord: By his clemencie he brought to ſubmiſſion

his neighbours that ſtoode out agaynſt him, and by his conſtancie helde them aſſured being once reconciled: His vviſdome ſeemed an Oracle to the Nations about him to diſpoſe of their counſels and ſvvaigh their enterpriſes: And touching quarrels and controuerſies of ſtate, eyther for his grauitie and iuſtice, the only arbitration and reſolution vvas referred to him, or at leaſt for the avve that vvas had of him, the factions durſt not burſt out to further limits then he liked of: Laſtely, it vvas an approued Monarchie of God, for that Chriſt the ſonne of God amid ſuch an vniuerſall malice of man and mankinde, vvas contented to shevv himſelfe in flesh in the dayes of his reigne. Euen ſo though the ſingular perſons be chaunged, yet the effects and bleſſings of this time do nothing vary vnder the happy rule of your Maieſtie, vvhom God hath raiſed and eſtablished a ſoueraigne Empreſſe ouer ſeuerall nations and languages, and vvith the frutes of a firme and continued peace, hath plentifully enriched the peoples of your Dominions: reſtored Religion and the Church of Chriſt to dvvell a nevv amongſt vs: made your authoritie avvefull to all your neighbours and borderers: and laſtly hath erected your ſeate vpon a high hill or ſanctuarie, and put into your hands the ballance of povver and iuſtice, to peaze and counterpeaze at your vvill the actions and counſels of all the Chriſtian kingdomes of your time: VVherin ſure according to the courſe your Maieſtie holdeth, much leſſe that eyther for the preſent or in poſterities to come, can be iuſtly obiected any matter of imputation agaynſt you, ſeeing of the contrarie, moſt of them that be vviſe and true obſeruers of your dealings, do daily confeſſe and publish, that in your Maieſtie hath bene orderly fulfilled all lavves and offices of a deuoute Nevvtralitie: For that like as amidde their heauy afflictions vvherein ſucceſſiuely hath bene offred you no ſmall cauſes to ambition, your Maieſtie hath neuer ſtopped or cutte from them the refuge of your amitie and mercy: So neuertheleſſe your compaſſion hath principally reſpected the equitie of the complaynts of ſuch as implored it, eſteming it not agreable to the lavv of vertue and account of your conſcience, to make your profite vpon the diuiſions of your neighbours, though there haue not vvanted reaſons and titles to induce your deſire.

I forbeare to make declaration to your Maieſtie of the life and learning of the firſt Author of this booke, A matter teſtified vvith ſufficient credit and reputation in the high negociations and employments vvhich he managed long time vnder great Princes, Popes, & common vveales: And I am bolde (contrary to the cuſtome of ſome vvriters) to leaue to particulate in my Epiſtle any part of the argument vvhich vvith ſo great grauitie he hath digeſted at large in ſo great a volume: Onely the man for his integritie and roundnes vvas ſuch one, as vvhoſe vertues vvere farre from all ſuſpicion of parcialitie, fauour, hatred, loue, revvard, or any other propertie of humaine affection, vvhich might haue force to corrupt or turne from the truth the minde of a vvriter: And for the generall matter of his vvorke, it doth not onely conteine the vvarres and diuerſe accidentes hapned in Italy and other partes for almoſt fortie yeres, but alſo he doth ſo diſtinctly ſet dovvne the cauſes, the counſells, and the fortunes of euery principall partie introduced into thoſe actions, that by his ſtudie and iudgement, is traced & made eaſie to the reader, the vvay to all thoſe ſvvete and plentifull frutes vvhich vvith paynfulnes are ſought for in Hiſtories of this nature.

And for mine ovvne part, vvhere in all my dedications heretofore, not my vvill vvhich vvas alvvayes vvarranted by the gracious demonſtrations of your Maieſtie, But my maner of life inſtituted vpon priuate cuſtomes and exerciſes, hath holden me from approching the authoritie of this place, affore vvhich nothing ought to be preſented vvhich hath not a full perfection of ſpirite and ſtudie: yet novv, taking my reaſon of the vvorthines of the vvorke, and obſeruing the examples and inducements of others in like oblatiõs, I am bold vnder feare & humilitie to proſtrate theſe my laſt payns afore that diuine moderation of mind vvhich alvvays hath holden for acceptable all things reſpecting learning or vertuous labours: Humbly beſeeching your right excellent Maieſtie, that vvhere the vvorke is novv to appeare in the open vievv of the vvorld, and ſtande before the vncertaine iudgements of ſo many ſundry & ſtraunge humors of men, you vvill vouchſafe to let it paſſe vnder the happie name of your Maieſtie, and vnder your gracious authoritie to giue it defence and fauor agaynſt the emulation of ſuch as eyther through malice or ignorance may riſe vp to interprete me and my labours ſiniſterly. The Lorde bleſſe your Maieſtie vvith a long and peaceable life, and confirme in you to the comfort of your people, that courſe of vvell tempered gouernment, by the benefite vvhereof they haue ſo long time liued vnder the felicitie of your name. At my lodging neare the Tovver of London.

THE ARGVMENT OF THE FIRST BOOKE.

LODOWYK SFORCE vncle and tutor to Iohn Galeas Duke of Myllan, fearing leaſt Ferdinand King of Naples would make warre vpon him, breaketh of from the league that had bene renewed betweene the ſayd Ferdinand, Iohn Galeas, and the common weale of Florence, againſt the Venetians: he procureth the French King Charles the viij. to paſſe into Italy to conquer the kingdom of Naples: Pope Alexander the vj. alieth himſelfe with the King of Naples: The French King, hauing ordered th'affayres of the kingdom, deſcendeth into Italy, where he taketh many townes: Diuerſe emotions happen in the kingdom of Naples: The Pope is in great perplexitie and trauell: Piſa rebelleth againſt the Florentines: The French King entreth into Florence and Rome, and from thence paſſeth to Naples.

THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE hiſtorie and diſcourſſe of Guicciardin.

Intention of the author.

HAVING in hand to write the affaires & fortunes of Italie, I iudged it cõuenient to drawe into diſcourſſe thoſe particularities that moſt neareſt reſemble our time and memorie, yea euen ſince the ſelfe princes of that country calling in the armies of Fraunce, gaue the firſt beginning to ſo great innouations. A matter, for the varietie, greatnes, and nature of ſuche thinges, verie notable, and well worthie of memorie: and for the heauie accidents, hatefull, bluddie and horrible: for that Italie for many yeres was trauelled with all thoſe ſortes of calamities with the which principalities, countries, and mortall men, are wont to bee afflicted aſwell by the iuſte wroth and hand of God, as through the impietie and wickednes of other nations. The knowledge of theſe things ſo great and diuerſe, may miniſter many wholſome inſtructions aſwell to all men generally, as to euery one in particular, conſidering that by the trial, conſent & demonſtration of ſo many examples, all princes, people, and patrimonies may ſee (as a ſea driuen with diuerſe windes) to what inconſtancie humane things are ordeined, & how harmefull are the ill meaſured counſells of princes, many times preiudiciall to them ſelues, but alwayes hurtefull to their people and ſubiects, ſpecially when they are vainelie caried awaye either with their ſingular errours, or priuate couetouſnes, without hauing any impreſſion or remembrance of the ordinary chaunges of fortune, whereby turning to the domage and diſpleaſure of others, the power which is giuen them for the ſafetie, protection, & pollicie of the whole, they make them ſelues, either by want of diſcreſſion, or too much ambition, authours of innouations and new troubles.

The eſtate wherein Italie was anno 1490.

But the better to make knowen the ſtate and condition of Italie at that time, together with the occaſions of ſo many afflictions happening, it is to be conſidered that their calamities begonne with ſo much the more diſpleaſure & aſtoniſhement in mens mindes, by howmuche the vniuerſall eſtate and multitude of things ſtoode quiet, pleasant, and happie. For, it is true & well assured, that since the Romaine empire (weakened chiefly by the chaunge of auncient manners & customes) began a thousand yeares afore to decline from that greatnes whereunto it was raised by a wonderfull vertue and fortune: the principalities of Italy had not tasted of so great and generall prosperitie, nor reioysed in a condition so happy, plawsible and wel gouerned, as was that wheron it was with great sewertie reappосed the yeare of grace 1490. and certeine yeares afore and after: for that being on all sides reduced into peace and tranquillitie, the hilles and barreine places tilled and made no lesse frutefull, then the valleyes and regions most fertill, and no potentacy or communaltie subiect to other Lordes or rulers then their owne. It was not onely plentifully repleniſhed with people, societie, and riches, but also greatly honored with the estates and maiestie of many Princes, goodly aspect of sundry right stately cities, and with the seate and residencie of the throne of Religion: it florisshed in men rare and excellent in administration of common weales, and infinite in good witts seene and studied in all sciences and artes of excellencie and industrie: lastly bearing also no small praise and glorie for the seruice in warre according to the vse and discipline of that time, it reteyned iustly (by these giftes and blessings) a peculiar merite and reputation amongst all other nations. This felicitie being gotten with diuerse occasions, there were many thinges to enterteyne and preserue it, and amongest others, common voyce and consent gaue no small prayse and deseruing to the industrie and vertue of Laurence de medicis a Citisen of Florence, in whom was expressed such an excellencie of spirite and authoritie aboue the other Citisens of that regiment, that vpon his counsell was reappосed the gouernment of the affayres of that common weale, which was at that tyme more mightie for th'opportunitie of his situation, for the excellent witts and inuentions of men, and for the ready meanes and mynes of siluer and mettalles, then for the greatnes and circuite of Lordship or dominion: And by reason he was lately ioyned by parentage with Pope Innocent the viij. whom he had brought to reappose almost an absolute faith and credit in his councells, his name was great through all Italy, and his authoritie mightie in the deliberation of common affayres. He knewe well that it would be a thing preiudiciall to the common weale of Florence, and no lesse hurtfull to him selfe, if any of the great Potentates of that nation stretched out further their power, and therefore he employed all his deuises, meanes, and directions that the thinges of Italy should be so euenly ballanced, that they shoulde not waigh more on the one side then of the other: A thing which he could not make to succeede, without the preseruation of peace, and a perpetuall care, diligence and watching ouer all accidents yea euen to the least, baseſt, and most inferior.

The good estate of Italy afore the troubles.

Laurence de medicis.

Ferdinand King of Aragon.

In the same inclination to common tranquillitie was also concurrant Ferdinand of Aragon King of Naples, a Prince for his councells deliberate, in his actions resolute, & touching his affections very moderat, notwithstanding often times before, he had shewed many ambicious thoughts and farre of from all councell to peace. Wherein he was much gouerned in that time by Alphonso Duke of Calabria, his eldest sonne, who vnwillingly suffered that Iohn Galeas Sforce his sonne in lawe Duke of Myllan, more then twenty yeares of age, but of a iudgement very incapable and vnapt to great affayres & reteyning onely the name of Duke, should be suppressed and as it were kept smothered by Lodowike Sforce his vncle, who, more then tenne yeares afore by the misgouernment and vnchast life of Madame Bonne, mother to the sayd Galeas, was seazed vpon his minoritie, and by that meanes, had reduced by litle and litle into his power the ſtrong holdes, men of warre, tributes and treaſures, and all other the groundes and foundacions of the ſtate of Myllan, perſeuering in the gouernment not as tutor and regent, but (except the onely title of Duke) with all demonſtrations and actions of an abſolute Prince. Ferdinand, with whom was more familiar the impreſſion of preſent vtilitie, then his auncient inclination, or th'indignation of his ſonne (how iuſt ſo euer it were) deſired that nothing ſhould be innouated in Italy, nor the preſent policie fall into alteration: perhaps he had regard to the experience of the yeres before, wherin (to his great daunger) he had proued the hate of his barons and vniuerſall ſubiectes: & happily he had not forgotten (by the memory of things paſt) what affection a great part of his people boare to the name of the houſe of Fraunce: which iuſt and wiſe coniectures drewe him to ſuſpect leaſt the diſcordes of Italy might brede occaſion to the french to inuade the kingdome of Naples: or perhaps, to make a counter ſtrength agaynſt the might of the Venetians, (at that tyme redowted throughout all Italy) he iudged it neceſſary to ally him ſelfe with others and chiefly with the eſtates of Myllan and Florence: Touching Lodovvyke Sforce, notwithſtanding he was poſſeſt with a minde traueling, buſie, and ambicious, yet by the neceſſitie of his condicion, he was driuen to embrace the inclination and purpoſe to peace, aſwell for that they which commaunded at Myllan were no leſſe threatned then others with the daunger which the reſidue feared touching the greatnes of Venice: as alſo for that it was more eaſie for him by the benefite of tranquillitie and peace, to keepe the authoritie he had vſurped, then by the trauells and troubles of warre. And albeit he kept a continuall dreade, ielouſie and ſuſpicion ouer the thoughtes and deuiſes of Ferdinand and Alphonſo, yet waighing with the diſpoſition of Laurence de medicis to peace, the ielouſie he had likewiſe of their greatnes, and perſwading him ſelfe alſo that for the diuerſitie of affections and auncient hatredes betwene Ferdinand and the Venetians, it was a thing vaine to feare that betwene them ſhould be contracted an amity firme and wel aſſured: he held for certeine that they of Aragon could not haue the ſtrength, ſocietie, or aſſiſtance of others to enterpriſe againſt him that, which alone and of their ſingular power they were not ſufficient to obteyne.

Thus Ferdinand, Lodovvyke, and Laurence hauing one equall will and deuotion to peace, partly for the perſwaſions afore ſayd, and ſomewhat for other inducements & conſiderations: the league and confederation contracted in the name of Ferdinand King of Naples, Iohn Galeas Duke of Myllan, and the common weale of Florence, was eaſily recontinued: it was begonne many yeares before, and afterward broken by many accidents, and now eftſones renewed in the yeare 1480. for xxv. yeares, being competitors & parties therin almoſt all the meaner Potentates of Italy in whom was any principall ende and purpoſe not to ſuffer the Venetians to become great: The Venetians (for their partes) being in deede more mighty and greater then any particular of the confederates, but farre leſſe and inferior to them all togither, helde their councells ſeparate from the common councell of the league, and watching to rayſe and encreaſe their eſtate by the diſcord and trauells of others, they had a continuall preparation and readines to take th'opportunitie of all occurrants and tymes which might open vnto them the way to the Empire & Monarchie of al Italy: wherunto it was clearly ſeene that they did aſpire in diuerſe ſeaſons, but chiefly when abuſing the occaſion of the death of Philip Maria Viſcoũte Duke of Myllan, they attempted vnder colour to defend the libertie of the people of Myllan, to make them ſelues Lordes of that ſtate, conſpiring in like ſort (but of later memory) to bring the Duchie of Ferrara by the way of open warre,to their ſeruitude and ſubiection.

This confederation did eaſily bridle the couetouſnes of the ſenate of Venice, but it could not entierly knit the confederats in a true and faithfull amitie,for that being indifferently repleniſhed with enuie & ielouſie, they ceaſed not to keepe a continuall care,obſeruation,& eye ouer the thoughts and behauiours of one an other,breaking mutually all their reſolucions and plotts by the which might come to any one of them enlargement of eſtate or reputacion. A thing which made not the peace leſſe ſtable,but reuiued in them all a generall readines to be carefull to quench all ſuch ſparkes and brondes as might be the cauſe of new fires and burnings.

Such was the eſtate of the affayres, ſuch were the foundacions of the tranquillitie of Italy,diſpoſed and counterpeiſed in ſuch ſort, that much leſſe that there was any dout of preſent mutacion,ſeeing the wiſedome of man could not eaſily make coniecture,by what councells,by what accidents,or with what innouacion or armies, ſo great a tranquillitie could be troubled, when in the month of Aprill 1492. chaunced the death of Laurence de medicis: A death very pitifull for him in reſpect of his age (hauing not yet fortie foure yeares) but more bitter and intollerable to his contrey, which, for the wiſedome and reputacion of the man togither with the naturall volubilitie of his witte rayſed to all thinges concerning honour and greatnes, flouriſhed plentifully with riches, loue, and ciuilitie, and with all other benefitts and felicities, which in thaffayres of the worlde are wont to accompany a long concord and peace. This death hapned alſo very ill for the reſidue of Italy, as well for his generall deuiſes, cares, and actions for the common ſewertie, as alſo for that he was a meane in particular to moderate & bridle the differences, councells,and ſuſpicions, which for diuerſe occaſions, were often kindled betwene Ferdinand and Lodovvyk Sforce, Princes equall in ambicion, and nothing inferior in power. Like as when aduerſities happen, it is ſeldom ſeene that one ill comes alone: So a litle after the death of Laurence (the time preparing euery day occaſions to the calamities to come) chaunced the death of the Pope, whoſe life being in other thinges vnprofitable to the common weale,was at the leaſt conuenient in this, that leauing ſodeinly warre and armes vnhappily rayſed in the entry and beginning of his popedom againſt Ferdinand at the inceſing of many barons of the realme of Naples, he turned ſoone after all his facultie,affections & ſpirite to pleaſures vaine,diſſolute, & idle,not acquainting his thoughts(neither for him ſelfe nor friendes) with any enterpriſe which might trouble the reſt,felicitie,& good accord of Italy. To Innocent ſucceded Roderyk Borgia borne at Valence one of the chiefe cities of Spayne:he was an auncient Cardinal & one of the greateſt in all the court of Rome:one meane that raiſed him to the ſeate of the Pope, was the difference betwene the Cardinals Aſcanius Sforce,& Iulian S. Petri ad vincla: but the chiefeſt thing that accompliſhed his election,was that with a new exãple for that time,he bought by the conſent & knowledge of euery one,partly for money, and partly with promiſes of offices and great dignities,many voyces of the Cardinals,who reiecting thinſtruction of the Goſpell, were not aſhamed to paſſe to him by ſale, an authoritie and power to make marchandize of the holy treaſors, & that with the name of the celeſtiall authority in the moſt high and eminent part of the temple. To which abominable negociacion many of them were induced by the Cardinall Aſcanius, but that was not more with perſwaſions and ſutes,then with his example: for that being corrupted with the infinite deſire of riches,he made the Pope promiſe him for his hyer and recompence of ſo great wickednes the office of vicechancellorſhippe, (the principalleſt place in the Court of Rome)

Rome) together with benefices, caſtells, and his pallaice of Rome full of mouables of great valour. But the Pope for all this, coulde not auoyde neither for the tyme to come, the iuſtice and iudgement of God, nor for the preſent, the infamy and iuſt hate of men, in whom for this election, was no ſmall impreſſions of aſtoniſhment & horror, not only for that it was entãgled with meanes diſhoneſt but alſo becauſe the natures & condicions of the man choſen, were, (for the greateſt part) knowen to many: many ſentences & coniectures were made of his ſucceſſe, & amongeſt others, Ferdinand king of Naples, diſſembling openly the griefe he had of that election, ſignified to the Queene his wife with teares (which he was wont to forbeare euen in the death of his children) that there was created a Pope who woulde be moſt hurtfull to Italy and the whole common weale of Chriſtendom. A iudgement not vnworthy of the wiſedome of ſuch a Prince: for that in Alexander the ſixt (for ſo would this newe Pope be called) was a ſutteltie, ſharpenes, and expedicion of witte moſt ſingular, a councell excellent, a wonderfull efficacie in perſwaſion, and in all great affayres a iudgement and care incredible. But theſe vertues were maruelouſly defaced by his vices, for, touching his manners and cuſtomes, they were very diſhoneſt, in his adminiſtrations he expreſſed litle ſinceritie, in his countenance no ſhame, in his wordes ſmall trueth, in his hart litle faith, and in his opinion leſſe religion. Of the contrary, all his actions were defiled with an inſatiable couetouſnes, an immoderate ambicion, a barbarous crueltie, and a burning deſire to rayſe and make greate (by what meanes ſo euer) his children, who were many in number, and amongeſt others, one, no leſſe deteſtable then the father, to whoſe curſed councells he became a wicked inſtrument. Great was the chaunge in the affayres of the Church by the death of Innocent the eyght, but no leſſe reuolucion happened in the common weale of Florence by the taking away of Laurence de medicis, to whoſe greatnes (without contradiction) ſũceeded Peter the eldeſt of his three ſonnes, who as well for his age being yet younge, as alſo for his other qualities was not fitte for the gouernment of ſo heauie a charge, and leſſe capable to manage the affayres with that moderacion which his father was wont to vſe in buſines both forreyn and domeſticall, and knowing diſcreetely how to temporiſe betwene Princes confederate, he had whileſt he liued augmẽted greatly the condicions and facultyes both publike and priuate, and at his death, left vnto euery one a firme opinion that the peace of Italy was principally preſerued by his meanes.

Pope Alexander the ſixt flayned with many vices.

Peter de medicis heire to Laurence.

Peter was no ſooner ſucceeded to thadminiſtracion of the common weale, then with a courſe directly contrary to the councells of his father, & not communicating with thoſe auncient citiſens which were wont to be called to the deliberacion of buſines of importance, he ioyned him ſelfe ſo ſtraitly with Ferdinand and Alphonſe, perhaps by the perſwacion of Virginio Vrſin his parent depending wholy vppon them, that Lodovvyk Sforce had iuſt occaſion to feare, that as often as the Aragons would annoy him, they ſhould be ayded (by thauthoritie of Peter de medicis) with the forces of the common weale of Florence. This intelligence, ſeminary, and originall of all the troubles, albeit at the beginning was debated with no leſſe iudgement and wiſedome, then the reſolucion ſecrete and priuate: yet by certeine obſcure coniectures, it beganne euen in the beginning to be ſuſpected by Lodovvyk, a Prince very watchfull and of right ſuttle vnderſtanding: for, as it hath bene an auncient cuſtome in Chriſtendome to ſende Embaſſadors to congratulate with the newe Pope as Chriſtes vicar on earth, and to offer him obedience: So Lodovvyk Sforce who appropriated to him ſelf this peculiar cuſtome to ſtudy to ſhew him ſelfe more

Lod. Sforce is ielous ouer the amities betwene P. de medicis & the Aragons.

wiſe then the reſt and of inuentions ſtraunge and vnaduiſed to others, had giuen counſell that thembaſſadors of the confederats ſhould all enter Rome in one day, and preſenting them ſelues altogither in the publike conſiſtorie afore the Pope, the oration ſhould be expreſſed by one of them onely in the name of them all: for that by that forme and order of doing, beſides thencreaſe of their common reputation, it ſhould appeare to all Italy that there was amongeſt them not onely a good will and confederation, but rather ſo great a coniunction, that they ſeemed as one body, one Prince, and one inueſted corporation. To this he adioyned, that as touching the vtilitie of this councell, it was not onely expreſſed with the diſcourſe of reaſon, but iuſtified with a late and familiar example, for that (as was beleued) the laſt Pope taking argument of the diſunion of the confederates in that at ſeuerall ſeaſons, and with councells ſeparate, they had done him obedience, he was the more ready to inuade the kingdom of Naples. Ferdinand approued eaſily the aduiſe of Lodouvyk: the Florentines allowed it for thauthoritie of the one and other: and Peter de medicis was not againſt it in open councell, albeit in particular, the deuiſe was nothing agreeable to him: for that being one of the elect Embaſſadors for that common weale, & hauing an intention to make his legacion glorious with proud and gorgeous demonſtrations, he feared that if he ſhould make his entry into the citie and the Popes preſence amongeſt the other Embaſſadors of the confederats, the magnificencie of his trayne would not be ſeene no more then a litle candle amidd a choyſe ſort of greater lights. This vanitie of the yong man was confirmed by the ambicious councell of Gentyll Byſhop of Arze, the other coembaſſador for Florence: to him belonged the authoritie of the oration in the name of the Florentines, by reaſon of his dignitie and profeſſion in the ſtudies of humanitie: And ſeeing by this maner no leſſe vnlooked for then alwayes vnaccuſtomed, he ſaw him ſelfe depriued of thoccaſion to publiſh his eloquence in an aſſemblie ſo honorable and ſolemne, he complayned as if he had ſuffered wrong in his perpetuall reputation. For this reaſon, Peter de medicis, puſhed on partly by his proper vanitie and lightnes, and partely by the pompe and ambicion of the other, required the king of Naples (albeit with this caution to keepe from Lodouvyk that he did impugne his councell) to conſider that that forme of legacion could not be executed in common without great confuſion, and therefore that he would take vpon him to perſwade that thexpedicion might be ſeparat, and paſſe according to the examples paſſed. The king of Naples deſiring to gratifie him in his demaund (but yet not without the diſpleaſure of Lodouvyk) ſatisfied him in theffect, but not in the maner, plainly declaring to Lodouvyk that he did not diſcondeſcend from the firſt plott and reſolucion for thembaſſadors, for other occaſion then at the inſtance and ſolicitation of Peter de medicis: Lodouvyk for this ſuddein mutacion, declared more perplexitie and trouble of mind, then the nature and importance of the thing could deſerue, and amydd his complaintes, he impropriated to him ſelfe this degree of iniurie, that to diminiſh his reputation, they reuoked the firſt deuiſe wherof he was author and already had communicated it with the Pope and the whole court of Rome. But the point wherein he felt his moſt trouble and trauell of mind was, for that in this litle & vayne accident, he ſaw tokens, argument, and coniectures, that Peter de medicis had ſecret intelligence with Ferdinand, which by the euentes that followed he diſcouered dayly more apparantly. Languilare, Cernetre, and other ſmall caſtells neare to Rome, were in the poſſeſſion of Franciſquin Cibo, a Genoway, baſtard ſonne to Pope Innocent, and he after the death of his father being gone to dwell at Florence, perhaps vnder the fauour and ſocietie of Peter de medicis, medicis, brother to M. his wife: ſolde immediatly after his comming thether to Virginio Vrſin by the negociation of Peter, thoſe caſtells for the price of forty thouſand duckats. A thing debated chiefly with Ferdinand who lent him moſt part of the money, perſwading him ſelfe that it could not but turne to his profite, if the greatnes of Virginio who was his parent and in his pay, ſhould enlarge and ſtretch farre about the confins of Rome. The king conſidered that the power of the Popes was an apt inſtrument to trouble the realme of Naples (an auncient freeholder and chiefe of the church of Rome) both for that it had large borders vpon the eccleſiaſticall territories, and he had not yet forgotten what differences he and his father had with them: and alſo he wiſely foreſaw that there is alwayes ſome occaſion of newe contencions about the iuriſdiction of Confins, both for tributes and collacion of benefices, and for regard of entercourſe of barons with many other quarrels hapning many tymes amongeſt eſtates borderers, and no leſſe often betwene the vaſſall and the Lord Paramount: for which reaſons, he held alwayes for one of the firme foundacions of his ſecuritie, that all or the greater part of the mightieſt barons of the territory of Rome, ſhould depend vpon him. A thing which in that time he wrought with ſo much the more care and diligence, by how much the world iudged that the authoritie of Lodovvyk Sforce was like to be great with the Pope by the meane of Cardinall Aſcanius his brother: And as many beleued, he was perhaps not the leaſt puſhed forward with feare leaſt in Alexander were concurrant the couetouſnes and hatred of his vncle Pope Calixtus the third, who, (ſauing that death gaue impediment to his councells) had immediatly after the deceaſe of Alphonſo father to Ferdinand, taken armes to diſpoile him of the kingdome of Naples, (reuerted as he ſayd to the Church). He did not remember (ſo litle force amongeſt men hath the memorie of benefits receiued) how by the meane of Alphonſo (in whoſe kingdoms he was borne, and to whom he had bene a ſeruant long tyme) he had obteyned other eccleſiaſtical dignities with a liberal fauour and ayde to aſpire to the popedom. But it hath bene alwayes a thing very true that wiſemen haue not at all tymes a diſcretion or iudgement perfect, ſeeing it is neceſſary, that the ſignes of the weakenes and frailtie of mans vnderſtanding ſhould many tymes be diſcouered. The king of Naples, notwithſtanding he was recommended for a Prince watchfull, pollitike, and foreſeeing, yet did he ouerſee to conſider how much this deliberation deſerued to be reiected, for that conteyning in no accident or fortune any other hope then of a ſmall vtilitie, it bredde on the other ſide, many degrees and properties of miſchiefes and harmes irreparable, for that in the ſale of thoſe ſmall caſtels was no litle opportunitie to innouate to newe things, the mindes of thoſe to whom it did either apperteyne, or had intereſt of profite to looke to the preſeruation of the common peace and concord: for the Pope pretending that by ſuch alienacion made without his knowledge, they were diuolued to the ſea Apoſtolike by the diſpoſing of the lawes, ſeemed not a litle iniuried: & looking withall into the endes and purpoſes of Ferdinand, filled all Italy with complaintes againſt him, Peter de medicis, and Virginio, whom he aſſured that ſo farre as his power would ſtretch, he would not ſpare any thing nor let paſſe any meane to preſerue the dignitie and right of the ſea of Rome. Lodovvyk Sforce was no leſſe moued, to whom were alwaies ſuſpected the actions of Ferdinand, and who, for the falſe opinion he had that the Pope would be gouerned by the councells of Aſcanius and him ſelfe, eſtemed it his proper loſſe, if any thing ſhould be diminiſhed of the greatnes of Alexander: But that which vexed him moſt, was that he could not but doubt, that betwene the Aragons and P. de medicis was contracted a ſecret and an aſſured league, drawing his coniecture from this that in that action they had proceded wholy, vniformely, and reciprocally: And therefore to raiſe impediments to thoſe plots & determinations as moſt daungerous to his affayres, & to make this occaſion conuenient to winne the Pope, he ſtirred him vp as much as he could to protect his proper dignitie: he perſwaded with him that there was not ſo much neceſſitie to ſet before his eyes thinges that were done preſently, as to conſider how much it imported him, to ſuffer in the firſt dayes of his pontificacie, to be deſpiſed the maieſtie of ſuch a degree euen by his proper vaſſalls: he told him he had not to beleue that the couetouſnes of Virginio, or the importance of the caſtells, or other reaſon of that nature, had moued Ferdinand: But a certeine languiſhing deſire (which he could no longer keepe ſmoothered) to aſſay his patience and courage with iniuries bearing litle face and ſhew at the beginning, but afterwards (if he would ioyne ſufferance to thoſe inferior wronges) he would not be without boldenes to tempt him euery day with offences of farre higher and greater qualitie: he aduiſed him to beleue, that the ambicion of Ferdinand did nothing differ from his auncestors kings of Naples and perpetuall enemies to the Church of Rome, who had not forborne to perſecute the Popes with warres and armies, and ſome times had occupied Rome: That the example is freſh & green, that the king now reigning, in the perſon of his ſonne, diſpatched two armies at two ſeueral times againſt two Popes, & made inuaſion euen to the wals of Rome: That he hath bene alwaies exerciſed in malice, conſpiracies, and warres againſt his predeceſſors: And now not onely the example of other kinges, not onely his naturall couetouſnes to beare rule, did ſtirre him vppe againſt him, but rather an olde infected deſire of reuenge nowe burſt out by the memorie of iniuries receiued of Calixtus his vncle. Therefore he aduiſed him with great diligence to looke into thoſe thinges, leaſt by giuing ſufferance and patience to theſe firſt wronges, he were not the breeder of his proper diſhonor and derogacion, making him ſelfe to be honored with ceremonies and vayne titles, and in effect followed with diſpite, deriſion and contempt of euery one: he told him that in this vnworthy tolleracion was ſecretly many oportunities of courage & boldnes to the party to conſpire againſt him many daungerous enterpriſes: where, if he would take this to hart and call thinges into correction and iuſtice, he ſhould with more facilitie preſerue the auncient maieſtie & greatnes with the true reuerence due by all the world to the Popes of Rome. To theſe perſwaſions he ioyned many offices and promiſes of no ſmall importance, but farre greater in efficacie and effect, for that he lent him readily forty thouſand duckatts, and leuyed with him at their common charge three hundreth men at armes, vnder this condicion that they ſhould be employed where it beſt pleaſed the Pope. Notwithſtanding all this, Lodovvyk, deſirous to ſhunne the neceſſitie to enter into new troubles, cõmunicated with Ferdinand, & councelled him to diſpoſe Virginio to appeaſe the Pope by ſome honeſt meane, leſt vpon ſo fléder beginnings, there aroſe not diſpleaſures and troubles heauy and ſlaunderous. But with greater libertie and efficacy, he admoniſhed often times Peter de medicis, that (conſidering how conuenient it was for the common peace of Italy that his father Laurence was alwayes as the mediator and indifferent friend of Ferdinand and him) he would rather take the wayes, examples, and directions of his father ſpecially touching a perſonage of ſo great valour, then beleuing new councells, to be driuen to giue occaſion to an other, to make deliberacions which in the ende woulde proue hurtfull to euery one: he willed him to remember what great reputacion & ſewertie the Sforces and Medicis had giuen reciprocally to their houſes: and with what wronges and iniuries the familie milie of Aragon had obtruded vpon his father, his auncestors, and common weale of Florence: and lastly by how many meanes and times Ferdinand and Alphonso his father had conspired some times by armes and open force, and often by traines & suttelties, to make them selues Lordes of Tuskane.

These councells or aduertisements brought fourth litle frute according to thexpectation of the author, for that Ferdinand, esteeming it much to his indignitie to giue place to Lodovvyk and Astanius, by whose workings he supposed the Pope was setled into those discontentements and indignations which he shewed: gaue secrete councel to Virginio by thincitation of his sonne Alphonso, not to delay to take by vertue of his purchase, the possession of the castells, promising to defend him against all displeasures that might happen. And of the other side, gouerning him selfe with his naturall industrie, he communicated with the Pope diuerse meanes of composicion, secretely incensing Virginio notwithstanding not to consent to any but such, as might keepe the castells in his possession, satisfying the Pope with some portion of money: which comfortes set Virginio into such a courage & resolucion of mind, that many times afterwards he refused certein of the condicions, euen such as Ferdinand (not to incense the Pope to much) solicited him instantly to be accepted. By these actions it was plainly perceiued that Peter de medicis persеuered to follow the authoritie of the king, & that all that was done to draw him away, was in vaine & without frute: therefore Lodovvyk Sforte deepely reuoluing how much it imported that the citie of Florence should be at the deuocion of his enemies, whose temperature and good gouernment was wont to be the principall foundacion of his securitie, and seming to see in his secret cogitacion many impressions of daungers threatning him on all sides, determined to prouide for his proper safetie, and to those newe perills to appropriate new remedies, specially his conscience interpreting vnto him with what vehement desire the Aragons thirsted to take from him the gouernment of his Nephew: which iust ambicio, albeit Ferdinand (to whom nothing was more familiar the to dissemble his intentions) had sought to couer in all his actions, yet in Alphonso, of nature more open and liberall, was not so great continencie and moderacion, but that he complayned publikely of thoppression of his sonne in lawe, pronouncing with more great libertie of wordes, then temperance of discression many iniurious speeches tending to manifest threatning. To these coniectures, Lodovvyk added this argument of suspicion: He knew well that Isabell wife to Iohn Galeas, a young Lady of high stomacke would vse a perpetuall diligence to incense her father & grandfather, that if thindignitie which was done to her husband and her would not moue them, at least the consideracion of the perills whereunto their owne liues were exposed, togither with the lamentable ruine of their children, might draw them to compassion. But that which chiefly occupied his mind with perplexitie and torment, was, that by the suggestion of his proper conscience, he knew how hatefull his name was to the subiectes of the Duchie of Myllan, as well for the greeuous and vnaccustomed money tributes which he had imposed vpon them, as also for the compassion that euery one had of Iohn Galeas their rightfull Lord. And although he trauelled by all his best wayes to make them of Aragon suspected of a desire to impatronise them selues of that estate, as though they did assume a title by the auncient rightes of the testament of Philip Maria Viscounte, who had instituted his heire Alphonso father to Ferdinand, and vnder that pretence ment to wrest from him the gouernment of his Nephew: yet, he found him selfe vnable by all these meanes to remoue the hatredes that were conceyued agaynst him, and much lesse so to satisfie the world, but that all men might conſider to how many miſeries and wickednes the ambicion and wretched deſire to beare rule, leades mortall men. Therefore after he had made diſcourſe and conference with no ſmall ſtudy and trauell of minde of the ſtate of thinges preſent, and the daungers likely to happen, caſting aſide all other thoughts, his deuiſes at laſt brought forth this reſolution to ſearch newe confederats and new friendes: Touching this reſolucion he found a great oportunitie in the Popes diſdaine againſt Ferdinand, and in the deſire which he beleued the ſtate of Venice had, that this confederacion ſhould chaunge and alter, which of long time had giuen no ſmall impediments to their purpoſes: he made ſolicitation to both theſe to contract in common a new confederacie for the publike benefite.

But the Pope reiecting all paſſions of anger, and all other affection, had his mind onely poſſeſt with an vnbridled couetouſnes to rayſe and make mighty his ſonnes, in whom hauing ſetled a blind fancie, he was not aſhamed contrary to the cuſtome of former Popes (who to caſt ſome cloke ouer their infamie were wont to call them their Nephewes) called them his children, and expreſſed them to the world for ſuch: And not finding as yet other fitte occaſion to giue beginning to his ambicious intention: he made inſtance to marry one of his two ſonnes to the baſtard daughter of Alphonſo demaunding a dowrie of ſome rich eſtate in the kingdom of Naples: from which hope ſo long as he was not excluded, he harkened rather with his eare then his hart to the confederacion offered by Lodovvyk. And if in this deſire he had bene ſatisfied, the peace of Italy had not perhaps falne into ſo ſodein alteracion & trouble.

Ferdinand happily had not his mind much eſtraunged from that motion: but Alphonſo to whom was hatefull the ambicion and pride of the Pope, denied conſtantly his conſent, and yet keeping his intencions diſſembled, they made no open chalenge or diſlike to the mariage, but laying all the difficultie vpon the qualitie of the dowrie that was demaunded, they ſatisfied not Alexander, who riſing for this cauſe into diſcontentement, reſolued to embrace the councells of Lodovvyk, his humors being turned all into diſdaine and ambicion, and his mind trauelled with feare for that not onely Virginio Vrſin was mercinary to Ferdinand. And for the many fauours he had receiued of him and them of Florence, and being withall of the faction of the Guelffes, was at that time very mighty throughout the whole dominions of the Church. But that which more was, Proſper and Fabricius principall heades of the familie of the Collonnoys, and the Cardinall of S. P. ad vincla, a Cardinall of great reputacion (then retyred to the Caſtell of Oſtie, which he held as Biſhop of the place, leaſt the Pope ſhould dreſſe ſome ambuſh againſt his life:) was now become a great friend to Ferdinand, to whom before he was a profeſſed enemie, and had many times ſtirred the Popes Sixtus and Innocent againſt him. But the Senate of Venice contrary to the opinion and expectation of the world made no great ſhew of readines to this confederacion, for, albeit they tooke it to happen to their commoditie, and held withall very agreeable the diſunion of others, yet they tooke occaſion in the infidelitie of the Pope being euery day more and more ſuſpected to euery one, to be ſlow to harken to the league, the remembrance of the alliances made by them with Sixtus & Innocent the Popes lateſt predeceſſors ſeruing much to their preſent diſtruſt. This was when the warre was moſt hoate againſt the Duke of Ferrara, whereunto after he had prouoked them, & intangled them with the quarrell, receiuing of the one great diſpleaſures without any profit, and for Sixtus, he did not onely chaunge purpoſe, but alſo recompenſed them with his ſpirituall curſes, and (togither with the reſidue of all Italy) he proceeded againſt them with his temporall corrections: But notwithſtanding

all theſe, the induſtrie and diligence of Lodovvyk continually ſoliciting the Senate, and priuatly working with many in particular, all theſe difficulties were vanquiſhed, and at laſt was contracted in the month of Aprill 1493. betwene the Pope, the Senate of Venice, and John Galeas Duke of Myllan (for all expedicions were diſpatched in his name). A new confederacion for their common defence and particular preſeruation of the gouernment of Lodovvyk: one of the condicions was, that the Venetians and Duke of Myllan, and euery of them ſhould ſend immediatly to Rome for the ſewertie of the Pope and ſtate eccleſiaſtick, an hundreth men at armes, as well with thoſe, as with greater forces (if neede required) they ſhould ioyne with him for the recouerie of the caſtells deteyned by Virginio.

Confederacion betwene the Pope, the Venetians & the Duke of Myllan.

Theſe new councells moued not a litle the mindes of all Italy, for that the Duke of Myllan remayned now deuided from that league, by the which for more then a dozen yeares, their common ſecuritie was mainteyned, being in it expreſly defended that none of the confederats ſhould enter any new alliance without conſent of the reſidue. And therefore ſeeing that vnitie was broken with vnequall diuiſion, wherein conſiſted the equalitie of their generall and common buſines, and the mindes of the Princes repleniſhed with ſuſpicions and diſpleaſures, there could be no expectacion of other ſucceſſe then that, to a generall and common hurt, there would reſort frutes equall and conformable to ſuch ſeedes. Nowe, the Duke of Calabria and P. de medicis, iudging it more for the ſewertie of their eſtates to preuent, then to be preuented, inclyned eaſily to Proſper and Fabricius Colonne, who being alſo ſecretely incenſed by the Cardinal S. P. ad vincla, offered to ſurpriſe the towne of Rome with their companies of men at armes & the ayde of the faction of the Gebelyns, ſo that the Vrſins would follow them, and the Duke of Calabria march ſo neare, that he might reſkew them within three dayes after their entry into Rome.

But Ferdinand, who now deſired no more to vexe but to appaiſe the courage of the Pope, and to correct that which heretofore had bene done by a raſh councell & without diſcreſſion, reiected altogither thoſe councells wherein he iudged was infection of commotion, and caried not intencion and matter to breede ſecuritie, but to rayſe and nouriſh greater troubles and daungers: he determined now, not faynedly but with all his hart to doe all he could to compound and accord the controuerſie of the caſtells, perſwading him ſelfe, that that occaſion of ſo great emotion & chaunge being taken away, Italy would ſpeedely returne with litle or no trauell, to her firſt eſtate. But it hapneth not alwayes, that in taking away thoccaſions, theffectes doe ceaſe, hauing had of them their firſt beginning: for, as it often tymes hapneth that reſolucions made by feare, ſeeme to him that feareth, leſſe then the perill: ſo Lodovvyk had no great confidence in that he had found a remedie ſufficient for his ſecuritie: But dowting, by reaſon the Pope and the Venetians had intencions and endes other then his, that his foundacion could not long laſt which he had layd vppon the confederacion lately made with them, and that therefore his affayres by diuerſe accidents ſhould be in daunger to be reduced into hard tearmes and many difficulties: he applyed all his thoughts more to cure euen to the roote the originall ill that he ſett before his eyes, then to prouide a ſalue for ſuch accidents as might happen by it, neither remembring how daungerous it is to vſe a medicine ſtronger then the nature of the diſeaſe or complexion of the patient will ſuffer, nor that to enter into greater perills can be the onely remedie for daungers preſent. And to the ende to build his ſewertie vppon forreine ſtrength, ſeeing he had no confidence in his owne forces, and leſſe expectacion of truſt in thitalyan amities, he determined to doe all that he could to ſtirre vp the French King Charles the viij. to aſſayle the kingdom of Naples, which he pretended to appertein to him by the auncient rightes & diſcentes of the houſe of Aniovv.

The title of the houſe of Aniow, to the kingdom of Naples.

The kingdom of Naples, which, in the inueſtitures & bulls of the Church of Rome whereof it is an auncient freehold, is abſurdly called the Realme of Sicyle on this ſide the riuer of Far, and being vniuſtly vſurped by Manfroy baſtard ſonne to the Emperour Frederyk the ſecond, was giuen in chiefe togither with the yle of Sicyle vnder the title of both Sicyles, the one on this ſide, and the other beyond Far, by Pope Vrbyn the fourth, to Charles Earle of Prouence and Aniovv, brother to that Levvys king of the french, who, much renowmed for his power & ſtrength, but more recommended for the holines of his life, deſerued (according to the vaine affections of the frenchmen) to be tranſlated after his death into the number of Saincts. This Charles with force of armes, obteyned effectually, that, which by title was giuen to him with thauthoritie of the Church: after his death, ſucceeded to the kingdom, Charles his ſonne called by the Italyans, (to diſtinguiſh him from his father) Charles the ſecond, who left the inheritance of the Realme to Robert his ſonne. But becauſe Robert died without iſſue male, Iohane daughter of Charles Duke of Calabria ſonne to Robert, who died in young age before his father, aſpired to the kingdom: but her authoritie beganne immediately to be deiected, no leſſe for thinfamie of her life and condicions, then for the common imbecillitie of that ſexe: whereuppon, with thincreaſe of time, the Realme being throwne into many diſcordes and warres, not with ſtraungers, but amongeſt the ſelfe ſucceſſors of Charles the firſt, deſcending of diuerſe children of Charles the ſeconde: Iohane deſpayring not to be able to defend her ſelfe, adopted for her ſonne, Levvys Duke of Aniovv, brother to the frenche Kinge Charles the fift: he to whome the french men gaue the ſurname of wiſe, for that he had obteyned many victories without feeling the power of Fortune. This Levvys, after he had paſſed into Italy with a mighty armie (Iohane being aforehand deceſſed by violent meanes, and the kingdom transferred to Charles called Durazzo deſcending likewiſe of Charles the firſt) died of a feuer in Apulia euen when he was almoſt in poſſeſſion of the victorie: ſo that there came no other thing to them of Aniovv by this adopcion, then thearldom of Prouence, which had bene alwaies poſſeſſed by the yſſues of Charles the firſt. But yet of that roſe the original of the colour vnder the which afterwards, both Levvys of Aniovv, ſonne to the firſt Levvys, & at an other tyme a ſonnes ſonne of the ſame name both ſtirred vp by the Popes, being then in variance with the ſame kinges, to make many inuaſions vppon the kingdom of Naples, but with great misfortune and preiudice. Touching Charles Durazzo, Ladiſlao his ſonne ſucceeded him, who dying without iſſue in the yeare 1414. the crowne diuolued to his ſiſter Iohane the ſecond, A name much accurſed for the kingdom of Naples, and no leſſe vnhappy to both the one and other of the women, reſembling one an other in diſſolute gouernment and wanton cuſtomes of life: for this Iohane putting the pollecie and direction of the Realme into the handes of thoſe perſons with whom ſhe communicated vnchaſtly her body, was immediatly brought into ſuch ſtraites and difficulties, that being tormented with Levvys the third, with the aide of Pope Martyn the v. ſhe was at laſt conſtrayned for her laſt refuge, to make her ſonne by adopcion, Alphonſo king of Aragon & Sicyle. But entring ſoone after into contencion with him, ſhe brake that adopcion vnder colour of ingratitude, & made a new adopcion, calling to her ſuccours, the ſelfe Levvys, who perſecuting her with warre, compelled her by the neceſſities of warre, to make the firſt adopcion: In ſo much as hauing with force chaſſed Alphonſo wholly out of the kingdom, ſhe enioyed it in peace, all the reſidue of her life: And dying without yſſue, ſhe inſtituted for her heire (as the brute went) Rene Duke of Aniovv and Earle of Prouence brother to Levvys her ſonne adoptyf, who perhaps died the ſame yeare. But the ſucceſſion of Rene diſpleaſing much the Barons of the realme (beſides a brute running that the teſtament was forged by them of Naples) Alphonſo was reuoked by a part of the Barons & people: And from thence kindled the fire of the warres betwene Alphonſo & Rene, which by many yeres brought many afflictions to that noble realme, & yet the accidēts & actions of the warres were more by the proper forces of the realme, then by the ſtrength of the parties. In this ſort (the wills of men being different and contrary) were kindled the factions not altogither in that time quenched betwene the Aragons and them of Aniovv, their titles and coulers of rightes chaunging with the time, for that the Popes following more their cuſtoms of couetouſnes, or the propertie of times, then iuſtice or equitie cōſented diuerſly to the inueſtitures of them. But touching the warres betwene Alphonſo & Rene, the victory remained to Alphonſo, a Prince for his valer, more renowmed, for his power, more mighty, & for his fortune, better fauored: who dying ſoone after without lawful heires, & without making any mēcion of Iohn his brother & ſucceſſor to the realme of Sicile & Aragon, bequeathed by teſtament the kingdom of Naples to Ferdinand his baſtard ſonne, as a iuſt reward & teſtimonie of his proper getting & cōqueſt, & therfore he iudged it could not appertein to the crowne of Aragon. This baſtard, notwithſtanding he was immediatly after the death of his father, inuaded by Iohn the ſonne of Rene, & that by the ſupportacion of the principal barōs of the realme: yet with his fortune & vertue he mainteined not only good defēce, but alſo ſo chaſſed his aduerſaries, that neuer after during the life of Rene (ſuruiuing many yeares his ſonne,) he neither had to debate with thoſe of Aniovv, nor yet ſtoode in feare of their inuacions. In the end Rene died, & hauing no yſſue male, he eſtabliſhed as heire ouer his whole eſtates, Charles the ſōne of his brother, who dying ſoone after without childrē, left by his wil his inheritāce to the frēch king Levvys the xj. to whō did not only returne as to his Lord ſouereigne the Duchie of Aniovv (which ſuffreth no capacity of ſucceſſion in the women, for that it is a mēber of the crowne) but alſo he put him ſelfe in the poſſeſſion of Prouence, notwithſtanding the Duke of Lorraine deſcending of one of the daughters of Rene, iuſtified the inheritance of his eſtates to appertein vnto him. And the ſayd Levvys by iuſt vertue & prerogatiue of the ſame teſtamēt, had good power to pretend that the rightes which thoſe of Aniovv had to the kingdom of Naples, ſhould be appropriated to him. All which inheritāces being paſſed & cōtinued after his death to the perſon of Charles the viij. his ſōne, Ferdinand king of Naples began to haue a mighty enemy, beſides the oportunitie generally offring to who ſoeuer deſired to annoy him. For, at that time, this was the ſtate of the realme of Fraunce: it was very populous in multitudes of men, for wealth & riches euery particular region moſt fertill & plētiful, for glory in armes moſt floriſhing & renowmed: a pollicy wel directed, diſcipline adminiſtred, an authority dreadful, & in opinion & hope moſt mighty, laſtly their generall condiciōs & faculties ſo wel furniſhed, as phaps it was not more happy in theſe mortal felicities ſince the daies of Charlemain. It was newly amplified in euery one of the 3. parts wherein all Gavvle ſtoode deuided by the aūcients: for, xl. yeares before vnder Charles the vij. (a Prince for his victories obteined with great daūgers called happy) Normādie & the Duchie of Guyen holden by the engliſh, were reduced to the obediēce of the frēch crowne. And in the laſt daies of Levvys the xj. the earldō of Prouence, the dukdom of Burgondy, almoſt all Picardy togither with the Duchie of Britaine, were by a newe mariage inueſted in the power of Charles the viij. There was no wāt of inclinaciō in this king to aſpire to conquer by warre and armes the kingdom of Naples as iuſtly apperteyning to him: which continuing from his infancie by a certeine naturall inſtinct, was enterteyned and nouriſhed by ſuch as were about him, and for the conformetie of humors, very agreeable with him: they raiſed his thoughts into vaine regions, and made him glorious aboue the triumphes of Cæſar and Alexander: they told him that with his heroicall minde, vertues, and diſpoſition, did concurre a preſent occaſion to make him ſurmount the renowme of his predeceſſors, for that in the conqueſt of Naples was a ready way for him to bring vnder his ſubiection thempire of the Turkes.

Theſe things being knowne to many, brought many hopes to Lodovvyk Sforce to perſwade eaſily the thing he deſired, who alſo reappoſed much in the frēdſhip & familiaritie which the name of Sforce had in the french court: for, both in him & in his brother Galeas afore him was continued by many demonſtracions & good offices, the amitie begon by Francis Sforce their father, who xxx. yeares before hauing receiued in fee of Leuvys the xj. (whoſe mind abhorred alwaies the things of Italy) the city of Sauōe with the right which he pretēded to haue to Genes poſſeſſed aforetime by his father, neuer failed him in his daūgers, neither with coūcel, ſuccors, nor affectiō.

But Lodovvik to ſolicite in Fraunce with more credit and authoritie, and iudging him ſelfe vnable alone both for the importance and daunger of the thing: to handle ſo great an enterpriſe: ſought to communicate & perſwade all things with the Pope, in whō he knew had moſt dominion two ſtirring humors, ambicion & diſdayne: he told him that not by the fauors of the Princes of Italy, and much leſſe by the meane of their armies and helpes, he ſhould be reuenged of Ferdinand, nor haue hope to compaſſe eſtates worthy and honorable for thaduancement of his ſonnes. He found the Pope to beare a vehement and ready wil to the matter, perhaps for a deſire to innouate and alter thinges, but more likely to conſtraine the Aragons by feare to come to that which by conſent & wil they would not accord to him. After they had communicated their councells, they diſpatched ſecretly into Fraunce, perſonages of truſt to ſound the will of the king & ſuch as gouerned him: who ſhewing them ſelues not farre from their intencion, Lodovvyk turning his whole witts to the deuiſe of this enterpriſe: ſent in the ſight of all the world (but ſhadowing it with other occaſions) one Charles Balbyan Earle of Belioyenſe, who ſoliciting the king certeine dayes in priuate audience, & working particularly with ſundry of his principal fauorits, was at laſt introduced into open councell, the king preſent, where in a publike hearing of the Prince, his Lordes and Prelates of the Court, he deliuered this formē of diſcourſe.

Thembaſſador of Myllan perſwades the french king to the voyage of Naples.

Moſt chriſtian king, The experiēce of the diſpoſiciō of harts diuerſly inclined, makes me dowtful, whether vnder a direct & abſolute forme, I ſhould begin my diſcours, or vſing the cuſtome of Orators, bring into queſtion ſuch obiectiōs as may be oppoſed againſt the preſēt matter: for, in cauſes of perſwaſion, the one with the other muſt orderly cōcurre, leaſt for want of due office in the ſpeaker, the matter ſeeming to ſuffer imperfectiō & error, do not bring forth reſolucion & effect according to thexpectacion of the parties for whom he ſolicites. And albeit the vniuerſal coniecture & opiniō of your maieſties many vertues, & the graue aſpect & face of your right wiſe coūcel here aſſēbled, promiſe no leſſe ready cōſent & liking, thē the matter is iuſt & innocēt yet for your maieſties better inducemēt, & general ſatisfactiō of your Lordes & Prelats aſſiſting, I wil ioyne my ſelf to the refutaciō of that general dout which innegociaciōs of this nature, are cōmonly obiected, more by cuſtō, thē iuſt cauſe ariſing:

If therefore (right Christian king) any man for what occasion so euer, will hold for suspected the integritie of mind and faith, with the which Lodovvik Sforce comes to councel you to beare armes to cõquer the kingdom of Naples: he may easily deliuer his mind of that ill grounded suspicion, if he either loke into the offers, offices, & cõdicions wherwith he doth accompany his perswasion & councell, offering you the cõmoditie of his treasors, men, & all other oportunities: or at least wil cal to his memory with what deuociõ both he, Galeas his brother, & originally Francis his father, did honor the late king Levvys your father, continued with no lesse constancie, faith, & piety to the glorious name of your maiestie. Let him consider also that by this enterprise, Lodovvyk standes possible to many great daungers with a very naked hope of any profit: yea in this is conteined the only benefit he shall haue, to see a iust reuenge of the ambushes & wronges done by them of Aragon: where your maiestie by meane of the victory shal happily aspire to a most florishing kingdom, bringing with it a greater glory & oportunitie of farre more high and honorable merite, an action wherunto the thoughts of mighty Princes ought to be fashioned. And of the other part, if it happen that you come not to the end of this enterprise: yet your maiestie loseth no reputacion, nor your greatnes the more diminished: for that onely the fortunes of Princes are subiect to opiniõs, but not their estate & maiesty impaired. But for Lodovvyk, he is of nothing more sure then to suffer general ill wil & contempt, & of nothing more vnsure then to find remedy in his perils: for that in him would concurre all the displeasures & slaunders which may concerne his estate, life or reputacion. And therfore I see not how should be suspected the councels of him, whose cõdicions & fortunes are so vnequal & inferior to yours. But there be reasons stirring you to this honorable expedicion, which for the simplicity, roundnes, & innocency they conteine, will admitte no dowt: for that in them are liberally concurrant all the groundes & foundacions which in consulting of enterprises, merit chiefest conside-racion: that is to say, the iustice of the cause, the facilitie of the conquest, & the great frut of the victory: it is manifest to all the world, how resolute & apparãt be the rights which the house of Aniovv, to whom you are lawful inheritor hath to the realme of Naples, & how iust is the succession which this crowne pretendes to it by the yssues of Charles, who first of the blood royall of Fraunce, obteyned the same kingdom both with thauthoritie of the Pope, and by his proper valour. And it is no lesse easie to conquer it, then the action is iust: for, who knowes not, howe much the King of Naples is inferior in force, authoritie, and fortune, to the most mightie King of all Christendom. And no nation dowteth with what terrour and renowne the name of the french thundreth throughout the regions of the world, neyther with what astonishment the brute of your armies, keepeth other contreys in dread. At no time did the inferior Dukes of Aniovv assaile the kingdom of Naples: that they put it not in great hazard: And it is to late to be forgotten, how Iohn sonne of Rene had in his hand the victorie against Ferdinand now reigning, if Pope Pius had not taken it from him: but much more Francys Sforce, who forbare (as is well knowen) to obey Levvys the xj. your father. If those small forces trained with thẽ so great fortunes, what may be hoped for of the armies & authoritie of so mighty a king, all oportunities being increased, and the difficulties obiected against Rene and Iohn, diminished, seeing the Princes of those estates which gaue impediments to their victories, haue now vnitie & confederacion with you: & in them be no small meanes to offend the kingdom of Naples: for, the Pope by lãd, by reason the territories of the church are frõtiers to Naples, & the Duke of Myllan by sea, applying to you the cõmoditie & seruice of Genes:

" will be furtherers of your victorie with many helpes, fauours, and commodities: be" sides these, there is no potentacie or iurisdiction in Italy wil oppose against you: for, it
" can not be iudged of the Venetians that they will throwe them selues into expenses
" and daungers, and much lesse depriue their estate of the amitie wherein so long time
" they haue bene interteyned with the kinges of Fraunce: to preserue or protect Ferdi- " nand an auncient enemy to their name & greatnes: for that amongest estates & king" doms the remẽbrance of iniuries past kepes mens mindes from reconcilement. And " there is no reason to beleue that the Florentyns wil depart from the natural deuocion
" which they haue borne to the crowne of Fraunce, seing it is but iust, to owe faith, ser-
" uice & affection, to those who gaue them their first creacion, dignitie, and greatnes.
" But be it, that, following the common ingratitude of mortall men, they would obiect
" them selues against you: what are they against so great a power, compounded vpon
" so warlike a nation, which many tymes, against the wils of all Italy hath passed the
" Alpes, & with a wonderful glory & happines, haue brought home many victories &
" triũphes: And in what time hath the realme of Fraunce bene euer more happy, more
" glorious, or more mighty then at this hower: neither had this crowne at any tyme " heretofore so cõueniẽt & ready meanes to establish a firme peace with all his neigh" bours. All which oportunities if they had so generally mette togither in the daies of " your father, he would perhaps haue bene more ready to this selfe same expedicion:
" And touching them of Aragon your enemies, the difficulties be no lesse augmented
" against them, then to you the oportunities be fauoring, because in the same realme
" both the faction of Aniovv is yet mighty, & no lesse thintelligences of many Princes
" & gentlemen chassed out vniustly within these few yeares, besides, the iniuries done
" at all times by Ferdinand to the Barons & people, yea euen to them of the party of A- " ragon, haue bene of so bitter tast and toleracion togither with his disloyaltie so great,
" his couetousnes so insatiable, and the examples of crueltie in him and his eldest sonne
" Alphonso so notorious and horrible: that it is certeine that all the realme pushed for" ward with a iust hate against them, will rise into willing commocion at the brute of " your cõming (so great authoritie hath as yet the remembrance of the liberalitie, sin" ceritie, humanitie, and iustice which the french kinges haue vsed:) the onely delibe-
" racion to make the enterprise is sufficient to make you victorious: for, your men at
" armes shall no sooner passe ouer the mounteynes, nor the armie at sea no sooner be " prepared in the hauen of Genes, then Ferdinand and his sonne stricken with the con" science of their wickednes, will take more councell to flie then to fight: so shall
" you with great happines, recouer for the posteritie of your blood, a kingdom, which " albeit can hold no comparison with the large realme of Fraunce, yet, besides his ri" ches, amplitude & fertility, it wel merits accompt & reckoning for the helpes & infi" nite cõmodities which by it may be increased to this your imperial crowne, matters " which I would particulat, were it not that the noble mindes of the french reach to " greater ends, & that the high & excellent thoughts of so valiant and glorious a king,
" regard not so much profits priuat, or particular, as they behold the vniuersal greatnes
" of the whole cõmon weale of christendom: wherin touching this, what oportunitie
" more greater, what more ample occasions, what seate of contrey more proper or cõ-" uenient to manage warre against the enemies of our religion? The sea that deuides
" the kingdom of Naples & Grece, conteines not in some part aboue lxx. miles in large-
" nes: A prouince so oppressed & torne in peeces with the tyrannies of the Turks, that " they desire nothing with more general gladnes, then to see the bãners of Christians " and men of warre marching for their deliuerie. There is nothing more easie then to

runne euen into thintralls of that nation, and to batter Conſtantinople, the ſoueraigne reſidencie of that Empire. This enterpriſe, for the maieſtie & nature of it, doth moſt worthely become your perſon & greatnes, with whoſe high and aſpiring thoughts it ſeemes to haue a certeine liuely affinitie. And for the reaſon and neceſſitie of it, it can not ſo iuſtly apperteine to any as to you bearing the ſurname of Moſt Chriſtian, a title wherin your predeceſſors haue flouriſhed with no ſmal examples of triumph and glory, they yſſuing in armed maner out of this realme, ſome times to deliuer the Church of God from thoppreſſion of tyrannes, ſome times to inuade the infidels, & recouer the holy ſepulcher, haue raiſed euen to the third heauen their names & ma-ieſtie of the french kinges: with theſe councells, with theſe meanes, with theſe actions, with theſe ends, became great & emperour of Rome, that mighty & triumphant Charles, of whom as you beare the name, ſo nowe the time offereth you occaſion to communicate with his glory & titles. But it is a time vainly ſpent to ſtand long vpon the recapitulacion of theſe reaſons, as though it were not more conuenient & more agreing with the order of nature, to conſider how to keepe, then how to get: for, conſidering the oportunitie of ſo many and great occaſions calling you, it could not but intangle your greatnes with apparant infamie & diſhonor, to ſuffer any longer Ferdinand to vſurp vpon you ſuch a kingdom, which for almoſt ij. hundreth yeares hath had continuall poſſeſſion in the kings of your blood. And ſeeing by cleare iuſtice & all iudiciall courſe of lawes, it apperteynes vnto you, who dowtes how iuſtly it agreeth with your dignitie to recouer it: but ſpecially how much it concernes your piety to deliuer from the cruel tyrannie of thoſe Catelyns, thoſe people which beare deuocion to your name, & doe craue by right to beare you the dutie & office of ſubiects?
Thus moſt high & glorious king is the enterpriſe proued iuſt, eaſie, & neceſſary, & withall no leſſe glorious & holy, as well for it ſelf in particular, as for that it openeth the way to other enterpriſes worthy of a right chriſtian king of Fraunce: whereunto not only the reaſons of mẽ, but euẽ the ſelf voice of God, doth call you with great & manifeſt occaſiõs, aſſuring you afore the beginning, of a moſt great happines & fortune, ſince no greater worldly happines can happen to no Prince, thẽ to ſee his deli-beracions & councels, (bringing glory & greatnes) to be accõpanied with ſuch cir-cũſtances & conſequẽces, that they concerne not only the benefit & vniuerſal ſaue-tie, but much more do conſider the exaltation of the whole cõmunitie of chriſtẽdom.

This propoſicion had no willing paſſage into the eares or hartes of the great Lordes of Fraunce, but ſpecially of ſuch, who for their nobilitie and opinion of wiſedom held greateſt authority: They iudged that ſuch a warre wherof he hath opened the way and entrey, could not but conteyne many difficulties & daungers, both for the conduct of armies into a countrey ſtraunge, & farre remoued from the realme of Fraunce, & alſo againſt enemies bearing reputaciõ of valour, pollicie, & diſcipline:
for, for wiſedõ, forecaſt, & ſtaied diſcreſiõ, Ferdinãd bare a high recõmẽdacion: & for valour, conduct & direction in warre, his ſonne Alphonſo was no leſſe renowmed. Be-ſides, they made this coniecture, that Ferdinand hauing raigned xxx. yeres & ſacked & cõfiſked at ſundry times many of the Barõs, had heaped togither no ſmal treaſor:
on the behalf of the king, they conſidered that his capacitie was to green to ſuſteine alone ſo heauy a burdẽ, & for the direction of warres & eſtats, the councel weake, & the experiẽce leſſe aſſured of ſuch as he beleued moſt in. To theſe they added the want of mony wherof they eſtemed to neede a great quãtity. They wiſhed that the deceits & ſuttleties of thitaliãs might be depely loked into, aſſuring them ſelues that it could not be pleaſing, neither to others nor to Lodovvik Sforce him ſelfe: A man confeſſed

by all the Italians to be of litle faith) that the kingdom of Naples ſhould paſſe into the power of a king of Fraunce: they iudged it harde to winne, and leſſe eaſie to keepe thoſe thinges that ſhould be wonne: For that reaſon (ſayd they) Levvys father to Charles, (a Prince in all his actions following more the truth then the apparance of thinges) would neuer accept the hopes which were offered him of the matters of Italy, and much leſſe make reckoning of the rightes falne to him in the Realme of Naples: No, he ſaw in his iudgement, that to ſend armies beyond the mounteynes, was no other thing then to ſearch enemies and daungers with the waſt of infinite treaſor and blood of the realme of Fraunce: They held it neceſſary afore all thinges (if this expedicion ſhould proceede) to reunite controuerſies with the kinges borderers, for that with Ferdinand king of Spayne, was no want of occaſions of quarrells and ſuſpicions, and with Maximilyan king of Romaines, and Philip Archduke of Auſtrich his ſonne, not onely many hartburnings and ielouſies, but alſo diſpleaſures and iniuries: whoſe minds albeit could not be reconciled without condeſcending to ſome things hurtfull to the crowne of Fraunce, yet neuertheles ſuch reconcilements would be more by demonſtracions then effects: for, ſay they, if any ill accident happen to the kinges armie in Italy, what accord can be ſo well aſſured which will hold them from
" inuading the realme of Fraunce, ſeeing this is familiar with Princes to hold for ſuſpe-
" cted the greatnes and fortunes of their neighbours, and are ouer nothing ſo watch-
" full as ouer oportunities and occaſions. And touching the king of England, Henry the vij. it was not to be dowted that the naturall hate of the engliſh toward the french had not more force then the peace made with him two monthes before, for that it is manifeſt that no one thing brought him more to the compoſicion, then that the preparacions of the king of Romaines aũſwered not the promiſes wherwith he had induced him to lay ſeege to Bollogne. Of this nature were the reaſõs alleaged by the great Lordes, partly debated amongeſt them ſelues, and partly diſputed in the preſence of the king. The chiefeſt of thoſe that iuſtified theſe arguments afore the king, was one Iames Grauille Admiral of Fraunce, whoſe greatnes albeit was ſomewhat diminiſhed, yet his authoritie ſuffered no alteracion for the auncient name and credit of his wiſdom rouing liberally thorow all the realme of Fraunce. But the kinges minde with a wonderful gredines, was wholly inclined to the cõtrary aduiſe: what with the greennes of his yeares aſpiring nowe to xxij. and by his vnſtayed nature, not yet experienced in thaffayres of the world, he was caried into a wonderfull ambicion to enlarge his imperie, following an appetite of glorie, founded rather vpon a light will and furie of youth, then vpon maturitie of councel, ſeeing that either by his proper nature, or rather the examples and admoniſhments of his parents, he reapposed litle faith in his Lordes and Nobles of his realme. And ſince he came forth of the tutorſhip and iuriſdiction of Anne Ducheſſe of Burbon his ſiſter, he bare no more care to the councells of thadmirall, nor to others that had bene great in the gouernment: But gaue him ſelfe ouer to the directions of certeine men of baſe condicion, trained vp almoſt alwaies in the ſeruice of his perſon: of theſe, ſuch as had moſt fauour and place with him, perſwaded him greatly to embrace the enterpriſe, being partly corrupted, (for the councells of Princes are often times mercenarie) with the promiſes and preſents of Lodovvykes Embaſſador by whom was not forgotten any diligence or art to draw the fauours of ſuch as might doe moſt in this action. They were partly puthed on by certeine hopes, either to be rayſed to eſtates in the kingdom of Naples, or to obteyne of the Pope, dignities and penſions in the Church. The principall of all theſe, was one Stephen de Vers, borne in Languedock, of baſe place, but bredd vp of long time with the king, in whose chamber he vsed to lye, and by the kings creacion made Seneshall of Beucaire: with this man did communicate one VVilliam Briconnet, who of a marchaunt created first generall of Fraunce, and after made Bishop of S. Malo, had not onely the charge and administracion of the kings reuenue, (which the french cal superintendant of the finances,) but also hauing confederacie with Stephen, had by his meanes a great entry into all thaffayres of importance, albeit he had no great insight in the pollicie and gouernment of matters of estate. To the helpe of this enterprise were adioyned the perswasions of Autouell of S. Seuerin, Prince of Salerne, and of Vernaedin of the same familie, Prince of Bysignan, togither with many other Barons banished the Realme of Naples, who being withdrawne many yeares before into Fraunce, had continually solicited the king to that enterprise, laying before his eyes the great calamitie or rather generall despaire of the whole kingdom, and the factions and many followers which they promised them selues to haue in the same.

In this diuersitie of perswasions, the deliberacion remained suspended for certein dayes, others being not onely in dowt what to determine, but also the kings will wauering and vncerteine, for that some times inclining to his ambicion and glory, and some times restrained with feares and daungers, he would often be irresolute, & eftsones turne to the contrary of that which he had afore determined. But in the ende, his first inclinacion togither with the cursed destinie of Italy, being of more force thē any thing that could be sayd to the contrary, the well gouerned and peasible councells of his Nobles were altogither reiected, and communicating onely with the bishop of S. Malo and the Seneshall of Beucaire, and partaking nothing with the assent & priuitie of all others, there was a conuencion made with Lodovvyks Embassador, whose condicions albeit were holden secrete for many monthes, yet this is the capitulacion and summe of them.

Confederacion betwene the kinge of Fraunce, and Lodo. Sforce.

That king Charles either going in person into Italy, or sending thether any armie for the conquest of Naples, the Duke of Myllan was bound to giue him passage thorow his iurisdictions. To send thether with his men, fiue hundreth men at armes paied: To suffer him to arme at Genes so many vessells as he will: And to lend him before he departed out of Fraunce, two hundreth thowsand ducketts.

Touching the king, he was bound to the defence and protection of the Duchie of Myllan against all men, with particular mencion to preserue the authoritie of Lodovvyk: to enterteine during the warre within the citie of Ast belonging to the Duke of Orleance, two hundreth launces to giue succours to the necessities of that Duchie. Lastly he promised either at that time or soone after, by a writing subsigned with his owne hand, that hauing once conquered the realme of Naples, he should giue to Lodovvyk the principalitie of Tarente.

But let vs looke somewhat into the variacion of times and thinges of the worlde: Albeit Francis Sforce, father to Lodovvyk, a Prince of rare wisedom and valour, was a professed enemie to those of Aragon, for the many displeasures he had receiued of Alphonso, Ferdinands father: and an auncient friend to the house of Aniovv: yet this was his moderacion in the actions concerning those two families, that in the yeare 1457. when Iohn sonne of Rene, inuaded the kingdom of Naples, he ministred succours to Ferdinand with such a wonderfull diligence and readines, that the victorie was acknowledged to happen wholly by his helpe: he was stirred to this for no other reason, then that he saw it was to perillous for his Duchie of Myllan, that the french his neare neighbours, should make them selues Lordes ouer so mighty an estate. The same reason induced Philip Maria Viscounte (abandoning them of Aniovv, to whom he had alwaies before borne fauour) to deliuer Alphonſo his enemie, who taken of the Geneuoys in a battell at ſea neare to Caiette, was brought to him priſoner to Myllan, with all the nobilitie of his realmes: on the other ſide, Levvys the xj. father to Charles, being often times perſwaded by many and not with light occaſions, to harken to the thinges of Naples, and being withall with great inſtance, called by the Geneuoys to be Lord ouer their contreyes, as Charles his father had bene afore him: Did alwayes refuſe to intangle him ſelfe with the doings of Italy, as matters full of expenſes and difficulties, and in the ende hurtfull to the realme of Fraunce. But now the opinions of men being chaunged, but perhapps not chaunged the reaſon of thinges, we ſee how Lodovvyk calls the french ouer the mounteynes, not fearing by ſo mighty a king (if Naples ſhould fall into his handes) that daunger which his father no leſſe valiant in armes then he, would haue feared, if but a litle Earle of Prouence had conquered it. And of the other ſide, we ſee Charles now raigning inflamed with a deſire to make warre in Italy, preferring the raſhnes of men of baſe place and vnexperienced, afore the councell of his father: A Prince of ſingular wiſedom, temperance, and forecaſt.

" It hapneth too often, that new Princes haue newe councells, and of newe councells " commonly reſort new effectes, euen ſuch as in a ſhip, when a rawe man is put to the
" helme, the courſe muſt needes alter.

It is not vnlikely that Lodovvyk was drawne to ſo great a deliberacion by Hercules de Eſte Duke of Ferrara, his father in law, who, nouriſhing a vehement appetite to recouer Poleſine de Rouigne, a contrey confining and importing much the ſewertie of Ferrara which the Venetians had taken from him in the warres ten yeares paſt, foreſaw that the onely meane to recouer it was to ſet all Italy in trouble, and innouate the ſtates with moſt great emotions. Beſides this, many beleued, that albeit in Hercules appeared a diſguiſed apparance and will to wiſh well to his ſonne in law, yet in ſecret he followed him with an extreme hatred, for that in the ſame warre all the reſidue of Italy which had taken armes for him being farre more mighty then the Venetians, Lodovvyk gouerning then the ſtate of Myllan, and regarding his proper reſpectes & particular intereſtes, conſtrayned the others to make peace with condicion that Poleſine ſhould remayne to the Venetians: And therefore Hercules hauing no meanes to reuenge ſo great an iniurie by armes and warre, ſought to execute his long ſmothered malice by giuing him a daungerous councell: ſuch are the operacions of malice
" working in mindes mighty, who ſeldom hold it any breach of iuſtice to be reuenged
" of him that offereth the firſt iniurie.

But now Italy being poſſeſſed with a brute of thoſe thinges which were in practiſe on the otherſide the mounteynes, and whoſe firſt authors at the beginning were vncerteyne, many thoughtes and diſcourſes appeared in the vnderſtandings of men: to many, waighing with the power and ſtrength of the french king, and the readines of that nation to new broyles and innouacions, the preſent diuiſions and factions of thitalians, it ſeemed a buſines of great qualitie and importance: others, interpreting the age and greenes of the king, and iudging much of the negligence naturall to that nation, and laſtly looking into the great impediments which great enterpriſes haue, conſtrued all not to a councell well grounded, but to a hotte and vnbridled affection of youth, which after it had a litle throwne out his fume and fire, would eaſily vaniſh and diſſolue. Ferdinand him ſelfe (againſt whom all this buſines was conſpired) ſhewed litle appearance of feare, ſaying it was an enterpriſe intangled with many difficulties, for that if they made their inuaſion by ſea, they ſhould find him furniſhed with a plentifull nauie, armed able to giue him battel in the plaine ſea, his portes being

ing furniſhed,and his fortes well manned and vittelled: neither was there any baron in the realme able to receiue them,as had bene done afore to Iohn of Aniovv, by the Prince of Boſſane,and other great ones of the land. And touching their expedicion by land,it was full of incommodities,ſuſpicious to many,and a painefull march farre of, for that their way lying all a long the length of Italy, the reſidue of the Princes could not be without their particular feares,and perhaps Lodovvyk Sforce more then the others,notwithſtanding he made ſhew of the contrary,ſeming as though a common perill brought intereſt to euery particular: for that the proximitie and neighbourhood of Myllan with Fraunce, gaue vnto the king a greater oportunitie, (but in true likelyhood)a greater deſire to poſſeſſe and occupie that Duchie. And ſeeing the yong and true Duke of Myllan was of neare kinred to the king, Lodovvyk could not other waies aſſure him ſelf,but that the king caried an intencion to deliuer him from his oppreſſion,hauing not many yeares before proteſted openly, that he would not endure that Iohn Galeas his coſin ſhould be ſo vnworthely reſtrayned and kept vnder: That the ſtate of them of Aragon, ſtoode not vpon ſuch tearmes and condicions, as the hope of their weaknes might induce the courage of the french to make inuaſions vpon them, for that they were plentifully furniſhed with many numbers of valiant men at armes,great trowpes of horſes of ſeruice,many ſtoares of municions and artilleries,and all other neceſſary things for the warre, togither with ſo rich a mynt of money,that it ſufficed againſt all wantes, prouicions and fortunes: that beſides many honorable capteines trayned and experienced,he had for the conduct of his armies,his eldeſt ſonne,Duke of Calabria,a leader of great renowme & no leſſe vertue,growen into a mind reſolute,a councell ſtayed and well aduiſed, and an aſſured experience,by following all the warres in Italy,for many yeares before. To theſe forces he added the powers of his parents and allies, of whoſe ready ayde and aſſiſtance he nothing dowted,hauing ſpeciall expectacion to receiue plentifull ſuccors from the king of Spayne his coſin,and brother to his wife, not onely in reſpect of the double knotte of parentage, but alſo for that in good pollicie it ſtoode him vpon to holde for ſuſpected the neighbourhood of the french men to Sicyle.

This was the glorious humor of Ferdinand, bringing forth in publike many bragges touching his owne power and greatnes, and to the contempt and leſſening of the forces and meanes of his aduerſaries. Theſe be properties often times familiar with Princes, to whom there can not be a more ſenſible and apparant token of their aduerſitie or ruine,then when they eſteeme them ſelues more then they are,& make their enemies leſſe then they finde them.

But Ferdinand,as he was a Prince of ſingular wiſedom and well aſſured experience: ſo,in him ſelf he found his mind torméted with many very greuous thoughts beholding with a freſh memorie the troubles he had receiued of the french nation, in the beginning of his raigne: he debated deepely that he ſhould haue to doe with enemies warlike and mighty, for their trowpes of horſemen farre aboue him: in footemen infinite,in enſignes well appoynted,trayned,and diſciplined: for prouiſions at ſea,nothing wanting to an armie royall: for artilleries,plentifull,ſundry, and terrible: for money,his mynes and myntings furniſhed aboue all wantes that could happen: And of men, infinite in multitudes, reſolute in mindes, for ſeruice apt,of faith aſſured,of wills tractable,for commaundement obedient,and laſtly, bearing all one common deſire to commit their liues to any daunger for the glory and greatnes of their naturall king.But of the contrary,touching him ſelfe,all thinges were ſuſpected to him, his realme being full of hatred againſt the name of the Aragons, or at leaſt of no litle inclinacion to commocion, and the moſt part of the reſidue, of an ordinary deſire to haue new kings, wherein fortune may be of more power then faith: his ſtrength was mightier in opinion, then in true forces: his treaſor layd vp and reſerued, not ſufficient to cary the neceſſary expenſes for his defence, ſince all thinges by the warre being turned into rebellion and tumults, his reuenewes would conuert to nothing in a moment: he ſaw that in Italy he had many enemies, and with none any frendſhip firme or well aſſured, hauing at ſome times bene greuous to all, either by armes or other violent meanes. And for Spayne, according to the examples paſt, & condicions of the ſame realme, he had no expectacion of other ſuccours for his perills, then large promiſes with a great name of operacions, but very ſlender and ſlow effectes. Laſtly his feares were augmented by the vnfortunat predictions that went of his howſe, come to his knowledge at ſundry times, partly by auncient writinges found out of new, partly by thinterpretacions and wordes of men for the moſt parte vncerteine of the preſent, and yet will referre certeinly to thinges to come: thoſe be

" thinges that in proſperitie we beleue litle, & in aduerſitie too much, ſpecially if there " ariſe any apparance.

The king of Naples wandring in theſe conſideracions, and his feares being greater without compariſon then his hopes, he ſaw there were no better remedies againſt ſo great daungers, then either with all ſpeede poſſible, to remoue by ſome agreement, ſuch thoughtes from the french kinges mind, or at leaſt to take from him part of the foundacions which ſtirred him to the warre.

And therefore hauing ſent Embaſſadors into Fraunce, to treate of a mariage betwene the king of Scots, and Charlotte daughter of Dom Federyk his ſecond ſonne, the diſpoſicion of which mariage was gouerned by the french king: for that the yõg Lady was nouriſhed in his court, and borne of a ſiſter of the mother of king Charles: he diſpatched new commiſſions for the matters preſent & running: he ioyned with them in deputacion and aſſiſtance Camille Pandon, hauing bene vſed in negociacion for him there before, the better to labour priuatly ſuch as were chiefeſt guiders of the kinges councells, and others bearing inclinacion to profit, promiſes, and corrupt offers: and if they could not by other meanes appeaſe or remoue the kinges intencion to the warre, then to offer him condicions of tribute and other ſubmiſſions: & ſo, if it were poſſible, to obteine peace. Beſides this, he applied not only all his thoughts, diligence & authoritie to compoſe the difference of the caſtells bought by Virginio (to whoſe intractabilitie and obſtinacie, he referred the chiefe occaſion of all theſe diſorders) but alſo he ſtudied to giue a new life to the practiſes of parentage, commoned vpon before betwene the Pope and him. But aboue all others, his deepeſt care and thought was to appeaſe and aſſure Lodovvyk Sforce (firſt author and mouer of all the miſchiefe) perſwading him ſelfe that feare, more then other occaſion ledde him to ſo daungerous a councell. And therefore (according to the neceſſities that followed him) preferring his particular ſewertie, afore the naturall reſpect and intereſt of his Neece, or the ſauetie of the ſonne borne of her: he offered by many embaſſages, to referre him ſelfe wholly to his will touching the things of Iohn Galeas, & the Duchie of Myllan: In which offers more generall then honorable, he had no regard to the aduiſe of his ſonne Alphonſo, who to amaſe, confuſe, and threaten Lodovvyk, iudged it the readieſt meane to make him giue ouer thoſe new coũcells: wher-
" in albeit he might take courage of the naturall fearefulnes of Lodovvyk, yet we often runnes into enterprises, that bring forth daunger, dishonor, and shame.

At last were appeased the controuersies of the castells after many difficulties proceeding more of Virginio then of the Pope, to the conclusion of which composicion, came Dom Federyk sent to Rome by his father for that effect. The accord runne that they should remaine in the possession and right of Virginio, repaying to the Pope equall proporcion of money which he had giuen at first to Franciſquin Cibo: togither with this was knit vp the mariage of the Ladie Sances bastard daughter to Alphonſo, with Dom Geffray yongest sonne to the Pope, (both the one & other by reason of their greene age vnable to consomat or accomplish the mariage.) These were the condicions: That Dom Geffray should goe to remayne at Naples after a few moneths: that he should receiue in dowrie and respect of the mariage, the principalitie of Squillaco valued at tenne thowsand duckats in yearly reuenue, and that Ferdinand should giue to him an estate of an hundreth men at armes. This confirmed thopinion of many, that all that the Pope solicited in Fraunce, bare no other meaning, then by feare to draw them of Aragon to these conuencions: this was one argument to approue their coniectures, that Ferdinand laboured to make a confederacion with him for their common defence: but the Pope obiected so many difficulties, that there was no other thing obteyned of him, then a very secret promise by writing to defend the kingdom of Naples, so that Ferdinand would equally promise to protect the estate of the Church.

These thinges dispatched, the companies of men at armes which the Venetians & the Duke of Myllan had sent to the Pope for his succors, retired with licence and fauour out of the Church dominions: Ferdinand also began now with no lesse hope of happy succesſe to treate with Lodovvyk Sforce, who with a wonderfull suttletie & arte, shewed him selfe some times ill contented with the inclinacion of the french king to the matters of Italy, and some times excused and iustified him selfe vpon his necessitie, for that by reason of his chiefe for Genes and the auncient confederacion with the house of Fraunce: he was constrayned to tender the desires and requestes made to him (as he sayd) by the same king. But some times he promised to Ferdinand in publike, and some times to the Pope and P. de medicis apart and seuerally, to do all he could to moderate the kinges desire, assaying to lull them a sleepe in this hope, to the ende they conspired or dressed nothing against him, before thaffayres of Fraunce were well proceeded and established: wherein they were the more easie to beleue him, by how much they iudged the resolucion to bring the french king into Italy so ill for his owne sewertie, that in consideracion of his particular perill, and the common inuest of Italy, they supposed he would vtterly disclaime and shake it of. All this somer past in this nature of doings, Lodovvyk working vnder such disguised formes and maners, that without giuing any suspicion to the french king, neither Ferdinand, the Pope, nor the Florentyns dispaired of his promises, nor yet altogither trusted him.

The suttleties of Lod. Sforce.

But in this meane while, were layed in Fraunce with no small studie, the foundacions of the warre and expedicion to come, whereunto (contrary to the councells of most of the greatest) inclined more & more thaffection of the king, who, to be more at libertie, accorded the differēces he had with Ferdinand and Iſabell king & Queene of Spayne: Princes in those times of great reapport and name for gouernment and wisedom, both for that they had drawne their Realmes out of great troubles into a setled tranquillitie, & also, had recouered to Christianitie, with a warre of ten yeares continuance, the kingdom of Granado vsurped by the Moares of Affrica for almost viij. hundreth yeares: it was expresſed in this capitulacion (solemnly iustified by pub-like oth of both partes in the church) that in Ferdinand nor Iſabell (for Spayne was gouerned vnder their common name) ſhould be no action of ayde to the Aragons directly nor indirectly: no contract of any new affinitiue or alliance: nor that in no ſort they ſhould oppoſe againſt king Charles for the defence of the realme of Naples. The king, in counterchaunge and recompence of theſe, (beginning by a loſſe certein, for a hope of gaine vncerteine) reſtored without any repayment of money, Parpignian, with all the earldom of Roſſellion, pawned many yeares before to Levvys his father by Iohn king of Aragon and father to Ferdinand. An exchaunge altogither againſt the will & liking of the whole nation of Fraunce, for that that earldom ſeated at the foote of the hills Pyrennei, & conſequently according to thauncient diuiſion, part of Gallia, gaue alwayes neceſſary impediments to them of Aragon for entring into Fraunce on that ſide.

The king, for the ſame occaſion, made peace with Maximylian king of Romaines, and with his ſonne Phillip Archduke of Auſtrich, in whom was no want of occaſion either of olde or newe hatreds againſt him: but ſpecially for that his father Levvys by the death of Charles, Duke of Burgondie and Earle of Flaunders, with many other contries conioyning, did impatronize him ſelfe vpon the Duchie of Burgondie, and Earldom of Artoys, with many other places which the ſayd Duke poſſeſſed: whereof growing no ſmall warres betwene king Levvys, & Marie the onely daughter of Duke Charles, married after the death of her father to Maximilian: there was made at laſt (Marie being dead and Phillip the common ſonne of Maximilian and her ſucceding to thinheritance of his mother) an accord amongeſt them, more by the wills of the people of Flaunders, then readines of Maximylian. The better to cõfirme this accord, Margaret the ſiſter of Phillip was married to Charles ſonne of Levvys, and (notwithſtanding ſhe was very yong,) ledde into Fraunce: where after ſhe had remained many yeares, Charles refuſed her, and tooke to wife Anne, to whom by the death of Francis her father leauing no yſſue male, the Duchie of Brytaine was deſcended. This was a double iniurie to Maximylian, being at one time made fruſtrate the mariage of his daughter, and his owne, hauing by procuracion afore married the ſayd Anne: And yet, for that he was not able of him ſelfe to ſuſteyne the warre recontinued by occaſion of this iniurie, and that the people of Flaunders (gouerning them ſelues by their proper councell and authoritie, by reaſon of the minoritie of Phillip) would not dwel in warre with the realme of Fraunce. And ſeeing laſtly that the kings of Spayne & England had diſſolued their armies which they had leuyed againſt the french: he conſented to the peace, by the which king Charles reſtored to Phillip, his ſiſter Margaret deteyned in Fraunce till then, togither with the townes of the Earldom of Artoys, reſeruing to him ſelfe the caſtells, but vnder bond to render them at foure yeares ende, at what time Phillip being riſen to his maioritie might in good validitie confirme the accord paſt. Thoſe townes when the peace was made by king Levvys, were acknowledged by common agreement as the proper right of the ſayd Margaret. The generall peace thus eſtabliſhed with all the neighbours to the realme of Fraunce, the reſolucion of the warre againſt the kingdom of Naples, was confirmed for the yeare following: in which time were prepared all prouiſions neceſſary continually ſolicited by Lodovvyk Sforce: who (the thoughts of men aduauncing from degree to degree) occupied his witts now not onely how to aſſure the gouernment to him, but lifting vp his mind to higher conceites, he had an intencion to transferre to him ſelfe the Duchie of Myllan vnder thoccaſion of the warre againſt th Arragons, wherein to giue ſome couler of iuſtice to ſo great an iniuſtice, and with more firme foundacions to aſſure assure his affayres against all fortunes that might happen: he married Blanche Mary sister to Iohn Gales and his Neece to Maximylian newly aspired to thempire of Rome by the death of Federyk his father: to him he promised in dowrie to be payd within a certeine time iiij.hundreth thowsand duckatts of ready money, with iewells and other ornaments to the value of xl.thowsand duckatts: and of the other parte Maximylian thirsting more after money then affinitie by this mariage, bound him selfe to indue Lodovvyk, (to the preiudice of Iohn Galeas his new brother in law) with thinuestiture of the Duchie of Myllan, for him, his children, & ofspringe, as though that estate had remained without lawfull Dukes euer since the death of Phillip Maria Viscount. At the latter payment of the money, he promised to giue him all the priuileadges and prerogatiues accomplished in most ample forme.

The Viscounteis, gentlemen of Myllan, during the bluddy factions in Italy, betwene the Gebelyns and Guelffes, and after the Guelffes were suppressed: of principall men of one part of Myllan, became Lordes and absolute maisters of the whole citie, (such frutes for the most are bredd by ciuill discordes.) And in this greatnes after they had continued many yeares, they sought (according to the common aduauncement of tyrannies the better to disguise their vsurpacion with a show of right) to strengthen first with colers lawful, & after to set out their fortune, with most ample titles: therefore after they had first obteyned of themprours (of whome Italy began to know rather the name then their power) the title of capteines & then vicaires of thempire: In the ende Iohn Galeas (who for that his father in lawe Iohn king of Fraunce had giuen him the earldom of Vertus, called him self Earle of Vertus) obteyned of Vincislao king of Romaines for him & his yssues males, the dignitie of Duke of Myllan, in which succeded him the one after the other Iohn Maria and Phillip Maria his sonnes. But the lyne masculyne being determined by the death of Phillip, albeit, by his testament he had instituted as his heire Alphonso king of Aragon and Naples, partly for the recompense of the amitie he shewed at his deliuery, but more, for that the Duchie of Myllan defended by so mighty a Prince, should not fall into the subiection of the Venetians aspiring manifestly to it: yet Francis Sforce, at that time a capteine valiant and equally seene in affaires of peace and warre, being assisted with many occasions then occurrant, and more esteeming to reigne then to keepe faith: held with armes the sayd Duchie as apperteining to Blanche Maria his wife, the bastard daughter of Phillip. And albeit it was supposed that soone after with a small porcion of money, he might haue purchased of themprour Federyk thinuestiture of that state: yet trusting he was able to kepe it by the same meanes wherwith he had wonne it, he made small reckoning of that office in themprour: thus without inuestiture continued Galeaz his sonne, & Iohn Galeaz his later sonne: by reaso wherof Lodovvyk bearing him self wickedly at one time against his Nephew liuing, & doing wrong to the memory of his father & brother deceassed, mainteined that not one of the were lawful dukes of Myllan, procuring him self, as of an estate diuolued to thempire, to be inuested by Maximylian, & by that reason bare the title not of the 7. but of the 4. Duke of Myllan, which thinges (so long as his Nephew liued) were not suffered to come but to a fewe mens knowledge. Besids, following the example of Cyrus yonger brother to Artexerses king of Persia, (which also he confirmed with thauthority of many lawyers) he aduowched that he was before his brother not in yeares & age, but for that he was the first borne after their father became Duke of Myllan: This reason togither with the first was bestowed amongest the imperiall priuileadges, wherin to cloke with a vaine couer the ambicion of Lodovvyk, there was also written in letters separate, that it was not the cuſtom of the holy Empire to conſent or paſſe any eſtate to any that afore had holden it vnder thauthoritie of an other, for which cauſe Maximylian had kept no reckoning of the peticions made by Lodovvyk to obteyne thinueſtiture for Iohn Galeas, hauing afore acknowledged the ſame Duchie of the people of Myllan.

In this mariage made by Lodovvyk of his Neece with Maximylian, Ferdinand tooke encreaſe of hope that Lodovvyk would eſtraunge him ſelfe from the amitie of the french king: theſe were the reaſons and arguments of his hope: for that he had knitt him ſelfe with Maximylian enemie and Corriuall to the french king by many occaſions: the departing with ſo great a ſunme of money might induce the kings ſuſpicion agaynſt him: And laſtly this newe coniunction miniſtring occaſion of corage & hart, he ſuppoſed he would not be fearful to diuide him ſelfe from the french doings: This hope Lodovvyk nouriſhed with great conning, and with the vayle of the ſame ſo blinded all others, that at one time he communicated with Ferdinand & the other Potentates in Italy, and withall enterteyned the king of Romaines, and yet kept the french from ielouſie: Ferdinand alſo iudged that it could not but be diſpleaſing and intollerable to the Senate of Venice (to whom he had ſent Embaſſadors) that a Prince ſo mightie aboue them ſhould enter the hart of Italy, wherein they had the chiefeſt place, opinion, and authoritie: beſides, he fedd much of the hopes in the king and Queene of Spayne, who had promiſed him great ſuccors, if neither by perſwaſions, offers, nor authoritie, he could not breake the enterpriſe. On the other ſide, the french king hauing taken away all impediments, on that ſide the mountes began to practiſe to remoue ſuch difficulties as might fall to his hinderance on the other ſide the hills: In that action he ſent Peron de la bache, a man not ignorant in thaffayres of Italy, by thexperience he had there vnder Iohn of Aniovv: who after he had made knowen to the Pope, the Senate of Venice, and the Florentyns, the reſolucion of his king to recouer the kingdom of Naples, he made peticion to them all to enter ſocietie, fellowſhippe, and communitie with him: But he reaped no other frute then frayle hopes and generall aunſweres, for that the warre being not to be executed till the next yeare, euery one refuſed to diſcouer ſo long before, his intencion: In like ſort, the king required of thembaſſadors of Florence, (ſent to him a litle before by Ferdinands conſent to excuſe them ſelues of thimputacion that they inclined to the partie of th Aragons) to haue paſſage and vittells for his armie in their iuriſdictions at reaſonable rate, and that to accompanie him to the kingdom of Naples, they would furniſh him with an hundreth men at armes, which he ſayd he required as a ſigne that the common weale of Florence ſtoode with him in amitie: Albeit they aunſwered him with many reaſons and declaracions, that they could not in that ſort proteſt without great perill vntill his armie were paſt into Italy: And albeit they affirmed that he might be well aſſured that in all accidents and fortunes, that citie ſhould not faile to miniſter to him, all thoſe conuenient effects, of office, obſeruãce, & deuocion, which of long time they had borne to the crown of Fraunce: yet they were conſtrayned according to the french importunities to promiſe all thoſe thinges, otherwaies they were threatned to ſuffer priuacion of that great mart and traffike of marchandize which the Florentyne nation had in that realme: it was knowen after that theſe compulſions were inforced by Lodovvyk at that time the principall diſpoſer of all the french practiſes with th Italians.

Peter de medicis labored much to perſwade Ferdinand, that thoſe demaunds imported ſo litle the ſubſtance of the warre, that it would be more for his profit if the common weale & he continued amitie with the french king, hauing by that meane good way and oportunitie to make ſome compoſicion, then in refuſing thoſe ſmall demaundes, to declare them ſelues his enemies, and ſo ſuffer no poſſibilitie to doe good to him: he alleadged with all the generall complaynts and hatreds which he ſhould heape vpon him ſelfe, if the traffike of Florence were reſtrayned in Fraunce: or that thentercourſe there ſo neceſſary to thupholding of the citie, ſhould ſuſpende and perhaps come in time to loſe his libertie and practiſe: he told him it was conuenient in good faith and meaning (the principall ground of confederacions) that euery confederate ſhould ſuffer patiently ſome incommoditie, to thende the other ronne not into more greater harmes: But Ferdinand who conſidered how much of his reputacion and ſewertie would diminiſh if the Florentyns were deuided from him: was not ſatisfied with theſe reaſons, but complayned greeuouſly that the faith and conſtancie of Peter beganne ſo ſoone not to aunſwer his owne promiſe & thexpectacion he had conceiued of him: by reaſon whereof, Peter reſolutly diſpoſed aboue all thinges to continue in amitie with them of Aragon, vſed many meanes to ſuſpend and deferre the aunſwer importunatly demaunded by the french, referring them in the ende to vnderſtand the full wills and intencions of the common weale by new Embaſſadors.

About the ende of this yeare, the alliance made betwene the Pope and Ferdinand, beganne to wauer and ſhake, either for that the Pope in obiecting newe difficulties, aſpyred to obteyne of him greater thinges then he had: or elſe that he perſwaded him ſelfe to induce him by this meane to bring agayne to his obedience the Cardinall S. P. ad vincula, whom (offering firſt for his ſecuritie the faith of the colleadge of Cardinalls, of Ferdinand and of the Venetians) he deſired much to ſee returned to Rome: he held his abſence much ſuſpected for thimportance of the rocke of Oſtia, holding in his handes about Rome, Roncillon and Grotaferare, by the fauors, opinion and authoritie which he had in the court: But chiefly he was ielous ouer him, for that naturally he was deſirous of innouacion, and obſtinate to hazarde rather all daunger, then to be cut of from one poynt of his councells and purpoſes. Ferdinand excuſed him ſelfe much, that he had no power to apply the Cardinall thereunto, whoſe ſuſpicion was ſo great, that all ſewertie ſeemed to him leſſe then the perill: he complained to the Pope of his hard fortune, that on him alwayes was layd thimputacion of thinges which in truth proceeded from others: he was ſory that the Pope had beleued that by his mocion and by his money, Virginio had bought the caſtells, being in deede bought without his priuitie or medling. In deed he had diſpoſed Virginio to the compoſicion, & for that effect had furniſhed him with the money which was giuen in repayment & recompenſe of the caſtells: The Pope receiued not theſe excuſes, but with hard and bitter wordes complayned of Ferdinand, & ſo gaue ſhew that there could be layed no firme ground of their reconciliacion.

With ſuch a diſpoſicion of mindes and confuſion of thinges ſo apparantly drawing to new troubles, began the yeare 1494. (I enterpret the yeare according to the vſe of Rome.) A yeare very vnhappy for Italy, and in deede the firſt of the vnfortunate and miſerable yeares, for that in it was made open the way to infinite and horrible calamities, whereof we may well ſay a great part of the worlde by many accidents, hath taſted euer ſince. In the beginning of this yeare, King Charles refuſing to heare ſpeake of any agreement with Ferdinand, enioyned his Embaſſadors as meſſengers of a king enemie, to depart with ſpeede out of the realme of Fraunce: And almoſt in the ſame concurrance of time, the ſayd Ferdinand dyed ſuddeinly of an appoplexy being more trauelled with cares & perplexities of mind, then loaden with yeares, or

weakned with olde age: he was a Prince of ſingular wiſedom and induſtrie, with the which (accompanied with happy fortune) he kept him ſelfe in the kingdom newly obteyned by his father againſt many difficulties appearing euen in the beginning of his reigne, and brought to it much more amplitude and greatnes, then was done vnder any other king perhaps long before: A good king, if he had continued to reigne, in the ſame maner he began: But either with the variation of times or chaunge of maners, becauſe he knew not (with moſt Princes now a dayes) how to reſiſt the furie of dominion and rule, or perhaps according to the iudgement of euery one his nature and inclinacion beginning nowe to diſcloſe which he had couered afore with great conning: he was eſteemed a man of litle faith, and of ſuch violent and cruell moodes, that euen by his owne followers he was iudged worthy of the name of inhumanitie. The opinion was, that the death of Ferdinand hapned very inconuenient for the common affayres, for that, where he would haue proued all remedies to hinder the deſcending of the french men, it was not now to be dowted but it would be more hard to make Lodouvyk aſſure him ſelfe of the haughtie & immoderate nature of Alphonſo, then it was to diſpoſe him to renew amitie with Ferdinand, in whom was for the moſt part expreſſed a ready inclinacion (the better to auoyd all quarrels with the ſtate of Myllan) to yeld and condeſcend to his will: And amongeſt other things, it is manifeſt that when Iſabell Alphonſoes daughter was brought to Iohn Galeas her huſband, Lodouvyk at the firſt ſight ſuffred him ſelf to ſlide into ſo great affection towards her, that he deſired her of Alphonſo for his wife, and to that ende (according to the vniuerſall opinion of Italy) he did ſo much by magick and enchauntments, that Iohn Galeas for many monethes was made vnable to the actiō of mariage: Ferdinand was not intractable to this mariage, but Alphonſo ſo refuſed and reſiſted it, that Lodouvyk making no hope of it, tooke an other wife by whom hauing children, he turned all his ſtudies and thoughtes to transferre to them the Duchie of Myllan: ſome ſuppoſe and write, that Ferdinand, being determined (for the auoyding of the preſent warre) to ſuffer all indignities and incommodities: had an intencion, as ſoone as the calmnes of the tyme woulde ſuffer, to goe by ſea to Genes, and from thence by lande to Myllan, to ſatisfie Lodouvyk in all his deſires, and to bring againe to Naples his Neece, hoping that not onely with effectes, but alſo with this publike confeſſion by the which he acknowledged to holde all his eſtate and well doing vppon him, he ſhould remoue his mind from the warre, or at leaſt ſomewhat moderate his conſpiring intencions, the rather for that it was ſeene to all men of obſeruacion, with what wonderfull ambicion and deſire, he aſpired to be noted the onely arbitrator and oracle of all Italy: Alphonſo immediatly after the death of his father, diſpatcheth foure Embaſſadors to the Pope, who albeit ſhewed manifeſt ſignes that he was returned to the firſt inclinacion of amitie with the french, and had at the ſame tyme by bull ſubſigned by the colleadge of Cardinalles, promiſed at the french Kinges requeſt, the eſtate of Cardinall to the Byſhoppe of S. Malo, and reteyned in common with the Duke of Myllan Proſper Colonne whome the Kinge afore had taken to his pay, togither with other Capteynes and leaders of men of warre: yet he made no greate difficultie to accorde in regarde of the profitable condicions offered by Alphonſo, who deſired much to be aſſured of him and to bynd him to his protection and defence: They made theſe open conuencions, that there ſhould be betwene them a confederacion for the defence of their eſtates, with equal leuyes of men by both: That the Pope ſhoulde conferre vnto Alphonſo the inueſtiture of the kingdom, with diminucion of tribute obteyned by Ferdinand of other

Confederacion betweene the Pope and Alphonſo k. of Naples.

Popes

Popes for his life onely: that the Pope ſhould ſend a legatt to crowne him: That he ſhould create Cardinall Lodovvyk ſonne of Henry, baſtard brother to Alphonſo, who afterwardes was called Cardinall of Aragon: That king Alphonſo ſhould pay immediatly to the Pope thirtie thowſand duckatts: That he ſhould indue the Duke of Candia with eſtates within the realme of xij. thowſand duckatts reuenue yearly, togither with the firſt of the ſeauen principall offices that ſhould be voyd: That he ſhould interteyne him ſo long as the Pope liued in his pay with three hundreth men at armes, with the which he ſhould be bounde to ſerue the one and the other equally and indifferently: That he ſhould giue to Dom Geffray, (who for the pawne of his fathers fayth was nowe to goe to his father in lawe) the eſtate of Pronotorye and one of the ſeuen offices, ouer and beſides the promiſes of the firſt contracte: That he ſhoulde beſtowe the reuenue of benefices in the Realme vppon Cæſar Borgia the Popes ſonne, who a litle before was created Cardinall by his father, wherein, to auoyde impediments of being a baſtard, to whom it hath not bene accuſtomed to graunt ſuch dignities) he made proofe by ſubborned teſtimonies that he was the ſonne lawefull of an other: Beſides all this, Virginio Vrſin (who by the Kinges ſending for came to this capitulacion) promiſed that the King ſhoulde ayde the Pope to recouer the rocke of Oſtia, if the Cardinall S. P. ad vincula refuſed to come to Rome. This promiſe King Alphonſo affirmed without his conſent or priuitie, and well ſaw that in ſo daungerous ſeaſons, it would bring no litle preiudice to him to be depriued of the Cardinall whoſe authoritie was not ſmall ouer the towne of Genes, which he determined to ſurpriſe by the ſetting on of the Cardinall. And becauſe amidd ſo great troubles and emotions, there might perhaps be treaties of councells or other matters preiudiciall to the ſea apoſtolike, he did what he could to vnite him with the Pope, who not ſatisfied with any condicion if the Cardinall returned not to Rome, and the Cardinall being moſt obſtinate to hazard his life vnder the faith of thoſe Catylins as he termed them, the diligence of Alphonſo was in vayne, and his deſire of no effect: for after the Cardinall with many diſſembled and flouriſhing ſhewes, had giuen almoſt aſſured hope to accept the condicions: he ſtale away by night from Oſtia in a brigantyne well appoynted, and at a time when was leaſt reaſon to dowt any ſuch euaſion, leauing the rocke armed with ſufficient garriſon: And reappoſing certeine dayes at Sauone, and ſpending ſome litle time at Auignion, (of which citie he was Legatt) he went laſtly to Lyons, where king Charles was come a litle before, to prepare with better oportunitie and reputacion the prouiſions of the warre which he publiſhed he would execute in perſon: he was receiued of the king with great ioy and honor, and immediatly ioyned him ſelfe to thoſe that ſtudied to trouble Italy.

In this meane while Alphonſo, more by feare then proper inclinacion, forgott not to continue with Lodovvyk Sforce that which had bene begonne by his father, offering him the ſame ſatisfactions: But Lodovvyk to whom nothing was more familiar then to diſſemble, deuiſed to enterteyne him with diuerſe hopes, but with demonſtracions that he was conſtrained to proceede in ſuch exact order and conſideracion, leaſt the warre determined againſt others, tooke not his beginning againſt him, he left not for all this to ſolicite and vrge the preparacions in Fraunce, wherein to expreſſe the deuocion of his minde with better effect, and to reſolue all particularities occurrant in that expedicion, and laſtly leaſt the execution of all thinges determined ſhoulde ſuffer ſuſpence or haue ſlowe action: he ſent thether (coulering it with a brute of the Kinges pleaſure) Galeaz of S. Seuerin huſband to one of his baſtard daughters and in whom he reappoſed great confidence and fauors. According to the councells of Lodovvyk, king Charles ſendes to the Pope foure Embaſſadors, with charge that in paſſing by Florence, they ſhoulde make inſtance for the declaracion of that common weale. The Embaſſadors were Eberard Daubigny a Scottiſh Capteine of nation, the generall of Fraunce, the Preſident of the parliament of Prouence, & the ſame Peron la Bache, that had bene with them the yeare before. They according to their inſtructions (ſet downe chiefly at Myllan,) recounted in both the one and other places the rightes which the french king (as ſucceſſor to the houſe of Aniovv, and for want of yſſue in Charles the firſt,) pretended to the realme of Naples, togither with his royall determinacion to paſſe that yeare into Italy in perſon, not to intrude into any thing that belonged to an other, but to reobteyne that which iuſtly was his owne: And to giue his voyage a more pawſible paſſage in the mindes of men, they ſayd his mind and meaninges were not ſo much fixed vpon the conqueſt of Naples, as that afterwards he would turne his forces againſt the Turkes, for the ſeruice of Ieſu Chriſt, & glory of his name. They declared to the Florentynes, how much their king aſſured him ſelfe of that citie hauing bene reedified by Charlemain, and fauored alwaies of the kinges his predeceſſors, and lately of king Levvys his father in the warres vniuſtly managed againſt them by Pope Sixtus, by Ferdinand laſt dead, & Alphonſo now raigning. They willed them to loke into the great profits comming to their nation by traffike and entercourſe in the realme of Fraunce, where they were fauored with familiaritie and offices as if they were naturall of the region it ſelf And with that example they might hope to haue in the kingdom of Naples, (if he became Lord of it) the ſelfe ſame libertie of trade, ſewertie and benefit, where, of them of Aragon they neuer receiued other thinges, then domage, daungers, and diſpleaſures.

They recommended to their good councells the conſideracion of theſe things, and to proteſt by ſome token that they would ioyne with him in this enterpriſe. But if they were reſtrayned by ſome iuſt impediment, reaſon or excuſe, at leaſt that they would graunt libertie of paſſage to his armie thorow their territories, and refreſhing and vittells for his money. They debated theſe thinges with the common weale and generall ſtate, but they recommended particularly to P. de medicis, the reſpect of many goodturnes and honors done by Levvys the xj. to his father and aunceſtors: how he in very ielous and daungerous ſeaſons, had made many demonſtracions for the preſeruacion of their greatnes, and in ſigne of amitie, had honored them with the ſkotchions and armes proper to the houſe of Fraunce: where, Ferdinand not ſatisfied to perſecute them with open and violent warre, did alſo with a minde ſworne to their ruine, take parte with the ciuill conſpiracies wherein Iulyan his vncle was killed, and Lavvrence his father ſore hurt. The Embaſſadors went out of Florence without reſolucion, & being at Rome, they preferred to the Popes remembrance the aun-cient merits and perpetuall deuocion of the crowne of Fraunce to the ſea apoſtolike, whereof were autentike teſtimonies, all recordes both auncient and preſent, and of the contrary, they inſinuated the ordinary contumacie and diſobedience of them of Aragon, and referred the proofe to the view and conſtruction of their actions paſt.
Then they demaunded that the realme of Naples might be inueſted in the perſon of their king, as iuſtly apperteyning to him. They allured him with many hopes, and made many offers, ſo that he woulde be fauorable to thenterpriſe, which their king had taken vpon him as much by his perſwaſions and authoritie, as for other occaſi-ons. To this demaund the Pope aunſwered that thinueſtiture of that realme hauing bene graunted by ſo many his predeceſſors to three kinges of the houſe of Aragon ſucceſſiuely

The french k. ſendeth Embaſſadors to the Pope, Florentins and Venice.

ſucceſſiuely (for in thinueſtiture graunted to Ferdinand, Alphonſo was comprehended by name) it was not conuenient to giue it to king Charles afore it was declared by forme of iuſtice that he had good right, whereunto thinueſtiture graunted to Alphonſo was not preiudiciall, for that for ſuch conſideracion it conteyned expreſſe mencion, that it was ment without the preiudice of any perſon: he tolde them that the realme of Naples did directly belong to the ſea apoſtolike, whoſe authoritie he knew was farre from the kings will to violat, and no leſſe contrary to thintencions of his auncestors who had bene alwayes the principall defenders of the ſame: But if he ſhould doe any violent action vpon Naples, it could not be without manifeſt intruſion & tranſgreſſion of the holy ſea, and bring diſhonor to the reputacion & merits of his elders: it would better become his dignitie and vertues, to ſeeke to iuſtifie his pretence of right by courſe of iuſtice & moderate equitie, wherein as Lord, Patrone, & onely iudge of ſuch a cauſe he offered him ſelfe ready to adminiſter to him: And that a Chriſtian king ought not to demaund more of a Pope, whoſe office was to reſtraine and forbid, and not to enterteyne and nouriſh warres betwene Princes chriſtened: And though he ſhould ſo farre incline to the kings will, yet he ſhewed many difficulties and daungers both by the neighbourhood of Alphonſo and the Florentyns, whoſe vnitie all Tuſkane followed, and alſo for the conſanguinitie & alliance of ſo many Barons holding of the king of Naples, whoſe eſtates ſtretched euen to the gates of Rome. Notwithſtanding all this, he enforced him ſelfe, not to cut of their hope altogither, albeit he bare priuatly this ſetled reſolucion not to depart from the confederacion made with Alphonſo. At Florence thinclinacion was great and generall to the houſe of Fraunce, for the liberall mart & traffike which that ſtate had with the french: for an olde opinion (but vntrue) that Charlemain was the reedifier of their citie deſtroyed by Tottila kinge of Gothes: for the auncient coniunction and amitie which their auncestors the Guelffes haue had long time with Charles the firſt, king of Naples, and with many of his lyne protectors of the faction of Guelffes in Italy. And laſtly for the memorie of the warres, which the olde Alphonſo, & after him Ferdinand in the perſon of his ſonne, had areared againſt that citie. By the reaſon, recordacion, and memorie of theſe thinges, the communaltie and multitude cried to conſent to free conduct and paſſage, deſiring no leſſe the beſt authoriſed and wiſe citiſens in that common weale to whom it ſeemed a great partialitie and ouerſight to pull vpon the countrey of Florence, (for the controuerſies of an other) ſo preſent and daungerous a warre: they held it no pollicie to oppoſe them ſelues againſt ſo mighty an armie managed in the perſonne of A king of Fraunce, deſcending into Italy with the fauour of the ſtate of Myllan, and no reſiſtance of the gouernment of Venice, though they publiſh no manifeſt conſent: this councell they confirmed with thauthoritie of Coſmo de medicis (eſteemed in his time one of the wiſeſt in Italy) who, in the warres betwene Iohn of Aniovv and Ferdinand, gaue alwayes this councell, that the citie of Florence ſhould not obiect it ſelfe againſt Iohn: notwithſtanding the Pope & Duke of Myllan were ioyned with Ferdinand. They remembred withall, the example of Lavvrence father to Peter, who was of the ſame aduiſe vppon euery brute of the returne of them of Aniovv: yea ſo much was he amaſed with the power of the french ſince the ſame king obteyned Britaine, that he would often times ſay, that great troubles were prepared for all Italians, if the king of Fraunce knew his owne ſtrength. But Peter de medicis who meaſured thinges more by will then by wiſedome, abuſed him ſelfe to much with his owne opinion, beleuing that theſe emocions would rather reſolue into brutes then into effects: wherein being gouerned by ſome his ſpeciall fauorits corrupted perhaps with the presents of Alphonso, determined resolutly to continue in amitie with the Aragons, whereunto in the ende all the residue of the Citi-

" sens must condescend by reason of his greatnes: Ambicion is an vnquiet humor in
" man: it may be that Peter not content with thauthoritie which his father had got in the common weale (& yet such, by his disposing, that though Magistrats were created, yet they determined no matters of importãce without his aduise) aspired to a power more absolute euen to the title of Prince: he did not debate with discression the condicions of that citie, who, at that time being populous in multitudes, and mighty in riches, and nourished by many ages with an apparance of a common weale, the principall Citisens being accustomed to participate in the gouernment, rather in forme of companions then subiectes, would hardly endure so great and suddein mutacion: And therefore, Peter knowing that to the holding vpp of his ambicion must be ioyned foundacions extraordinary: and the better to haue a mighty piller to support his new principallitie: he restrained him selfe immoderatly to th Aragons, determining in their course to communicate with their fortunes. Thus perhaps was furthered by this accident: not many dayes before thembassadors of the french ariued at Florence, there cãme to light certeine practises, which Lavvrence and Iohn de medicis, yong men rich, and neare in bludd to Peter, and lately become his enemies vpon certein light occasions of youth, conspired with Lodovvik Sforce and by him with the french king directly against the greatnes of Peter: But being arested by the Magistrates, they were with light punishment returned to their houses in the countrey, for that the temperance of the Magistrates preuailing with Peter not without some difficulties, induced him not to suffer the lawes to execute any extreme action vpon his kinred and bludd: But receiuing warning by this accident that Lodovvyk Sforce thirsted after his ruine, he esteemed it so much the more needefull to remaine still in his first purpose: At last thembassadors were aunswered, but much to their discontentment, and more contrary to their desire: in place of the conclusion they hoped for, they were told with wordes reuerent and respectiue, with what naturall deuocion the people of Florence, honored the house of Fraunce, togither with their commõ desire to satisfie so great a king: on the other side they made declaracion of their impediments, as that there could be nothing more vnworthy of Princes and common weales, then not to keepe faith promised, which vnlesse they should apparantly defile and breake, they could not now satisfie his demaundes, and content the time togither: They sayd, as yet was not ended the confederacion which by thauthoritie of king Levvys his father was made with Ferdinand with couenant, that after his death it should stretch to Alphonso: wherein they were bound by special condicion not only to defend the realme of Naples, but also to giue no passage thorow their countries to any that went about to inuade it: Lastly that it brought no small greefe to them, that there was such difference betwene their desires and wills, and that they had no power to make other resolucions then such as must either make the king displeased, or bring great preiudice to their whole estate: Onely they hoped that the king being wise and iust, would interpret them according to their good wills, and referre to those reasonable impediments that which they could not promise.

The Florentyns aunswere the french Embassadors.

The king made angrie with this aunswere, commaunded immediatly thembassadors of Florence to depart out of Fraunce, and following the councell of Lodovvyk Sforce, he banished out of Lyons, not the generall marchauntes, but onely the factors and bankers of P. de medicis, to the ende that they might iudge at Florence, that he acknowledged this iniurie particularly vpon Peter, and not vpon the body of the state.

The french king angry with the Florentyns aunswere.

The

The other Potentats of Italy being diuided amongeſt them ſelues, ſome bearing fauor to the french, and ſome fearing calamities and extreme fortunes, the Venetians onely determined to remaine newters, and with an idle eye to behold the yſſue of all thinges, perhaps they were not much troubled that Italy ſhould fall into garboyle, hoping that the long warres of others would giue them oportunitie to enlarge their eſtate: or perhaps the opinion of their greatnes would not ſuffer them to be dowtfull of perills: And therefore not fearing that the victors could haue any fortune ouer them, they iudged it a folly to make proper to them, the warres of others, & had no apparant neceſſitie. And yet Ferdinand ceaſſed not to ſolicite them continually, and the french king the yeare before, and euen then had ſent to them Embaſſadors who forgat not to declare that betwene the houſe of Fraunce & that common weale, was alwayes amitie and good will, and as occaſion offered mutuall effectes and offices expreſſed. The which diſpoſicion, the king ſeeking to augment and ratifie, he deſired of that wiſe Senate councell and fauor in his enterpriſe, whereunto they aunſwered with this moderacion and breuitie: that the king for him ſelfe was ſo wiſe & foreſeeing, & enuironed with a councel ſo graue and ripe, that it could not be without too much preſuming to ioyne to him their opinions and councells. They would be alwayes glad of his proſperities & good fortunes for the obſeruances which they had alwaies borne to the crowne of Fraunce: They were not a litle greeued, that they could not accompany the readines of their mindes with thoſe effectes they deſired, for that by the ſuſpicion wherein the Turke kept them continually wanting neither deſire nor oportunities to vexe them: Neceſſitie compelled them to keepe alwayes with great charges many yles and coaſt townes fronting vppon him, the ſame being the cauſe that they could not make them ſelues parties to the warre of an other But the preparacions which were made on all ſides as well by lande as ſea, were of farre greater importance then eyther the orations of thembaſſadors, or the aunſweres made to them: for, king Charles had ſent Peter d'Vrſe his great Eſquier, to Genes (ouer which citie the duke of Myllan commaunded by the ayde of the faction of Adorne and I.L. de fieſco ſigno) to rigge vp a mighty armie of ſhippes and gallies, cauſing alſo to be armed other veſſells in the portes of Ville Franche and Marſelles. This was the cauſe of the brute in his court, that he determined to enter the kingdom of Naples by ſea, as had done afore time Iohn ſonne of Rene againſt Ferdinand: In Fraunce albeit many beleued, that what for the youth of the king, and the baſe condicion & ſlender conduct of ſuch as ſtirred him to this expedicion, togither with the want & neceſſitie of money, theſe preparacions in them would diſſolue & vaniſh into ſmoke: yet, to ſatisfie the deſire of the king who by the aduiſe of his fauorits had newly taken vpon him the title of king of Ieruſalem and both Cycylyes (then the title of the kinges of Naples:) There was generall and diligent order giuen on all partes for the prouiſions of the warre: as making of muſters, gathering of money, remouing of men, with other induſtries due to ſuch expedicions: And no councell had but with Galeas de S. Seuerin, who held incloſed in his mind all the ſecrets & purpoſes of Lodouvvyk Sforce: Of the other ſide Alphonſo in whom had wanted no pollicie or diligence to fortifie him ſelfe by ſea and by land (iudging now there was no more time to ſuffer him ſelfe to be mocked with the hopes of Lodouvvyk Sforce, and that it ſerued better for him to amaze and vexe him, then to trauell to aſſure or appaiſe him) commaunded thembaſſador of Myllan to retyre out of Naples, and reuoked his that was reſident at Myllan: he ſequeſtred alſo and tooke into his poſſeſſion the reuenues of the Duchie of Bary, which Lodouvvyk had enioyed many yeares by the gift of Ferdinand. And not content with theſe thinges, which were rather demonſtracions of open hatred, then wronges or offences, he diſpoſed all his witts, to turne from the Duke of Myllan, the citie of Genes, A matter of right great importance for the preſent affayres, for that by the reuolt and chaunge of that citie, would happen many meanes to trouble Lodovvyk in his gouernment of Myllan, and from the french king ſhould be taken away all oportunities to moleſt the realme of Naples by ſea: Therefore hauing made ſecrete pact with Cardinall Pavvle Fregoſe, afore times Duke of Genes, & ſtill followed with many of the ſame familie: and with Obietto de fieſque, two principal men both for the towne and ſea, togither with ſome particulars of the Adorneys, all baniſhed out of Genes for diuerſe occaſions: he determined to aſſaie with a ſtrong armie at ſea, to ſett them all in the towne againe (following that he was wont to ſay, that warres are o-

" uercomen either in preuenting thennemie, or diuerting him: he determined in like ſort to goe him ſelfe into Romagnia with a mighty armie, and to make ſuddeine inuaſion vpon the landes of Parma, where publiſhing the name of Iohn Galeas, and diſplaying his banners, he hoped that the peoples of the Duchie of Myllan would riſe againſt Lodovvik: And be it that in this were found many difficulties, yet he iudged
" it profitable that the warre ſhould beginne farre from his realme: he eſteemed it alſo to great importance for the ſubſtance of the warre, that the french men ſhould be ſurpriſed with the winter in Lombardye: wherein hauing greate experience in the warres of Italy, (whoſe armies attending the riping of graſſe and forrage for the feeding of horſes, were not wont to take the fielde afore the ende of Aprill:) he iudged that to eſchew the ſharpnes of winter, they would be conſtrayned to ſtay in a countrey of their frendes till ſpring time: In which intermiſſion and reſpite of time he hoped that ſome occaſion for his benefit might happen. Beſides, he ſent Embaſſadors to Conſtantinople, to demaund ſuccors as in a common daunger of B. Ottoman Prince " of the Turkes, for that it was reſolued in the french kinges intencion to paſſe into Greece after he had wonne Naples, which daunger he knew wel the Turke would not deſpiſe, for that by the memory of the warres made in times paſt againſt the Infidels in Aſia by the french nation, the feare which the Turkes had of their armes was not litle.

Whileſt theſe thinges were thus ſolicited on all partes, the Pope ſent his men to Oſtia vnder the gouernment of Nicholas Vrſin Counte of Petillane, to whom Alphonſo ſent ſtrength and ſuccors both by ſea and land: he tooke the towne without difficultie, and then beganne to batter the caſtell, which (by the meane of Fabrice Colonne, and conſent of Iohn de la Rouere prefect of Rome, and brother to Cardinall S. P. ad vincula) was eaſily rendred to him by the caſtell keeper, with this condicion, that the Pope neither with cenſures of the Church, nor temporall armes, ſhould purſue the Cardinall nor the prefect, if they gaue him no new occaſions: And it was ſuffered to Fabrice, in whoſe handes the Cardinall had left Grotta Ferrara, to continue the poſſeſſion of the ſame with the ſame rights, paying to the Pope ten thowſand duckatts. But Lodovvyk Sforce (to whom the Cardinall when he paſſed by Sauonne, had made knowen that which Alphonſo by his meanes and councells negociated ſecretly with the exiles of Genes) declared to king Charles what a great impediment that would giue to his enterpriſe, & therfore induced him to ſend to Genes two thowſand Svviſſers, & diſpatch into Italy with ſpeede three hundreth launces to be ready vnder the gouernment of Monſ. d'aubigny, (who returning from Rome, ſtayed by the kings commaundement at Myllan) both to aſſure Lombardye, and to paſſe further according to occaſions and neceſſities: To theſe ſhould be ioyned fiue hundreth men at armes, I-

talians enterteyned at that time in the Kinges pay vnder Iohn fr. de S. Seuerin Counte of Gainzze, Galeot Pico Counte of Myrandola, and Radolphe of Gonſague, togither with fiue hundreth which the Duke of Myllan was bound to furniſh: who not leauing his olde ſhiftes and ſuttleties, continued to confirme in the Pope and Peter de medicis his inclinacion to the peace & ſewertie of Italy, nouriſhing them with varietie of hopes which were not without their apparant demonſtracions.

It can not almoſt be, but that which men make great ſewertie of, ingendreth ſome dowte, euen in the mindes of ſuch as haue determined to beleue the contrary: for albeit there was no great faith giuen to the promiſes of Lodovvyk: yet it hapned not for all that, that their determined enterpriſes ſuffered in any ſort ſlowe ſucceſſe or proceedings: And the Pope & P. de medicis could haue bene well content that thenterpriſe had bene proued to ſurpriſe Genes: But becauſe in the action they ſhould directly offend the ſtate of Myllan, the Pope, (Alphonſo requiring his gallies & to ioyne his men with him in Romagnia,) conſented to the ſeruice of his men for the common defence in Romagnia, but not to paſſe further: And touching the gallies, he made difficultie, ſaying it was not yet time to put Lodovvyk ſo much in deſpaire. The Florentyns being required to receiue Alphonſoes armie by ſea in the port of Lyuorne, and to refreſh them, remained in ſuſpence vpon the matter, for that making excuſes to the demaundes of the french king, and being acquited vnder the pretence of the confederacion paſſed with Ferdinand, they were very vnwillingly diſpoſed to doe more without neceſſitie, then they were bound vnto by that confederacion.

Matters being now not able to ſuffer any longer delay, the armie by ſea of Alphonſo departed at laſt from Naples vnder the charge of th Admirall Dom Federyk: & Alphonſo in perſon aſſembled his armie in Abruzze to paſſe into Romania: But afore any further action was done, he thought it neceſſary to communicat with the Pope, who had the ſame deſire, the better to eſtabliſh all thinges that were to be done for their common ſafetie. The king of Naples ſendeth out his forces.

The Pope and Alphonſo met togither the xiij of Iuly at Vicouare, a place apperteining to Virginio Vrſin, where after they had ſpent three dayes, they returned well agreed: In this meeting and conſultacion it was determined by the councell of the Pope, that the perſon of the king of Naples ſhould paſſe no further: his armie conteined litle leſſe then a hundreth ſquadrons of men at armes, accompting xx. men to a ſquadron: And very neare three thowſand croſ bowe ſhott and light horſemen: Of this armie it was agreed that one part ſhould ſtay with him vpon the frontyers of Abruzze for his ſafetie and ſewertie of the ſtate eccleſiaſtike: And that Virginio ſhould remeine in the town of Rome to make head againſt the Collonoys: for dread of whom, alſo it was agreed that two hundreth of the men at armes of the Pope and a part of the light horſemen of the king ſhould not ſtirre out of Rome: That thexpedicion into Romania ſhould be performed in the perſon of Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, (that was the title of the eldeſt ſonne to the king of Naples) A yong Prince of great hope: leading with him lxx. ſquadrons with the reſidue of the light horſemen, and moſt part of the Popes companies ſuch as he erected for defence: There were ioyned with him (as moderators of his youth) Iohn Iacques Triuulſo gouerner of the ſouldiers of the king of Naples, and the Counte Petillane, who from the Popes pay was become mercynary to the king of Naples, both Capteynes of great experience and reputacion: Seeing they ment to leade an armie into Lombardye, it was thought good that it ſhould paſſe in the perſon of Ferdinand, for the ſocietie of blud and duble parentage which he had with Iohn Galeas huſband to Iſabell his ſiſter, and ſonne of Iohn Galeas, brother to Hipollita who was mother to Ferdinand: But touching the actions of this parliament betwene the Pope and Alphonſo, that of moſt importance, was, concerning the Collonois, for that it was diſcerned by manifeſt ſignes that they aſpired to new intelligences: ſeeing that Proſper and Fabricius hauing ſerued in the pay of the late king of Naples, and by him recompenſed with eſtates and honorable places: Proſper (the king being dead) after many promiſes made to Alphonſo to reenter into his pay, was by the working of Cardinall Aſcanius, entred into the common pay of the Pope and the Duke of Myllan, refuſing afterwards to take the Popes pay being much ſolicited: And Fabricius, who had continued in the ſeruice of Alphonſo hauing regard to the diſdayne of the Pope and the king of Naples againſt Proſper: made difficultie to goe with the Duke of Calabria into Romania, if firſt by ſome conuenient meanes were not reeſtabliſhed and aſſured the affayres of Proſper and all the familie of Colonne: This was the cooler of their difficulties: But ſecretly they both were become mercenary to the french king, (partly drawne by the great amitie they had with Cardinall Aſcanius, who forſaking Rome a few dayes afore for ſuſpicion of the Pope, was retired to their landes) and partly for hope of larger payes, but much more moued with diſpleaſure that Virginio Vrſin chiefe of the contrary faction bare greateſt rule with Alphonſo, and participated more then they in his proſperities: But to keepe this thing conceiled vntill they might with ſewertie declare them ſelues his ſouldiers, they treated continually with the Pope and Alphonſo, by whom was made great inſtance, that Proſper taking pay of them, would leaue the wages of the Duke of Myllan, for that otherwayes they could not be aſſured of him: The Collonoys made ſhow of deſire to accord with them, but to thende to determine nothing, they moued one tyme one difficultie and ſometimes an other, vpon the condicions that were offered.

In that practiſe, there was diuerſitie of wills betwene Alexander and Alphonſo, for that Alexander deſiring to diſpoyle them of the places they held about Rome, cheriſhed the occaſion to aſſayle them: and Alphonſo who had no other intencion then to aſſure them, was not inclined to the warre but for a laſt remedie: but he durſt not oppoſe againſt the couetouſnes of the Pope. At laſt they determined to conſtrayne them by armes, and appointed forces and orders howe it ſhould be done, aſſaying notwithſtanding afore, if within few dayes their controuerſies might be accorded.

The beginnig of the warre.

Theſe things, with many others, were debated on all partes, mens witts wandring and their mindes vnreſolute, their feares generall, but their hopes full of ſuſpicions and incerteinties, in their wills no conſent or vnitie, and all their coniectures and iudgements full of error, no, none that could moderat their expectacion, and much leſſe iudge what woulde be the ende of thoſe tragicall preparacions: but at laſt the warre of Italy tooke beginning by the going of Dom Federyk to the enterpriſe of Genes leading an armie no dowt of greater proporcion and better prouiſion, then had bene ſeene of long time before ronne ouer the ſtreames and ſea of Tyrrennum: it conteyned xxxv. light or ſuttle galleyes, eighteene ſhippes, with many other leſſer veſſells, great quantitie of artillerie, and three thowſand footemen to put on lande: By reaſon of which great equipage, and leading with them the exiles, the armie departed out of Naples with great hope of the victorie: But their lingring and ſlow departing, cauſed by thoſe difficulties which commonly follow great enterpriſes, & partly abuſed by the conning hopes which Lodowyk gaue them, and partly for that they ſtayed in the portes of Sienna to leuye to the number of v. thowſand footemen, made hard and daungerous, that, which being aſſayed one moneth afore, would haue ben eaſie and without perill: for, the enemies (by their ſlow proceedings) had leaſure to dreſſe a ſtronge prouiſion, putting within Genes the bayliſ of Dyon, with two thowſand Svvyzzers leuyed and payed by the french, and already ordered and rigged a great part of the ſhippes and galleyes which were armed in that port, and one parte of the veſſells furniſhed at Marſeilles, being there arriued alſo: Beſides, Lodovvyk for his part ſpared for no expēſes, but diſpatched thether Gaſper de S. Seuerin, called Fracaſſe, with Anthonie Maria his brother, with many footemen: And becauſe he would compound his ſtrength no leſſe vpon the good wills & hartes of Genes, then of forreine forces, he confirmed with giftes, penſions, and promiſes of many recompenſes the courage and intencion of Iohn Loys de Fieſquo, brother to Obietto, the Adornes, and many other gentlemen and populars much importing to keepe that citie in his deuocion: he had alſo called to Myllan many factions of the baniſhed men aſwell of the towne as riuers of Genes: To theſe prouicions mighty enough of them ſelues, did giue great reputacion and ſewertie the perſon and preſence of Lovvys Duke of Orleance, who about the ſame tymes that the Aragons flete was diſcouered in the ſea of Genes, entred that citie by commiſſion of the french king, hauing firſt communicated in Alexandria vpon the common affayres with Lodovvyk Sforce, who (as the doings of mortall men are full of thicke darknes) had receiued him with great gladnes and honor, but as a companion, not knowing howe ſoone his whole eſtate and life would fall into his power.

Lovys Duke of Orleans entreth Genes, and preſumes it.

Theſe accidentes were the cauſes why the Aragons (determined before to preſent their fleete afore the port of Genes, vnder hope that the parties and confederats with thexiles would draw into ſome inſurrection) chaunging now councell with the occaſion, reſolued to aſſayle the riuer: And after ſome diuerſitie of opinions, whether in the riuer of Leuant or the Weſt, were beſt to beginne: the aduiſe of Obietto preuayled, who promiſing him ſelfe much vppon them of the waters of Leuant, they adreſſed them ſelues to the towne of Portouenere, to the which they gaue aſſault for many howers in vayne, for that it was refurniſhed from Genes with fowre hundreth footemen, and the courages of thinhabitants well reſolute and confirmed by Iohn Lovvys de Fyeſquo lately come thither: Being out of hope to carie the towne by aſſault, they retyred to the porte of Lyuorne, to reuittell their ſhippes, and refurniſh their companies of footemen: for, when they vnderſtood that the townes and peeces vppon the riuer were in good condicion of defence and prouicion, they iudged that to that action was neceſſary a greater ſupply of force: At Lyuorna, Federyk being aduertiſed that the french armie inferior to his in gallyes, but mightier in ſhippes was in preparacion to fall out of the port of Genes: ſent backe agayne to Naples his ſhippes to be able with more readines by the ſwiftnes of his galleyes to keepe aloof from thennemie, if with their ſhippes and gallyes togither they ſhoulde ſett on him, hoping notwithſtanding to vanquiſh them, if their gallyes were ſeparate from their ſhippes, eyther by aduenture, or by will.

In the ſelfe ſame ſeaſons, the Duke of Calabria marched towardes Romania, with the armie by lande, with intencion to paſſe afterwardes into Lombardye, according to the firſt reſolucions: But to haue his paſſage more free and eaſie, and to leaue no impediments or perills behind his backe, it was needefull to ioyne to him the ſtate of Bologne, and the cities of Gmola and Furly: for Ceſene a citie immediatly ſubiect to the Pope and the citie of Faenſe, belonging to Aſtor de Manfreddi, a young gentleman, penſionary and gouerned vnder the protection of the Florentyns, were to giue willingly all commodities to the Aragons armie. Octauyan ſonne to Ieronimo de Riare, was Lord of Furly and Gmola, with a title of vicaire of the Church, but in mi-noritie & vnder gouernment of Katthern Sforce his mother, with whom many monethes before, the Pope and Alphonſo had practiſed to enterteyne Octauyan in their common pay, with condicion to defend his eſtates: but the matter remeyned imperfect, partly by the difficulties ſhe alleaged, to the ende to get better condicions: And partly for that the Florentyns dwelling ſtill in their former purpoſe not to exceede the bondes they had with Alphonſo to the preiudice of the french king, could not be reſolued to be concurrant in this practiſe, to the which their conſent was neceſſary, becauſe the Pope & the king would not alone ſuſteyne the charge: but much more for that Kattherne would not put in daunger that citie, onles with the others, the Florentyns would be bound to the gard and defenſe of the eſtates of her ſonne: Theſe difficulties were taken away by the meting and ſpeaking togither, which Ferdinand, (drawing his armie by the way of Marrechia into Romania) had with Peter de medicis in the village of S. Sepulcher: where he offered him in the name of his father king Alphonſo, franke power to diſpoſe of him and his armie in all the ſeruices which he had intencion to execute for the affayres of Florence, Siena, & Faenſa: theſe offers giuing a newe life to the auncient courage of Peter, as ſoone as he was returned to Florence, he ordeyned (notwithſtanding the diſſwaſions of the wiſeſt Citiſens) that thaccord ſhould be ſubſigned, for that Ferdinand had inſtātly deſired him. This being diſpatched at the common charges of the Pope, Alphonſo, and the Florentyns, not many dayes after, they had the citie of Bologna at their deuocion, enterteyning Iohn Bentyuole (vnder whoſe authoritie and direction the citie was gouerned) in the ſame maner the Pope promiſed, hauing withall the faith of king Alphonſo and P. de medicis, to create Cardinall Aſſhonie Galeas his ſonne, then pronotorye of the ſea.

Theſe thinges gaue to the armie of Ferdinand a great reputacion, which yet had bene more great, if with thoſe ſucceſſes he had ſooner entred into Romania: But by his ſlow ſpeede to march out of the kingdom, and the diligent care and watching of Lodovvyk Sforce, Ferdinand was no ſoner arriued at Cefena, then Monſr. Daubygny, and the Count Caiaʒze, gouernor ouer the companies of Sforce, togither with a great part of the armie appoynted to make heade againſt the Aragons, being paſſed without let by Bolognia, entred the countrey of Ymola: by meanes whereof, Ferdinand hauing loſt his firſt hopes to paſſe into Lombardie, was compelled to ſetle the warre in Romania, where (other cities following the partie of th Aragons) Rauenna and Cernia, cities of the Venetian iuriſdiction, bare fauor to neither ſide. This litle countrey ſtretching along the riuer of Pavv, & in the poſſeſſion of the Duke of Ferrara, ſpared no one cōmoditie to the companies of the french & Sforce. Touching P. de medicis, neither the difficulties hapning in thenterpriſe of Genes, nor thimpediments occurring in Romania, could bridle his raſhnes: for, being bownd by a ſecret cōuencion without the knowledge of the common weale, made with the Pope and Alphonſo to oppoſe him ſelf openly againſt the french king: he had not only cōſented that the Neapolytan armie at ſea ſhould be receiued & refreſhed in the hauē of Lyuorne, with power to leuye footemē through the whole territory of Florence: but alſo reſtraining his raſhnes to no limit, he wrought ſo, that Anniball Bētiwole, ſonne of Iohn, mercenary to the Florentyns, wēt with his charge, & the cōpanies of Aſtor de Manfreddi, & ioyned with the campp of Ferdinand, as ſoone as he entred into the contrey of Furly, & ſent beſides, to the ſayd Bentyuole, a thowſand footemen with artilleries. Such a like diſpoſicion was alwaies diſerned in the Pope, who, beſides the prouiſions of warre, not contented to haue exhorted by writing the yeare before, king Charles not to paſſe into Italy, but to

proceede by way of iuſtice and not armes, reinioyned him eftſoones by an other ſig-neture, the ſelfe ſame thinges vppon payne of the Church cenſures: And by the biſhop of Calagorre his Nuncio at Venice, (whether for the ſame effect were gone the baſſadors of Alphonſo, & they of Florence, who notwithſtanding made not ſuch open demaundes) he perſwaded much that Senate, that for the common benefite of Italy, they would proteſt publike reſiſtance againſt the french purpoſes, or at leaſt to giue Lodovvyk roundly to vnderſtand, that he was much diſcontented with this innoua-cion: But the Senate aunſwered by the Duke, that it was farre from the office of a wiſe Prince, to pull the warre vpon his owne howſe, and take it from an other, nor to conſent to doe either by demonſtracions or effects, any thing that may diſpleaſe either of the parties: And becauſe the king of Spaine, ſolicited inſtantly by the Pope & Alphonſo, promiſed (for the ſuccors of Naples) to ſend into Scycile an armie by ſea well furniſhed, and at laſt made excuſe that it could not be ſo ſoone ready for want of money: the Pope gaue conſent (beſides a certeine porcion which Alphonſo ſent him) & power, that he might conuert into that vſe, the moneyes gathered in Spaine by the Apoſtolike authoritie vnder coler of the Croyſade, which ought not to be employed againſt others then thennemies to the faith Chriſtian: Alphonſo alſo, beſides thoſe he had already ſent to the great Turke, diſpatched of new Camylla Pandon, with whom was ſẽt ſecretly by the Pope George Bucciardo a Genovvay, whoſe ſeruice Pope Innocent had vſed there afore, who being receiued with great honor of Baiazet, & di-ſpatched with no leſſe expedicion, brought home large promiſes of ſuccors: which albeit was confirmed a litle after by an Embaſſador ſent by the Turke to Naples, yet either for the diſtance of places, or for the diſtruſt he had of the Chriſtians, thoſe promiſes brought forth no effect: In this time, Alphonſo & P. de medicis ſeing their armies ſucceeded not happily by land nor ſea, they labored to beguile L. Sforce, vſing his owne craftes & connings, but their induſtrie brought forth no better yſſue, then their forces. It was thopinion of many, that Lodovvyk, for the conſideracion of his proper daunger, was not content that the french king ſhould conquere Naples: but his plot was, that aſſoone as he was made Duke of Myllan, and that the french armie had paſſed into Tuſcane, to worke ſome accorde, by the which Alphonſo ſhould acknowledge him ſelfe tributarie to the crowne of Fraunce, with aſſurance to the king of office and obſeruancie, and ſo the king (the places which the Florentyns helde in Lunigiane, reuerting perhaps out of their hands) to returne into Fraunce: So that the Florentynes by this meane ſhould remeyne battered, the king of Naples diminiſhed of force and authoritie, and he become Duke of Myllan, ſhould haue got for his ſew-ertie ſo much as was ſufficient, without feare to fall into the daungers which might happen by the victorie of the french: he had hope alſo that the winter comming on, the king would ſuffer ſuch difficulties as would let the courſe of his victorie: Laſtly he iudged that waighing with thimpacience of the french, the kinges ſlender proui-cion of money, and the wills of many of his people eſtranged from thenterpriſe, there would not want meanes to worke compoſicion.

Conieftures againſt the ſutteties of Lodowyk Sforce.

This was a groſſe error in his pollecie, to breede the ſtorme, and leaue the defence to poſſibilities dowtefull: it is too daungerous to broach a veſſell of poyſon, and haue the vertue of the antydote vncerteyne: fier ſuffered to ronne, burnes without lymitt, euen to the conſuming of ſuch as firſt kyndled it. But whatſoeuer was his ſecret intencion, it is certeyne that albeit at the beginning Lodovvyk ſtudied to ſeparate Pe. de medicis from th Aragons, yet after he perſwaded him ſecretly to per-ſeuere in his opinion, promiſing him ſo to worke that the french Kinge ſhoulde not march at all, or at leaſt if he did paſſe, he ſhould with the ſame ſpeede returne afore he did any action on that ſide the mountes: this he did often reiterate by his Embaſſador reſident at Florence, eyther for that ſuch was his iuſt intencion, or elſe hauing determined to ruinate Peter, he deſired that he might bring him to doe ſo much agaynſt the kinge, as there might be no meane to reconcyle them. But Peter determining by the conſent of Alphonſo to make theſe behauiours knowen to the french king, called one day into his howſe, the embaſſador of Myllan, vnder couler of being ill diſpoſed of his perſon: afore he came, he cauſed to hyde ſecretly the french Embaſſador reſident at Florence, in a place where he might eaſily heare their communication. There Peter repeated to the embaſſador plainly, diſtinctly, and at large, the perſwaſions and promiſes of Lodovvyk, and that for his authoritie he was vnwilling to conſent to the demaundes of the french king: taking occaſion to complayne greeuouſly, for that with ſo diligent inſtance he ſolicited the king to paſſe: he concluded, that ſeeing the effectes aunſwered not his wordes, he was conſtrayned to ioyne him ſelfe to the enterpriſe, to auoyd his proper and preſent perill: The Myllanoys Embaſſador aunſwered, that he ought not to dowte of the faith of Lodovvyk, if for no other reaſon, at leaſt for this, that in compariſon and conſideracion of thinges, it was no leſſe daungerous to Lodovvyk then to any other, that the french ſhould enioy Naples: And therefore with all the councell, courage, and reaſons that he could, he perſwaded him to perſeuere in his firſt opinion, leaſt by ſuch hurtfull alteracion of his minde, he were not the cauſe to bring him ſelfe and all Italy into perpetuall ſeruitude: This diſcourſe with all his actions and circumſtances, the french Embaſſador with preſent ſpeede communicated with the kinge his maiſter, aſſuring him that he was betrayed by Lodovvyk, whoſe deuiſe tended all to his particular purpoſſe and profite, and all his intencions diſſembled and diſguiſed.

This pollicie and priuate manner of Peter bredd not the effect which Peter and Alphonſo hoped for, but, of the contrary, the matter and manner being reuealed to Lodovvyk, euen by the french them ſelues, the diſdayne and hate conceaued afore againſt Peter, redobled and tooke a ſtronger qualitie, and Lodovvyk with a new diligence and quicknes, ſolicited the french king to conſume no more time vnprofitably.

Foreſhowes of the calamities of Italy.

But now not onely the preparacions that were made in ſo great plenty both by ſea and lande, but alſo the conſent of the heauens and of men, pronounced to Italy their calamities to come: for that ſuch as made profeſſion, to haue iudgement eyther by ſcience or diuine inſpiracion in the thinges to come, aſſured with one voyce that there were in preparing, both more great mutacions and more ſtraunge & horrible accidents, then for many worldes before, had bene diſcerned in any part or circuit of the earth. There were ſeene in the night in Poulle three ſunnes in the middeſt of the firmament, but many clowdes about them, with ryght fearefull thunders and lightninges: In the territorie of Aretze, were viſibly ſeene paſſing in the ayre, infinite numbers of armed men vpon myghtie horſes, with a terrible noiſe of drommes and trumpettes: The Images and figures of Saincts did manifeſtly ſweate in many partes of Italy: In euery place were brought forth many monſters of men and other creatures, with many other thinges againſt the order of nature concurring all at one time, but in diuerſe places: by meanes wherof the people were caried into incredible feares, being already amaſed with the brute of the french powers & fury of that nation, with the which according to the teſtimonie of hiſtories,

they had aforetyme ronne ouer all Italy, ſackt and made deſolate with fire and ſword the citie of Rome, and ſubdued in Aſia many prouinces, and generally no part of the world which had not felt the vertue of their armes: But albeit theſe iudgements are often tymes fallible, and rather coniectures vncerteyne, then effectes hapning, yet the accidents that drew on, brought to them, in the ſpirites of frayle men, an abſolute fayth, credit, and religion: for, king Charles, holding his firſt purpoſe, was now come to Viena in D'auphine, and would not ſuffer him ſelfe to be ſtayed from his perſonall expedicion into Italy, neither by the iuſt and generall peticions of his whole realme, nor with the conſideracion of his vniuerſall wants of money, which were ſuch as he had no meane to furniſh the neceſſities preſent, but by pawning for a great ſumme of money, certeine iewells lent him by the Duke of Sauoye, the Marquiſſ of Mountferat, and other great Lordes of the Court: of the ſummes he had gathered before of the reuenues of Fraunce, and ſuch as were lent to him by Lodouvvyk, he had employed a great quantitie vppon the armies at ſea, wherein at the beginning was reappoſed a great hope of the victorie: and of the reſidue, he had made many indiſcreete liberalities to diuerſe perſons before he went from Lyons: And his Princes and noble men hauing at that tyme not ſo ready wayes to exact money vpon their peoples, as their immoderat couetouſnes hath brought them ſince, without regard to God or men, it was not eaſie for him to leuye new tributes: ſo ſlender were the prouiſions and groundes of ſo great a warre, furie and raſhnes guiding the king more, then wiſedom and councell.

But as it often hapneth in the execucion of things new, great, and difficult, that albeit all thinges are ordeyned and foreſeene: yet the reaſons that may be conſidered in the contrary come then to appeare in thunderſtanding of men, when the enterpriſe is toward his action and beginning: So, the king being vppon the poynt to depart, yea his ſoldiers marching towardes the mountes, there aroſe a great murmure thoroughout the court: ſome brought into conſideracion the difficulties ordinarie in ſo great an enterpriſe, and ſome diſputed of the generall daungers and infidelitie of th Italians, but ſpecially there was an vniuerſall ielowſie of Lodouvvyk Sforce, both for thaduertiſement lately come from Florence, and alſo certeyne money expected from him, remeyned yet behind: So that not onely ſuch as had alwayes reproued this enterpriſe, roſe vp eftſoones to reſiſt it with more audacitie (as hapneth in thoſe caſes when councell is confirmed by the euent of thinges) but euen thoſe that had bene the principall workers, as chiefly the Biſhop of S. Mallo, beganne ſo to ſhake, that the brute comming to the eares of the king and the whole Court inclyning to murmure and confuſion of opinions, cauſed ſuch an inclynacion in the king to paſſe no further, that ſuddeinly commaundement was giuen to make ſtaye of all the bandes and companies of ſouldiers: by meane whereof many that were already on their way, returned with willing ſpeede to the Court, following a reaport publiſhed, that it was a reſolucion ſette downe, that the camppe ſhoulde not paſſe into Italy: it was then beleeued that all had turned into alteracion and chaunge, if the Cardinall of S. P. ad vincla, (the fatall inſtrument both at that tyme, before, and after, of all the miſeries of Italy) had not with his authoritie and vehemencie giuen a newe life to thexpedicion, recomforted the heartes of the noble men, and brought agayne the ſpirite of the king to his firſt determinacion: he layed before him not onely the reaſons that had firſt ſtyrred him vppe to ſo glorious an enterpryſe, but alſo with a ſharppe and quicke eloquence, willed him to looke into thinfamie which myght ronne throughout all the worlde for ſo lyght a mutacion of ſo

And

And finally ſaith he, albeit the enterpriſe were neuer ſo perillous, yet neceſſitie conſtrayned him to follow it, ſeeing betwene glory and infamie, betwene diſhonour and triumph, betwene thopinion to be eſtemed a king, and a man vile, priuat, and abiect, there remeyned no meane. Theſe ſpeches in ſubſtance deliuered by the Cardinall, but according to his nature, in more graue & vehement geſture, kindled ſuch a new life and courage in the king, that without hearing any, then ſuch as perſwaded him to the warre, he departed the ſame day from Vyena accompanied with all the barons and capteynes of the realme, except the Duke of Burbon, to whom in his abſence, he left thadminiſtracion of the king dom, & the Admirall, with certeine others appointed to the gouernment and gard of prouinces moſt importing: Him ſelf with the armie paſſing into Italy by the mount Geneura, which yeldes a farre more eaſie paſſage then the mount Cenis, and by the which (but with incredible difficulties) Hannibal of Carthage made his way into Italy: entred into the towne of Aſt the ix. of September, a thowſand fowre hundreth lxxx. and fowreteene, leading with him into Italy the ſeedes of innumerable calamities, & moſt horrible accidents, with a chaunge almoſt and innouacion of all thinges: for, of his paſſage did not onely take beginning mutacion of eſtates, ſubuerſion of realmes, deſolacion of countreys, deſtruction of cities, and murders ciuill and moſt cruell: but alſo he brought with him newe faſhions of habytes, new cuſtomes, new and bluddy maners of making warres, and diſeaſes till thoſe tymes vnknowen, yea he did ſo diſorder thinſtruments of peace and concord in Italy, that being neuer able ſince to reorder & reduce them, other nations ſtraunge & barbarous, haue had good meane to oppreſſe them miſerably: And fot thincreaſing of thinfelicitie (becauſe their ſhame and diſhonour ſhoulde not be diminiſhed by the valour and vertues of the victor) he whoſe comming brought all thoſe calamities, (albeit he lackt nothing of the liberalities & fauours of fortune,) was voyde almoſt of all the giftes of nature & the mind: for, it is moſt certeine that king Charles from his infancie was of complexion very delicat, and of body vnſownde and diſeaſed, of ſmall ſtature, and offace (if thaſpect and dignitie of his eyes had bene taken away) fowle and deformed, his other members bearing ſuch equall proporcion, that he ſeemed more a monſter then a man: he was not onely without all knowledge of good ſciences, but ſkarcely he knew the diſtinct carecters of letters: his mind deſirous to commaund, but more proper to any other thing, for that being enuironed alwayes with his familiars & fauorits, he reteyned with them no maieſtie or authoritie: he reiected all affayres and buſines, and yet if he did debate and conſider in any, he ſhewed a weake diſcreſſion and iudgement: And if he had any thing in him that caried apparance of merit or praiſe, yet, being thorowly waighed and founded, it was found further of from vertue then from vice: he had an inclinacion to glory, but it was tempered more with raſhnes and furie then with moderacion and councell: his liberalities were without diſcreſſion, meaſure, or diſtinction: immouable often tymes in his purpoſes, but that was rather an ill grounded obſtinacie then conſtancie, and that which many call bowntie, deſerued more reaſonably in him the name of coldnes and ſlacknes of ſpirite.

The french king in Aſt.

The french king diſcribed.

The ſame day the king arriued in the towne of Aſt, the fauours of fortune began to appeare to him with a ioyfull token or prediction: for, there came from Genes glad newes, that Dom Federyk (who after his retyre from Portouenere to the hauen of Lyuorne, and that he had refreſhed his armie by ſea, and leuyed new companies of landmen, was eftſoones returned into the ſame riuer) had put on land Obietto de Fieſquo, with iij. thowſand footemen, who without difficultie had made him ſelfe Lord of the towne of Rapalle which is xx. miles from Genes, and then ſent companies to eſpie and ſpoyle the countrey there about: That ſuch a beginning being of no litle importance, for that touching the affayres of the towne of Genes, all emotions howe litle ſo euer they were, would be daungerous conſidering the contagiouſnes & multitude of parties and factions, thoſe within the towne eſteemed it not good that the enemies ſhould haue further aduantage: And therefore, leauing part of their companies to the gard of Genes, the ij. brethern S. Seuerins and Iohn Adorne brother to Auguſtyn gouerner of the towne, with thItalian footemen, putte them ſelues on the way to goe to Rapalle, the Duke of Orleance with a thowſand Svvizzers leading thither tharmy by ſea, which contained xviij. galleyes, vj. gallions, and ix. great ſhipps. And being all ioyned nere to Rapalle: they furiouſly gaue vpon the enemies that made head againſt the bridge which was betwene the ſuburbes of Rapalle and a litle ſtraite plaine that ſtretched to the ſea: That beſides, the proper forces of th Aragons, the ſeate of the place fought with aduantage for them, by whoſe ſteepenes & ſharpnes more thē other munition or art, the places of that riuer are wel fortified: the beginning of the ſkirmiſh ſemed proſperous to thēnemie, the Svvizzers being in a place very vnproper to beſtow their ordenāce, beginning almoſt to retyre: but by the cōtinual cōcurſe & flocking of the peaſants ronning after the faction of the Adornes, for their agilitie & experience in thoſe ſtonie & mountenous places, men of ſpeciall merit in ſeruice, and the Aragons beaten in flanck with the artilleries of the gallies of Fraunce which were brought as nere the banks as could be: they begā very hardly to ſuſteine the charge: And that laſtly, as they were beaten from the bridge, Obietto was aduertiſed (in whoſe fauour his pertakers did not yet ſtirre) that Iohn Lovvys de fieſquo was at hand with a great trowpe of footemen, And therefore fearing to be charged on the backe, they fledd to the mounteynes, Obietto being the firſt according to the cuſtom of rebells: That there was ſlayne of them in this encounter partly by fighting, and partly by fleeing, more then a hundreth bodies: A ſlaughter not litle, conſidering the maner of the warre in Italy in thoſe tymes: with theſe aduertiſements came accompanied the reapport of the priſoners taken, amongeſt whom was Iulius Vrſin, who with xl. men at armes and certeine croſbow ſhott on horſ backe, had followed the ſea armie of Alphonſo, in whoſe pay he was: Fregoſin ſonne to the Cardinall Fregoſe and Orlandin of the ſame familie, remeyned alſo priſoners. This victorie aſſured altogither thaffayres of Genes, for that Dom Federyk (who as ſoone as he had put his footemen on land, ſpred him ſelfe vpon the mayne ſea, as not to be conſtrayned to fight with thennemie in the gulphe of Rapalle) deſpairing to doe any profitable ſeruice at that time, retyred his armie once againe to the port of Liuorne: where albeit he refurniſhed his numbers with new ſouldiers, & had many plots to aſſayle the riuers in ſome other place: yet (by infortunate beginnings of enterpriſes often tymes men loſe both courage & councells) he attempted no other action of conſequence, leauing a iuſt occaſion to Lodovvyk to vaunt, that with his induſtrie and his councells, he had giuen the baye to his aduerſaries, ſeeing there was no other thing that ſaued the ſtate of Genes, but their too ſlow ſpeede to depart, whereof Lodovvyk was the cauſe by his conning and vayne hopes breeding their deceitfull ſecuritie.

Lodo. Sforce goeth to viſit the french king in Aſt.

At this time went Lodovvyk Sforce to viſit the king at Aſt, whether he caried with him Beatrix his wife, followed with great pomp and a trayne of the moſt honorable and ſingular fayre Ladies within all the Duchie of Myllan: he was alſo accompanied with Hercules, Duke of Ferrara. There they debated of their common affayres, and by generall councell it was reſolued that the armie ſhould march with as much ſpeede

as was possible, wherein for the more diligence and expedicion of things, Lodovvyk who had not a litle feare, that the hard season of the yeare hapning, they would soiorne all the winter in the territories of his Duchie, lent eftsones to the king a great quantitie of money, wherof he had not a litle necessitie and want: Notwithstanding, the king falling into the disease which we call the small pockes, he remeyned about a moneth within the towne of Ast, the armie being dispersed into quarters and places thereabowts: Touching the numbers of his armie, (as may be truely gathered out of so many diuersities) it conteined, (besides the two hundreth gentlemen for his gard, and reckoning the Svvyzers gone before to Genes, and the companies interteyning the warre in Romania, vnder Monsr D'aubygny) xvj. hundred men at armes, allowing to euery of them according to the custom of Fraunce, two Archers, so that vnder euery launce (for so they call their men at armes) are comprehended vj. horses: of the Svvyzzers vj. thowsand footemen, and vj. thowsand of the realme of Fraunce: whereof the one halfe were Gascoine souldiers, for their furniture gallant and well appoynted, and for their naturall aptnes to the warres, a people aboue all others, sooneſt trayned to seruice. And to ioyne to this armie, there was caried to Genes by sea, a huge proporcion of artilleries of sundry natures, both for batterie and seruice of the field, but of such sortes as Italy neuer saw the like.

The number of the french kings armie.

This hell or torment of artillerie being deuised many yeares since in Iermanie, was brought first into Italy by the Venetians, hauing warre about the yeare 1380. with the Genovvaies: wherin the Venetians vanquished by sea, and much afflicted by the losse of Chioze, were ready to receiue such cõdicions as it pleased the victors, if in so good an occasion, there had not bene want of moderate councell: The greatest sort was called bombardes, which, after the inuencion was spred thorow Italy, were employed to the battering of townes: some of them were of yron, and some of brasse, but conteyning such grosse and huge proporcion, that for their waight and ignorance of men, and instruments vnapt, they were caried slowly, and with great difficultie: And being with intollerable trauels planted afore townes, yet there was so much respitt betwene one shott and an other, that in comparison of their vse at this day, they gaue litle frute or succesſe to the seruice, but left to the defenders leasure and oportunity at wil, to reenforce their rampiers and fortifications: And yet, by the violence of the saltpeter, with the which their powder had his mixture, the bulletts flew into the ayre with such horrible noyse and furie, that that instrument (yea afore he had his perfection) put to skorne and silence all those engynes and deuises, wherewith the auncients were wont to pull downe townes, to the great fame of Archymedes, & other notable enginistes: But the french men fordging peeces of farre greater facilitie, and of no worse mettall then brasse, which they called cannons, vsing bulletts of yron, in place of those of stone of the first inuencion, vsed to drawe them vppon wheeles, not with oxen (as was the custom in Italy) but with horses, and with such agilitie of men & instruments appointed to that seruice, that they almost kept march with the armie: And being brought afore townes or walls, they were braked and planted with an incredible diligence, and with a very small intermission betwene the shotts, they battered with such violent furie, that, what before was wont to be done in Italy in many daies, they dispatched it in few howers: These deuillish instruments they vsed also in the field, making some times the cannon seruiceable there, & some times peeces of lesser fordge, haled according to their proporcion, with the self same speede and nymblenes. Those artilleries were the cause, that all Italy stoode in great feare of the kinges armie, which was also holden more redowted and dreadfull, not by the numbers, but for the valour of the ſouldiers: for, the men at armes, being almoſt all of the kings ſubiectes, gentlemen and not of the popular ſort, were not ſimply vnder the direction and diſcipline of capteynes, nor payed by them, but by the kinges officers: by which meane, companies and bandes had not onely their compleate numbers, but they were men of choyce, and in good point for horſe and armor, (being well able to make their owne furnitures) and contended in ſeruice, aſwell for the deſire of honor (which naturally is nouriſhed in the hartes of men of noble race) as alſo that by their actions in armes and fight, they might aſpire to recompenſe aſwell out of warre as the warre during, and by degrees, riſe worthely to the name and places of capteyns: The ſame reſpectes puſhed forward the capteines Barons, and great Lordes, or at leaſt ſuch as did communicat in honorable diſcent and bludd, for the moſt part ſubiectes of the crowne of Fraunce, who hauing their numbers ſet & limited, (for according to the warres of that realme, there is no companie aboue a hundreth launces) had nō other intencion, then by ſeruice to meritt well of their king: So that there was not amongeſt them any humor of inconſtancie, either by ambicion or couetouſnes to chaunge their Lord, or for enuie to exceede other Capteynes in numbers of men at armes: cuſtoms meare contrary to the ordering of the men at armes in Italy: where many of the men at armes, are either peaſantes, or populars, ſubiectes of an other Prince, and depending wholy of their Capteines, with whom they contract for their pay, and ſerue vnder their arbitracion: they haue neither by nature nor by accident, any extraordinary ſpur or prouocacion to ſerue well: The Capteines are very rarely vaſſalls of him that enterteynes them: they haue for the moſt part diuerſe intereſts, purpoſes, and endes: full of enuy and hatreds: And being bound to no tearme fixed for their payes, & abſolute commaūders ouer their companies, they oftentimes beguile the ſeruice with leſſe numbers then they are payed for: And ſometimes not contented with honeſt condicions, they put their patrons vpon euery occaſion to raunſom: At their pleaſures they will paſſe from the ſeruice of one, and enter into the pay of an other, ambicion, couetouſnes, or other particular intereſts, making them not onely inconſtant, but alſo vnfaithfull: There was alſo ſeene no leſſe difference betwene the footemen of Italy, and thoſe that ſerued vnder king Charles, for that th Italians fought not in ſquadrons ſet and ordered, but in trowpes, and diſperſed in the field, and oftentimes retyring to the aduauntages of hills and ditches: But the Swyzzers, a nation warlike, and by the long vſe of warre and many victories, had renewed their auncient glorie and hardines, vſed to feight with bandes ordered, and diſtinct in numbers certeine: And neuer forſaking their rankes, they vſed to ſtand againſt their enemies as a wall, firme, and almoſt inuincible, ſo farre forth as they fought in a plaine or place large to ſtretch out their battell: euen with the ſame diſcipline and orders, but not with the like courage and vertue, did fight the footemen of the french and Gaſcoynes.

The Colōnys for the ſrench king.

Whileſt the king by reaſon of his ſickneſs, ſoiorned in the citie of Aſt, there happened a new tumult about the borders of Rome: for, the Colonnoys (notwithſtanding Alphonſo had accorded to all their immoderat demaundes) aſſoone as Monſr D'aubygny was entred Romania, declared them ſelues for the french king without more diſſembling, & tooke the rocke of Oſtia by intelligences they had with certeine ſpaniſh footemen left there in garriſon. This raiſed the Pope into paſſion, & made him bitterly complaine to all Princes in Chriſtendom, of the iniuries done to him by the french: he addreſſed his complaintes chiefly to the king of Spayne, and Senate of Venice, of whom (but in vaine) he prayed ayde and ſuccors according to the contract of confederacion made betwene them the laſt yeare before: And turning alltogither his witts, authoritie and courage, to the prouiſions of the warres, after he had cited Proſper and Fabricius, (whoſe houſes he cauſed to be raſed in Rome,) and aſſembled his companies with part of thoſe of Alphonſo, vnder Virginio, at the riuer of Tyuerone, neare Tyuoly: he ſent them all vpon the landes of the Collonnoys, whoſe ſtrength was no greater then two hundreth men at armes, and a thowſand footemen: But afterwards the Pope dowting leaſt the french armie at ſea ſuppoſed to come from Genes to the ſuccors of Oſtia, ſhould be receiued into the port of Neptune, belonging to the Collonnoys: Alphonſo after he had gathered at Terracina all the companies that the Pope and he had in thoſe quarters, eſtabliſhed his campe there, hoping to haue it eaſily. Notwithſtanding the Collonnoys defending it with great franknes of courage, & being alſo paſſed into their contreyes without impediments, with the companies of Camylla Vitelli, of the citie of Caſtello, and the bandes of their brethern which the french king had newly taken into his pay: The Pope reuoked to Rome, part of his people which were in Romania with Ferdinand, whoſe affaires continued not with that felicitie and fortune which they ſeemed to ſhow in the beginning: for, as he was arriued at Villefranche, betwene Furly and Faenze, and from thence was entred into the highway of Imola: the armie of thennemie encamped neare to Villefranche, ſeeing their forces inferior, retyred betwene the forreſt of Lugo and Columnare, neare the forde of Geniuola: A place very ſtrong by nature, and apperteining to Hecules d'Eſte, out of whoſe contreyes they were vittelled: So that Ferdinand, ſeeing that by the ſtrength and ſituacion of the place, he could not charge them, but with manifeſt & generall perill, iſſued out of Imola, and went to incampe in Toſkanella, neare the village of S. Peter in the contreyes of Bolonia: for, being deſirous to fight, by the ſhowe he made to goe towards Bolonia, he ſought to put thennemies (to whom he would not leaue libertie to paſſe further) in neceſſitie to incampe in places not ſo ſtronge: But they, approching certeine dayes after neare Imola, pitched their campe vppon the riuer of Santerne, betwene Lugo and S. Agathe, the place being well fortified, and had for their backe, the riuer of Pauv: The ſame day Ferdinand incamped ſix miles from them vpon the ſame riuer neare Mordane and Bubane, preſenting his armie the day after in battell ringed within a mile of them: where, after he had looked for them in vaine for certeine howers, the place miniſtring all commodities to fight, by reaſon of his ſkope, largenes, and plainnes, and ſeeing he could not ſet vpon them in their trenches without abſolute daunger, went to incampe at Balbiana, not holding any more the way of the mounteyne as he had done till then, but accoaſting the ennemie, he marched alwayes with this intencion, to conſtraine them, if he could, to forſake their trenches ſo full of aduantage and ſtrength.

It hath ſeemed till now that thaffaires of the Duke of Calabria caried good eſtate and fortune, and a gouernment with reputacion, ſeeing the ennemies had apparantly refuſed to fight, defending them ſelues more with the ſtrength and ſituacion of their trenches, then with actions of armes, and in all encounters of the light horſemen, th Aragons caried away alwayes the beſt: but the campe of the french & Sforce, receiuing continuall ſtrength by ſupplies of companies, which at the beginning remeyned behind, the eſtate of the warre began to chaunge: for that, the Duke, whoſe heate and forwardnes was moderated by the councell of thoſe capteynes that followed him, to thende he would not commit all to fortune without aduantage: retyred to S. Agathe, a towne of the Duke of Ferrara, where, finding diminucion of his footemen, and of that part of the horſemen of the Church, which the Pope had called backe, and laſtly in the middeſt of the contreyes of the Duke of Ferrara, began to looke to fortefie him ſelfe: But after he had remeyned there certeine dayes, he vnderſtoode by eſpiall that there was expectacion in the ennemies campe, of two hundred launces, and a thowſand Svvyzzer footemen, which the french king had cauſed to march as ſoone as he entred into Aſt: And therefore he retyred to the waſt of Faenza, a place betwene the walls of the ſame towne, and a ditch which reculeth about a thowſand paſſes from the towne, and inuyroning it round about, makes that ſituacion very ſtrong. And by reaſon of his retraite, thennemie came to S. Agatha, which he had abandoned. Sewerly both theſe armies ſhowed great tokens of courage, when they ſaw their ennemie inferior: but when things were brought to an equallitie, the place apt, their forces indifferent, & all other oportunities conſenting, either one eſchewed to aſſay the fortune of battell, and in them both was approued that which very rarely hapneth, that one councell was pleaſing to two armies, being ennemies: For, the french thought they ſhoulde accompliſh their intencion, for the which they were come out of Lombardie, if they hindred the Aragons for paſſing further: And Alphonſo iudged it greatly to his benefit, if he could amuſe & hold thennemies bridle vntill winter: And therefore gaue expreſſe charge to his ſonne, and Ioh Iacques Trymulſo, with the Count de Petillane, that without great occaſion, they ſhould not put in the power of fortune, the realme of Naples, which was vtterly loſt, if that armie were defeated: But theſe remedies ſufficed not for his ſauetie, for that king Charles, whoſe forwardnes could not be reſtrained, neither by the ſeaſon of the time, nor any other difficulties, marched into the field with his armie as ſoone as he had recouered his health: And becauſe John Galeas Duke of Myllan, & his coſin iermayne, (for the king & he diſcended of two ſiſters, daughters to Lovvys the ſecond, Duke of Sauoye) lay ſore ſicke in the caſtell of Pauya, he went with great humanitie to viſit him, making his way by the towne, & lodging in the ſame caſtell: The ſpeches he vſed to him were generall for the preſence of Lodovvyk, onely expreſſing howe much greeued he was for his ſicknes, and perſwaded him to take hope and courage to recouer his health: But touching the effect of the minde, the king with all thoſe that were with him, had great compaſſion of him, euery one iudging for certeyne, that the yong gentleman, by the wickednes of his Vncle, had not long to liue. This compaſſion was much encreaſed by the preſence of Iſabell his wife, who not onely full of many ſorrowes for thinfirmitie of her huſband, and eſtate of her litle ſonne borne by him, but alſo much afflicted for the perill of her father and his adherents, ſhe fell with great humilitie, in the publike preſence, at the feete of the king, recommending to him with pitifull teares, her father, and his howſe of Aragon: towardes whom, albeit the king, for her age, for her bewtie, and her preſent fortune, expreſſed an apparant inclinacion to pitie, yet, being not able to ſtaye the courſe of ſo great a matter, for ſo light occaſion, he aunſwered her with ſignes of will to doe that he could not, ſaying, thenterpriſe being ſo farre aduaunced, he was conſtrayned to proſecute and continue it.

The french king viſites Iohn Galeas, duke of Myllan.

From Pauya the king marched to Plaiſance, and during the aboade he made there, newes came of the death of Iohn Galeas, by which occaſion Lodovvyk, that had followed him thether, returned in no ſmall diligence to Myllan, where by the principals of the councell, which the Duke had ſubborned, it was propownded, that in regarde of the greatnes of that eſtate, and the daungerous times that prepared now for Italy, it would be a thing preiudiciall, that the ſonne of Iohn Galeas, (hauing not v. yeares in age) ſhould ſucceede his father: And therefore, aſwell to keepe the liberties of the

the ſtate in protection, as to be able to meete with thinconueniences which the time threatneth: they thought it iuſt and neceſſary (derogating ſomewhat, for the publike benefite, and for the neceſſitie preſent, the diſpoſicion of the lawes, as the lawes them ſelues doe ſuffer) to conſtraine Lodovvyk, for the better ſtay of the common weale, to ſuffer that into him might be tranſported the title & dignitie of Duke, a burden very waighty in ſo conſpiring a ſeaſon: with the which couler, honeſtie giuing place to ambicion, the morning following (vſing ſome forme of reſiſtance) he tooke vpon him the name and armes of the Duchie of Myllan, hauing ſecretly proteſted before, that he receiued them as apperteining to him, by thinueſtiture of the king of Romaines: It was publiſhed that the death of Galeas hapned by immoderat cohabitacion, but the vniuerſall iudgement of Italy was, that he dyed not of infirmities naturall, nor by incontinencie, but by poyſon and violent compulſion, wherof Theodor de Pauya, one of the Phiſicions, aſſiſting when the king viſited him, aſſured the king to ſee moſt apparant & manifeſt ſignes: And if he were diſpatched by poyſon, there was none that dowted that his Vncle was innocent either directly or indirectly, as he, who not content with an abſolute power to be gouerner of the ſtate, but aſpiring according to the common deſires of great men, to make them ſelues glorious with titles & honors, and ſpecially he iudged that both for his proper ſewertie, and the ſucceſſion of his children, the death of the lawfull Prince was neceſſary, and therfore ſought to eſtabliſh in him ſelfe the power and name of Duke, wherin ambicion and couetouſnes preuailed aboue conſcience and law of nature, & the ielous deſire of dominion, enforced his diſpoſicion, (otherwayes abhorring bludd) to that vile action: It was beleued of many wiſemen, that he hath had that intencion euer ſince he began to ſolicite the french kinges iorney into Italy, iudging thoccaſion and the time would well concurre to aduaunce theffect, for that the french houering vppon the borders of that ſtate with a mayne armie, it would alter mens coniectures and humors, and cary their witts from remembrance of an act ſo wicked: But ſome hauing opinions more particular, ſuppoſed both for the ſuddainnes of his death, & diligent transferring the imperie to the other, that it hapned by a new thought proceeding of feare, leaſt the king (the councells of the french are ſuddain) would turne him ſelf with a contrary courſe to deliuer his coſin Galeas from ſo great a ſubiection, being induced thereunto, either for reſpect of parentage and compaſſion of his age, or that he might thinke it was a thing more ſure for him ſelfe, that the Duchie of Myllan were in the power of his coſin, rather then commaunded by Lodovvyk whoſe fidelitie many of his great Lordes laboured continually to make ſuſpected with him: But becauſe Lodovvyk had gott the yeare before thinueſtiture of the Duchie of Myllan, and a litle before the death of his nephew, had diſpatched with diligence thumperiall priuiledges, it makes a congruent conſtruction, that it was a deliberacion voluntary and foredeuiſed, and not ſuddeine, nor in reſpect of the preſent daunger: The king ſtayed certeine dayes at Plaiſance, not without inclinacion to returne into France, for that aſwel the want of money, which being the more generall, was ſo much more intollerable, as not ſeeing any new thing in Italy diſcouer in his fauour, he had many dowtes of his ſucceſſe, hauing withall no litle ſuſpicion of the new Duke of Myllan, who notwithſtanding when he parted, ſayd he would returne, yet the iudgement was, that he would not come againe at all: it is not out of all likelihood, that being vnknowen to the nations on thother ſide the mountes that wicked cuſtom to poyſon men, which is a practiſe very common and familiar in all partes of Italy: but that the king and all his court, beſides the ſuſpicion they had conceyued againſt the faith of Lodovvyk, had his name in honor, yea the king eſteemed it an iniurie done to his owne honor and greatnes, that he had ſolicited his comming into Italy, to be the better able without daunger to execute an act ſo abominable: yet in the ende, the reſolucion was to march on, Lodovvyk continually laboring him thereunto, with promiſe to returne and viſit the king within few dayes, for that both the kinges aboade in Lombardie, & his haſtie returne into Fraunce, were wholly contrary to his intencions.

Laurence and Iohn de medicis with the french king.

The ſame day the king departed from Plaiſance, Lavvrence and Iohn de medicis came to him, who being ſecretly fledd from their howſes in the contrey, made great inſtance that his maieſtie would come neare Florence, promiſing him much of the affections and goodwill of the people towardes the howſe of Fraunce, and no leſſe of the hate againſt P. de medicis, againſt whom the king was aggrauated by occaſions new and greene: for, the king ſent from Aſt an Embaſſador to Florence, to propound many offers, if they would graunt him paſſage, and abſteyne hereafter from ayding of Alphonſo: and of the other ſide to pronounce threatnings to them, if they perſeuered in their former councell: wherein to aſtoniſh them the more, he gaue expreſſe charge to his Embaſſador to returne immediatly, if they would not giue ſpeedy reſolucion: he was aunſwered with excuſes to deferre and expect, for that the chiefeſt Citiſens of the gouernment being withdrawne to their howſes of ſolace in the contrey, according to the cuſtom of the Florentyns in that ſeaſon, they could not with ſuch ſpeede giue him an aunſwere certeine, but would with all diligence aduertiſe the king of their intencion by a particular Embaſſador: it is moſt certeine, that it was agreed in the kinges councell without contradiction, that the armie ſhould rather take the way that leades thorow Tuſkane, and the territories of Rome directly to Naples, then that, which, lying along Romania, & la marque, paſſing the riuer of Tronte, entreth into Abruzze, not for that they did diſtruſt to giue the chaſe to the bandes of th Aragons, which with difficultie reſiſted Monſr D'Aubygny: But for that it ſeemed a thing vnworthy of the greatnes of ſuch a king, and no leſſe infamous to the glorie of his armies, (the Pope and Florentyns being declared againſt him) to giue occaſion to men to thinke that he eſchewed the way for diſtruſt, that he was not able to force them: But much more becauſe they eſteemed it daungerous to make warre in the realme of Naples, and leaue as ennemies at their backes, the ſtate eccleſiaſtike and Tuſkane: And therefore the armie turning to the way of Tuſkane, it was determined to paſſe rather the Appenyn, by the mountaine of Parme, then to march the direct way to Bolonia: This was Lodovvyks direction, when he was at Aſt, for that he had a deſire to make him ſelfe Lord of Pyſa.

The way that the french armie tooke to Naples.

M. Montpenſier leader of the vaũtgard.

So that the vauntgard, ouer whom was gouerner and leader, Gilbert de Montpenſier, of the houſe of Burbon, and Prince of the bludd: And the king following, with the reſidue of the armie, paſſed to Pontreme, a towne of the Duchie of Myllan, ſett at the foote of th Appenyn, vpon the riuer of Magre, which diuides the contrey of Genes, (aũciently called Liguria) from Tuſkane: from Pontreme M. Montpenſier entred the contrey of Lunigiana, a part of which obeyd the Florentyns, certeyne caſtells belonged to the Genovvays, and the reſidue were ſubiect to the Marquis of Maleſpine, who mainteyned their ſmall eſtates vnder the protection ſometimes of the Duke of Myllan, ſometimes of the Florentyns, and ſometimes of the Genovvays. About thoſe quarters ioyned with M. Mountpenſier, the Svvyzzers, which had ben at the defence of Genovvay, togither with thartillerie which was come by ſea to Spetia: And being come neare the towne of Finizana, belonging at that time to the Florentyns, whether they were guided by Gabriell Malespina, Marquiss of Fodisnoue, who was recommended to them, they tooke it by force, and sackt it, making slaughter of al the souldiers straungers that were within, and many of thinhabitants: A maner of making warre very newe, and so much the more terrible to all Italy accustomed for many yeares past to warres, rather flourishing in pompes and fine furniture like to warres showed by maskers in a stage playes, then to skirmishes bluddy and daungerous: The Florentyns were determined to make their principall resistance at Serezana, which they had greatly fortified, but not with strength sufficient and necessary to resist so mighty an ennemie, becawse they had not furnished it with any Capteine of warre, that had authoritie to minister discipline, nor yet souldiers, neither resolute nor seruiceable, other then such as lost hart at the first voyce of thapproch of the french armie: yet they of Florence were of opinion that it coulde not be easiely taken, specially the castell, and much lesse the rocke Serazana, both wel furnished, and bearing his situacion vpon the hil aboue the towne: Besides, it was not possible that tharmie should remeyne long time in those places, the contrey being barreine and straite, & being inclosed betwene the sea and the mountaynes, was not sufficient to nourish so great a multitude, and their vittells comming farre of, could not obserue such iust tyme & oportunitie, as to serue their present necessities: by reason whereof it seemed the kinges affayres began to fall vpon hard tearmes, and that his armie stoode possible to many daungers & distresses: for, albeit he could not with conuenient impediments be let from assayling Pysa, leauing behind him the towne and castell of Serazana, and the rocke, nor kept by the contrey of Lucques, (which citie, by the working of the Duke of Myllan, had secretly determined to receiue them) that he entred not an other part of the territorie of Florence: yet he could hardly be brought to that deliberacion, and much lesse condescend to it, becawse he had a perswacion in his secrete fancie, that if he wonne not the first towne that resisted him, it would diminish much his reputacion, and leaue a daungerous example to others to vse insolencie against him.

But so it was ordeyned, that eyther by the grace and blessing of fortune, or by an ordenance of more high power, (if at the least thindiscressions and faults of men deserue such excuses) to such an impediment hapned a suddeine remedie: seeing that neither the courage nor constancie of P. de medicis, were greater in his aduersities, then had bene his modestie and discression in his prosperities: By this must be vnderstanded that the displeasures which the citie of Florence had receiued from the beginning, for thimpediments which were giuen to the king, were continually multiplied, both for a new chase and banishment of their marchauntes, out of all partes of the realme of Fraunce, and also for feare of the power of the french, which did so much the more grow rising in the harts of men, by how much they heard that tharmy had begon to passe th Appenyn mountes: but specially they fell all into dread and feare, by the crueltie showed at the taking of Finizana: for these causes euery one did publikly detest the rashnes of P. de medicis, who, without necessitie, beleuing more in his owne weening, & the councels of certeine rash ministers, men arrogant in times of peace, and vnprofitable, and cowardes in times of warre: then following the directions of those Citisens that were friends to his father, and had alwayes instructed him with no lesse graue councells: had so indiscreetely prouoked the armes of so mightie a king, assisted with the Duke of Myllan: seeing withall, he was ignorant in thaffayres of warre, leauing the citie, and other places of their obedience not fortefied, but ill furnished with souldiours and munitions necessary to make defense a-gainſt ſo great a force: Beſides that, there had as yet appeared none of thoſe Aragons, for whom they had expoſed them ſelues to ſo great daunger: So that their cõtrey abandoned of euery one, remained in the deepe hatred of ſo mighty a king, and was ready to fall as a manifeſt pray to him, who with ſo great inſtance, had ſought not to fall into occaſion and neceſſitie to hurt it.

This diſpoſicion which was almoſt in all thoſe of the towne, was further kindled by many noble Citiſens, much diſpleaſed with the preſent gouernment, & that one onely familie had riſen ſo much in preſuming, as to appropriat to him ſelfe the rule of the whole common weale: in ſo much as one increaſing the feares of an other, and all laboring in one common dreade, and miniſtring ſtomacke and courage to ſuch as deſired new thinges, they had ſo ſtirred the braynes & ſpirites of the people, that there was generall feare of ſome tumult in the towne, whereunto the multitude was the rather prouoked by the pride & immoderat behauiors of Peter, who, in many thinges forſaking the ciuil cuſtoms and modeſtie of his aunceſtors, had bene followed from his infancie with a perpetuall hatred and ill wil, by the generalitie of the Citiſens: his father ſeemed to haue a great ſpeculacion in his vices and vile condicions, for that he would often ſay to his ſecret friendes, that thindiſcreſſion and arrogancie of his ſonne, would one day be the cauſe of the ruine of his houſe. It is a " good propertie of wiſedom in fathers, to find out the diſpoſicions of their children,
" but it is a principall effect of their iudgementes, to cutte of with diſcipline all courſe
" of humors, that feede and miniſter to their naturall corrupcions, which is an office
" no leſſe iuſt in parents, then it belongeth to the art of the Phiſicion, firſt to ſeeke out
" the humor that offendes, and then to apply the remedie proper to cure, and not to
" leaue the body to a ſetled infection.

Peter being now amaſed with the peril, which with raſhnes he contemned afore, and ſeeing he fayled of the ſuccors and aydes which were promiſed by the Pope & Alphonſo, who as well for the loſſe of Oſtia, ſeege of the port Neptune, as for feare of the french armie by ſea, had euen their handes and heades full: determined with a councell ſuddeine and particular, to goe ſearch of thennemie that ſafetie, which he hoped no more to finde in his friendes, following therein thexample of his father, who, in the yeare 1479. being brought to deſperat tearmes of daunger, by a warre which Pope Sixtus and Ferdinand king of Naples, managed againſt the Florentyns, went to ſeeke Ferdinand in the towne of Naples, from whom he brought to Florence
" publike peace and priuat ſewertie. But it is a thing very daungerous for men to go-
" uerne them ſelues by examples, if there be not a concurrance of the ſelfe reaſons,
" not onely in generall, but euen in all particularities: and if thinges be not ruled with
" the ſame wiſedom: And if laſtly, ouer and beſides all other foundacions, the ſelfe
" ſame fortune haue not her part. Being parted from Florence in this deliberacion, & not farre of his way, he had aduertiſement that the horſemen of Pavvle Vrſin, and 3. hundreth footemen ſent by the Florentyns to enter Serezana, were broken by certein companies of the french, which were come ſkowring euen on this ſide the riuer of Magre, the moſt of them either ſlaine or made priſoners. This made him tary for the kinges ſafe conduct at S. Peters, whether went for his conduct and ſewertie the Biſhop of S. Mallo, with certeine Lordes of the Court, in whoſe companie he ariued at the campe the ſame day that the king, with the reſidue of his ſtrength ioyned him ſelfe to the vauntgard, which incamping before Serazanella, battred that rocke, but not with ſuch ſucceſſe as there was hope to cary it: After he was preſented to the king, who enterteyned him with good countenance, but more in apparance, then in affection:

P. de medicis comes to the french king.

affection: he appaiſed immediatly all his diſpleaſures, in conſenting to his whole demaundes, which were great and immoderat: namely, that the fortereſſes and caſtells of S. Peter, Serezana and Serezanella, which were (as it were) the keyes of the dominions of Florence on that ſide: and the fortreſſes of Pyſa, and the port of Lyuorne (members principall of their eſtate) ſhould be all putte into the handes of the king, who, for his part, ſhould bind him ſelfe by promiſe and by his proper ſigniture, to redeliuer them, as ſoone as he had conquered the kingdom of Naples: That Peter ſhould do ſo much, that the Florentyns ſhould lende to the king two hundreth thowſand duckats, and that then he would receiue them into his alliance and protection: Touching the ratificacion of which promiſes, made with ſimple wordes, it was ſayd there ſhould be letters diſpatched to Florence, by the which the king ment to paſſe: but the conſignacion of the caſtells and fortreſſes was not deferred: for, Peter ioyning meaning to his wordes, cauſed to be deliuered without tarying, to the king, thoſe peeces Serezana, S. Peter, and Serezanella, and not many dayes after, according to the agreement, the like was done of the peeces of Pyſa, and port of Lyuorne.

Peter de medicis accordes with the frech king.

The french men wondred, that Peter with ſo great facilitie accorded to thinges of ſo great importance, for that there was no dowt but the king would haue bene contented with farre meaner condicions: I will not let paſſe in this place without reapport, that which was ſuttelly aunſwered to P. de medicis, by Lodovvyk Sforce, arriuing the day following at the campe: As Peter in going to meete him to doe him honour, excuſed him ſelfe that he had miſcaried, for that Lodovvyk, was ſome what gone out of the way: he aunſwered very properly: That the one of them two went out of the way, but perhaps (ſayth he) it light vpon your ſelfe, as reproching vnto him that he was falne into ſo great difficulties & daungers, for not giuing faith to his councells: But the euents of thinges falling out afterwardes, did well declare, that they both had gone out of the right way, but it was with a greater infamie and calamitie to him, who rayſed into greater degree, made profeſſion with his wiſedom, to be the guide of all others.

This reſolucion and accord of P. de medicis, did not onely aſſure the king of the things of Tuſkane, but it tooke out of his way all blockes and obſtacles in Romagnia, where the Aragons beganne now much to declyne: for, as it is a thing very hard to him that ſkarcely defendes him ſelfe from daungers imminent, to prouide in one ſeaſon for the perills of an other: So, whileſt Ferdinand remeyned in ſewertie within the ſtrong fort of Faenza, thennemie returned to the contrey of Imola, where, after they had with a part of tharmie aſſailed the borow of Bubane, but in vaine, becauſe by his litle circuite a ſmall ſtrength ſufficed to defend it, and for his baſe ſituacion, the contrey ronne ouer with waters: They tooke by force the towne of Mordane, notwithſtanding it was very ſtrong, and plentifully furniſhed with ſouldiers to defend it: But ſuch was the furie of thartillerie, and ſuch the deſperat hardines of the french in thaſſalt, (many being drowned as they paſſed ouer the waterie ditches) that there was no abilitie of reſiſtance by thoſe that were within, againſt whom the victors accompanied their fortune with ſuch bluddy crueltie, without regard to age or ſex, that they filled all Romania with generall feares and aſtoniſhments: By reaſon of this accident, Kathern Sforce deſpairing of ſuccors, accorded with the frenchmē, to avoid the perill preſent, and promiſed to their armie all commodities of the eſtates ſubiect to her ſonne: the ſame being the cauſe that Ferdinand (now dowting of the wills of them of Faenza, yea & held it ſo much the more daungerous, to remeyne in the middeſt of Imola and Furly, by how much he was wel aduertiſed of the going of P. de me- dicis to Serazana) retyred neare to the walls of Ceſena, ſhowing ſo great a feare, that becauſe he would not paſſe neare to Furly, he led his armie by the hills, (a way more long and comberſom) neare to Caſtrocare, a borow of the Florentyns. And within few dayes after, hearing of the conuencion which Peter had made with the french, for which cauſe the bandes of the Florentyns forſooke him, he tooke the way to Rome: Like as alſo Dom Federyk being parted from the port of Lyuorne, retyred with his armie towards the kingdom of Naples, where begonne to be neceſſary for Alphonſo, thoſe armies which he had ſent abroad with ſo great hopes to inuade the eſtates of others: for, his affayres were ful of many aduerſities on his ſide, ſeeing that the ſeege of the port of Neptune not ſucceeding, he had ledd backe his armie to Terracina. And the armie by ſea for the french, whereof were leaders the Prince of Salerne, and M. de Serenon, were diſcouered aboue Oſtia, but yet giuing it out that they would not offend the ſtates of the Church, they put no men on lande, nor ſhowed any token of diſpleaſure to the Pope, notwithſtanding their king many dayes before had refuſed to heare Frauncis Piccolhomini, Cardinall of Siena, Legat, ſent by the Pope to his maieſtie.

But to returne to P. de medicis, after the Florentyns were aduertiſed of the conuentions he had made, ſo greatly to the diminucion of their territories, & with ſo ſlaunderous and daungerous a wound and gall to the common weale, there was no litle diſpleaſure and diſcontentement through out all the citie: beſides their great loſſes, their hartes were moued againſt him, for that with a newe forme and order of dealing, and contrary to the examples of his predeceſſors, he had alyened without the councell of his citie, and ſolemne decree of the Magiſtrates, ſo great a parte of the ſtate of Florence: in ſo much, that to the bitter complaintes made againſt him, were ioyned the murmures and ſecret grudgings of the people, incenſing one an other to riſe and recouer their libertie, without that any of thoſe that in their hartes bare fauors to the doings of Peter, durſt either with force, or perſwacion, ſet them ſelues againſt ſo great an inclinacion: Albeit the Florentyns hauing no ſtrength to defend Pyſa and Lyuorne, had alſo no hope to turne the kinges will from hauing them: yet becauſe they would ſeparate the councells of the common weale, from the councels of Peter, or at leaſt that that ſhould not be attributed to one in particular, which apperteyned to them all in publike, they addreſſed to him many Embaſſadors of thoſe families, which were ill contented with the Medicis: But Peter knowing that that was a beginning of a mutacion of eſtate, to thende to prouide for his affayres afore greater diſorders hapned, applyed his deliberacions to the time, & tooke leaue of the king, vnder couler to giue perfection to that he had promiſed: At this tyme alſo the king parted from Serazana, to goe to Pyſa, and Lodouvyk Sforce returned to Myllan, hauing obteyned for money that thinueſtiture of Genes, graunted by the king a few yeres before to John Galeas for him and his yſſue, ſhould be transferred to him and his poſteritie: he went away very much diſcontented, for that the king woulde not leaue in his keeping (as he ſayd he had promiſed) S. Peter and Serazane, which places ſeruing him as a ladder to rayſe him to the citie of Pyſa, he demaunded as vniuſtly taken from the Genovvays, a fewey eres before by the Florentyns. But when Peter was returned to Florence, he found the citie eſtraunged from him, and the minds of his chiefe friendes in ſuſpence, for that againſt their councell, and againſt thoportunitie of the time, he had vndiſcreetly gouerned all thinges: The communaltie alſo was drawne into ſuch an vprore & mutinie, that as the next day after his returne, he would haue entred into the pallace, wherein reſted the authoritie and great magiſtracie giſtracie of the common weale, it was forbidden him by certeine Magiſtrats which kept the gate armed, of whom the chiefeſt was Iacques de Nerly, a yong man of equal nobilitie and riches: This being ſpred abroad thorow the citie, the people ronne with ſwift tumult to armes, being the more moued to this vproare, for that Paulo Vrſin, whom Peter had ſent for, was at hand with his band of armed men: The aſpect and conſideracion of theſe daungers, cauſed Peter (eſtſoones returned to his houſe) and hauing loſt both courage and councell, and whileſt the ſtate declared him rebell, to flee in great haſt out of Florence, following him Iohn Cardinal of the Church of Rome, and Iulyan his brethren, vppon whom in like ſort were impoſed the paynes ordeyned againſt Rebells: he went directly to Bologna, where Iohn Bentyuole, deſiring in an other that conſtancie and reſolucion of courage, which he could not ſhowe ſince in his owne aduerſities, reproued him bitterly at the beginning, for that not onely to his owne preiudice, but alſo to the ill example of all that oppreſſed the libertie of their contreyes, he had ſo cowardly without the death of one man, abandoned ſuch a greatnes. In this ſort, by the raſhnes of one yong man, did at that time fall the houſe of Medicis from that rule and power, which, vnder the name and apparance almoſt of a ciuill adminiſtracion, it had obteyned in Florence lx. yeares: it began in Coſmo his great grandfather, a citiſen of ſingular wiſedom, & infinit wealth, and for thoſe regardes very notable through all the parts of Europe: But much more was he recommended, for that with a wonderful magnificencie and hart truely royall, regarding more the eternitie of his name, then the profit of his poſteritie: he employed more then fowre hundreth thowſand duckats, in building of Churches, erecting of Monaſteries, with other buildings of ſumptuous coſtes, not onely in his owne countrey, but alſo in many partes of the world: And his ſonnes ſonne Lavvrence, a man for vnderſtanding and iudgement, excellent, in councell graue and ſingular, in liberalitie equall with his grandfather, and for greatnes of hart, nothing inferior, for miniſtracion in the common weale, of authoritie more abſolute, but for wealth, of leſſe abilitie, and of life farre more ſhort: gat generall reputacion through out Italy, & with many ſtraũg Princes, which after his death, was turned into a cleare monument and memorie, for that it hath ſemed euer ſince, that the concord and felicitie of Italy ended with his life.

P. de medicis fleeth out of Florence.

The ſame day the ſtate of Florence fell into chaunge, the french king being in the citie of Pyſa, the townesmen in popular trowpes with cryes and ſhowtinges, ronne to him and demaunded libertie, complayning greeuouſly of the oppreſſions and wrongs which they ſayd they had receiued vnder the gouernment of the Florentyns: certeyne of the kinges councell aſſiſting, aſſured him that their demaund was iuſt, for that the Florentyns held them in to hard ſeruitude. The king not ſeing into thimportance of their requeſt, nor how farre it was contrary to the contract of Serazane, told them, they ſhould haue libertie: with the which aunſwere the Pyſans ronne to armes, and throwing downe to the earth all the enſeignes and armories of the Florentyns, they put them ſelues into an abſolute libertie ſo long deſired: Notwithſtanding, the king, contrary to him ſelfe, and no leſſe ignorant in the thinges he had accorded, would that the Florentyn officers ſhould ſtill adminiſter their accuſtomed iuriſdictions, and of the other part, left the olde citadell in the handes of the Pyſans, and kept to him ſelfe the new, of farre more importance: In theſe accidents of Pyſa and Florence, may be wel diſcerned a true experience of the olde ſaying, or common prouerbe as we call it: That men when their aduerſities approche, loſe chiefly that wiſedom, with the which they might haue hindred or auoyded the ills that happen:

The Pyſans offer to reuolt.

" And this is common to men and kingdoms, that draw towardes their deſtinies, that " when their ill fortune comes, it blyndes their eyes that they can not diſcerne it, and
" bynds their hands, that they can not help it, making them inſtruments againſt them
" ſelues in the execucion of their miſhaps: for, both the Florentyns, who in all tymes haue held the fidelitie of the Pyſans ſuſpected, ſeeing ſo daungerous a warre at their gates, forgat to reuoke to Florence the principall Citiſens of Pyſa, as for their better ſewertie they had wont to call home a great number of them, vppon neuer ſo light occaſions, or litle accidents: And P. de medicis, ſeing a concurrance of ſo many great difficulties togither, was to much ouerſeene, that he did not arme the place & pub-like pallaice with ſuch ſtrength of ſtraungers, as he had often tymes done before in farre leſſer ſuſpicions: That foreſight had kept him ſtil in his eſtate and rule, & ſuch prouiſions had much hindred thoſe great mutacions: But touching the affayres of Pyſa, it is manifeſt, that that which gaue them greateſt incouragement to make this commocion, (naturally hating the name of the Florentyns) was thauthoritie of Lo-dovvyk Sforce, who to that ende had interteyned certeyne intelligences and practiſes with ſome Citiſens of the place baniſhed for priuat offences: And the day preſent of the reuolt, Galeas de S. Seueryn, whom he had left to be alwayes about the king, incenſed the people to the tumult, by which meane Lodovvyk perſwaded him ſelfe, that the dominion of Pyſa would fall ſpeedely into his handes, not knowing that a litle after in ſuch a matter, was wrought the cauſe of all his miſeries: But it is alſo manifeſt, that certeyne of the Citiſens communicating the night before with the Cardinall S. P. ad vincla, what they had deſire and reſolucion to doe: The Cardinall, who, perhaps till that day had neuer bene author of peaſible councells, admoniſhed them with wordes graue and well inſtructing, that they ſhould not conſider onely the ſuperficiall and beginning of thinges, but ſee deepely that which with time, and in tyme may happen: he told them libertie was a thing precious, and of very vehe-
" ment deſire, well meriting that men ſhould oppoſe them ſelues to all daungers, ha-
" uing a true & ſenſible hope to be able to defend it on all ſides: But as touching their " citie, naked of peoples, and mearely drayned of wealth and ſubſtance, he ſawe very " weake poſſibilities to iuſtefie it againſt the power of the Florentyns: and to promiſe
" to them ſelues that thauthoritie of the french king ſhould be turned to their prote" ction, were hopes deceitfull, and an expectacion too full of inceriteynties & dowtes:
" for that albeit the moneyes and treaſors of Florence ſhould doe litle with him, (as it " is like they may preuayle a great deale, ſpecially looking into the contract of *Seraza-
" na*) yet his armies would not be alwaies in Italy, according to the experience & iudge-
" ment of examples paſt: Beſides, it were too great an indiſcreſſion to bind them ſelues
" to a perpetuall perill, vnder foundacions frayle, and not perpetuall: And for moſt
" vncerteyne hopes, to leuye againſt ennemies farre more mighty then they, a warre
" certeyne and abſolute, wherein they could promiſe them ſelues no ſuccors, ſeeing
" they depended vpon the will of an other, and that which more is, of very diuerſe ac" cidents: yea, be it they ſhould obteyne ſuccors, much leſſe were that to auoyde or " ſhake of, but rather to redouble and make greater, the calamities of the warre, being " vexed at one tyme by the inuaſions and ſouldiers of the ennemie, and tormented with " thoppreſſions & inſolencies of the men of warre that come to their ſuccors: Which " miſeries (he ſayd) would be ſo much the more greeuous to them to beare, by how " much in the ende they would come to ſee and know that it was not for their proper
" liberty, they tooke armes, but for thimperie of a ſtraunger, chaunging one ſeruitude

expenſes of a warre, but to raigne ouer thoſe for whom they fight: And yet your warre (ſayth he) ſeeing the great wealth and neighbourhedd of the Florentyns, (by whom you ſhall find many and perpetuall vexacions) you can not be able to ſuſtein, but with very great difficulties.

In this generall confuſion of thinges, the king departeth from Pyſa towardes Florence, and is not reſolued what forme he would giue to thaffayres of the Pyſans, he ſtayed in a place called Signa, vij. myles from Florence, to be aduertiſed, afore he entred the citie: whether the tumult of the people were in any ſort reappayſed, who had not diſcontinued their vproares, ſince the day that P. de medicis was chaſſed out of the citie: he had withall this intencion to giue tyme to M. D'aubygny, whome he had ſent for, (to thende his entrey might ſo much the more aſtoniſh the Florentyns) with direction to leaue thartillerie at Caſtrocare, and giue leaue to the fiue hundred men at armes Italians, which were with him in Romagnia, togither with the men at armes of the Duke of Myllan, except the Count Caiazze, which followed M. D aubygny with three hundreth light horſemen: it was ſuppoſed by many tokens and conie-ctures, that thintēcion of the king was, to draw the Florentyns by feare of his power, to yeld vnto him the dominion abſolute of the citie: A thing which him ſelfe could not diſſemble with their Embaſſadors, hauing often recourſe to Signa, to make perfect thaccord that was contracted: it was without dowt, that the king bare a minde inflamed againſt them, and nouriſhed many ill diſpoſed meanings againſt their citie, for that they ſought to hinder him in his enterpriſe: And albeit it was manifeſt, that that reſiſtance proceeded not of the will of the common weale, which in reaſonable ſort had iuſtefied them ſelues: yet he could not ſo eaſily forget & diſſolue thimpreſſion of the offence, being (as it was ſuppoſed) much induced to their diſfauors, by many of his councell and Lordes: who, iudging it not meete to let paſſe thopportunitie to make him ſelfe Lord ouer the citie, or perhaps puſhed forward with their proper ambicion & couetouſnes, were loth to loſe thoccaſion to ſacke a citie, aboūding in ſuch treaſors & wealth: inſo much as there ronne a brute thorow the camp, that the citie had deſerued to be puniſhed, to ſerue as an example to others, being the firſt towne in Italy that had preſumed to oppoſe againſt the power and armie of Fraunce: There were alſo of the chiefeſt of his councell, that ſolicited him to reſtore P. de medicis to his former degree: for whom with a peculiar diligence aboue all the reſidue, did labor Phillip Lord of Breſſe, brother to the Duke of Sauoye, being induced to that office by the priuat friendſhipps & promiſes that had paſſed betwene them: in ſo much, that eyther by the perſwaſions of them that could doe moſt, (notwithſtanding the Biſhop of S. Mallo councelled the contrary) or by a hope to make the Florentyns more inclyned to his will by this feare, or laſtly to haue occaſion to take vpon the ſuddeine what parte or way he would: the king wrote to Peter, cauſing alſo the L. Phillip to doe the like, and aduiſed him to come neare to Florence, for that for the auncient friendſhip that had bene betwene their howſes, & for his owne particular readines and good will ſhowed in the conſignacion of the fortreſſes: he was determined to readdreſſe him, and reſtore him to his firſt authoritie: But theſe letters found him not at Bolonia, according to the kinges weening, for that what by the rough wordes of John Bentyuole, & dowte he ſhould be purſued by the Duke of Myllan, and happly alſo by the french king, he was for his misfortunes retyred to Venice, whether they were ſent to him by his brother, the Cardinall remayning then at Bolonia. At Florence they dowted much of the kinges will: & yet, not ſeeing with what force, or with what hopes they might reſiſt him, they agreed as a councell leaſt daūgerous,to receiue him into their citie, hoping there would ſome meane ariſe to appeaſe him. And yet making the beſt of their perills, and becauſe they would be prouided for all fortunes,they ordeyned that the houſes of moſt of the Citiſens ſhould be ſecretely repleniſhed with men naturall of the dominion of Florence, and that the Capteynes which were in the pay of the common weale,(diſſembling notwithſtanding thoccaſion)ſhould enter the citie with many of their bandes and ſouldiers, and that euery one within the towne and places about it, ſhould ſtand vpon ready garde to take armes at the alarme of the great bell of the publike pallaice. After this the king marched to Florence with his armie,wherein was expreſſed no litle pompe, aſwel by the glorie & magnificencie of thoſe of his Court,as by them of the towne: he entred in ſigne of victorie,armed him ſelfe and his horſe, with his launce vppon his thigh,and immediatly began to ſpeake of compoſicion, but that was not without many difficulties: for, beſides the immoderat fauors which ſome of the french Court bare to P. de medicis, and the demaundes of money intollerable made by the king,he demaunded openly the imperie of Florence,alleaging that according to the orders of warre in the realme of Fraunce,he had lawfully wonne it,ſeeing his entrey was armed according to the cuſtoms of Conquerors: from which demaund,albeit he went in the ende, yet ſought he to leaue at Florence certeyne men of the longe coate, (ſo are called in Fraunce lawyers, doctors, and men of iuſtice) as his Embaſſadors,with ſuch authoritie, that according to thinſtitucions of Fraunce, he might pretende to be giuen to him for euer no litle iuriſdiction: But of the contrary, the Florentyns were obſtinat to preſerue their full libertie, hapning what perills ſo euer, in ſo much that communicating togither with ſuch a contrarietie of wills,albeit the mindes of both partes were continually kept in hoat and angry moodes, yet neither faction ſhewed readines to determine the difference by armes: for, the people of Florence giuen of long to the following of marchaundize, and not to thexerciſe of warre,ſuffered no ſmal feares,hauing within their owne walls one ſo mightie a king with his armie full of nations vnknowen and furious: And to the french men was no litle amaze the conſideracion of the great multitude of peoples, who, ſince the dayes that the gouernment changed, had gathered boldenes and audacitie aboue expectacion: They were aſtoniſhed beſides at the common brute, that at the alarme of the great bell, there would flocke infinite trowpes of people from all the partes confining: In which common feare on both ſides,at the noyſe of euery falſe alarme that was heard,eyther part for his proper ſewertie,tooke armes, but not one did aſſayle or prouoke an other. The foundacion which the king ſought to worke by P. de medicis,was ſupplanted, for that Peter wauering betwene the hope that was promiſed him,and the feare that he ſhould be giuen vp as a pray to his aduerſaries, aſked councell of the Senat of Venice,touching the kinges letters: Truely there is nothing more neceſſary in great deliberacions, and on the other ſide nothing more daungerous,then to demaund councell: And albeit councell is leſſe neceſſary to men diſcreete,then to ſuch as are not tempered,yet no dowt the profits are not fewe which wiſe men reape by councells, ſeeing no man hath that perfect wiſedom to conſider alwayes and know all thinges of him ſelfe,and in reaſons contrary or different, is able alwayes to diſcerne the better part. But what aſſurance hath he that aſketh coũcell,to receiue councell according to the faith he reappoſeth: ſeeing if there be no equall fidelitie nor affection,but regard to particular intereſts, as profit,reuenge, or ſome other mocion: he that giueth the councell, dreſſeth it to that ende which beſt aunſwereth his purpoſe: So that thoſe endes being for the moſt part vnknowen to him

him that comes to aſke councell, he perceiueth not (if he be not wiſe) the treaſon and infidelitie of the councell: The experience was ſeene in the condicion of P. de medicis: for, the Venetians iudging, that if he returned into his countrey, it would be a cauſe to giue the king a greater facilitie to his demaundes and deſires of the Florentyns, (A thing preiudiciall to them, and contrary to the courſe of their affayres) perſwaded him by many liuely reaſons, (councelling rather for them ſelues then for him) that he ſhould not put him ſelfe in the power of a king of Fraunce, holding him ſelfe iniuried by him: Wherein the better to encourage him to thymitacion of their councell, they offered him to embrace his affayres, and as time and neceſſitie required, to miniſter to him all meanes and fauors conuenient for his reſtitucion, wherein the better to be aſſured that he ſhould not then depart Venice, they ſet vpon him, (if the common brute be true) very ſecrete eſpiall and guard. But now for Florence, in this meane while mens hartes were inflamed on all partes, and almoſt caried into manifeſt contencion: the king would nothing abate of his later demaundes, nor the Florentyns be bownd to ſummes of money ſo intollerable, and much leſſe conſent to any iuriſdiction or preeminence in their eſtate: All which difficulties not being able almoſt to be diſſolued without armes, were euen preſently decided by the vertue of Peter Capponi, one of the fowre deputed to treate with the king: This Capponi was a man of ſpirite and great courage, and of ſpeciall reputacion in Florence, aſwell for his partes and qualities, as for that he was of an honorable familie, and diſcended of perſonages, who had borne great rule in the common weale. As he and his companions were one day in the preſence and audience of the king, & that one of the kings Secretories redde the vnreaſonable capitulacions offered by the king, at the laſt, he, in a great furie ſnatched the articles out of the Secretories hands, and tare them before the eyes of the king, ſaying with a hart reſolute, and a voyce framed, ſeeing you demaund of vs thinges ſo diſhoneſt, ſound you vp your trompets, and we will ringe our bells, let all thinges be ruled by the ſentence of the ſworde, and in the ſame heate flinges with great ſuddeines out of the chamber, being followed with his companions: The wordes of this Citiſen whom the king and his court had already knowen, for that a fewe monthes before he had bene in Fraunce in legacion for them of Florence, aſtoniſhed them all in ſuch ſort, ſpecially for that they could not beleue that ſuch a boldnes was without occaſion: that they called him backe againe, and without ſpeaking more of demaundes, whereunto the Florentyns had no will to condiſcend: the king and the citie fell to compoſicion in this ſort: That all quarrells and iniuries forgotten and cancelled, the citie of Florence ſhould be friend, confederate, and in the perpetuall protection of the crowne of Fraunce: That for the ſewertie of the king, the citie of Pyſa and towne of Lyuorne, with all their caſtels, ſhould remeine in his hands: And that he ſhould be bownd to reſtore them to the Florentyns, without any expēſes or charges, as ſone as he had brought to end his enterpriſe of the kingdom of Naples, the which ſhould be cōſtrued to be at an end whenſoeuer he ſhoulde haue cōquered the citie of Naples, or accorded the warre by meane of peace or truce for leſſe then two yeares, or that for any other occaſiō his perſon ſhould be gone out of Italy: That thoſe that had the keeping of the ſayd caſtells, ſhould be ſworne from the preſent to render them in the caſes aforeſayd: That in the meane while the imperie, the iuriſdiction, the gouernmēt, & the reuenue of the townes ſhould be in the adminiſtraciō of the Florētyns, as they were accuſtomed: That the like ſhould be of S. Peter, Serezane, & Serezanelle: But (for that the Genovvays pretēded right to them) the king ſhould procure either by cōpoſiciō or iuſtice ſome reaſōable end betwene thē, & if within the time afore ſaid he could not determine the titles, that then he ſhould

reſtore them to the Florentyns: That the king might leaue at Florence two Embaſſadors, and that during his expedicion for Naples, there ſhould be nothing debated concerning that action, without their priuitie and calling them to it: And that during the ſayd tyme, they ſhould not chuſe a capteine generall ouer their companies, without communicating with the ſayd Embaſſadors: That all the other peeces taken away or reuolted from the Florentyns, ſhould be immediatly rẽdred, & that they might be ſuffred to recouer them by armes, where deniall was made: That, to ayde the king in his enterpriſe, they ſhoulde giue him fiftie thowſand duckats within fifteene dayes, forty thowſand in the month of March, & thirty thowſand in Iune next comming: That the Florentyns ſhould pardon the Pyſans their rebellions, and all other faults committed during their reuolt: That they ſhould deliuer Peter de medicis and his brethern from condemnacion and confiſkacion, with this condicion notwithſtanding, that Peter ſhould not come by an hundred miles neare the confines of the dominion of Florence, (that was becauſe he ſhould not remaine at Rome) nor his brethern nearer then a hundred myles of the citie of Florence: Theſe were tharticles of moſt importance in the capitulacion made betwene the king and the Florentyns, which, after they were lawfully paſſed & contracted, were, in great ceremonie publiſhed in the great Church at diuine ſeruice, where the king in perſon (at whoſe requeſt this was done) & the Magiſtrates of the citie, promiſed by ſolemne othe vpon the high altar, in the preſence of the Court and the whole face of Florence, to obſerue the contents of the ſame. Within two dayes after, the king left Florence, and went to Siena, which citie being confederat with the king of Naples, & with the Florentyns, had followed their authoritie, vntil the going of Peter de medicis to Serezana warned them to looke to their proper ſafetie.

Siena, a citie well peopled and planted in a region very fertill, and which (of antiquitie) had bene the moſt renowmed & mighty towne of Tuſkane next to Florence, was gouerned by a peculiar pollecie proper & particular to it ſelfe, but ſo, as it knew rather the name of libertie then theffects: for that being diuided into many factions or members of Citiſens, which they cal orders, it obeyde that part which according to the accidents of tymes, and fauors of forreyne Potentates, was more ſtronge then the others: At that tyme helde moſt rule and authoritie the order of Mont None: After the king had taried a very fewe dayes at Siena, he planted a garriſon there, (for that hauing bene alwaies at the deuocion of thempire, he held it ſuſpected) & tooke his way to Rome, riſing euery day more inſolent then other, for his ſucceſſe and fortunes, which were alwayes greater then euer were his hopes: And being alſo fauored with the ayre, and wether more then the natural temperature of that ſeaſon had wont to ſhow, he determined to put diligence to his fortune, and vſe thoſe proſperities, not as terrible to his enemies manifeſt and profeſſed, but euen to thoſe that were conioyned with him, or at leaſt had not prouoked him in any thing: therefore, the Senat of Venice, and the Duke of Myllan, no leſſe aſtoniſhed with theſe ſucceſſes, then dowtfull that the kinges thoughtes would not be at reſt by the conqueſt of Naples, (ſpecially ſeing him poſſeſt of the fortreſſes of the Florentyns, and to leaue a garriſon at Siena) began for a remedie of their common daunger, to common to make a new confederacion, whereunto, they had with more ſpeede and eaſe giuen perfection, if there had bene made that reſiſtance to the king at Rome that was hoped for, the intencion of the Duke of Calabria (with whom were ioyned in one ſtrength the bandes of the Pope, and Virginio Vrſin, with the reſidue of th Aragons armie) being to incampe at Vicerba, to giue impediment to the king for paſſing further: To this he was drawne,beſides many occaſions by thopportunitie of the place inuironed with townes of the Church,and neare the ſtates of the Vrſins: But all the circumference and contreyes about Rome,drawing into tumult by thincurſions which the Colonnoys made beyond the riuer of Tyber,and for thimpediments of the vittells (by meane of Oſtia) which ſhould come to Rome by ſea, he durſt not abide there: he dowted with all,of thintencion of the Pope, for that ſince he vnderſtoode that P. de medicis was turned,he had begonne to open his eares to the demaundes of the french, for the which,and the reaſons of them,Cardinall Aſkanius went to him, after, in pledge of his ſewertie,the Cardinall of Valence was come to Marina,a towne of the Colonnoys: And albeit Aſkanius was gone without reſolucion certeine,for that Alexander diſtruſted much thintencion of the king,and of the other ſide was in great feare of his forces,which bredd no ſmall torment and conflict in his hart: yet after the king was parted from Florence,,they returned eftſoones to common of thaccord: wherein for the more diligent accompliſhment of thinges, the Pope diſpatched to the king the Biſhops of Concorde,and Terny,and M.Gratian his confeſſor, with commiſſion that they ſhould compownd aſwell for the affayres of Alphonſo, as for his owne: But the king was of a contrary meaning, hauing ſetled his reſolucion to accord onely and particularly with the Pope: And for that cauſe he ſent to him the L.de la Trimouille, and the Preſident of Ganuy being there alſo for the ſame occaſion: the Cardinal Aſkanius and Proſper Collonne, who were no ſooner come to Rome, then the Pope (for what cauſe I know not) chaunging aduiſe, beſtowed the Duke of Calabria within Rome,with all his armie: he cauſed to be areſted Aſkanius and Proſper, & reſtrayning them within the tower of Adrian,of olde called the caſtell of Creſcence, and now named the caſtell S.Ange,he demaunded of them reſtitucion of Oſtia: In this tumulte alſo the frenche Embaſſadors were made priſoners by the Aragons: But the Pope cauſed them with a preſent ſpeede to be redeliuered, and within a few dayes after, reſtored to libertie Aſkanius and Proſper,conſtrayning them notwithſtanding to depart ſuddenly out of Rome: After this,he ſent to the french king, lying then at Nepi Cardinall Federyk of S.Seuerin,beginning to treate onely of his proper affayres, and yet in great dowt and declyning of mind,for that ſome times he determined to ſtand to the defence of Rome,and therefore gaue ſufferance to Ferdinand & the capteines to looke to fortefie it in the partes moſt weake: and earſte againe,he iudged greate hardnes and impoſſibilitie to defend it, for thimpediments of vittells reſtrayned by thoſe of Oſtia: In which reſpectes,waighing alſo with the infinit numbers of ſtraungers,being of mindes and of wills different,the diuerſitie of factions euen amongeſt the Romaines,he began to thinke to goe from Rome, requiring in the colleage that euery Cardinal would promiſe by a writing ſubſigned,to follow him: And euen ſtanding amaſed with the daungers and difficulties imminent,vpon euery one of his deliberacions he turned his mind to accorde: But whileſt his minde wauered in theſe ambiguities, the french men forbare not to ouerronne the whole contrey on this ſide Tyber,making them ſelues Lordes of one towne after an other, no place offering reſiſtance to their incurſiõs,No,not one peece or fort which gaue not place to their importunat furie, according to thexample of the others, no, not ſuch as had good occaſion to oppoſe them ſelues againſt them, as Virginio Vrſin, drawne by ſo many bondes of faith,office, and honor to the houſe of Aragon, Capteine generall of tharmie of Alphonſo,grand Conſtable of the realme of Naples, and very neare parent to Alphonſo, for that Iohn Iordan his ſonne had maried a baſtard daughter to the late king Ferdinand.But he turning all theſe thinges into forgetfulnes,& as vnthank-

full for the ſtates and fauors he had receiued in the kingdom of Naples, as vnmindfull that the calamities of the Aragons were firſt kindled for his occaſions, and nouriſhed chiefly in his particular intereſtes: conſented that his perſon continuing ſtill in the pay of the king of Naples, his children ſhould compownd with the french, and be bound to giue them paſſage and libertie of vittells and othet friendſhips, through all the eſtates which he held of the dominions of the Churche, leauing the french men not a litle amaſed with his example and forme of dealing, being not acquainted with theſe ſutle and vnaccuſtomed diſtinctions of the ſouldiers of Italy: he ſuffered withall that Campagnane, and certeine other places were put in deputacion into the handes of the Cardinall of Gurcy, who promiſed to reſtore them ſo ſoone as the armie was out of the territories of Rome: This forme of agreement was vſed alſo by the Count de Petillane, with all the reſidue of the familie of the Vrſins: immediatly vpon theſe accordes, king Charles went from Nepi to Bracciane, a chiefe towne of Virginio, and ſent to Oſtia Lovvys the L. of Ligny, and Yues L. of Alegre, with fiue hundred launces, & two thowſand Svvyzzers: to thende that paſſing Tyber, and ioyning with the Collonnoys, they might make a ſtrength to enter Rome, and that ſo much the better, by how much the Collonnoys, by the meane of their factions and partakers within Rome, had a reſolute hope to make their entrey in what ſort ſo euer it were, notwithſtanding by the ſeaſon of the tyme being rough and ſtormie, the difficulties were much increaſed. By this tyme Cinit auechc Cornette, and in the ende almoſt all the territorie of Rome were brought to the deuocion of the frēch, when a man might haue ſeene all the Court amaſed, all the Cardinalls dowtfull, and all the communaltie of the citie full of feares & emocion, demaunding vehemently peace: in ſo much that the Pope driuen to daungerous tearmes, ſeeing the foundacions which he had layd for his defence, ſhaken on all ſides, was not reteyned with any other thing, then with the remembrance that he was one of the firſt that ſtirred the french king to thenterpriſe of Naples: And had ſince without occaſion giuen, obſtinatly reſiſted him with authoritie, with councells, and with force, the ſame making him iuſtly dowt, that the faith which he ſhould receiue of the king, ſhould be like to that the king had receiued of him: To theſe feares he felte an other torment nothing inferior, vnderſtanding the Cardinall S. P. ad vincla was very gracious in the kinges ſight, with many other Cardinalls, his ennemies bearing no litle authoritie and rule in the kinges doings: By the perſwaſions of whom, and for the regard of the title of right Chriſtian which the kinges of Fraunce beare, and for the auncient name which that nacion hath to be very religious, and laſtly for that in ill men the conſcience giltie and infected, ſuſpecteth not onely the worſt, but alſo their mindes caried in ſhadowes, they expect and dread great thinges of thoſe that are knowne to them, but by name onely: he feared leaſt the king would turne his witts (according to a vayne brute) to reforme the gouernment of the Church: the ſame being a right trembling thought & coniecture to him, when he remēbred with what infamie he was come to the Popedom, performing his miniſtracion with maners of life & meanes not differing from ſo fowle and vile a beginning: But he was cleared immediatly of theſe ſuſpicions, by the diligence and promiſes of the king, full of efficacie and deſire to aduaunce aboue all things his going to the realme of Naples: And for that cauſe letting nothing paſſe that might take out of his way the blockes and impediments of the Pope, ſent to him eftſoones as Embaſſadors the Seneſchall of Beucaire, the Mareſhall of Gie, & the ſayd Preſident of Gannay: they labored to perſwade the Pope that the kinges intencion was not to medle with any thing that apperteined to thauthoritie of Popes,

and that his demaundes ſtretched not but to thinges reaſonable and neceſſary for the ſewertie of his paſſage: They required him inſtantly to agree with good will to the kinges entrey into Rome, aſſuring him that it was a holy and peculiar deſire in his maieſtie: Not that it was not in his power to make his entrey by armes, but becauſe he would not be conſtrayned to forbeare to vſe thoſe actions of reuerence, which had bene alwayes done by his elders to the Popes of Rome: They aſſured him that aſſoone as his maieſties perſon were poſſeſſed of the preſence of the Pope within Rome, all thoſe quarells that had bene rayſed betwene them, would be conuerted into reconcilement, vnitie, and coniunction: It ſeemed to the Pope a hard compulſion, to deſpoyle him ſelfe afore all thinges of the ayde of his friendes, and committing his eſtate and life into the power of an ennemie, to receiue him within the walles of Rome, afore he had compownded or aſſured his affayres: Notwithſtanding, making election of the daunger that was of leaſt qualitie, he conſented to all their demaũds, and cauſed to depart out of Rome the Duke of Calabria, for whom albeit he obteyned of the french king a ſafe conduit for his ſafe paſſage through all the dominions of the Church, yet the Duke, accompting it a diminucion of his reputacion and courage, refuſed it, and iſſued out of Rome by the gate S. Sebaſtian, the laſt day of the yeare 1494. at the ſame hower, that at the gate de S. Maria de Popolo entred with the armie of Fraunce, the french king armed, with his launce vppon his thigh as he entred Florence: At the ſame tyme the Pope full of incredible feares and perplexities, was withdrawne to the caſtell S. Ange, and not accompanied with other Cardinalls then Baptiſta Vrſin, and Oliuer Caraffe a Neapolitan: But now began the Cardinalls ad vincla, Aſkanius Collonne, and Sauelle, with many others, to ſolicite the king with vehement inſtance, that taking from the ſea a Pope ful of vices, and abominable to all the world, he would create and ſet vp an other: they told him it would be no leſſe vertuous in him to deliuer the church of God from the tyrannie of a wicked Pope, then it was great glorie to Pepin & Charlemain his predeceſſors, to take the Popes of holy life out of the perſecucions of thoſe that did vniuſtly oppreſſe them: that the action was no leſſe neceſſary for his ſecuritie, then greatly concurring for his glorie: for, there was no expectacion of faith or truſt in the promiſes of the Pope, being a man naturally full of fraude, inſatiable in ambicion, ſhameles in all his doings, and according to the teſtimonie of experience, extremely hating the french, with whom the reconciliacion that now he made, was more by neceſſitie and feare, then of inclinacion or good will: partly by theſe perſwacions, and partly for that the Pope in the condicions that were debated, refuſed to let the king haue the caſtell of S. Ange, for the ſewertie of thoſe thinges he promiſed him: thartilleries were drawne twiſe from the pallaice of S. Marke where the king was lodged, to be planted before the caſtell: But the king bearing no inclinacion to offend the Pope and the preſentes, and promiſes of Alexander working much with ſome of thoſe that gouerned moſt the kings councells: they fell to accord in this ſort: That the Pope ſhould giue to the king, to hold for his ſewertie till he had conquered the kingdom of Naples, the Cytadells of Ciuitauechia, Terrachine, and Spolete, and yet this laſt was not put into his hands: That the Pope ſhould keepe no remembrance of any offence or iniurie of the Cardinalls or any Barons ſubiectes to the church that had followed the kinges partie: That the Pope ſhould inueſt him in the kingdom of Naples: That he ſhould giue to the king Gemyn Ottoman brother to Baiazet, who, after the death of their father, had bene perſecuted by the ſayd Baiazet, according to the barbarous cuſtomes of the Ottomans, ſeeking to eſtabliſh their ſucceſſion in the Empire, with the bludd of their brethren their neareſt kinne, and competytors: In which perill for ſafetie of his life, he was fledd to Rodes, from whence he was brought into Fraunce, & laſtly paſt ouer into the power and cuſtodie of Pope Innocent: By which occaſion Baiazet, ſeruing his turne of the couetouſnes of the Vicaires of Chriſt as inſtrumentes to holde in peace the Empire ennemie to the Chriſtian faith, payed euery yeare (vnder the name of allowance towardes his norriture and keeping) forty thowſand duckats to the Popes, to thende they ſhould be leſſe ready to deliuer him into the handes of other Princes to ſerue their turnes againſt him: The king was ſo much the more deſirous to haue him, by how much he ſuppoſed to turne him to many vſes & oportunities for thaduauncing of his pretended enterpriſe againſt the Turkes, (being greatly caried into glorie by the vayne flatteries of many of his fauorits) which he ment to beginne as ſoone as he had accompliſhed the conqueſt of th Aragons: And becauſe the laſt xl. thowſand duckats ſent by the Turke, were taken at Sinigalle by the Prefect of Rome, he required that the Pope would remitte both the puniſhment and reſtitucion: To theſe capitulacions were added that the Cardinall of Valence ſhould follow the king three monthes as Legat apoſtolike, but in meaning it was to ſtande as oſtage for the promiſes of his father: The accord thus made and paſt, the Pope returned to the Vatican, where is his pallaice pontificall: And after, with pompes and ceremonies accuſtomed at the receiuing of great kinges, he receiued the king in the Church of S. Peter, and there (according to the maner) hauing kiſſed his feete kneeling, was afterwards receiued to kiſſe his cheeke: An other day he aſſiſted in preſence the Popes maſſe, where he had his place the firſt after the firſt Biſhop Cardinal, and according to the auncient cuſtom, gaue water to the Pope celebrating maſſe: which offices, humilities & ceremonies, the Pope, to continue the memorie to all poſterities, cauſed to be curiouſly drawn in a table purtraied, & honge vp in a gallerie of the caſtell S. Ange: In this action, the Pope to gratifie the king, created & publiſhed Cardinalls the Biſhop of S Malo, & the Biſhop of Maus, of the nation of Luxumburg, forgetting nothing that might expreſſe how ſincerely and vnfaynedly he was reconciled.

The french king kiſſeth the Popes feete.

The king remeyning in Rome about a month, forgat not to ſend bandes & trowps of ſouldiers euen vppon the confins of the kingdom of Naples: where was already ſuch generall commotion, that Aquila, and almoſt all Abruzza, diſplayed enſeignes afore he parted from Rome, as alſo Fabricius Collonne occupied the quarters of Albe & Taille coſſe: The whole reſidue of the kingdom was almoſt in no more peaſible eſtate, for that as ſoone as Ferdinand was parted from Rome, the frutes of the hatredes which the people had long borne to Alphonſo, began to appeare, helping much the remembrance of many rigors which his father Ferdinand had vſed againſt them: vpon theſe they rayſed ready occaſions to complayne vehemently of the iniquities of the gouernments paſſed, togither with the cruelties and pride of Alphonſo, expreſſing in theſe humors apparant deſire that the french might come, and that in ſuch ſort, as the contemplacion of the auncient relykes and monuments of ſuch as held with the houſe of Aniovv, albeit they were ioyned to the memorie of ſo many Barons as had bene chaſſed and empriſoned at ſundry tymes by Ferdinand, (thinges of them ſelues of great conſideracion and of no litle power to worke a chaunge) did litle in this tyme in regarde of the other occaſions: ſo vehemently were the hartes of all the kingdom inflamed againſt Alphonſo who for his part, as ſoone as he vnderſtood that his ſonne was gon out of Rome, entred into ſuch preſent feares & aſtoniſhmēts, that, turning all memorie or regard to the great renowme and glorie which with ſo long experience he had got in many warres in Italy, into a preſent deſpaire not to be able

able to reſiſt this fatall ſtorme, determined to abandon the kingdom, and leaue to Ferdinand the name and authoritie royall: In this deuiſe perhaps he had hope that taking away with him ſelfe the generall hatred, and leauing to the people for their king a yong Prince of great expectacion, not yet hauing offended any of them, but gracious and plawſible to the vniuerſall multitude, he ſhould make leſſe in his ſubiectes their deſire to haue the french: which councell if it had bene ſooner taken, would happily haue wrought to better purpoſe, but being differred, till things were not onely in motion and ſhaking, but euen beginning to fall, it was not able to ſtay ſo great a ruine: It was ſayd alſo (if it be lawfull not to deſpiſe ſuch thinges altogither) that the ſpirite of Ferdinand appeared three tymes in ſundry nightes to Iames chiefe Surgeon of the Court, charging him firſt with ſoft and mild words, and after with many threatnings, to warne Alphonſo from him not to hope to be able to reſiſt the french king, becauſe it was a reſolucion in deſtinie that his race trauelled with infinit aduentures and fortunes, and depriued at laſt of ſo large a kingdom, ſhoulde now ende and determine: he ſayd their enormities began now to appeare in iuſtice, and the many tyrannies by them committed were the cauſes, but aboue all others that, which by his perſwaſion he had done in the church of S. Leonard in Caiaia neare Naples comming from Pozzolo: for that he expreſſed them no more particularly, men ſuppoſed that Alphonſo had in that place perſwaded Ferdinand to put to death ſecretly many Barons, whom he held priſoners long time before: But of what nature ſo euer was thoccaſion, it is moſt certeine, that Alphonſo vexed with his proper conſcience, liued day and night in a diſcontented ſpirite, for that in his ſleepes the ſhadowes and Ghoſtes of thoſe dead Lordes were liuely afore him, and on the dayes he beheld the people prepard greatly to inſurrections, for reuenge of his rigorous dealinges: In which perplexitie of mind applying his councells to his fortunes, he communicated onely his intencion with the Queene his mother in law, keeping it from his brother or his ſonne, and departed from Naples accompanied with fowre light gallies loaden with implements rich and precious: he was ſo afflicted with dread & confuſion, that at the earneſt inſtance of his mother he would not ſtay two or three daies (a time to ende the whole yeare of his reigne) And at his departing expreſſing ſuch tymerous diſpoſicion of mind as if he had bene enuironed with the french mē: he ſayled to a towne in Sicile called Mazare, which Ferdinand the king of Spayne had giuen him the yeare before: but his feares left not to followe him no more then his fortunes, ſhowing at euery brute or ſmall noyſe no leſſe perplexitie and terror, then if the heauens and elements had conſpired againſt him.

As the french king departed out of Rome, he receiued aduertiſement of the fleing of Alphonſo: And aſſoone as he was arriued at Vellitre the Cardinall of Valence fledd ſecretly from him: with the which albeit the Pope ſhowed him ſelfe much diſcontented, offering to giue the king ſuch aſſurance as it pleaſed him: yet wiſe men beleued that it was not without his practiſe and commaundement, as one that ſought to haue in his power to obſerue or not obſerue the conuencions he had made with his maieſtie: an action agreeing with his ambicion, which moſt gouerned him, but farre from the office of his profeſſion which he leaſt eſteemed, making nothing vnlawfull, for that he challenged to him ſelf to haue power to diſpenſe with all things: from Vellitre the vauntgarde marcheth to Montfortyn, a towne of the Church ſeated in la Campagnia, and ſubiect to Iacques a gentleman Romayne, who had at firſt followed the pay of the french king, But ſince (the hate he bare to the Collōnoys preuailing more with him then his proper honor) he was become mercenarie to Alphonſo:

The place being well ſhaken with the great artillerie, was taken (notwithſtanding his ſtrong ſituacion) within few howres by the french, who executed by the ſworde all that were found within it, except his three ſonnes, and certeine others that retyred into the caſtell, but made priſoners aſſoone as they ſaw thartillerie planted: from thence tharmie marched to Mont S. Iohn, a towne of the Marquiſſ of Piſcaire, ſeated in the ſayd Campagnia, vpon the confins of the kingdom: this towne, beſides it was ſtrong by nature and induſtrie of men, yet it was well furniſhed with ſouldiors to defende it, hauing in it three hundred footemen ſtraungers, and fiue hundred of thinhabitants well appoynted for all daungers: In ſo much as it was not thought pregnable but by a hard and long ſeege: But after the french men had ſomewhat ſearched the walls with their cannons, they gaue in the preſence of the king then come from Verune, ſo hoat and violent aſſault, that vanquiſhing all difficulties, they tooke it by force the ſame day, And following their naturall furie, as alſo to warne others by this example not to be ſo obſtinate to reſiſt, they made lamentable ſlaughters, wherein ſparing no ſort of barbarous crueltie, they followed the deſolacion of the place with ſetting fire on houſes: A maner of making warre not vſed in Italy in many ages before, and therefore filled the whole realme with more generall feares and terrors: for, in Italy in all victories obteyned in what order ſo euer, the moſt extreme and laſt action wherein the Victor would ſtretch out his crueltie, was to diſarme & ſpoyle the ſouldiors, and ſo let them goe vanquiſhed: and for townes taken by force, to put them to ſacke and pillage, and thinhabitants to raunſom, pardoning alwayes the life of men not ſlayne in the heate and furie of the fight.

This was all the reſiſtance, the payne, and impedimentes which the french king had to conquere ſo large, ſo rich, and ſo populous a kingdom, for the defence whereof, there was not ſhowed in any ſort any vertue, any courage, any councel, any force, any faith, nor any deſire of honor: for, after the Duke of Calabria, (after his going out of Rome, retyred to the borders of the kingdom, and from thence called to Naples, by the flying of his father) had taken vpon him thautoritie and title of king, (but more with ſolemnities, then with pompe and ioyes accuſtomed) and that he had aſſembled his armie contayning fiftie ſquadorons of horſemen, and ſix thowſand footemen of choyſſe, and ledd by the beſt reputed Capteynes in Italy: he incamped him ſelfe at S. Germayn, to ſtoppe thennemie for paſſing further, being drawne thither by thoportunitie of the place, inuyroned on the one ſide with high and rough mountaynes, and of the other with a contrey full of mareſhes and waters, and had in the front the riuer of Garillan, which the Auncients called Lari, albeit it was not ſo deepe in that place but at ſome tymes it was paſſible at a forde, by reaſon whereof, and that the paſſage is very narrow and ſtraite, they ſay with good reaſon that S. Germayn is one of the keyes of the kingdom of Naples: he ſent alſo bandes and trowpes to the next mounteynes to keepe the way of Cancella: But all was in vayne, and in theſe doinges he did no other thing then keepe his minde in languiſhing, like as the Surgeon torments his patient by applying varietie of medicines to a wound that reſiſtes all cures and remedies: for, his armie already ſtricken with a generall terror with the onely name of the french men, declared apparant tokens of puſillanimitie and faintnes: And the Capteynes and leaders, partly tendring the ſafetie of them ſelues and their owne eſtates, diſtruſting already of the defenſe of the kingdom, and partly deſiring innouacions and new thinges, began to wauer no leſſe in faith then in courage: Laſtly, all the kingdom being in inſurrection, it was not without feare, that at their backes ſhould happen ſome perillous diſorder: Therefore councell giuing place to

cowardnes, and frayle feares ouerruling reſolucion and conſtancie of minde, vnderſtanding after the taking of Mount S. John that the Mareſhal de Gie was at hand with three hundred launces, and two thowſand footemen, they diſcamped with ſhame from S. Germain, and retyred to Capua with ſuch confuſion and feare, that they lefte by the way viij. great peeces of artillerie without garde, giuing thennemie a meane to helpe forwarde their deſtruction with their owne weapons. This citie, the newe king, reappoſing much in the amitie of the towne towards the houſe of Aragon, and in the ſtrong ſeate of the place, he hoped to defend and to keepe alſo Naples and Caietta, not making diſtribucion of his forces to other places: The french men went after, but diſperſed and out of order, marching more after the manner of trauellers, then like men of warre, and without all regard either to keepe vnder their enſeignes, or to be ruled by the direction of their Capteynes, they tooke libertie to goe where ſo euer they thought to find pillage: And ſo neare was the encounter of theſe two armies, that one part of them moſt often lodged the nightes in places where the Aragons were diſlodged in the mornings: Neither in Capua was any greater demonſtracion of vertue or fortune, for that after Ferdinand had there beſtowed his armie, much diminiſhed in numbers ſince the retraict from S. Germain, he was ſent for by letters from the Queene, expreſſing that ſince the loſſe of S. Germain, there were ſuch murmures and mutinies within Naples, as without his preſence, there was manifeſt daunger of a generall tumult: for which cauſe he went thither with a ſmal company, by his preſence to giue impediment to the perill preſent, promiſing to returne eſtſoones to Capua the day following. Iohn Iacques Trimulce to whome he had left the garde of the citie, had ſecretly ſent to the french king for a Heralde, to come vnder ſewertie to ſpeake with him, which being graunted, Trimulce with certeine gentlemen of Capua, went to Calui where the ſame day the king was entred: This did Trimulce notwithſtanding that many others of the citie wel diſpoſed to keepe their faith to Ferdinand, did ſpeake againſt it with many braue and hawtie wordes: But being preſented to the king all armed as he came in, he tolde him in the name of the Capuans and ſouldiers, That they ſeeing their forces, defence, and ſtrength, to fayle in Ferdinand, whom they had faithfully ſerued whileſt there remayned any apparance of hope: were now come to make offer of their ſeruices to him, bringing mindes to follow his fortunes where ſo euer he will employ them vnder honeſt condicions, adding withall, that he dowted not to bring him Ferdinand him ſelfe, ſo that he would enterteyne and acknowledge him as apperteyned: The king made him this gracious aunſwere, that he accepted the offers of the Capuans and the ſouldiers, as alſo the comming of Ferdinand ſhould be no leſſe welcome: onely that he ſhould retein no porcion of the kingdom of Naples how litle ſo euer it were, but that he would indue him with eſtates and honors in the realme of Fraunce.

Iohn Iacques Trimulce goeth to the french king.

It may be dowted with what maner of inducements this Trimulce, a capteyne valiant and particular in the profeſſion of honor, was drawne to reuolte and leaue his king: Touching him ſelfe, he affirmed, that he went by the wil and direction of Ferdinand to ſolicit ſome compoſicion with the french, And being altogither excluded from all hopes, and the iudgement manifeſt that the kingdom of Naples could be no longer defended by armes, he thought it not onely lawful, but alſo allowable to prouide at one tyme for the ſafetie of the Capuans, and ſecuritie of the ſouldiers: But the common opinion of men made an other conſtruction, referring his reuolt to a deſire he had that the french king might be Victor, for that he hoped when he had made a conqueſt of Naples, he would looke into the meanes by the which he might in like ſort make him ſelfe maiſter of Myllan: In which citie, he being borne of a moſt noble familie, and becauſe for the priuie fauors which the houſe of S. Seuerin had with Lodouvvyk Sforce & with other occaſions, he had not place according to his vertues and merits: he was wholly eſtranged from Lodouvvyk: for thoſe occaſions many wiſe men iudged, that he had councelled Ferdinand to proceede in the actions & ſeruice of Romania, more temperatly then perhaps thoccaſions required: But in Capua, afore the returne of Triuulce, all began to declyne to reuolt, the ſouldiers had ſacked the pallaice, armories, and ſtables of Ferdinand, the men at armes made diuiſions of them ſelues, and were beſtowed in ſundry quarters: And Virginio and the Count Petillane were retyred with their companies to the citie of Nola, belonging to the ſayd Count by the donation of the Aragons, ſending firſt to the french king to demaund ſafeconduct for them and their people: Ferdinand returned according to his word and promiſe, hauing ſomewhat appeaſed according to the tyme the humors of the Neapolytaines, by giuing them hope of the defenſe of Capua: he was come within two myles of the citie all ignorant of the chaunge that hapned ſince his departure: But the towne hearing of his returne and ſo neare approach, and the people wholly exclayming againſt his reentrey, drew into armes, and by a common voyce and councell ſent forth to meete him certeyne of the nobilitie, to aduertiſe him to paſſe no further, for that the citie ſeeing he had left it abandoned, that Triuulce gouerner of the men of warre was gone to the french, his owne ſouldiers had made a ſpoyle of his pallaice, and Virginio and the Count Petillane left them to their fortunes, and that almoſt all his armie was broken: they were conſtrayned for their proper ſafetie to giue place to the conqueror: with theſe newes no leſſe heauy thē troubleſom, Ferdinand (after he had made vayne inſtance euen with teares to be receiued) returnes to Naples, being wel aſſured that the example of Capua would draw the reſidue of the kingdom to reuolt, as the citie of Auerſe ſeated betwene Capua and Naples, drawne into emotion diſpatched preſent Embaſſadors to offer them ſelues to the french king: And the Neapolytans conſulting alſo manifeſtly to doe the like, the infortunat king determined not to reſiſt ſo obſtinat a will of fortune, and therefore aſſembling vpon the place of the new caſtell many of the nobilitie and people, he deliuered to them this laſt and lamentable ſpeech.

I may call God to witneſſe and the conſciences of all thoſe men, that heretofore haue had any informacion of my thoughtes and conceites, that no deſire made me more to aſpire to the crowne, then to expreſſe to the world with what greeſe I miſliked the rigorous gouernments of my father and grandfather, and with a recompenſe more iuſt & plawſible to reclayme by moderacion and benefits thoſe hartes and affections which they had loſt by their hard dealing and crueltie: But the infelicitie of our houſe would neuer ſuffer that I ſhoulde receiue this frute, which I eſteeme more excellent and honorable then the kingdom itſelfe: ſeeing that to be a king, is a thing that often tymes dependes vpon fortune, but to be ſuch a king as to turne all his cares and endes to the welfare and felicitie of his peoples, that depends onely of him ſelfe and his proper vertue. Theſe be hard tearmes in nature to detect my parentes, and chalenge their abuſes to thoſe to whom nothing is more welcome then thoccaſion of reuenge, nor any thing further of, then hartes and affections to forgiue or forget. I could ſay enough to iuſtifie my ſelfe, for that it is eaſie for innocents to finde wordes to ſpeake, but ſeeing there is ſo litle compariſon betwene their offences paſt, and the merit of my innocencie preſent, it were but in vayne to vrge a hatefull remembrance of them, and yet nothing the more acquite you of the calamities mities that approach: No, in cases of aduersitie it is a better temperance to prouide for the ill that is comming, then to amuse the tyme in complaintes againſt the Authors ſuppoſed, leauing the conſideracion of the cauſe to God, with whom no mortall creature hath familiaritie in the vnderſtanding and ordering of his iuſtice: I ſee our affayres ſuffer hard fortunes, and the extremitie wherein they are falne is of that nature, that we may complayne more to haue loſt the kingdom by thinfidelitie and feares of our armies and Capteynes, then our ennemies can vaunt to haue wonne it by their proper vertue: And yet our fortune leaueth vs not altogither without hope, if we ſuſteyne yet a litle tyme, for that both by the king of Spayne, and all the Princes of Italy, is preparing a mighty ſuccor, their eyes being now opened that afore could not conſider, that the fire which burnes our realme muſt in like ſorte (without prouidence) caſt his flames into their ſeuerall eſtates: And for me, at the leaſt, courage ſhoulde not want to determine to gether the kingdom and my life, both with that glorie which becomes a yong king deſcēded by ſo long ſucceſſion of ſo many kings, and alſo aunſwering the expectacion which hetherunto you haue had of my meritts and vertues: But becauſe thinges can not be put to triall, without committing the common patrimonie to deſperat perill, I am determined rather to giue place to fortune and keepe hidd my vertue, then in ſtriuing to loſe the kingdom, to be the cauſer of effectes contrary to thoſe endes for the which I haue alwayes deſired to be king: Therefore with teares I giue you this councell, that ſtanding no more againſt the furie of the time, you ſend with ſpeed to make your accord with the french king: And to thend you may be in better power, to do it without ſtayne to your honors, I abſolue you willingly of the homage and othe which you made to me a few dayes paſt: wherein I exhort you according to the neceſſitie of your fortune, not to deferre your obedience, humilitie, and readines to receiue him, as by that meanes to ſtay the courſe of your proper aduerſities, and helpe to moderat the naturall pride of that nation: If at any tyme their barbarous cuſtoms and manners cauſe you to hate their rule and imperie, and deſire my returne, I will remeyne in place apt to miniſter ayde to your will, and be ready to offer vp my life for the redreſſe of your oppreſſions and harmes: But if their gouernment content you, this realme ſhall neuer receiue vexacion or trauell by me, your well doing and benefit ſeruing as a perpetuall conſolacion to my miſeries: and that ſo much the rather, if I may knowe that there remayne in you any memorie, that neither in the perſon of an eldeſt ſonne to a king, nor in the power of a king, I haue done no wronge to any creature: My thoughtes were neuer ſubiect to mocions of ambicion, my mind neuer defiled with inclinacion to crueltie, myne owne ſinnes bring me not this affliction, but by a diuine iuſtice I ſuffer for the wickednes of my parentes: I am determined not to be the cauſe that, either to preſerue the realme, or to recouer it, any ſubiect of the ſame be oppreſſed: No, it is more ſorow to me to loſe the meane to make amendes for the tranſgreſſions of my parentes; then to forgoe the royall dignitie and kingdom it ſelfe: for, albeit I ſhall be eſtranged from you, and baniſhed from my patrimonie, yet I will not holde my ſelfe altogither wretched, if to the memorie of theſe thinges, you ioyne a ſtedfaſt beleefe, that I would haue bene king rather like to old Alphonſo my great grandfather, then to Ferdinand, or the laſt Alphonſo: It can not be that theſe wordes were deliuered without great compaſſion: But albeit they wrought many forowfull impreſſions in the hartes of the hearers: yet, it did nothing to the ſtay of the tumult, ſo hatefull was the name of the two laſt kinges to the people, and ſo ſweete the deſire of the french gouernment to the nobilitie: he was no ſooner retyred into the caſtel, then the multitude began to ſacke his pauilions and hales then pitched in the place: which being an indignitie farre vnworthy his meritts and more then he could endure, he returned with great courage to the place to driue them from the ſpoyle, the maieſtie and preſence of a king being yet of ſuch authoritie in a citie rebelled, that the ſouldiers reſtrayning their furie, euery one abſteyned from pillage: But aſſoone as he was returned to the caſtell, and had ſet on fire and ſonke moſt of the ſhippes in the hauen (hauing no other way to depriue the ennemie of thē) he began by tokens certeyne to dowt that the Lanſknightes which were the gard of the caſtell contayning in number fiue hundred, conſpyred to take him priſoner: And therefore the daunger being preſent, he vſed this ſuddeine councell, to giue them his wardropps, goods, and furnitures that were within the caſtell, and whileſt they were buſie to deuide and ſhare them, he ſlipt out of the caſtell by the gate of ſuccors, deliuering firſt out of priſon all thoſe Barons that had bene reſtrayned by the crueltie of his father: he mounted vppon the light gallies that attended him in the hauen accompanied with Dom Federyk and the olde Queene wife to his grand father, who caried with her Iane her daughter: And being followed with very fewe of his people, he ſayled into the yle of Yſchia, called by the auncients Enaria, diſtant thirty myles from Naples: On his way, ſo long as his eyes were ſedd with the proſpect and ſight of the kingdom, he made many repeticions with a pitifull voyce of this verſe of the Pſalme, that they vvatch in vayne vvhich keepe the citie, if it be not kept by the Lord: But finding now no more comfort of fortune, then when he was amydd the daungers of Naples, it fell to him to make tryall of his vertue in Yſchia, togither with an experience of thingratitude and infidelitie of ſuch as riſe vp againſt thoſe wretched perſons that are perſecuted with fortune: for the caſtell keeper of the place refuſing to receiue him but with one man onely, he fell vpon him with ſuch furie, that what by his agilitie and valour, and the impreſſion of a king and maieſtie royall, he brought immediatly vnder his power both the caſtell and the keeper: This aduerſitie albeit was much inferior to the loſſe and priuacion of his kingdom, yet it afflicted him no leſſe, then if the action had bene of higher moment, for that in all miſeries nothing more mitygates the perturbacions of the minde, then to remember that the greateſt miſhapps are paſt, as in ſorowes, it is a ſpeciall comfort to know the vttermoſt: But fortune is infinit in her afflictions, and leaues no expectacion of remedie where a ruine is determined, the ſame making good the experience of the olde ſaying, that to the man vnfortunat one ill neuer hapneth alone, but when they begin to fall they thunder all at once: After Ferdinand was gon out of Naples, euery one gaue way (as to a violent landflood) to the onely name and renowme of the victors, and that with ſuch cowardnes, that two hundred horſemen of M. Lignies went to Nole, whether Virginio and the Count Petillane were retyred with fowre hundred men at armes, and tooke them priſoners without reſiſtance: either they had confidence in the ſafe conduict that was graunted them, or elſe their feares were no leſſe then the others, ſeing with out triall or ſhow of valour, they ſuffered them ſelues to be ledd captiues to the rock of Mondragon, and all their companies to ſuffer pillage and ſpoyle: In this meane while, th Embaſſadors whom the Neapolitanes had ſent to preſent to the french king the keyes of the citie, found him at Auerſe, from whence after he had accorded to them with great liberalities, many priuileadges and exemptions, he went to Naples, and made his entrey the xxj. of February: he was receiued with generall reioyſing on all ſortes, neither perſon, kinde, age, condicion, quallitie, nor faction of men, ſparing to ronne to behold him, as if he had bene their patrone and firſt founder of the citie:

citie: yea, there was a plentifull and willing preſence of thoſe, who either in them ſelues, or in their aunceſtors, had bene rayſed to honors and eſtates by the houſe of Aragon: with this affluence and concurſe of people, after he had viſited the great Church, he was ledd (becauſe new caſtell was yet to thennemies) to be lodged in the caſtell Capua the auncient reſort and reſidence of the kinges of Fraunce, hauing with a wonderfull courſe of felicitie farre aboue the example of Iulius Cæſar, rather vanquiſhed then ſeene his enemie, and that with ſo ready fortune and facilitie: that during the whole expedicion, he neuer had neede to diſplay one pauilion or tent, & much leſſe to breake a launce: And touching helpes and prouiſions, he had ſo great plenty and ſuperfluitie, that his armie at ſea prepared with ſo great expenſes, being caried by violence of wether into the yle of Corſe, was ſo long in approching the ſhoares of the kingdom, that the king had accompliſhed his conqueſt afore there was neceſſitie of their ſeruice.

Thus by ciuill diſcordes which ſo long hath blinded the Princes of Italy, to the great diſhonor and ſkorne of the men of warre of that nation, and common daunger and ignominie of euery region of the ſame, was transferred one of the moſt goodly and mighty partes of Italy, and of the Empire of Italy, to an Empire and gouernment of a nation beyond the mountes: for, albeit olde Ferdinand was borne in Spaine, yet, for that from his youth he had his trayning in Italy, either king or the ſonne of a king, and holding no other principallitie in any region elſe, where togither that his ſonnes and ſonnes ſonnes were bredd vppe in Naples: I may with good right appropper them to the contrey, and call them Italyans.

THE ARGVMENT OF THE SECOND BOOKE.

THE Pysans continue their rebellion against the Florentyns: The french king takes the castells of Naples: The Pope, the Venetians and other Princes make league against the king, who returning into Fraunce is fought withall neare the riuer Taro: Ferdinand wynnes againe Naples: Nonarre is besieged by the confederats: The king makes peace with the Duke of Myllan, and returnes into Fraunce.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE historie and discourse of Guicciardin.

IN the booke before haue bene sett downe the foundacions of the french warres in Italy, both out of what founteyne they spronge, and with what course and mocions they had their proceedings euen to an action of conquest farre aboue the memorie and examples of all tymes and ages before. But as in all powers and causes naturall, this is a propertie infallible to haue their reuolucion by the same swift and violent returne wherewith they did rise to their exaltacion and fulnes: So, the french king, rising with his felicitie, into humors of securitie, saw the declinacion of his fortune and great triumphes, in the like measure and proporcion of tyme by the which he aspired to them, And suffering togither the priuacion of the kingdom, with the honor of his new cõquest, he shewed him selfe more happy to get glorie, then able to keepe it: Then whilest thinges went in this course at Rome and the kingdom of Naples, there kindled in an other parte of Italy, sparkes of a litle fier, wherein was nourished a smothering heate ordeyned to burst out to a great burning, to the hurt of many, but specially to the ruyne of him, who, by too great a desire of dominion and rule, first kindled it and set it on flame: for, albeit the king was bownd by the contract of Florence, that Pysa remeining in his handes till he had conquered the realme of Naples, the iurisdiction & reuenues should be administred by the Florentyns: yet, at his departure, he had sett no order for the execucion of his word and promise: In so much that the Pysans, presuming much of the Capteynes and souldiers left by the king for the gard of the citie, did determine no more to returne to the obedience of Florence: And therefore expulsing some of their officers and others that solicited there for the citie, they made the residue prisonners, with confiskacion of all their goods, and confirmed wholly their rebellion, both by demonstracions and actions: In this reuolte, to be the better able to continue it, they dispatched not onely Embassadors to the king to pray him of defence and protection to their doings, but also, for their stay and strength more assured, they recommended their cause vnder many argumentes of compassion to the cities of Syena and Lucques, who, being auncient ennemies to the name of Florence, could heare of nothing more to their liking and gladnes, then of the reuolt of the the Pysans, to whom in common they sent forthwith a proporcion of money, and Syenna a part furnished them with an ayde of horsemen: In like sort the Pysans sent Embassadors to Venice, to sownde the wills of that Senat, of whom albeit they were graciously receiued, yet they brought away nothing but hopes dowtfull and incerteyne: But they reappposed their chiefest confidence and foundacion in the Duke of Myllan, for that as he was the first breeder of their rebellion, so they hoped he would not fayle to support them with succors, countenance and councell: The Duke, albeit he made other showes and demonstracions to the Florentyns, yet he solicited secretly the confirmacion of this reuolt, and breathing courage into them with many offers, perswacions & promises, he communicated presently with the Genowways to furnish the Pysans with armor and municions, and to sende to them a commissioner, with three hundred footemen: There hath bene auncient quarell betwene the Florentyns and Genowways, rising at first by the conquest of Pysa, and continued by many degrees of displeasures, both for buying the port of Lyuorne of their Duke Tomasin Fregosa which they possessed, and also the taking away of Pietra Santa and Serazena: The memorie of these, ioyned to thoccasion offered, was sufficient to arme them with a wonderfull readines to doe all thinges that might annoy the Florentyns: occupying euen already many of their places in the contrey of Lunigiane, and were become Lords of the borders of Pietra Santa, vnder cooller of a letter obteined from the french king for the restitucion of certein goods confisked: The Florentyns, complayning of these actions at Myllan, were aunswered by the Duke, that according to the contract and capitulacions which he had with them of Genes, he could not well doe any thing to the restraint and impediment of them: And laboring to content them with wordes and diuersitie of hopes, he forbare not with a studie more secret and sutle, to practise and execute the contrary, as one that nourished an ambicious expectacion to draw Pysa to his obedience, if the Florentyns did not eftsoones recouer it, a thing much desired by him no lesse for the qualitie of the citie, then oportunitie of the scituacion: Neither was this desire new, but had bene nourished in him euer since he was expulsed Myllan, a litle after the death of Galeas his brother for a ielowsie which the Ladye Bonne, mother and tutur to the litle Duke had of him, at what time soiorning many monthes vpon the borders of Pysa, he cast many plotts & deuises to get the rule and imperie of it: wherein, as touching the title, he was holpen with a recorde and memorie, that Pysa, afore it came into the iurisdiction of the Florentyns, had bene possessed by Iohn Galeas Vistounte, first Duke of Myllan: By reason whereof, he thought it would be an increase of his glorie, to recouer that which had beene possessed by his elders, and seemed that he might pretende a cooller of right, in not making lawfull, that Iohn Galeas might leaue by testament (to the preiudice of the Dukes of Myllan his successors) to Gabriell Maria his bastard sonne, the state of Pysa, which he had gotten, (albeit with the treasors & armies of the Duchie of Myllan: The Pysans, not content to haue drawne their citie from the obedience of the Florentyns, sought to obtrude vppon all the places and peeces of the generall de Mayne, all which for the most part (in a generall sturre examples may doe muche) following the authoritie of the citie, receiued their commissioners euen in the first dayes of the rebellion, the Florentyns making no resistance in the beginning, for that they were otherwise busied in affaires of greater importance, not hauing as yet composed with the french king, and did perhaps expect that he would apply remedie to those harmes according to his bonde protested by publike and solemne othe: But finding his order too slow and lingring, & happly aūswering the care he made, they

ſent thether bandes and companies, who eſtſoones recouered partly by force, and partly by compoſicion, all that was occupied except Caſine, Buti, and Vicopiſan, into which places the Pyſans (being not ſtrong enough to make reſiſtance againſt the whole) had withdrawne their forces: Touching the king, the doinges of the Pyſans did nothing diſpleaſe him, and much leſſe was the maner of their proceedings diſagreeing from the eſtate of his endes and purpoſes: Their cauſe was apparantly fauored of many of his court, induced perhaps by a compaſſion that they had bene ſtraitely gouerned by the Florentyns, the ſame notwithſtanding being more in opinion then in truth: But ſome of the chiefeſt both in his councells and of his court, vnder thoccaſion to pitie the Pyſans, obiected them ſelues againſt the Cardinall of S. Mallo being wholly for the Florentyns: of theſe was principall the Seneſhall of Beaucaire, with whom the money of the Pyſans had much preuailed, but much more the diſcontentment he had of the greatnes of the Cardinall, from whom (according to the variations of Court) he beganne to be eſtranged & ſeparate, being moued with the ſelfe ſame ambicion to embaſe him, with the which he had rayſed him in the beginning: Theſe men not hauing reſpect to that which concerned the honor & promiſed faith of ſo great a king, perſwaded that it agreed beſt with the profit and eſtate of his other enterpriſes, to keepe the Florentyns in this neceſſitie, and not to moderat the doings of the Pyſans, at the leaſt til he had made perfect his expedicion vpon the realme of Naples: The king caried with theſe perſwaſions, framed him ſelfe to enterteyne both the one and other partie with ſeuerall hopes, And therefore whileſt he remeyned yet at Rome, he called for thembaſſadors of Florence to heare in his preſence the complaints made to him by the Pyſans, for whom ſpake Burgundio Loli Citiſen of Pyſa, and aduocate of the conſiſtorie in the Court of Rome: he complayned bitterly that the Pyſans had bene holden foureskore yeares in ſuch an vniuſt and cruell ſeruitude, that that citie, which with many honorable victories heretofore had ſtretched out her iuriſdiction euen to the partes of Leuant, & had bene alwayes one of the moſt mighty and glorious members of all Italy, was now by the ſeueritie and couetouſnes of the Florentyns come to her laſt deſolacion: That the towne of Pyſa was almoſt made naked of inhabitants, for that the moſt parte of the naturall and free borne Citiſens, not able to beare ſo heauy yokes, had willingly abandoned the place of their patrimonie, poſſeſſions, and delites, whoſe councell hath bene proued wiſe by the miſeries of others, whom the loue of their contrey hath made to abyde to ſerue as a wretched ſpectacle to all eyes of pitie, conſcience, or humanitie: That they, for the great exactions of the Magiſtrates, and inſolent robberies of perſons priuate, were diſpoyled almoſt of all their ſubſtance, and yet in no libertie nor way to nouriſh their liues, for that with a tyrannie and iniuſtice ſtraunge and barbarous, they were forbidden to manage trades of marchandiſe, or to exerciſe any art except of the hande: They had no acceſſe or function in any office of qualitie, nor in the adminiſtracion of the gouernment of Florence, no not in thinges which were transferred to perſons ſtraunge and forreine: That the Florentyns by many arguments exerciſed all ſortes of crueltie againſt the health and benefite of their liues, And to haue a more ready way to their generall deſtruction, they haue of late yeares ſhaked of an auncient and neceſſary care to preſerue the bankes and cawſeyes of the contrey of Pyſa, menteyned alwayes from age to age by the Lordes of that contrey with no ſmall ſtudie, for that otherwayes it was impoſſible, (ſeeing the ſhallownes of the contrey ſubiect to inundacions and water fludds) that they ſhould not be euery yere ſtricken with diuerſitie of diſeaſes: That by this decay, were made ruinat euen flat with

with the earth, churches, pallaices, with many honorable buildings both publike & priuate erected by their predeceſſors with no litle expenſe and charge: That it was no ſhame to particular cities or townes, if, after the raigne and courſe of many worldes they fell into ſeruitude, for that all mortall and earthly thinges beare their proper deſtinie and ſubiection to corruption: But the memorie of their nobilitie & greatnes, alwaies diſpoſed into the maieſtie of a gouernment and common weale ought to breede in the ſpirites of conquerors more compaſſion then rigor, chiefly euery one hauing to conſider that it is not onely in the power of time, but alſo incident to the iuſt courſe and deſtinie of earthly thinges, to bring vppon them the ſelfe ſame ende which is ordeyned to happen to all other cities and Empires: That in the Pyſans there reſted no more, wherein the inhumanitie and inſatiable couetouſnes of the Florentyns coulde be exerciſed with further ſkoape: And therefore the yoke of thoſe burdens bearing a waight aboue their ſtrength, & the varietie of their miſeries ſo infinit and intollerable, they had with one minde determined, rather to abandon their contrey, to giue vp their liues, and to forbeare the vſe, ſocietie, and delite of their goods, friendes, and kinred, then to returne eftſoones vnder ſo vniuſt, ſo tyrannous, and ſo vile a gouernment: beſeching laſtly the king with teares (which he beſought him to imagine to be the plentifull teares of the whole people of Pyſa miſerably proſtrate at his feete) to remember that, with the ſame pietie, with the ſame iuſtice, and with the ſame religion and conſcience, he had reſtored them to that libertie, of the which they had bene ſo vniuſtly deſpoyled: he would eftſoones as a Prince reſolut and conſtant, defend and keepe them in the ſame benefit, ſeeing the election was more honorable, more godly, more worthie his name & greatnes, to beare the name of the father and deliuerer of this citie ſo auncient and innocent, then in redeliuering it vp into a ſeruitude ſo wretched, to become the infamous miniſter of the robberies, oppreſſions, and tyrannies of the prowd Florentyns. To theſe accuſements aunſwered, with no leſſe vehemencie, Frauncis Soderyn Biſhop of Volterre, afterwards made Cardinall, and at that time one of the Embaſſadors for Florence: He ſhowed that the title of his common weale was iuſte, for that they had bought Pyſa in the yeare 1404. of Gabriel Maria Viſcounte the lawfull Lord, by whom they were no ſooner put in poſſeſſion of their purchaſſe, then the Pyſans redeliuered them ſelues by force: By which occaſion they were driuen to ſeeke to reconquer it by a long warre, whoſe ende was no leſſe proſperous, then the occaſion was iuſt, and no leſſe praiſe worthy the humanitie of the Florentyns, then the victorie glorious: for that hauing in their diſcreſſions to periſh all the people of Pyſa (languiſhing already with hunger) when they entred with their armie into the citie, they brought with them a greater quantitie of vittells then of weapons: And ſo in place to take away their liues by iuſt law of conqueſt and victorie, they breathed new liues with their refreſhing and vittells, into bodies miſerable and not worthy of life: That the citie of Pyſa at no time had obteyned any greatnes in the firme lande, and much leſſe had bene able in power to winne forreine and ſtraunge peeces, ſeeing they could neuer make them ſelues Lordes ouer Lucques, A citie communicating with them in neare neighbourhed and borders: but they ſtoode alwayes reſtrayned and incloſed in a ſtrait territorie, not ſeeking to make their fortune greater then was their vertue: And for their power at ſea, neither hath it bene ſo mighty as there is left any monument of it, nor of ſuch continuance as it hath any preſcription of time: for that, by the iuſt iudgement of God, whom they had prouoked by many actes of prophane impietie, and for a skourge of the longe ciuill diſcordes amongeſt them ſelues, it was

Rome

Rome, the Cardinall of S. Mallo as Embaſſador to Florence, making as though he ſent him thether to ſatisfie their demaundes: But in ſecret he charged him that, nouriſhing them with hopes till they had made payment of the money, he ſhould leaue thinges in the ſame eſtate: of which ſhifte of time, albeit the Florentyns made ſufficient dowt, yet they aduaunced xl. thowſand duckats afore the tearme, which aſſoone as the Cardinall had receiued, he went to Pyſa, promiſing to recontinue the poſſeſſion of the eſtate to the Florentyns: But he made a ſpeedy returne without any effect of his promiſe, and leſſe aunſwering the expectacion of them of Florence, afore whom he excuſed him ſelf by the obſtinacie of the Pyſans, & that being not able of him ſelf to diſpoſe them, his authoritie was leſſe ſufficient to conſtrayne them, hauing no expreſſe commiſſion from the king: Laſtly it was not conuenient for him being of holy profeſſion, to take or followe any councell whereon might ariſe effuſion of Chriſtian bludd: yet he beſtowed a new garriſon within the new Citadell, and had done the like in the olde caſtell, if he could haue got the conſent of the Pyſans, who grewe daily more and more in courage and forces by the ſecret helping of the Duke of Myllan, who iudging it neceſſary, that there ſhould be within Pyſa a greater ſtrength and a leader of experience & vallour, had ſent to them (couering him ſelfe notwithſtanding as he was wont with the name of the Genouuays) Luke Mauuezze, with newe bandes and companies: And letting paſſe no occaſion that might keepe the Florentyns in buſines the better to holde them from offending the Pyſans, he interteyned into pay in common with the Siennoys, Iacques d'Appian Lord of Plombyn, and John Sauelle, the rather to encourage the ſayd people of Sienna to defend Montpulcian, a place newly reuolted from the Florentyns, & accepted by them of Sienna, without hauing regarde to the confederacion which they had together: At the ſame time alſo the Florentyns were in no leſſe care and trauell for ſuddeine buſines newly hapned within the citie: for immediatly after the king was departed from Florence, the better to reeſtabliſh their gouernment, they had in their parliament (which in their cuſtom is a congregacion aſſembled of all the citiſens in the place before the townehouſe, who deliberat with free voyce vpon matters propownded by the great Magiſtrat) inſtituted a kind of pollicie, which, vnder the name of a gouernment popular tended in many thinges, more to the power of a fewe, then of euery one in generall: The which being greeuous to many, who faſhioned in their mindes a greater libertie, and hauing the priuat ambicion of ſome one of the principall Citiſens concurring, there was neceſſitie to diſpute vpon a new forme of gouernment, wherin as it was commoned vpon one day amongeſt the principall Magiſtrates and perſons of greateſt reputacion, Paulo Anthony Soderyn, a Citiſen, wiſe and much reſpected, deliuered his opinion in this ſort.

P. Anth. Soderin reaſoneth touching a forme of gouernment for Florence.

Albeit the eſtate popular is leſſe eſteemed then that wherein thinges are referred to one alone, or gouerned by the directions of graue men: yet, for that the deſire of libertie is a deſire auncient and almoſt naturall in this citie, and the condicions and eſtate of our Citiſens are equally proporcioned, which is a neceſſary ground of popular gouernments: I might mainteyne by eaſie and reaſonable diſcourſe, that it ought to be preferred before all other, were it not that the diſputacion would be ſuperfluous, ſeeing in all our aſſemblies ſince the parliament, it hath bene alwayes determined by a conſent vniuerſall, that the citie ſhould be gouerned in the name and with thauthoritie of the people: But the diuerſitie of opinions is riſen vppon this, that certeine particulars, in things ordeyned in the parliament, ſeeke to come neare and reſemble that forme of common weale, vnder the which the citie was gouerned »

" before our libertie was oppreſſed by the familie of the Medicis and others,(of which " nomber I confeſſe I am) ſuppoſing that the gouernment ſo eſtabliſhed, bare in ma" ny thinges rather the name then theffects of a pollicie popular, and fearing thacci-
" dents which often happen by like gouernments, deſire a forme more perfect and " more regarding the preſeruacion and protection of the concord and ſewertie of the " citiſens: A thing which neither by reaſon, nor experience of times paſſed, can be " hoped for in this citie, but vnder a gouernment depending alltogether vppon the " power of the people ſo that it be well and duely ordeyned and regulated, which " thing conſiſtes principally in two foundacions: The firſt is, that all miniſtracions
" and offices aſwell in the citie as thorow the whole demeane,be giuen(for a certeine
" time) by a councell vniuerſall, which according to our lawes may participat in the " gouernment,without the approbacion of which councell,new lawes can not be e" ſtabliſhed: By this meane,not being in the power of citiſens priuate, nor of any par" ticular faction or intelligence to diſtribute dignities & authorities,No man ſhall be " excluded by paſſion or partialitie of others, but offices ſhall be beſtowed according " to the vertues and merits of men: And vertue bearing this propertie to transferre
" dignities to thoſe perſons to whom her ſelfe is conioyned, it will be a meane & en" couragement to euery one to ſtriue by his vertues and good partes, with the ayde
" publike and priuate,to open his way to honors and reputacion: it ſhall be neceſſary
" that euery one abſteyne from vices,and forbeare to hurt one an other,and finally eſ-
" chew both the ſtudy & action of all hateful thinges in a citie wel inſtituted. And it " can not be in the power of one or a fewe to introduce with newe lawes, or with au-" thoritie of a Magiſtrate,an other gouernment, this being not to be chaunged, but " by the will and priuitie of the councell vniuerſall. The ſecond ground is,that the de" liberacions and councells of importance,ſuch as apperteyne to peace and warre,to
" the conſtruing and examinacion of newe lawes, and generally to all thinges neceſ-
" ſary for thadminiſtracion of ſuch a citie or empire,be managed by Magiſtrates par" ticularly appoynted to that charge, and by a councell more priuate compownded
" of wiſe and experienced citiſens to be deputed and ordeined by the councell popu" lar: for that the knowledge and iudgement of ſuch affayres,falling not familiarly in-
" to thunderſtanding of euery one, it is neceſſary they be gouerned by ſuch as are ca" pable to them,And requiring oftentymes diligence and ſecrecie, they are not to be " conſulted or communicated with the multitude,as not being neceſſary for the pre-
" ſeruacion of the publike libertie,that ſuch thinges be handled in too great audience
" and companie,ſeeing the libertie is aſſured as often as the diſtribucion of Magiſtra-
" cies,and deliberacion of new lawes, depende of the vniuerſall conſent: Theſe two
" foundacions thus layed,you haue a true popular gouernment ordeyned,the libertie
" of the citie grounded,and a perpetuall and commendable forme of common weale
" confirmed. There be many other thinges which tende to make this gouernment
" more perfect,but they are referred more conueniently to an other tyme, to thende
" not to confound in this beginning the mindes of men,which both ſuſpicious by the " memorie of tyrannies paſt,and not accuſtomed to manage gouernments free, can " not wholly knowe all things neceſſary to be ordeyned for preſeruacion of the liber-
" tie: and there be thinges, which for their litle importance and conſideracion, may " without daunger be differred vntill a tyme more apt and better occaſion. No dowte,
" the citiſens will embrace more and more this forme of common weale, and being
" by experience,made daily more capable of the truth, they can not but deſire that " their gouernment be polliſhed and brought to his full perfection: Neither can it

but

but be susteyned and holden vp by these two foundacions, which, how easie it is to lay and establish, and what frute they bring, is not to be proued onely by many reasons, but also appeares plainely by examples: for, albeit the gouernment of the Venetians standes properly vpon gentlemen, those gentlemen yet are no other then citisens priuat, and what for their numbers, so many, and for their condicions so diuerse, it can not be denied that it doth not much participat with a gouernment popular, although in many thinges it can not be imitated of vs: and yet it is principally founded vpon these two pillers and bases, by the which hauing bene continued by many ages, together with a libertie, vnitie, and concord ciuil, it is risen to the glory and greatnes which the world seeth: The vnitie & strength of the Venetians hath not growen as many suppose, by their scituacion, for that in the same may be and haue bene many discordes and sedicions: But it hath proceeded for that they had a forme of pollicie so wel sorted & proporcioned to it selfe, that necessarily it brought forth precious and wonderfull effectes, agreeable to the firme and sownd foundacions. Our owne examples ought to moue vs no lesse then straungers, if we consider in the contrary, that becawse our city had neuer a forme of gouernment like vnto this, it was the cause that our estate and affayres haue bene so subiect to ordinary mutacions, sometimes troden vnder feete by the violence of tyrantes, & sometymes rent and dismembred by the ambicious and couetous discordes of certeine particulars, and sometimes confounded by the vnbridled libertie of the cōmunaltie: Insomuch that where cities were built for the rest and happy life of thinhabitantes, our tranquilletie, our felicities, and our ioyes haue bene the confiskacion of our goods, with banishment and execucion of our miserable Citisens: The gouernment brought into the parliament, differeth not from the pollicies heretofore ordeyned in this citie, which being all infected with discordes and calamities, after infinit trauels both publike and priuat, they finally ingendred tyrannies, like as in the time of our aunce-stors for none other then these occasions, the Duke of Athens oppressed the libertie and in the times succeeding, Cosmo de medicis followed his example, whereof it is not to be maruelled: for, when the distribucion of Magistracies, and deliberacion of the lawes, haue not communitie with the common consent, but depend vpon tharbitracion of the lesser number: then the Citisens not carefull of the publike benefit, but seeking their profits and endes priuate, rise into sectes and conspiracies particular, whereunto are ioyned the diuisions of the whole citie, a plague most certeine to all common weales and Empires: So that it can not but be a greater discression to eschew those formes of gouernment which by reasons and examples in our selues we finde to be hurtfull, and draw neare to those pollicies which with the reasons and examples of others we discerne to be wholsom and happy. And thus much I take boldnes to auouch (the truth and sinceritie of the matter much enforcing me) that the pollicie of our citie ronning alwayes in that order that a fewe Citisens shal haue an vnmeasured authoritie, will proue to be a gouernment of a fewe tyrants, who wil be so much more daungerous then one tyrant alone, by how much the ill is great, & hurtes more, by how much it is multiplied: And if there should be none other ill or mischiefe at all, yet at leastwise, what for the diuersitie of opinions, and for thambicion and different couetousnes of men, there could be no expectacion of longe concorde: And discorde, as it is hurtfull in all seasons, so it would be most daungerous at this time, wherein you haue sent into exile one so mightie a Citisen, and wherein you stand depriued of one of the principallest partes of your estate: And lastly, Italy hauing euen in her harte and intralls forreine armies, standes on all sides inuironed with manifeſt perill: Albeit very ſeldom or poſſible, neuer it hath bene abſolutely in the power of all the citie to put order to it ſelfe according to our owne liking, yet ſeeing by the goodnes of God you haue that power, loſe not thoccaſion to inſtitute a free gouernment and ſo well erected, that not onely you ſhall be made happy by it whileſt you liue: but alſo may promiſe the ſame to your poſteritie, and leaue as an inheritance to your children ſuch a treaſure and felicitie, as your aunceſtors neuer had nor knewe.

To the contrary of this, did reaſon Guid'anthony Veſpucci, a lawer notable for his iudgment, and no leſſe ſingular for his facilitie and ſharpnes of witt: if the gouernment (ſayth he) inſtituted in the forme of Pavvle Antonyne Soderyn, would as eaſily bring forth the frutes that are deſired, as he hath liberally recounted them: ſewer we ſhould ſhow great corrupcion in iudgement, reaſon, and diſcreſſion, if we would wiſhe to our contrey any other ſort of pollicie, & right vnworthy ſhould we ſeeme of the reputacion and benefits of good Citiſens, if we would not embrace a forme of a common weale wherin the vertues, merits, and valours of men, ſhould be aboue all other thinges honored and recompenced: But I can not ſee how it may be hoped that a gouernment put wholly in the power of the people, can bring forth ſo many benefits: ſeeing no man dowtes but it is a leſſon in reaſon, a trial in experience, and an authoritie confirmed by great men, that in ſo great a multitude can not be found that diſcreſſion, that experience nor that order, as may be promiſed that they will preferre the wiſe afore the ignorant, the good afore the ill, and the experienced afore ſuch as neuer knew what it was to manage affayres: for, like as of a iudge incapable and ignorant can be no expectacion of iudgements righteous and iuſt: So, in a people full of confuſion and vanitie, is no hope (but at aduenture) of election or deliberacion wiſe or reaſonable: That which in publike gouernments wiſe men & ſuch as follow the ſtudie of no other affayres, can hardly diſcerne, let vs neuer beleue that a multitude vnexperienced, ignorant, compounded of ſo great diuerſitie of ſpirits, of condicions and cuſtoms, and wholly giuen to thinges that concerne them particularly, can diſtinguiſh and know it: Beſides, the immoderat perſwacion that euery one will haue of him ſelfe, will kindle in euery one a couetouſnes of honors, not ſufficing to men in popular gouernment to enioy the honeſt frutes of libertie, but they will aſpire all to the degrees principall, and ſeeke to haue place in the councells of things of moſt importance and hardnes, for that leſſe in vs then in any other citie, raigneth the modeſtie to giue place to ſuch as knowe moſt, and deſerue beſt: And ſo nouriſhing our ſelues with perſwaſion that of right we ought to be all equall in all thinges (the power reſting in the multitude) places of vertue, valour, and merit will be confounded, and this couetouſnes ſtretched out into the greateſt parte, will bring to paſſe that ſuch may doe moſt as know leaſt and merit leſſe, for that being moſt in number, they wil haue moſt power, opinions being rather compted then conſidered. Theſe thinges well waighed, what aſſurance is there, that contenting with the forme which now you would bring in, they would not immediatly fall to diſorder, and confound with inuentions new and lawes vndiſcreete which wiſe men could not reſiſt, the wayes to gouerne a common weale which had bene wiſely deliberated and eſtabliſhed: which thinges being daungerous at all times in ſuch a ſort of common weale, would bring farre more peril at this preſent, ſeeing it is the nature of men when they come out of one extremitie wherein they haue bene holden by force, to ronne with a ſwift courſe to an other extremitie without ſtaying in the middeſt: euen ſo, men drawne out of a tyrannie, if they be not reſtrayned, ronne headlong

headlong into an vnbridled libertie, which iuſtly may be called a tyrannie: Becauſe in theſe actions a people and multitude is like to a tyrant when he giueth where is no cauſe of meritt, and taketh from him that hath well deſerued, confounding the degrees and diſtinctions of perſons, yea happly their tyrannie is ſo much the more hurtfull, by how much their ignorance (conteyning neither waight, meaſure, nor lawe) is greater then the malignitie, which yet perhapps is gouerned by ſome rule, with ſome bridle, or ſubiect to ſome limit: We ought not much to be moued with the example of the Venetians, for that in their behalfe the ſcituacion makes ſome thing, and the forme of gouernment receiued of long time may doe much, togither with the order and diſpoſicion of thinges ruled in ſuch ſort that the councells of importance reſt more in the power of a fewe then of many, and their ſpirits happely not being by nature ſo ſuttle as ours, they are more eaſie to be kept quiet and contented: Beſides, the pollicie of the Venetians ſtandes not onely vpon the two foundacions that haue bene conſidered, but for their perfection and firmenes it imports much that they haue a Duke perpetual, with many other ordenaunces, which who would introduce into this common weale, ſhould ſeeme to bring in innouacions & find many reſiſtances, ſeeing our citie takes not nowe her being, nor at this preſent the firſt time of her inſtitucion: And therefore auncient cuſtoms impugning often times common profit, and men ſuſpecting that vnder cooler of preſeruacion of the libertie there would be raiſed a new tyrannie, wholſom councels wil be of litle force, euen as in a body infected & repleniſhed with ill humors, medicines are not of that ſeruice, as in a body purged: for which reaſons, & for the nature of humane things which commonly goe impairing, it is more to be feared that that which in this beginning ſhall be imperfectly ordeyned, will be wholly diſordered with time, then to hope that by time and with occaſions, it may be reduced to perfection: we haue examples of our owne and neede not the iuſtificacion of authorities and experiences of others: for, at what time hath the people gouerned abſolutely this citie, that it hath not bene full of diſcordes, that it hath not ſuffered deformitie & diſmembring, and laſtly that the ſtate hath not immediatly chaunged: And if we ſtande ſo much vpon the examples of others, why do we not remember, that the gouernmēt wholly popular, bredd in Rome ſo many tumultes, that had it not bene for the ſcience, diligence, and diſcipline of warre, the life of that common weale had bene ſhort: Let vs remember that Athens a moſt floriſhing and mighty citie, loſt not for other occaſion her Empire and ſo fell into ſeruitude of the Citiſens and ſtraungers, then for that they did diſpoſe of great affayres with the deliberacions and councells of the communaltie: But I ſee not for what occaſion it may be ſayd, that in the forme introduced in the parliament the libertie is not there wholly founde, ſeeing all thinges are referred to the diſpoſicion of Magiſtrates, and they not perpetuall, but chaunging, are not elected of few, but approued of many, & ought according to thauncient cuſtom of the citie to be referred to tharbytrement of the lott: then they can not be diſtributed by factions, or by the appetite of citiſens particular: we ſhall haue a farre greater aſſurance when the affaires of moſt importance ſhall paſſe by thexaminacion and direction of the moſt wiſe, the moſt practiſed, and moſt graue men, who are to manage and gouerne them with an other order, an other ſecrecie, and an other iudgement, then would be expreſſed in a multitude or communaltie incapable of ſuch thinges, ſome times when is leaſt neede prodigall in expenſes, and eftſoones in buſines great and waighty, ſo ſparing and reſtrained, that often times for ſauing a very litle, they fall into great expenſes and daungers, euen as men that leaping ouer

" a great blocke, ſtumble vpon a litle ſtrawe: In deede as P. Anthoyne hath ſayd, thin-
" firmity of Italy, and particularly of our contrey, is great and of no litle conſideracion,
" euen ſo the folly is ſo much the greater, when hauing neede of Phiſicions experien" ced and wiſe, we will put our bodies into the handes of ſuch as haue leaſt skill and " diſcreſſion: Laſtly, you haue to conſider that you ſhall mainteyne your people in " greater reſt, and leade them moſt eaſily to councells wholſom both for them ſelues,
" and to the benefit of euery one, in giuing them in the common weale a moderate
" part and authoritie, ſeeing if you referre all thinges to their arbitracion, there will be
" daunger that they will become inſolent and wholly diſagreeing from the councells
" of your wiſe, carefull, and affectioned citiſens.

Iero. Sauonarola eſteemed for a prophet in Florence.

In this councell, whereunto was not admitted the great number of citiſens, the aduiſe then tended to a forme of gouernment not ſo large and popular, had caried it, if amongeſt the deliberacions of men, there had not bene mixed authoritie diuine pronounced by the mouth of Ieronimo Sauonarola a religious man of thorder of frear preachers. This man hauing bene continually exerciſed for many yeares in the publike preaching of Gods word at Florence, and hauing ioyned to his ſingular doctrine, a generall brute of holines of life, had gotten in the opinion of moſt part of the people, the name and authoritie of a Prophet: for that at times wherein in Italy was no other apparance in mans reaſon, then of common tranquillitie, he would in his ſermons prophecie of the comming of forreine armies, with ſo great aſtoniſhment of men that neither walls nor camps were able to reſiſt them: which thinges with many others of other nature, he would aſſure that he did not foretell by diſcourſe humane, or knowledge of the Scriptures, but ſimply did foreſee them by reuelacion diuine: In theſe wonders & warnings he would ſometimes touch the mutacion of the ſtate of Florence: At that time he deteſted publikely the forme of gouernment agreed vpon in the parliament, affirming that it was the will and pleaſure of God that they did erect a pollicy mearely popular, in ſort that there ſhould not be power in a few citiſens to alter nether the ſewertie nor the libertie of the reſidue: inſo much that for the reuerẽce of one ſo great a name, ioined to the deſire of many, ſuch as were of thother opinion, ſhould not be able to reſiſt ſo great an inclinacion: Therfore this matter being many times propounded and debated, it was laſtly determined, that there ſhould be made a councel of all the citiſens, wherein ſhould haue no acceſſe (ſo it was ſpredd in many places in Italy) the dreggs of the people, but onely ſuch as by the auncient lawes of the citie might participate in the gouernment. In this councell ſhould not be hãdled nor they ſhould not diſpoſe of other things then of the election of all the Magiſtrates for the city & for the demeane, & of the confirmacion of prouiſions of money, together with all the lawes ordeyned before by the Magiſtrates and other councells more priuat and ſtraite: And to thende that thoccaſions of ciuill diſcordes ſhoulde be taken away, and the ſpiritts of euery one the more aſſured, it was prohibited by decree publike according to thexample of thaueniens, not to remember the errors and tranſgreſſions committed in the tymes paſt in thaffayres of eſtate: vpon which foundacions, might perhapps haue bene conſtituted a gouernment well regulated and eſtabliſhed, if at the ſame time they had introduced all the ordenances which then came into the conſideracion of wiſe men. But ſuch thinges being not able to be deliberated without the conſent of many who for the memorie of thinges paſt were full of ſuſpicions: it was iudged and determined that for the preſent, the grand councell ſhoulde be eſtabliſhed as a ground and foundacion of the newe libertie, referring to accompliſh that which wanted vntill a better oportunitie of time,and vntill (by the meane of experience) the publike vtilitie ſhould be knowne of ſuch as had no capacitie to knowe it by reaſon and iudgement: This was the courſe & condicion of thaffayres of Tuskane.But in this meane while,the french king,after he had with a ready fortune conquered the citie of Naples,to giue a full perfection to his victorie, he had principally to looke to remoue two impediments:The one how he might get new caſtel,and the caſtell of the egge, which are two fortreſſes of Naples,holding good yet for Ferdinand,but for the towne of S.Vincent,builded for the garde of the hauen, he had it without much reſiſtance: his other conſideracion was how he might reduce the whole kingdom to his obedience: In which two thinges fortune ſtill followed him with a full ſayle of her fauors,for,new caſtel,the habitacion of the kinges builded vpon the banke or ſhoares of the ſea, by the couetouſnes and cowardiſe of fiue hundred launceknightes holding garriſon there, was rendred with condicion that they might departe in ſafetie with all the goods and moueables they were able to cary: In this caſtell was founde great quantities of vittells,whereof the king without conſideracion to that might happen,made prodigall liberalities to certeyne of his owne people: And touching the caſtell called the egge, built within the ſea vpon a rocke, afore tymes parcell of the firme lande,but now deuided from it by the operacion of Lucullus, was ioyned with a narrow bridge to the next brinkes or ſhoares of Naples:they within the rocke, ſeeing them ſelues battered without ceaſing with a perpetuall furie of thartillerie, which might well ſhake the walls, but nothing moue the naturall rocke, agreed to yeld vp the place,if within viij. dayes they were not ſuccored: The Barons alſo and gouernors of communalties, would goe many dayes iorneyes to meete the french capteines and companies of ſouldiers ſent into ſundry partes of the realme: whoſe example in yelding, and the humanitie and inclinacion of the french in receiuing them, bredd ſuch a generall minde of reuolt in cities,fortes,and peeces particular, that almoſt all the places of ſtrength were rendred by thoſe that kept them, either with no reſiſtance at all, or at leaſt without perill or difficultie: yea the rocke of Caietta notwithſtanding it was made ſtronge with men, vittells, munition, and other thinges neceſſary for defence,yet after a few light aſſaults,it yelded to the diſcreſſion of the victors: This felicitie of the king followed with ſo full ſtreame,that within a very few dayes,and with a wonderfull facilitie,all the kingdom was brought into his obedience, except the yle of Yſchia,the caſtells of Bronduſia and Galipoly in Powylla, and in Calabria the rocke of Regge, ſcituate in the poynt of Italy right ouer againſt Sicile,the citie holding for the king: and except alſo Turpia and Mantia, who in the beginning diſplayed the banners of Fraunce, but refuſing to liue vnder the ſubiection of others then the king, who had already diſpoſed them to certeyne of his fauorits,they chaunged councell, and returned to their firſt Lorde: The like was done within a litle tyme after by the citie of Bronduſa,to the which the french king hauing ſent no men, but vſing negligence where was neceſſitie of care and councell, did skarcely heare their Magiſtrates ſent to him to Naples to capitulat: by which occaſion ioyning with thoportunitie offered, thoſe that kept the caſtells in the name of Ferdinand,had good meane by perſwaſions to draw agayne the citie to the deuocion of the Aragons: by which example alſo, the citie of Otrante lately declared for the french,& no creature ſent thether to receiue them, continued not long in their affection: All the Lordes and Barons of the realme (except Alphonſo Daualo Marquiſſ of Piſquire,who left within new caſtell by Ferdinand, was gone to him when he perceiued the inclinacion of the launceknightes to yeld:and except two others,who

for that the french king had giuen away their eſtates, were fled into Sicile) came to doe homage to the new king: who, deſiring to aſſure wholly ſo great a conqueſt by the way of concorde, called afore him vnder ſafeconduit afore he had wonne the rocke of the egge, Dom Federyk, who, aſwell for that he had remeyned many yeares in the court of Fraunce in the tyme of the kinges father, as alſo for that he touched his maieſtie in parentage, was much fauored of all the Lordes of Fraunce. The king told him, he would indue Ferdinand (leauing all that was his in the realme of Naples) with eſtates and large reuenues in Fraunce: And touching him, to recompenſe him liberally with all that he poſſeſſed there: But Federyk, well knowing that his nephew was determined to accept no condicion, except he might haue Calabria, aunſwered with a countenance of humilitie and reuerence, and wordes graue and wiſe: That ſeeing God, fortune, and the good wills of men haue concurred in his preſent felicities to giue him the kingdom of Naples, Ferdinand was not determined to make reſiſtance againſt ſo fatall a diſpoſicion: but, rather eſteeming it no ſhame to giue place to a king ſo happy and mighty, he would no leſſe then others, remeyne in his obedience and deuocion, ſo that his maieſtie would contribute to him ſome parte of the kingdome (touching Calabria by a ſecret meaning) to thende that dwelling therein not as king, but in the condicion of one of his Barons, he might honor the clemencie and magnanimitie of the french king, in whoſe ſeruice he hoped to haue once occaſion to ſhowe that vertue which his malicious fortune would not ſuffer him to expreſſe in the action of his owne ſafetie: That, nothing could turne more to the glorie of king Charles then that councell, bearing reſemblance and affinitie with the councells of thoſe kinges whom antiquitie doth ſo much recommend vnto vs, who, by ſuch operacions had rayſed their names to immortalitie, and eſtabliſhed amongeſt peoples and nations, diuine honors: That, it was a councell no leſſe for his ſewertie then for his glorie, for that Ferdinand brought to his deuocion, the realme would be ſo aſſured to him, that he ſhould not hereafter feare the chaunge " of fortune, who had this common propertie: that as often as victories were not aſſu- " red with moderacion and diſcreſſion, ſhe would defile by ſome accident vnlooked " for, the vertue and reputacion of the glory gotten. But the king dowting that if he communicated any parte of the kingdome with his competitor, he ſhoulde open a waye to manifeſt perill for the reſidue, Dom Federyk parted from him without any thing doing: Ferdinand, vnderſtanding of the rendring of the caſtells, ſayled into Sicile with xiiij. light gallyes ſlenderly appoynted, wherein he paſſed from Naples: This he did to be ready vpon all occaſions, leauing the gard of the rocke of Yſchia to Ianick Danalo brother to Alphonſo, both men of great vallour, and of ſingular faith towards their Lord: But the french king, to take from thennemie that receptacle very conuenient to trouble the realme, ſent thether his armie by ſea, which arriued at length in the port of Naples, and finding the towne abandoned, they forbare to aſſaile the rocke, wherein, for his inuincible ſtrength by ſcituacion, they diſcerned many impoſſibilities to preuayle: And therefore, to giue a greater helpe to their vertue, the king determined to aſſemble all the veſſells of Prouence and of Genes, to take Yſchia, and aſſure the ſea which Ferdinand vexed ſome tymes: But their councel and diligence were not equall to their fortune, ſeeing, according to thinfirmitie of all their doings, all thinges had a ſlow proceeding, and were guided in moſt great negligence and confuſion: for, the french king turning the proſperitie of his affayres to ſerue his vanities, his companies in like ſort, by ſo great felicitie became more inſolent then of cuſtom, and let goe at aduenture thaffayres of importance, not receyuing uing into their thoughts any other impreſſion then of feaſting and pleaſures: And ſuch as were great in the councells and fauors of the king, cared not but for their owne particular, and to draw of the victory all the profit they could, without reſpecting the dignitie or vtilitie of their Prince.

The death of Ge. Otto a Turke, and kept in refuge by the Pope.

About this tyme dyed at Naples Gemyn Otto to the great diſpleaſure of the king, who layed vp in him many foundacions and oportunities for the warre he determined to make againſt the Empire of the Turkes: It was beleued his death was brued in a cup of poyſon which the Pope had giuen him to worke his ende in a certein tyme: or that hauing deliuered him againſt his wil, and ſo depriued of the xl. thowſand duckats which his brother payed him yearely, he tooke for conſolacion that he that had taken him away, ſhould receiue by him no commoditie or profit: or at leaſt for enuy he bare to the glory of the french king: or laſtly for feare, that thinges ſucceeding happily with him againſt the Infidells, he would not afterwards turne his thoughtes to reforme the abuſes of the Church, which being wholy alyened from the auncient deuocion, cuſtoms, & pietie, made euery day of leſſe authoritie the religion of Chriſt, euery one withall hauing an aſſured expectacion that they would further decline before the ende of his raigne, which being gotten by wicked meanes, was happly neuer in the memorie of men adminiſtred with worſe orders: And there were that beleued (for the corrupt nature of the Pope made credible in him all wickednes) that Baiazet after he vnderſtoode that the french king prepared to paſſe into Italy, practiſed with him by the meane of George Bucciardin corrupted with money, to oppreſſe the life of Gemyn: And yet the king (nouriſhing ſtill his inclinacion to the warres of the Turkes, more vppon a greene humor of youth and volubilitie of minde, then by maturitie of councell) ceaſed not for his death to ſend into Greece tharbiſhop of Duraz of the nation of Albania, who put the king in hopes by the meanes of certeine factions of the baniſhed and other vayne intelligences, to ſtirre vp ſome commocion in that prouince: But new accidents conſtrained him to turne his ſpirits to new thoughtes.

Lodo. Sforce beginneth too late to feare the greatnes of the french.

It hath bene ſet downe before, how the deſire to vſurpe the Duchie of Myllan, ioyned to a feare that Lodouvvyk Sforce had of the Aragons and Peter de medicis, induced him to procure the french king to paſſe into Italy, by whoſe comming after he had obteined his ambicious pretence, and that the Aragons were brought into thoſe neceſſities, that there was no abilitie remeyning to defend their propper ſafetie: A ſecond feare both more great and reaſonable then the firſt, beganne to occupie his thoughtes, his eyes, and all his ſenſes: that was the ſeruitude and thraldom houering ouer him, and all th Italians, if the kingdom of Naples were ioyned to the power of the crowne of Fraunce, deſiring for that cauſe (as hath bene noted) that by the Florentyns ſhould be obiected many difficulties and impediments againſt the reſolucion of his enterpriſe. But when he ſaw his maieſtie was eaſily ioyned with that common weale, & with the ſame facilitie had ouercome all thimpediments of the Pope, and laſtly without reſiſtance had preuayled ouer the realme of Naples, the daunger ſemed euery day ſo much the greater to him, by how much the courſe of the french victories aduaunced more and more with facilitie, fortune and felicitie: A like feare alſo began to ſtirre in the mindes of the Senat of Venice, who in all their councells hetherunto had cõſtantly perſeuered in newtralitie, gouerning their abſtinence with ſo great diſcreſſion no leſſe in action then in demõſtracion, that there was no meane to ſuſpect their inclinacion more to one partie then to an other: They had for Embaſſadors with the king Anthony Loredan and Dominick Treuiſan, albeit they lingered

ſo long to ſend them, that the king was not onely paſſed the mountes, but arriued at Florence afore they were preſented to him: But now looking with iudgement and ſtudie into the violent courſe of ſo great felicities, his armies ronning like a thunder, without reſiſtance thorow all Italy, they beganne to eſteeme as their owne, the domage of their neighbours, and to feare that in the ruine of others, their deſtruction were not conſpired, But chiefly the king hauing made him ſelfe Lorde of Pyſa and other fortreſſes of the Florentyns, leauing garriſon in Sienna, and almoſt wonne the like imperie in the ſtate of the Church: they conſtrued all to arguments abſolute, that the ambicion of his thoughtes was not limited within the realme and rule of Naples: for theſe cauſes the Senat gaue willing eare to the perſwaſions of Lodovvyk Sforce, who aſſoone as the Florentyns had yelded to the king, had begonne to ſolicite them to ioyne with him in a common remedie againſt common daungers: wherein it was beleued that if the french king had met with any impedimentes eyther at Rome, or at his entrye into the realme of Naples, they had together taken armes againſt him: But the kinges fortune preuented their councells, and in his victorie was more ſuddeinnes & expedicion, then in all thimpediments that could be obiected. The king alſo, dowting of the practiſes and factions of Lodovvyk, had reteyned in his pay ſince the conqueſt of Naples, John Iacques Triuulce with an hundred launces vnder a penſion worthy and honorable, and ioyned vnto him with many promiſes the Cardinall Fregoſa and Obietto de Fieſque: the one for that they were mighty inſtruments to trouble and rayſe emotions in the towne of Genes: and the other, for that being a chiefe leader of the Guelffes faction at Myllan, caried a minde much deuided from Lodovvyk: To whom as yet the king refuſed to giue the principallitie of Tarenta, ſaying his bonde had no force till he had reduced into his power all the realme of Naples: Theſe thinges being bitterly diſpleaſing to Lodovvyk, he reſtrayned twelue gallyes which were armed for the king at Genes, and denownced the appoynting of any more veſſells there for the french ſeruice, which the king complayned to be the cauſe that he did not eſtſoones reaſſayle with a new ſupply the rocke of Yſchia.

Thus ſuſpicions and diſdaynes growing on all partes, and the ſuddeine conqueſt of Naples repreſenting to the Venetians and the Duke of Myllan the preſent perill of their eſtates: they were conſtrayned to ioyne vertue to their councells, and deferre no longer to put their thoughtes in execucion: wherein, for the furthering of their reſolucion & courage, they had the conſideracion of the mighty companies of confederats: for that to this the Pope was no leſſe ready (to whom the greatnes of the french was fearefull and ſuſpicious) then Maximylian king of Romaines wholly diſpoſed, to whome aboue all other for many occaſions of hatred to the crowne of Fraunce, and for the many iniuries receiued by the king raygning, the proſperities of Fraunce were hatefull: But the chiefe groundes and foundacions whereuppon the Venetians and Lodovvyk wrought, were the King and Queene of Spayne, who being a litle before bownd to the french king (not for other reſpect then to draw from him the earledom of Roſſillion) not to hinder him in the conqueſt of Naples, had conningly reſerued to them ſelues till that tyme a free power to doe the contrary: for, (if their brutes be true) there was a clauſe annexed to the capitulacions made for the reſtitucion of the Earledom of Roſſillion, which bare that they ſhould not be bownd to any thing that touched the preiudice of the Church: of which exception they inferred, that if the Pope, for thintereſt of his chiefe, deſired them to ſuccor the realme of Naples, they had good right to doe ſo, without breaking their faith, or corrupting rupting their promiſes: To this they added afterwards, that by the ſame capitulacions they were forbidden to oppoſe them ſelues againſt king Charles, in caſe it appeared that the ſame kingdom did iudicially apperteyne vnto him: But what difference ſo euer was betwene the truth and their conſtructions of thinges, it is certeyne, that hauing got that they deſired, they beganne not onely to giue hope to the ſuccors of them of Aragon, and ſecretly to ſolicite the Pope not to abandon their cauſe, but alſo, as they had in the beginning exhorted the french king with wordes moderat as louers of his glory and zealous to religion, to conuert his armies rather againſt Infidells then the Chriſtian nations: So they continued eſtſoones that courſe, but with ſo much more efficacie and wordes ſuſpected, by howe much the victorie of the king aduaunced and flouriſhed: And to thende they might couer their doinges with more authoritie, and to nouriſh in greater hopes the Pope and th Aragons, (and of the other parte giuing out a brute that they had regard onely to the gard of Sicily) they were ready to ſende thether an armie by ſea, which arriued there after the loſſe of Naples, but yet with an equipage and furniture more in demonſtracions then in effectes, for that it conteyned not aboue eight hundred horſemen mounted vpon iennets, and a thowſand footemen Spanyards: They vſed their apparances vntill the taking of Oſtia by the Collonnoys, and the threates of the french againſt the Pope gaue them a more honeſt occaſion to aduaunce that which they had faſhioned and reſolued in their mindes: And following their deuiſe to an action and beginning, they proteſted openly to the king whileſt he was at Florence by their Embaſſadors, that according to the office of Princes Chriſtian, they would take the defence & protection of the Pope, and the realme of Naples (A chief of the church of Rome) wherein hauing already begonne (aſſoone as they vnderſtoode of the fleeing of the Aragons) to negociat with the Venetians and the Duke of Myllan for confederacion, they eſtſoones ſolicited them with a new inſtance, to communicat with them for their common ſewertie againſt the french men.

So that, aſwell by the ſolicitacion of the king of Spayne, as occaſions of the tyme preſent, threatning indifferent perills to all the principalities in Italy: there was at length in the month of Aprill and in the citie of Venice where were th Embaſſadors of all thoſe Princes, contracted a confederacion betwene the Pope, the king of Romaines, the king of Spayne, the Venetians and the Duke of Myllan. The title and publicacion of this league was onely for the defence of the ſtates of one an other, reſeruing places to whoſoeuer would enter it with condicions reaſonable: But they all being of opinion that it was neceſſary ſo to temper thinges as the french king might not holde Naples, it was agreed in capitulacions more ſecrete, that the bandes of Spanyardes arriued in Sicily ſhould be a ſuccor for the recouering of that kingdom to Ferdinand of Aragon, who with a great hope in the wills of the people, labored to enter into Calabria: That the Venetians at the ſame tyme with their armie by ſea, ſhould aſſayle the ſea coaſtes of the ſayd kingdom: That the Duke of Myllan (to hinder ſuccors that might come out of Fraunce) ſhould doe what he could to get the citie of Aſt wherein was the Duke of Orleans with a very ſmall ſtrength: That to the kings of Romaines and Spayne ſhoulde be contributed by the other confederats a certeine quantitie of money, to thende that either of them ſhoulde make warre vppon the realme of Fraunce with a puiſſant armie: The confederats withall deſiring that all Italy would be vnited in the ſame concorde of will, made inſtance to the Florentyns and Duke of Ferrara to participat with this league: But the Duke being delt withall afore the league was publiſhed, refuſed to take armes againſt the french king, and yet,with an Italian ſuttlety he conſented that Dom Alphonſo his eldeſt ſonne ſhould take pay of the Duke of Myllan for cl.men at armes with title of Liefetenant ouer all his companies.

But the cauſe of the Florentyns was otherwiſe, hauing no leſſe iuſt occaſion to leaue the french king,then allured to the confederacion with many great offers: for that immediatly after the publicacion of the league, Lodovvyk offered them in the name of all the confederats (ſo that they would communicat in the league) all their forces to reſiſt the king, if, in his returne from Naples, he would vexe them, and to ioyne with them aſſoone as might be for the recouering of Pyſa and Lyuorne: And on thother ſide,they ſawe the kinge neither make reckoning of the promiſes he had giuen at Florence, and much leſſe had in the beginning reſtored them to the poſſeſſion of their townes, nor ſince the conqueſt of Naples redeliuered the caſtells of the ſame: They ſawe him make his fayth and othe inferior to the councells of thoſe, who,fauoring the cauſe of the Pyſans,perſwaded him that the Florentyns, aſſoone as they were reſtored would vnite with the other Italians: They ſaw alſo that notwithſtanding the great ſummes of money & other corrupcions which they had beſtowed vpon the Cardinall S.Mallovv,yet he reſiſted coldly ſuch as incenſed the king againſt them,as one that would not for the loue of the Florentyns come to contencion with the great ones of the kinges court: Aſwell in theſe cauſes general as in matters more particular,they found ill the king by demonſtracions manifeſt, that to the violacion of his faith,he had ioyned a careles eſtimacion of them, their merits,and amities,in ſo much that one day their Embaſſadors complayning of the rebellion of Montpulcian,and ſummoning him according to his bonde to compell them of Sienna to render it: he aunſwered in ſkorne what he had to doe if their ſubiectes rebelled,becauſe they were ill gouerned.But all theſe notwithſtanding the Florentyns, framing their councells according to the termes and neceſſities of their affayres, would not ſuffer diſdayne to cary them againſt their propper profit,eſteeming it to agree beſt with their preſent fortune, not to beare inclinacion to the requeſtes of the confederats: aſwell not to prouoke againſt them of new the armie of Fraunce in the kinges returne, as for that they woulde yet expect and temporiſe and hope to haue reſtitucion of their places by ſuch as kept them: and laſtly, for that they reappoſed litle in thoſe promiſes, knowing that they were hated of the Venetians, for thimpediments which at ſundry tymes they had giuē to their enterpriſes, & knowing manifeſtly that Lodovvyk aſpired to the imperie of Pyſa.

« But nowe,as all thinges earthly are ſubiect to their ſeaſons of reuolucion, and in « mortall felicities can be no aſſurance nor perpetuitie: So, about theſe tymes the « reputacion of the french began to diminiſh in the kingdom of Naples, for that making their proſperities ſerue to their pleaſures,and gouerning thinges at aduenture, « they looked not to chaſe the ennemie out of theſe fewe places yet holden by them,
« which they might eaſily haue done, if they had followed their fortune: They litle « conſidered that armes doe litle aduaunce, where pollicie is not concurrant,and vi« ctory bringes a very ſhort glorye, where the gouernment is vnperfect: But much more began they to decline in opinion,affection,and friendſhip: for,albeit the king expreſſed many honorable aſpects and liberalities towards the people in graunting thorow out the realme ſo many priuileages and exempcions as they amounted to more then two hundreth thowſand duckatts by yeare: yet other thinges were not redreſſed nor gouerned with that order and diſcreſſion that apperteyned: for that the king,holding it an action inferior to his authoritie & greatnes to heare the com-

plaintes and ſutes of men, referred ouer the whole charge of thaffayres to ſuch as gouerned him ſelfe, and they partly by incapacitie, and partly by particular couetouſnes confounded all thinges: for, the nobilitie were not embraſed with that humanitie they looked for, and much leſſe had recompenſes equall to their merits, yea they founde many difficulties to enter into the chambers and audience of the king: There was made no diſtinction of perſons: the merits and ſeruiſes of men were not conſidered but at aduenture: The mindes of ſuch as naturally were eſtraunged from the houſe of Aragon were not confirmed: many delayes and difficulties were ſubborned touching the reſtitucion of the ſtates and goods of thoſe that were of the faction of Aniovv, and of the other Barons that had bene baniſhed by the olde Ferdinand: fauors and graces were imparted to ſuch as procured them by corrupcion & meanes extraordinary: from many they tooke without iuſtice or reaſon, and to many they gaue without occaſion or deſeruing: Almoſt all offices and dignities were transferred to the french, in whom were alſo inueſted (to the great greefe of the naturall Lordes) all the townes of the demayne (ſuch they call thoſe that are wont to obey immediatly the king) thinges ſo much the more greeuous, by how much the king had promiſed there ſhould be no alteracion of nature, eſtate, or poſſeſſion of thoſe gouernments. The diſcontentment of theſe things was much increaſed by the inſolencie and naturall arrogancie of the french aggrauated much by the facilitie of the victorie, which caried them into thoſe opinions and weenings, that they eſtemed nothing of the whole Monarchie of Italy, attributing that to their proper vertue and vallour which chaunced by their fortune and felicitie: And theſe publike & generall inſolencies were made more intollerable by many priuat and inferior abuſes, as the armie being furried in many partes of the realme, and the bandes diſperſed more at aduenture then by diſcreſſion, liued in ſuch vnbrideled incontinencie, that thoſe wiues and daughters that had eſcaped their diſſolucion in the tyme of hoſtilitie, were violently diſhonored bearing the name of their hoſtes and friendes: In ſo much as theſe doinges drawing with them a ſuſpicion of a perpetuall ſeruitude, that loue, that deſire, that affection wherewith they honored them before, had now taken contrary qualitie, and not onely turned into hatred, conſpiracie, & accuſings againſt them, but alſo in place of the malice they bare to the Aragons, there was new inſynuacion of compaſſion to Ferdinand, no leſſe for the generall expectacion of his vertue, then for the memorie of the gracious ſpeech which with ſo great ſweetenes and conſtancie he deliuered to the Neapolytans the day of his departure: The ſame ſo working that that citie and almoſt all the kingdom expected with no leſſe deſire, an occaſion to reappeale the Aragons, then a few monethes before, they had deſired their deſtruction. Nowe began to be agreeable to them the name ſo hatefull of Alphonſo, calling iuſt ſeueritie, that which they had wont to note in him for crueltie: & interpreting to true ſinceritie of mind, that which wrongfully they had wont to cõſter pride and fiercenes: ſuch is the nature of communalties and peoples inclined to hope more then they ought, and endure leſſe then is neceſſary, alwayes thirſting after innouacions, and neuer contented with the tyme preſent. This infection chiefly goeth thorow thinhabitants of Naples, who, of all the regions in Italy are moſt noted of inconſtancie and deſire of new thinges.

Before this new league was made, the french king had determined to returne into Fraunce with ſpeede, moued more with a light fancie, and a vehement deſire of his court, then with conſideracions diſcreete or well tempered: ſeeing that in the kingdom of Naples remeyned vndecided many and great affayres of Princes and eſtates, and the partes of the realme being not fully conquered, his victory had not yet her iuſt perfection: But after he knew that ſo many Princes were drawne into league againſt him, he was much moued in his minde, and fell to deuiſe with his Lordes what he were beſt to doe in ſo great an accident, ſpecially euery one aſſuring him that it was long ſince thoſe Princes had conſented in conſpiracie againſt him: Thoſe of his councell were of aduiſe, that he ſhould diſpatche his departure, dowting that by how long he taried, by ſo much ſhould he giue oportunitie to the difficulties to increaſe, ſeeing the Confederats woulde winne time to make greater prouiſions, the brute ronning already that a great leuie of Almaines ſhould paſſe into Italy, and that men beganne to ſpeake much of the perſon of thEmprour: They perſwaded that the king would prouide that there might paſſe with diligence out of Fraunce, new bandes of ſouldiers to the towne of Aſt, both to garde that citie, and to keepe the Duke of Myllan in neceſſitie to defende his owne contrey, and withall to be in readines to paſſe further according to the occaſions and neceſſities of his maieſties ſeruices: it was alſo determined in the ſame councell to labor with all diligence and corrupcion of offers, to ſeparate the Pope from the other confederats, & to diſpoſe him to transferre to the kinges perſon the inueſtiture of the realme of Naples, which (notwithſtanding he promiſed abſolutely at Rome,) yet he had denied it til that day, and with declaracion that that graunt or conceſſion ſhould not beare preiudice to the title & rightes of an other. In a deliberacion ſo graue, and amongeſt ſo many thoughtes of ſuch importance, was not loſt the memorie of thaffayres of Pyſa: for, the king, deſiring for many regardes, that in him might remeyne power to diſpoſe of that eſtate, and dowting leaſt by the ayde of the confederats the people of Pyſa woulde not bereaue him of the citadell, he ſent thether by ſea together with th Embaſſadors of the towne which were with him, ſix hundreth french footemen, who being arriued there, conceiued the ſame affection which others that had bene left there, had: for being gouerned with deſire to ſpoyle and pray, after they had receiued money of the Pyſans, they went with their companies to encampe afore the towne of Libra frate, where the Pyſans (whoſe Capteine was Luke Maluozze) had ben in campe certeyne dayes afore vpon an aduertiſement that the Florentyns had ſent part of their bandes to Montpulcian, and hearing of the approch of their enemies, were rayſed and gone the day before: But returning thether eftſoones with the ſupply of the french men, they tooke it in fewe dayes, for that the Florentyne armie ſent to ſuccor it, could not paſſe the riuer of Serele for the violence of waters, neyther durſt they take the other way by the walls of Lucques, for the ill diſpoſicion of that people who were much moued, and fauored greatly the libertie of the Pyſans: Theſe bandes with thoſe of the french that remeyned of the conqueſt of Libra fratte, ronne ouer the whole contrey of Pyſa as enemies manifeſt to the Florentyns, who, when they complained, the king gaue no other aunſwere, then aſſoone as he ſhould come into Tuskane, he would redeliuer all thoſe places he had promiſed, deſiring them to beare with patience that litle reſpit.

But the meanes of departure were not ſo eaſie to the king, as was ready his deſire: for that his armie was not ſo great, as, being deuided into two partes, it was able to bring him into Aſt without daunger, and to ſuffice both to auoyd thimpediments of the confederats, and defend the kingdom of Naples againſt ſo many exactions as are in preparing. In which difficulties he was conſtrayned (to thende the realme ſhould not be naked of defence) to diminiſhe the prouicions reſerued for his owne ſafetie, and yet to keepe his perſon from manifeſt perill, his neceſſities enforced him not to

leaue in the kingdom ſo ſtrong an armie as was needeful: ſo he determined to leaue there halfe of his Svvyzzers, and a parte of the frenche ſootemen, eyght hundreth launcemen of Fraunce, and about fiue hundreth men at armes of th Italians which were in his pay, deuided vnder the enſeignes of the Prefect of Rome, the Collonnoys & Anthony Sauelle, Capteines who had taſted plentifully of his liberalities, in the diſtribucion of the townes and eſtates of the kingdom, but ſpecially the Collonnoys: for that to Fabricius he had giuen the contrey of Alba and Taille cuſſe poſſeſſed before by Virginio Vrſin: and Proſpero, he had indued with the Duchie of Tracette, and the citie of Fondi, with many caſtels which belonged to the familie of Caetane and Montfortin, together with many other peeces adioyning taken from the houſe of the Comtes: To theſe forces, he made reckoning that in all neceſſities, he ſhoulde vnite the forces of thoſe Barons, who for their owne ſewertie, were conſtrayned to deſire his greatnes: but ſpecially he reappoſed much in the powers of the Prince of Salerne whom he had reſtored to thoffice of Admirall, and of the Prince of Biſignian: he created as Lieftenant generall ouer all the realme, Gilbert de Burbon Duke of Montpenſier, a Capteine more eſteemed for his greatnes of his houſe, and that he did participat in the bludd royall, then for his proper vertue: he aſſigned other Capteines in many partes of the realme, on whom he had beſtowed eſtates and reuenues: of theſe the chief was M. D'aubygny, whom he had made great Conſtable of the realme for Calabria: In Caiette, the Seneſhall of Beaucaire whom he had rayſed to thoffice of highe Chamberlaine: And in Abruzze Gracian a valiant Capteine and of great reputacion: promiſing them all in one generall faith and worde of a Prince to ſende them ſpeedy reskew of money and men: But in the meane while to enterteyne the warre, he left them no other prouicion, thē the aſſignacion of thoſe moneyes which ſhould be dayly gathered of the reuenues of the realme, which beganne already to wauer and ſhake, for that the name of th Aragons beganne to reuiue in many places: For, at the ſame tyme that the king would departe from Naples, Ferdinand accompanied with the ſpaniſh armie that came by ſea into the yle of Sicile, was diſcended into Calabria, to whom flocked with a ſwift readines many trowpes of the contreymen, the citie of Rogge rendring it ſelfe to him, whoſe caſtell had bene alwayes kept in his hame: At the ſame tyme was diſcouered about the ſhoares of Pouylla the Venetian armie by ſea, ouer whom was Capteine Anthony Grymany, a man in that common weale of great authoritie: But neither for theſe, nor many other ſignes of chaūges towardes the king, did not forbeare, no not once ſuſpende or linger his deliberacion to goe his way: for, beſides that happly they were driuen by neceſſitie, the deſire was incredible in the king and all his court to returne into Fraunce, as though fortune that was ſufficient to make them get ſo great a victorie, had bene ſtill ſo able to preſerue it for them: he did not remember that the getting of a victorie is referred to fortune, but the loſſe of a kingdom is imputed to the king, who ſtandes then in moſt neceſſitie of councell and diſcreſſion, when fortune makes him beleue he is in moſt ſecuritie: it is familiar with fortune to doe more harme in one day, then ſhe doth good in many yeares, vſing for her delite to rayſe vp vayne men for her glory, and ſuffer them eftſoones to fall with the waight of their propper vanitie and want of gouernment: In this tyme alſo held good for Ferdinand, the yles of Tſchia and of Lipara, which albeit were neare to Sicile, yet they are members of the kingdom of Naples: he held Reggi which he had newly recouered, and euen in Calabria, he commaunded Villenenfue with the caſtell, and places about Brondaſa where Federyk was retyred, alſo Galipoli, la Mantia, and Turpia.

Gil. Burbon D. of Montpenſier the kinges Lieftenant in Naples.

The realme of Naples beginneth to reclayme the name of th Aragons.

Before the king parted from Naples, many thinges were in negociacion betwene him and the Pope: not without great hope of concorde: In which actions was ſent from the Pope to the king, and after returned to Rome the Cardinall S. Denys, and for the french king, M. Franci: The king deſired greatly thinueſtiture of Naples, and that the Pope, if he would not ioyne with him, at the leaſt that he would not be for his enemies & that he would receiue him into Rome as a friende: To which demaundes, albeit at the beginning the Pope bare ſome inclinaciō, yet, diſtruſting much in him ſelfe of the king, and eſteeming that to ſeparate him ſelfe from the confederats, and conſent to thinueſtiture, would be ſuppoſed a meane ſufficient to make a faithfull reconciliacion with him: he obiected many difficulties to thother demaundes, and to that of thinueſtiture, (albeit the king would condiſcende to take it vnder this condicion not to be preiudiciall to the rightes of an other) he aunſwered, that he wiſhed the lawes might be looked into afore, to ſee to whom the right apperteyned: And of the other ſide, ſeeking to giue impediment by force to the kinges entrye into Rome, he ſent to the ſtate of Venice and to the Duke of Myllan to refurniſhe him with ſuccors and ſtrength of ſouldiers, who, immediatly ſent him a thowſand light horſemen, and two thowſand footemen with promiſe of an ayde of a thowſande men at armes: with which bandes ioyned to his owne forces he hoped to be able to make reſiſtance: But the Venetians and Duke of Myllan conſidering afterwards, that it was a thinge too daungerous to ſende their ſtrength and companies ſo farre from their owne eſtates, ſeeing that neither the whole armie agreed vpon was yet in order, and parte of their puoples occupied in thenterpriſe of Aſt, and ioyning withall to theſe dowtes thinfidelitie of the Pope, remembred in a late experience when king Charles paſt that way, he called Ferdinand into Rome with his armie, & ſuddeinly with a coūcell chaunged, made him yſſue forth againe: They began to perſwade him to withdrawe to ſome place of ſewertie rather then to aduenture his perſon to ſo great a daunger in ſtriuing to defende Rome. Theſe thinges increaſed the kinges hopes to come to compoſicion with the Pope.

The french king crowned king of Naples.

The french king departed from Naples the xx. day of May: But for that he had not taken in the beginning with the ceremonies accuſtomed, the titles & enſeignes regall of the kingdom: A fewe dayes afore his departure, he receiued ſolemnlie in the cathedrall Church with great pompe and celebracions the royall ornaments, the honors, othes and homages, accuſtomed to be done to new kinges: At this coronacion, the oracion was pronounced in the name of the people of Naples by Iohn Iouian Pontan, to whoſe prayſes very cleare and ſhining for thexcellencie of his doctrine, his life, and ciuilitie of maners, this action brought no ſmal ſtayne and ſlaunder for that, as he had bene of long a principal Secretorie to the kinges of Aragon, & of very priuate and familiar authoritie, and the teacher and maiſter of Alphonſo: So, whether it were to obſerue iuſtly the partes proper to orators, or to ſhow his affection to the french, he tooke too great a libertie to ſpeake in the diſprayſes and derogacion of the kinges by whom he had bene ſo much aduaunced. So hard it is ſometymes for a man to keepe in him ſelfe that moderacion and thoſe rules, which he following with ſo great doctrine, had taught to others writing of morall vertues, & by his wit and knowledge had made him ſelfe wonderfull to the world in all kindes of philoſophie and learning: The king ledd with him viij. hundreth french launces, two hundred gentlemen for his garde, a hundreth launces vnder the Lord Trimulce, three thowſand Svvyzzers footemen, a thowſand frenchmen, and a thowſand Gaſcoyns, hauing ordeyned that in Tuskane Camylla Vitelli and his brother ſhould ioyne with

with him with two hundreth and fiftie men at armes,& that the armie by ſea ſhould draw towards Lyuorne. Virginio Vrſin and the Count Petillane followed the king without other garde or ſewertie then their faith not to goe away without leaue: Their cauſe,for that they reaſoned that they were not iuſtly made priſoners,had bene diſputed in the kinges councell, afore whome they alleaged,that at the tyme they yelded them ſelues, the king had not onely graunted to thoſe that they ſent, but alſo ſet downe in writing vnder his owne ſignature their ſafe conduit,whereof being aduertiſed by their ſolicitors which attended the diſpatch of the Secretories,they had vnder that truſt at the ſommonce of the firſt Herald that went to Nola, erected and diſplayed the enſeignes of the king,and giuen the keyes to the firſt Capteine hauing with him but a few horſemen,notwithſtanding their ſtrength being foure hundreth men at armes,they might eaſily haue made reſiſtance: They preferred beſides, the auncient deuocion of the familie of Vrſins, who taking part alwayes with the faction of the Guelffes,had alwayes borne both in them ſelues and in all the predeceſſors of that houſe,perpetuall impreſſions of honor,reuerence,and ſeruice,to the crowne of Fraunce: And as from thoſe regardes had proceeded, that with ſo great a readines they had receiued the kinges Maieſtie into their eſtates bordering vpon Rome: So therefore,it was neither conuenient nor iuſt, both hauing regard to the faith giuen by the king,and the merit of their operacions and actions, that they ſhould be holden priſoners: But they were aunſwered with no leſſe roundnes by M.de Lygny, whoſe ſouldiers tooke them within Nola: that the ſafe conduit, albeit it was determined and ſubſigned by the king,yet it is to be vnderſtand, that it was not perfectly giuen, but when it was confirmed with the kinges ſeale and with the ſeale of the Secretorie,and ſo deliuered to the partie: That in all grauntes and letters pattents ſuch was thauncient cuſtom in all courtes,to thende that if any thing were inconſiderately paſſed the mouth of the Prince by reaſon of many thoughtes and affayres, or for not ſufficient informacion of thinges,it might be moderated and goe forth with his due perfection: he alleaged that the confidence of that moued them not to yeld to ſo ſmall a companie of ſouldiers, but they did communicat in the generall neceſſity and feare,for that there remayned no meane either to defende or to flee, the whole contrey about them ſwarming with the armies of the victors: That what they had alleaged of their merits was falſe, which if it ſhould be affirmed by an other, them ſelues ought to deny it for their honor: for that it was manifeſt to all the world,that not of will or free conſent,but to auoyde daunger (leauing in aduerſitie the Aragons, of whom in proſperitie they had receiued great benefits) they agreed to giue the king paſſage thorow their landes: Therefore ſeeing they were in the pay of thennemie,and bare mindes eſtraunged from the name of the french, & that they had perfectly no ſafe conduit or ſewertie, they were made priſoners by good law and right of armes: Theſe reaſons thus aduouched againſt the Vrſins, and ſuſteyned by the power of M.de Ligny,and authoritie of the Collonnoys, who aſwell for auncient enuies,as for the diuerſitie of the factions,quarrelled them openly: there was no reſolucion nor ſentence,onely they were commaunded to follow the king,leauing them naked hopes to be deliuered when his maieſtie was come to Aſt.

Virginio Vrſin and the Count Petillane being the kings priſoners,ſhow reaſons to be redelliuered.

Their reaſons are diſproued by Monſr.de Ligny.

But albeit the Pope,(the confederats hauing councelled him to goe his way)was not without inclinacion to be reconciled with the king, with whom he negociated continually: yet,ſuſpicion and ielowſie being ſtrong in him, he nouriſhed the king with hopes that he woulde attende him: And yet after he had beſtowed a ſufficient garriſon within the caſtell S.Ange, two dayes before the king ſhould enter Rome, he went to Oruiette accompanied with the colleage of Cardinalls, and two hundred men at armes, a thowſand light horſemen, and three thowſand footemen: he left behinde him as Legat the Cardinall of S. Anaſtaſio to receiue and honor the king, who entred by that quarter on the farre ſide of Tyber, to thende to auoyd the caſtell S. Ange: And refuſing the lodging that was offered him by the Popes commiſſion in the pallaice of the Mount Vatican, he went and lodged in the ſuburbes: And when the Pope vnderſtoode that the king came neare to Viterbe, notwithſtanding he interteyned him with newe hopes to compound with him in ſome place conuenient betwene Viterbe and Oruiette, he left Oruiette and went to Perouſe, with intencion (if the king tooke that way) to goe to Ancona, the better to haue meane, by the commoditie of the ſea, to retyre to ſome place abſolutely aſſured: All this notwithſtanding the king, being not a litle diſcontented with his vniuſt feares and ielouſies, rendred the caſtells of Ciuitauechia and Terracina, reſeruing Oſtia, which when he came out of Italy, he gaue vp to the power of the Cardinall of S. P. ad vincla, who was biſhop thereof: he paſſed in like ſort by the contreyes of the Church, as thorow the dominions of a freind, ſauing that they of Tuskanella refuſing to receiue into their towne his vauntgarde, the ſouldiers tooke it by force, and ſackt it, not without murder and ſlaughter of many.

After this, the king remeyned without any occaſion at Siena ſix dayes, not conſidering (neither of him ſelfe nor by the ſtraite aduertiſements of the Cardinall de S. P. ad vincla, and by Trymulce) how hurtfull it was to giue time to his enemies to make their prouiſions and vnite their forces: neither did he recompenſe the loſſe of the time, with the profit of councells or deliberacions: for there was debated at Sienna the reſtitucion of the fortreſſes of the Florentyns promiſed by the king at his departure from Naples, & confirmed by many voluntary grauntes on the way: And therefore, the Florentyns, beſides that they were ready to pay the thirty thowſand duckats remeyning of the ſumme agreed at Florence, offered to lende lxx. thowſande more, and to ſende with him till he were arriued at Aſt, Franciſco Secco their Capteyne with three hundreth men at armes and two thowſande footemen: The neceſſitie which the king had of money, the oportunitie to augment his armie, ioyned to the conſideracion of his faith and othe, induced almoſt all thoſe of his councell to perſwade effectually the reſtitucion of the caſtells and peeces of ſtrength reſeruing Petra Santa and Serezana, as conuenient inſtruments to draw more eaſily to his deuocion the hartes of the Genovvays: But it was a reſolucion in deſtinie that the matter of new calamities ſhoulde remeyne kindled in Italy: for, M. de Ligny, a man for his youth more ready to enterpriſe, then rype in councell, and whoſe experience had not yet wrought in him a perfection of iudgement, being borne of one of the kinges ſiſters, and of no ſmall fauors with him, made his lightnes togither with the diſdaine he bare to the Florentyns, for that in all their ſutes they addreſſed their meanes to the Cardinall of S. Mallovv, the onely impediment to this deliberacion, alleaging no other reaſon then the pietie and compaſſion of the Pyſans: And touching the offer of the forces which the Florentyns made, he deſpiſed them, vaunting that the armie of Fraunce was able to fight with all the men of warre in Italy knit in one ſtrength: M. de Pienes was a ſupporter of his opinion, for that he thought the king would beſtow vppon him the iuriſdiction of Pyſa and Lyuorne: There was debating alſo at Siena of the gouernment of that citie, for that many of the orders of the people and of the reformers (to plucke downe the brotherhood of the order of Montenoue,) made inſtance, that erecting a newe forme of gouernment, the garde which they of Monte-

noue kept at the publike pallaice might be taken away, and the place ſupplyed by a garde of frenche men vnder the leading of M.de Ligny: And albeit this councell was reiected in the councell of the king,as a thing of litle continuance and impertinent to the time preſent: yet M. de Ligny who had layed a vayne plott to make him ſelfe Lorde of it,obteyned that the king woulde take into his protection that citie vnder certeine condicions,binding him ſelf to the defenſe of it and all the circumſtances except Montpulcian,which he ſayd he would not intangle him ſelfe withall, neyther for the Florentyns nor for the Sienoys: The communaltie of Siena (albeit no mencion was made in the capitulacion) chuſed by the conſent of the king M.de Ligny for their Capteine,promiſing him twenty thowſand duckats by yeare vpon condicion, that he would keepe there a Lieftenant with three hundreth footemen for the gard of the place,which ſtrength he left there coolled out of ſuch as were of the frenche armie: The vanitie of which deliberacions appeared immediatly,for that the order of Montnoue hauing eftſoones reconquered with armes their authoritie accuſtomed,chaſſed out of Siena the garde, and gaue leaue to M. de Lyſle whome the king had left there for his Embaſſador.

But there were now great ſtirres and emocions in Lombardye: for the Venetians, and Lodovvyk Sforce (who had euen then receiued from thEmprour with much ſolemnitie the priuileages of inueſtiture of the Duchie of Myllan, and made publike homage and oth of fidelitie to thEmbaſſadors that brought them) rayſed great preparacions to ſtoppe the king that he ſhould not returne into Fraunce, or at leaſt to aſſure the Duchie of Myllan,to come to the which he muſt paſſe ouer ſo great a circuit and ſpace of contreyes: To theſe endes,euery of them readdreſſed their forces, and leauied of new partely in common,and partly at expenſes ſeparat, many men at armes,obteyning after many difficulties that John Bentyuole whome they had taken into their common pay,ſhould ſticke to the league with the citie of Bologna: Lodovvyk armed at Genes for the garde of the ſame citie, tenne gallyes at his owne charges,and foure great ſhippes at the common expenſes of the Pope,the Venetians and him ſelfe: And being at the poynt to execute that whereunto he was bownd by the couenants of the confederacion touching the towne of Aſt, he ſent into Iermany to leauy two thowſande footemen, and conuerted to that enterpriſe Galeas S.Seuerin with ſeuen hundred men at armes,and three thowſand footemen: in ſo much as aſſuring him of the taking of that towne and to achieue all thinges to his honor, (he was naturally very inſolent in his proſperities) he ſent this meſſage to the Duke of Orleãce the more to terrifie him: That hereafter he ſhould forbeare to vſurpe the title of Duke of Myllan,which title Charles his father had taken ſince the death of Philipp Maria Viſconte: That he ſuffered not newe bandes to paſſe out of Fraunce into Italy: That he cauſed to returne home againe ſuch as were already within the towne of Aſt: And for thaſſurance of theſe things,that he ſhould put the towne of Aſt into the hãds of Galeas S.Seuerin,in whom the king might reappoſe truſt aſwel as in him, hauing the yere before bene receiued by the king into the brotherhood & order of S. Michell in Fraunce: he vaunted much in the ſame kind of boaſting of his forces, of the prouiſions the confederats made to make head againſt the king in Italy,the great preparacions of the king of Romaines and the king of Spayne to moue warre beyonde the Mountes: But the Duke of Orleance was made nothing affrayd with theſe vaine threates,and being well aſſured that there was made a newe confederacion, he ſtudied to fortifie Aſt,and ſolicited with great inſtance to ſend out of Fraunce new ſupplies and companies,who,vnderſtanding that they were to be imployed in the proper ſuccors of the kinges perſon, began with great diligence to paſſe the mountes: By reaſon whereof the Duke of Orleans not fearing his enemies, marcheth into the fielde, and takes in the Marquiſdom of Saluce the towne & caſtel of Galſinieres which Anthony Maria of S. Seuerin poſſeſſed: which being knowen to Galeas, who had a litle before taken certeine ſmall villages, retyred with his armie to Anon, A towne of the Duchie of Myllan neare to Aſt, neither hauing hope to be able to offende, nor feare to be offended: But the nature of Lodovvyk alwayes inclining to entangle him ſelfe with enterpriſes which demaund great expenſes, and yet of a condicion to flee and feare (yea euen in greateſt neceſſities) thinges that brought coſtes and charges, was the cauſe to commit his eſtate into right great daungers: for that by reaſon of his very ſpare and needy payments, a very fewe footemen came out of Iermany, and for the ſame nygardnes, the bandes that were with Galeas were diminiſhed euery day: where, of the contrary, were increaſed continually the ſupplyes that came out of Fraunce, who for that they were called to the reskew of the kinges perſon, marched with ſuch diligence, that the Duke of Orleans had already aſſembled three hundreth launces, three thowſand Svvyzzers footemen, and three thowſande Gaſcoyns: And albeit the king by a commaundement ſpeciall and peremptory had aduertiſed him, that abſteyning from all enterpriſe, he ſhould ſtande vpon continuall readines and preparacion to meete his maieſtie when ſo euer he ſhould be ſent for: yet (it is harde for a man not to make reckoning of his proper profit and to reſiſt it) he determined to accept thoccaſion to poſſeſſe the citie of Nouare, wherein he was offered to be put by two of the Opizins gentlemen of the ſame citie hating much the Duke of Myllan, for that aſwell vpon them as many others of the towne, he had with vniuſt ſentence and iudgement vſurped certeine condutes of waters and other poſſeſſions: Thenterpriſe and the manner of it being reſolued vpon, the Duke of Orleans paſſed by night the riuer of Pavv at the bridge Sturo within the iuriſdiction of the Marquis of Montferat, hauing in his company the Marquis of Saluce: he was receiued by the conſpirators of thenterpriſe into the towne with all his forces, and founde no reſiſtance: And from thence making ſuddeine incurſions with parte of his horſemen euē vntil Vigeneua, it was beleued that if he had drawne his whole armie with ſpeede towards Myllan, there would haue riſen no ſmall inſurrections, for that the loſſe of Nouare and the preſent face and conſideracion of troubles towardes, kindled in the Myllanoys a wonderfull inclinacion to reuolt and chaunge: wherein Lodovvyk, no leſſe tymerous in aduerſitie, then inſolent in proſperitie, was ſeene with teares vnprofitable to acknowledge his cowardiſe (for the moſt part is ioyned in one ſelf ſubiect, inſolencie and tymerouſnes:) they alſo that were with Galeas in whome onely conſiſted his defence, remeyning behinde, ſhowed them ſelues in no place to his reskew: but becauſe the condicions and diſorders of the ennemie, are not alwayes knowne to the other Capteynes, it hapneth often in warres that many goodly occaſions are loſt, there being alſo no apparance that ſo ſuddeine a mutacion could ſucceede againſt ſo great a Prince, ſeeing withall it is a principall pollicie in Princes in ſeaſons daungerous and conſpiring, to make their ſtrength at home free from feare, ielowſie, or ſuſpicion: The Duke of Orleans, to aſſure the conqueſt of Nouare, determined to haue the caſtell, which the fift day accorded to yelde, if within xxiiij. howers they were not ſuccored: during which tyme, Galeac de S. Seuerin had leaſure to conuey his companies to Vigeneue, and the Duke (who the better to reconcile the minds of the people, had by proclamacion called in many exactions impoſed afore vpon the communaltie) good reſpit to encreaſe and refurniſh his armie: All which notwithſtanding notwithſtanding the Duke of Orleans, hauing ranged his bandes where the walls of Vigeneue offered battell to his enemies on whom fell ſo generall aſtoniſhment, that they were vppon the poynt to abandon the towne and paſſe the riuer of Theſin by a bridge they had made vppon boates and other matter neceſſary to their ſuccors in the paſſage: Thennemie refuſing to fight, the Duke of Orleans retyred to Trecas: from this time the affayres of Lodouvyk began to ſayle with a better gale, many ſupplyes of horſemen and footemen arriuing in his armie: for the Venetians being content that the charge to meete the french king ſhould be in effect to them alone, conſented that Lodouvyk ſhould call backe parte of thoſe bandes he had ſent vppon the coſtes of Parmeſan, and withall they refurniſhed him with foure hundreth ſtradiots: Inſomuch as the meane to paſſe further was taken from the Duke of Orleans, who making a roade with fiue hundreth horſemen euen to Vigeneue, and the horſemen of thennemie encountring with them, a great loſſe light vpon the D. of Orleans: This encounter gaue courage to Galeas S. Seuerin, both ſuperior in forces, and nothing inferior in fortune, to preſent battell to the Duke at Trecas: At length all the armie being aſſembled (wherin beſides th Italian ſouldiers, was arriued a thowſand horſemen & a thowſand footemen of Alemains) incamped within a myle of Nouaro, whether the D. of Orleans was retyred with all his regiments.

The newes of the reuolt of Nauaro procured the king being then at Syena, to make way: And therefore he auoyded all occaſions that might make his departure ſlow, or hinder his reſolucion: wherein being well aduertiſed that the Florentyns, warned by the perills paſt, and newly falne into ſuſpicion for that Peter demedicis followed him, albeit they had determined to receiue him into Florence with honors due to his greatnes, yet for their more ſewertie, they filled their towne with men of armes and pyked bandes: he drew to Pyſa by the landes of the Florentyns, leauing the citie on the right hand: In the towne of Poggibonſe met him Ieronimo Sauonarola, who according to his cuſtome vſing the name and authoritie of God to his purpoſe, ſhowed him vnder vehement inuectiues and geſture that he ought to reſtore to the Florentyns their townes, ioyning to his perſwaſions, threatnings abſolute and terrible, that if he obſerued not that he had ſworne with ſo great ſolemnitie, and that vppon the holy Goſpells, yea almoſt afore the eyes and preſence of God, a puniſhment would follow equall to his infidelitie and periurie: The king made him ſundry aunſweres according to his inconſtancie, hauing as litle conſcience to keepe his faith, as he had regard to giue it: ſometymes he promiſed the frear to make reſtitucion aſſoone as he was come to Pyſa, and immediatly (wreſting his promiſe and othe) he ſayd he had ſworne to the Pyſans to protect their libertie afore he made any oth at Florence: and yet he gaue hopes alwayes to their Embaſſadors for the reſtitucion of their peeces aſſoone as he was come to Pyſa: where being arriued, the matter was eftſoones proponed in the kinges councell, for that the preparacions, vnitie, and ſtrength of the confederats about the borders of Parma increaſing dayly, they began to looke into the difficulties to paſſe thorow Lumbardye: for which cauſe many deſired the moneyes and other ſuccors offered by the Florentyns: But to theſe councells were contrary euen thoſe Capteynes and gentlemen who had reſiſted them at Sienna: They alleaged, that albeit there hapned by the oppoſicion of the ennemie, any diſorder or difficultie to paſſe thorow Lumbardye, yet it were better to haue in their power the citie of Pyſa (whether they might retyre) then to leaue it in the handes of the Florentynes, who, hauing once reobteined the places they demaunded, would be of no better faith, then had bene the other Italyans: They added, that in compa-

riſon of commodities, it was very conuenient for the ſewertie of the kingdom of Naples, to holde the port of Lyuorne: for that the plot layd to alter the ſtate of Genes ſucceeding well to the king (wherof the hope could not be dowtefull) he ſhould be ſouereigne Lord almoſt of all the ſeas euen to the hauen of Naples: ſewer theſe reaſons were able to doe much in the minde of the king as yet litle capable to chuſe the beſt councell: but of farre greater power were the peticions and teares of the Pyſans, who in great concurſe of men, women, and children, ſometymes proſtrate at the kinges feete, and eftſoones recommending to euery one (yea euen the leaſt of his court and the ſouldiers with lamentable cryinges and complaintes bewayled their miſeries and calamities to come) the inſatiable hatred of the Florentyns, and the laſt deſolacion of their contrey: which ſhould not haue cauſe to lament for any other thing then for that his maieſtie had put them in libertie, and promiſed to protect them in it: In aſſurance whereof, they beleuing the word of a right Chriſtian king of Fraunce, to be a word firme and reſolute, they had taken boldnes ſo much the more to prouoke the hatred of the Florentyns: with theſe complaintes and exclamacions accompanied with the preſent aſpect and view of their miſeries, they diſcended with ſuch compaſſion into the hartes euen of the moſt ſimple men at armes, the archers of the armie, and many of the Suvyzzers: that they went in great numbers and tumult to the king, whom (Salzart one of the Penſioners ſpeaking in the name of them all) they beſought with inſtance vehement and humble, that for the honor of his perſon, for the glorie of the crowne of Fraunce, and for the conſolacion of ſo many of his ſeruaunts prepared alwayes to put their liues in hazard for him, & who perſwaded him with a faith more loyal, ſimple, and innocent, then ſuch as were corrupted with the money of the Florentyns, he would not take from thoſe poore and naked Pyſans the benefit which ſo graciouſly he had beſtowed vpon them: They offered him, that if for want of money he ſuffered him ſelfe to be caried into a deliberacion ſo infamous, he would rather take their chaynes, their iewells, and their treaſors, yea and reteyne in his hand their payes & penſions which they were to receiue of him: This vehement affection of the ſouldiers tooke ſo great a libertie, that a ſimple Archer had boldnes to threaten the Cardinall of S. Mallovv, and others by his example with ielous and braue ſpeeches quarreled with the Mareſhall of Gie and Preſident of Gannay, whom they knew to labour the redeliuerie of the Pyſans to the ſeruitude of Florence: Inſomuch that the king ſomewhat confuſed by ſo great a varietie of his people let thinges hang in ſuſpence, and was ſo farre of to take any certeine reſolucion, that at one tyme he promiſed the Pyſans neuer to paſſe them into the power of the Florentyns, and to thembaſſadors of Florence attending at Lucquea, he gaue intelligence, that that which he did not at that preſent for iuſt occaſions, he would doe immediatly after he was arriued in Aſt, willing that their common weale ſhould ſende Embaſſadors thether.

The king aſpireth to the ſurpriſing of Genes.

The king departed from Pyſa after he had chaunged the Capteine and left ſufficient garriſon within the citadell, doing the like in the other fortreſſes and peeces of defence: And as it agreed with the greennes of his youth to embraſe enterpriſes, & no leſſe equall to his greatnes and title to nouriſh ambicion, ſo carying a deſire incredible to conquer the towne of Genes, being ſet on by the Cardinalls of Rouere and Fregoſe, and by Obietto de fieſquo and others of the baniſhed, who gaue him hopes of a ſuddeine mutacion there: he ſent with them from Serezane (contrary to thopinion of all his councell who allowed not to diminiſh the forces of tharmie) the Lorde Phyllip de Brexe brother to the Duke of Sauoy, with ſix hundreth launces, and fiue hundred hundred footemen newly arriued out of Fraunce by ſea, ordeyning that the men at armes of the Vitellis comming behind with a ſlow marche, and therefore not able in tyme to ioyne with him, ſhould follow them: And that certeyne others of the baniſhed, together with the bandes ſupplied by the Duke of Sauoye, ſhould enter the riuer of the Weſt, And laſtly that tharmie by ſea, reduced to ſeuen gallies, two gallyons, and two foyſtes led by the Capteyne Miolaus, ſhould go to make backe to tharmy by lande.

By this time the vauntgard guided by the Mareſhal of Gie was come to Pontreme, which towne, after it had diſmiſſed three hundred footemen ſtraungers left there for the gard of the place, did yeld ſuddeinly by the meane of Triuulce with couenant that they ſhould not be vexed neither in their perſons nor in their goodes: But the faith giuen by the Capteines, could doe litle for the ſewertie of the towne, for that the Svvyzzers, whoſe furie being long kept ſmothered, burſt out now to a greater flame, and taking occaſion of reuenge, for that when the army going to Naples paſſed thorow Lunigiana, about xl. of their nation (for a quarrell hapning at aduenture) were ſlayne by them of Pontrema: they ſacked and burnt the towne, after they had made barbarous ſlaughters of thinhabitants.

In theſe tymes, the army of the confederats aſſembled diligently about the borders of Parma: they conteyned about two thowſand, two hundred men at armes, eight thowſand footemen, and more then two thowſand light horſemen, the moſt parte Albanoys & of the prouinces neare to Greece, who brought into Italy by the Venetians, reteined the ſame name they had in their contrey and were called Stradyots: of this armie the ſinewes and principall ſtrength were the bandes of the Venetians, for that thoſe of the Duke of Myllan (hauing turned moſt of his forces to the ſeruice of Nouaro) made not the fourth part of the whole armie: ouer the bands of the Venetians, wherein were many notable Capteines, commaunded as generall Francis Gonzague Marquis of Mantua, a man albeit very younge, yet what for his great courage & natural deſire of glory, his expectacion ſurmounted his age: with him were ioined as cõmiſſioers two of the chiefeſt of the Senat, Luke Pyſan and Melchior Treuiſan: ouer the regiment of Lodovvyk Sforce, commaunded vnder the ſame title of generall, the Count Caiazze, in whome Lodovvyk reappoſed muche: but for his partes, being nothing equall in armes to the glory of his father, he had rather gotte the name of a ſuttle and pollitike warrior, then of a hardie & reſolute Capteyne, and with him was Commiſſioner Francis Barnardyn Viſcounte chiefe of the faction of Gebelins at Myllan, and therefore vſed as oppoſit to Iohn Iackes Triuulce. Amongeſt theſe Capteines and principalls of tharmie conſulting whether they ſhould goe incampp at Furnoue, a litle village at the foote of the mountaine: it was determined, for the ſtraitnes of the place, and perhaps (as was afterwardes ſpread abroad) to giue occaſion to the ennemie to diſcend into the playne: that they ſhould lodge in the abbay of Guiaruola diſtant three myles from Furnoue: This aduiſe was the cauſe that at Furnoue was lodged the vauntgarde of the french, which had paſſed the mounteyne much afore the reſidue of the armie being hindred by the great artillerie, which with many difficulties was drawne ouer that ſharpe mounteyne of th Appenyn, and yet had paſſed with farre greater troubles, if the Svvyzzers (deſiring to ſatisfie the fault they had done to the kinges honor at Pontrema) had not applyed a wonderfull readines, diligence, and force.

The armie of the confederats.

The vauntgard being arriued at Furnoue, the Mareſhall of Gie ſent a trompet to th Italian campe to demaund paſſage for tharmie in the name of the king, who not offering to offend any perſon & receiuing vittells at conuenient prices, had to paſſe that way to returne into his realme of Fraunce, diſpatching at the ſame inſtant certeyne light horſemen to view thennemie and the contrey, who were broken and put to flight by certeine Stradyotts which Francis Gonzague ſent to thencownter: if this occaſion had bene followed, and that th Italyans had giuen vpon the trenches of the french, they had eaſily (by all diſcourſe and coniecture of warre) broken the vauntgard, and ſo taken away all poſſibilities of the kinges paſſage: This occaſion remeyned in their fauor alſo the day following, notwithſtanding that the Mareſhall after he had conſidered the daunger, had retyred his people into a place more high: But there lacked reſolucion of mind to thopportunitie that was offered, for th Italian capteines had not boldnes to aſſaile them, aſwell for thaduauntage of the place whether they were retyred: as for that they feared the ouergreatnes of the vauntgarde, and that they were the mayne armie: It is certeine that euen then the confederats had not aſſembled all their forces ſpecially the bandes of the Venetians who were ſo ſlow to ioyne in one ſtrength at Guaruola, that it is manifeſt, if the king had not dallyed ſo long vpon the way at Pyſa, Sienna, and other places without all occaſion, he might haue paſſed without impediment or encownter of thennemie: he was ioyned at laſt to the vauntgard, and lodged the day after with all his armie at Furnoue.

The Princes confederat neuer beleued that the king durſt haue paſſed th Appenyn by the high way with ſo ſmall an armie, for they were of opinion, that leauing the greateſt part of his people at Pyſa, he woulde returne into Fraunce with the reſidue by ſea: And afterwards vnderſtanding that he continued his way by land, they ſuppoſed, that to eſchew their armie, he would lay his plott to paſſe the mountaine by the way of the boroughs of Vandetar, & by the hill Centcroig very ſharpe and harde, and from thence to the borders of Vrtoney hoping to meete the Duke of Orleans vpon the confynes of Alexandria: But when they knew certeinly that he was come to Furnoue, th Italian armie, very well reſolued afore, both for the ſhow of courage in ſo many valiant capteines, and for the reapport of the litle number of thennemies, began now to wauer and ſhake, making opinions fearfull of the valour of the men at armes of Fraunce and the vertue of the Svvyzzers, to whom without al compariſon, th Italian footemen were eſteemed much inferior: they conſidered much of the agilitie of ſuch as managed the great artilleries: but ſpecially (which moueth much the mindes of men when they haue taken a contrary impreſſion.) They redowted greatly the vnhoped for hardines of the french, who, not waighing thinequalitie of their numbers inferior to theirs, durſt yet affront them: for theſe conſideracions, the courage of the Captaines being well moderated, they held a councell amongeſt them ſelues what aunſwer they ſhould make to the trompet ſent by the Mareſhall of Gie: on the one ſide it ſeemed too daungerous to put the ſtate of all Italy in the diſcreſſion of fortune, and on the other ſide it could not but bring preiudice to the valour of all the ſouldiers and men of ſeruice in Italy, to ſhow that they had no courage to oppoſe againſt the armie of the french, who, being farre inferior in numbers, and leſſe expectacion of other oportunities in a countrey ſtraunger, durſt yet offer to paſſe euen in the face and eyes of them: In this councell the aduiſe of the Capteines being diuerſe and all the beſt experienced & ſtayed, either giuen ouer wholly to feare, or at leaſt very vnreſolut after many diſputacions, they laſtly agreed to ſend aduertiſement to Myllan of the kinges demaund, and to execute that which ſhould be determined by the Duke and the Embaſſadors of the confederats: who being drawne into councell as a matter of generall importance, the Duke and the Venetians being

moſt neareſt the daunger, were of this opinion, not to ſtoppe the way of the ennemy, ſeeing he would goe, but rather according to an olde councell, to make him a bridge of ſiluer: otherwaies (according to many auncient examples) there might be daunger, that neceſſitie turned into deſpaire, he woulde not make his owne way with great effuſion of blud of ſuch as vndiſcretely would hinder him: But the Spaniſh Embaſſador, deſiring that without the daunger of his king, they would make a triall of fortune, perſwaded vehemently & almoſt with proteſtacion not to let paſſe the king, nor to loſe thoccaſion to breake that armie, which paſſing in quiet, the matters of Italy would remeyne notwithſtanding in greater daungers then before: for that the french king keeping Aſt and Nouaro, all Pyemont obeyed his commaundements: And hauing at his backe the realme of Fraunce, a realme mighty and rich, and the Svvyzzers his neighbours ready to come into his pay in what numbers he would, And laſtly being a great increaſe of his reputacion and courage, if the armie of the league ſo farre aboue him in numbers, would conſent ſo cowardly to his paſſage: he would eftſoones torment Italy with greater courage, knowing that the Italians either would not or durſt not fight with the french men: All this notwithſtanding, the fewer opinion preuailing moſt in this councell, they determined to write to Venice with whom bare rule the ſame aduiſe.

But theſe conſultacions were in vaine, like as the arrow being ſhot, it is to late to wiſhe it may do no hurt where it falls: for, the Capteines of tharmie after they had written to Myllan, waighing that by reaſon of thextremitie of tyme, they could not haue returne of aunſwer in ſeaſon conuenient, how much it would touch in diſhonor all the men of warre in Italy to leaue the paſſage free to the french men, ſent backe the trompet without any aunſwer certeine, being reſolued to aſſayle the ennemie, and charge them in the paſſage: the Commiſſioners of Venice being of the ſame aduiſe, but Treuiſan much more then his companion: The french men marched on with great arrogancie & boldnes, as they that till that time hauing encountred no reſiſtance in Italy, were perſwaded that either the army durſt not oppoſe any impediment, or at leaſt if they did, they iudged their proper vertue inuincible, and diſdaining the ſtrength of thēnemies, they thought their fortune would be the ſame in this fight that it was in their late conqueſt of Naples: But when in diſcending from the mounteyne, they diſcouered the armie lodged in infinit numbers of tentes and pauilions, and in a place ſo large that (according to the cuſtom of Italy) they might range them ſelues all in battell: And waighing what by their great numbers, and lodging ſo neare them, with other demonſtracions of reſolucion of mind, that there could want no wills nor diſpoſicion to fight: their late arrogancie beganne to take an other habit, & in their councells began to fall ſo many coniectures of feare & dowt that they would haue receiued it for a good newes, to heare that th Italians would be content to let them paſſe: This feare was redoubled by this occaſion: The kinge, ſince the aunſwer, had written to the Duke of Orleans to meete him with all the power he could make, and to marche with ſuch ſpeede as he failed not at the day & place appointed: But the Duke returned aduertiſement that the armie of Sforce (oppoſed againſt him ſtanding vpon a ſtrength of nyne hundreth men at armes, twelue hundred light horſemen, and fiue thowſand footemen,) was ſo mighty, that without manifeſt perill he could not aduaunce to obſerue his maieſties appoyntment, conſidering beſides, that he muſt be enforced to leaue parte of his bandes for the garde of Aſt and Nouaro: Theſe neceſſities conſtrayning the king to turne his minde to newe councells, he commaunded M. D'Argenton (who, a litle before had bene his Embaſ-ſador at Venice, where Piſan and Treuiſan now their deputie Commiſſioners perſwaded him to diſpoſe the kinges minde to peace) to ſende a trompet to the ſayd Commiſſioners to let them vnderſtand that he woulde common with them for the common benefit: they accepted his deſire, and appointed the next morning to meete in a place conuenient betwene both the armies: But the king, either for that in that place he had want of vittells, or for ſome other occaſion, chaunged aduiſe, & would not in that place attend the yſſue of that meeting.

The front of the tents and trenches of the one and other armie, was diſtant litle leſſe then three myles, ſtretched out along the right ſhore of the riuer of Taro, which is rather a lande fludde then a riuer, for that falling from the hill of Appenyn, after it hath ronne thorow a litle valley incloſed with two banks, it diſcendes into the large playnes of Lombardye, and ſo falls into Pavv: vppon one of theſe two bankes, which was that of the right hand diſcending euen to the ſhoare of the riuer, was lodged the armie of the confederats, incamped by councell of the Capteines rather on that ſide, then on the left ſhoare (where muſt be the wayes of the ennemies,) to thende they ſhould not haue meane to turne to Parma: of which citie for the diuerſitie of factions, the Duke of Myllan was not without ſuſpicion, the rather for that the frēch king had by the appoyntment of the Florentyns for his conduit to Aſt Francis Secco, whoſe daughter was maried into the houſe of Iorelli, a famulie noble and mightie in the territorie of Parma: The lodgings of the confederats were fortefied with ditches and rampiers, & well furniſhed with artillerie, by the mouth of the which, the french men going to Aſt, muſt of neceſſitie paſſe Taro on the ſide of Furnoue, and marche, no other thing remeyning betwene them and thItalians then the riuer: All the night the french were in great trauell for the vexacions of thItalians who made their eſtradiots to make incurſions euen to their campe, which was ſo ready at euery brute as if there had bene a continuall alarme: to this trouble and perplexitie of minde, was ioyned a ſuddein and moſt thicke rayne mixed with lightnings and thunders feareſull, with many horrible crackes and flaſhes, that they tooke it as a foreſhewing of ſome ſorowfull accident, a matter which did more amaze them then the armie of thItalians: not onely for that, being in the middeſt of mounteynes and ennemies, & in a place which (if they preuailed not by fight) fauored them with no hopes or meanes of ſafetie, the conſideracion of thoſe great difficulties, gaue them iuſt occaſion of extreame feares: But alſo (to mindes fearfull al fancies and coniectures ſeeme thinges of truth) they made conſtructions of the threatnings of the firmament not accuſtomed to ſhow it ſelfe ill diſpoſed but towards ſome great variacion, the ſtorme (in their opinions) raging moſt toward that parte where was the perſon of the king of ſo great maieſtie and power.

The battell of Taro.

The morning following being the ſixt of Iuly, the frenche armie beganne by the peepe of the day to paſſe the riuer: Afore, marched the moſt part of the artillerie, being followed with the vauntgard wherin the king (ſuppoſing that againſt it would be bent the greateſt forces of the ennemie) had put three hundreth and fiftie french launces, Triuulce with his cōpanie of a hundreth launces, & three thowſand Svvyzzers which were the ſinewes & hope of that armie, & with them on foote Engilbert brother to the Duke of Cleues, & the baylif of Dyon that had leauyed them: to theſe, the king adioyned three hundred archers, and certeine crosbowmen on horſebacke of his gard, whom he made alight on foote, and almoſt all the footemen which he had with him: After the vauntgard marched the battel, in the middeſt whereof was the perſon of the king armed at all partes and mounted vppon a fierce courſer: and

neare to him, (to gouerne with his councell and authoritie that parte of the armie) was the lord of Trymouille a leader much renowmed in the realme of Fraunce: Then followed the arearegarde guided by the Count de fois: and in the laſt place was beſtowed the baggage of the armie: Notwithſtanding this marching of the armie and the preſent readines to fight, yet the king, who could haue bene cõtented with ſome accord, ſolicited Argenton to goe and negociate eftſoones with the Venetian Commiſſioners, euen at the ſame time that the campe beganne to moue: But the Venetian armie being all in armes, and the Capteines determined to fight, the ſhortnes of the time and nearenes of thennemie, left no reſpitte or ſpace of time to enterteyne Parley: for, now began the light horſemen on both ſides to skyrmiſhe, the artillerie from all quarters to ſhoote of with a noyſe horrible, and the Italians yſſued out of their tentes, had ſpred vpon the ſhoare of the riuer their eſquadrons and rankes prepared to the battell: Theſe thinges notwithſtanding, the french men forbare not to march, partly vpon the breache or greaue of the riuer, partely by the skirtes or ſtretching out of the banke for that in ſo ſtraite a plaine they could not diſplay their ordenance And the vauntgard being now led to the right way of the campe of thennemies, the Marquis of Mantua with an eſquadron of ſix hundred men at armes of the gallanteſt of all the armie, and with a great band of ſtradiots & other light horſemen followed with fiue thowſand footemen, paſſed the riuer at the backe of the arearegard of the french, leauing vpon the banke on thother ſide Anthony of Montfeltre baſtard to Federyk late Duke of Vrbyn with a great eſquadrõ, to paſſe whẽ he ſhould be called to refreſhe the firſt battel: he ordeyned beſides, that when the fight was begonne, an other parte of the light horſemen ſhould charge thennemie in flancke, & the reſidue of the eſtradiots paſſing the riuer at Furnoue, to giue vpon the baggage of the french, which either for want of men, or (as was bruted) by the councell of Triuulce, was left without garde to who woulde make pray of it: of the other ſide, the Count Caiazze with foure hundred men at armes (amongeſt whom was the company of Dom Alphonſo D'eſte come to the campe without his perſon, for that his father would it ſo) and with two thowſand footemen, paſſed the riuer of Taro to aſſayle the french vauntgard: hauing in like ſort left on the banke on the other ſide Annyball Bentyuole with two hundred men at armes, to giue reskew when he ſhouldbe called: And for the defence of their lodginges and tentes, remeyned two great companies of men at armes and a thowſand footemen, for that the Commiſſioners of Venice would reſerue in all fortunes a whole ſuccor for their ſafetie: But the king ſeing that (contrary to that his Capteines had perſwaded him) ſo great a ſtrength came to charge the arearegard, he turned his backe to the vauntgard, & began to draw neare to the arearegard with the battell, haſting ſo diligently with an eſquadron afore the reſt, that when the charge began, he was in the forefront with the firſt that fought: Some haue written that the companies of the Marquis paſt the riuer not without diſorder, both for the height of the banks, & for the impediments of trees, of blocks, and bowes, wherof commonly the riuers of landfluddes are full: To this others haue left in memorie that his footemen for the ſame difficultie, & becauſe the water was ſwelled with the raine that fell in the night, either came late to the ſeruice of the battell, or at leaſt all were not there, a great parte remeyning on thother ſide the riuer: howſoeuer he was followed, it is moſt certeine, that the charge which the Marquis gaue was reſolut and furious, & was no leſſe valiantly aunſwered by the french, the eſquadron on both ſides entring the conflict Pellmelle and not according to the cuſtom of the warres of Italy, which was to fight one eſquadron againſt an other, & in place of him that was weary and began to retyre,to ſupply the fight with a freſh, making in the ende but one great eſquadron of many eſquadrons, in ſo much as for the moſt parte the skirmiſh or triall of armes wherein commonly died but very few people,endured almoſt a whole day, and often times the ſuddeine comming of the night was the cauſe that they brake of without victorie certeine of either parties. The launces being broken,at the encounter of whom fell to the earth aſwell on the one parte as of the other,many men at armes, and many horſes,euery one beganne with the ſame furie,to lay handes vpon their maſſes,eſtokados,and other ſhort weapons,the horſes fighting with their feete and their teeth,& with the ſhocke,no leſſe then the men that gouerned them: And truely the vertue of thItalians gaue a great ſhow in the beginning,but the vallour and reſolucion of mind in the Marquis, who being followed with a valiant companye of younge gentlemen and Lancepezzades (theſe are braue and proued ſouldiers interteyned aboue the ordinary companies) forgot nothing which apperteyned to a Capteine coragious: The french men ſuſteyned with great vallour ſo hott & furious a charge,but being ouerlayed with ſuch odds of numbers,they began almoſt manifeſtly to ſhake, not without the daũger of the king,within a very few paſſes of whom the baſtard of Burbon was made priſonner,notwithſtanding he fought with great vertue: the fortune of him put hope into the Marquis, to haue the ſame ſucceſſe againſt the perſon of the king, being vndiſcreetely led into a place ſo daungerous without that garde & order which was conuenient for ſo great a Prince: The Marquis with his people,made many aduentures to come neare him: againſt whom,the king albeit he had fewe of his people about him,yet his vertue defended his perſon,and his naturall courage ouercame his preſent daunger, the fiercenes and agilitie of his horſe doing more to his ſafetie, then the ſuccors of his people: In theſe great perills,there wanted not in him,thoſe coũcels, which in actious daungerous are wont moſt to appeare in mens memorie and fancies: for that in ſo great a diſtreſſe of fight ſeeing him ſelfe almoſt made naked of his garde,and abandoned of fortune & worldly ſuccors,he had recourſe to the heauenly aydes,making a vowe to S. Denys and S. Martyn reputed protectors particular of the realme of Fraunce,that if he paſſed ſafe into Pyemont with his armie, he would, aſſoone as he was returned on the other ſide the Mountes,make perſonall viſitacion & that with great giftes, to the holy temples dedicated to their names,the one ſtanding neare to Parys,and the other in the towne of Tours: and that euery yeare with moſt ſolemne feaſtes and ſacrifices, he would honor and celebrate ſo great a grace receiued by their meane: After this contemplacion & promiſe to accompliſh theſe vowes,he entred into a new courage,the ſtrength of his body redoubling in the ſpirit and comfort of his minde,and ſo beganne eftſoones to fight with greater valour then his complexion could naturally beare. The daunger of the king ſo touched & enflamed thoſe that were left farre of,that ronning to couer with their perſons, the perſon of the king,they ſuſteined thItalians: And his battel which remeyned behind, preſſing in at the ſame time,an eſquadron of the ſame charged ſo furiouſly the ennemies in the flancke,that it moderated ſomewhat their heate, and preſently reskued the kinges daunger: whereunto was added this helpe,that Rodolphe Gonzague Vncle by the mother to the Marquis of Mantua, A Capteine of great experience, as he encouraged the ſouldiers & reordered ſuch as he ſaw out of order,doing alwayes many other good offices of an excellent Capteine, as he rayſed by chaunce his beauer, was ſo hurt in the face with an eſtockado by a french mã, that falling from his horſe, his people could neuer reskew him in ſo great a confuſion and tumult,and ſo thicke

trowpes of fierce horſes raging without gouernment: But hauing other mē & horſes falling vpon him, he dyed rather ſtiffled and ſmothered with the thronge of horſes feete and treadings, then by the armes or blowes of the ennemies: A chaunce truely vnworthy ſuch a man, for that in the councells of the day before, & the ſame morning, he perſwaded contrary to the will of his nephewe to abſteyne from fight, iudging it a great want of diſcreſſion to hazarde them ſelues to the will of fortune without any neceſſitie. Thus the battell chaunging by diuerſe accidents, and no aduauntage appearing more for th Italians then for the french men, the difference was now more then euer to whome the victorie would remeyne: In ſo much that hope and feare being equall on both partes, they fought with an incredible furie, euery one eſteeming that the victorie reſted in his right hand and ſtrength, and not at the diſpoſing of fortune: An auncient perſwaſion in old ſouldiers, that in actions of battell and warre, the ſucceſſe of the victorie followeth not the number of the ſouldiers, but reſteth in the reſolucion of their mindes and innocencie of their cauſe: The " " " french men had a deſperat courage, aſwell for the preſence & daunger of their king (for that nation hath alwayes borne no leſſe reuerence to the maieſtie of their kings, then to things of diuinitie) as for that they were hemmed into ſuch ſtraites and places, as gaue no hopes of their ſafetie, but by the onely victorie: The Italians were incouraged, by the couetouſnes of ſo rich a pillage, by the honorable example of the Marquis leading them to the battell with ſo happy ſucceſſe, and with the great number of their armie, by whome they had expectacion of great ſuccors from their friendes and contreyes enuyroning, a thing which the frenche coulde not hope for, for that either their whole companies were already in the fight, or at leaſt attended euery inſtant to be charged and brought into the fortune of their fellowes: But it is " not dowted, that the power of fortune is great in all our humane actions, more " mighty in matters of warre then in any other thing, but moſt infinit and ineſtimable " in the feates of armes, where, one commaundement ill vnderſtanded, one order ill " executed, one raſhnes, one vaine voice, yea ſometimes euen of the meaneſt ſouldi- " our, carieth many times the victorie to ſuch as ſeemed euen then vanquiſhed and ouercome, and where vnlooked for doe happen many ſuddeine accidents, which it is impoſſible to the Capteine by his experience to foreſee, or let by his councell, or aſſure by his wiſedom: In ſo much as, in ſo great a dowt, not fayling of her cuſtom, ſhe did that, which neither the vertue of men, nor the force of armes had not yet done: for, the eſtradiots ſent to charge the tents and baggage of the french, hauing begonne to ſpoyle without any reſiſtance, and beginning to leade away to the other ſide the water, ſome mulets, ſome ſompters, and ſome armor: not onely the other eſtradiots appointed to charge the french in the flanke, but euen ſuch as were already within the fight, ſtirred vp with the ſight of the gaine wherwith they ſaw their companions goe laden to their tents, left the battell, and turned their weapons to pyll & ſpoyle that that was left of the french pillage: And one cauſe, one reſpect, and one example drawing the reſidue, you ſhould ſee many horſemen, and footemen yſſue by trowpes out of the battell, to doe the like: By which occaſion, not onely the ſuccors ordeined, failing th Italians, but euen the numbers of thoſe that fought diminiſhing with ſo great diſorders, and Anthony of Montfeltre not remouing for that no man called him, Gonzagua being ſlaine vpon whoſe calling he depended: The french men began to winne ſo much ground, that now nothing did more ſuſteyne th Italians (manifeſtly declining) then the vertue of the Marquis, who expreſſing in his perſon all the actions required in a valiant capteine, made head yet againſt the new fortune and furie of the ennemies, and laboring with euery poſſibilitie to keepe them from the victorie, ſometimes he encouraged his people by his owne example, and eftſoones with ſweete and pearſing ſpeeches perſwaded them rather to loſe their liues then their honors, ſeeking to reſolue their mindes with all thoſe reſpectes of honor, profit, reputacion, and neceſſitie, which make the ſouldier goe the battel. But it was impoſſible that in a few ſhould be continued long reſiſtance againſt many, or that the vertue which is not fauored with fortune ſhould not at laſt fayle. The ennemies multiplied vpō them on all ſides, a great part of their owne were ſlayne, & many hurt without hope of further help to the ſeruice, yea euen of the particular band of the Marquis: by which extremities, they were driuen to fal into diſorder & flee to repaſſe the riuer, which by the raine ouer night, and the hailes and watery ſtormes falling in great abundance during the fight, was riſen ſo high that it gaue great impediments to ſuch as were forced to repaſſe ouer it. The french men followed the chaſſe with a furie equall to their fortune euen to the riuer, regarding nothing more then to make ſlaughter of thoſe that fledd, without taking any priſoner or reſpecting the ſpoyles and gaine of the chaſſe: onely they cryed with redoubled voices, companions remember Guiguegate: Guiguegate is a village in Piccardye neare to Teronane, where, in the later yeares of the raigne of Lovvys the xj. the french men almoſt victorious in a battell againſt Maximylian king of Romaines, being diſordered becauſe they beganne to fall to pillage, were put to flight: But at the ſame time that on that ſide of tharmie the fight was valiant & obſtinat, the vauntgard of the french (againſt the which the Count Caiazze led one part of the horſemen, came to the battell with ſo great a furie, that the Italians aſtoniſhed when they ſaw they were not followed of their peoples, inclined of them ſelues ſo faſt to diſorder, that many of their leaders being ſlayne, amongeſt whom was Iohn Piccingu and Galeas of Correge, they returned in manifeſt flight to the great eſquadron: But the Mareſhall of Gie, diſcerning (beſides the ſquadron of the Count) an other regiment of men at armes prepared to the battell on the other ſide the riuer, woulde not ſuffer his ſouldiers to followe them: which afterwards by ſome was reputed a councell diſcreete and wiſe, and by others, looking perhaps leſſe into the reaſon then into the euent, it was iudged a reſolucion rather cowardly, then conſtant: for that, if he had purſued them, the Count and his companies had giuen him their backes, by which diſaray he had ſo amaſed the reſidue of their ſtrength remeyning on thother ſide the water, that there woulde haue bene great impoſſibilitie to reteyne them, ſeeing that the Marquis fleeing aſwell as the others, & repaſſing the riuer as ſtrongly and in as good order as he could, found them in ſuch tumultes and ſeparacions, as euery one thinking to ſaue him ſelfe with his cariage, the high way that goeth from Plaiſanca to Parma was already ful of horſes, of men, and cariages which drewe to Parma: This tumult partely was ſtayed by the preſence and authoritie of the Marquis, who reaſſembled them & put eftſoones all in order: But much more did reaſſure the deuided minds of the Italians the comming of the Count of Petillane, who in ſo generall a confuſion of both the armies, vſing thoccaſion, fled to th Italian camp: where diſperſing comfort to euery one, & affirming that amongeſt the ennemies, was no leſſe diſorder and amaze, he eftſoones confirmed and reaſſured their mindes: In ſo much that both by opinion & reaſon, euery one ſuppoſed that without him, either at thinſtant, or at leaſt the night following, all the campe had diſperſed in great terror: Thus th Italians retired to their campe, except ſuch as being caried by confuſion and tumult, and thinking to finde ſafetie in fleing, were ſeparat into ſundry places, wherof many falling into the hands of the french men,found at one inſtant an ende of their life and fortunes: The king with his people drew to his vauntgarde which had not ſtirred: And there deuiſing with his capteines,whether he ſhould ſuddeinly paſſe the riuer and giue vpon thennemies in their lodgings,he was councelled by Triuulce & Camilla Vitelli, (who was come to the battell with a few horſemen,hauing ſent the reſidue of his companie to the enterpriſe of Genes) to ſet vpon them: And Frauncis Secco furthering the expedicion more then any other,tolde the king that the way that was ſeene ſo farre of, was full of men and horſes,which argued that either they were fled to Parma, or hauing begon the chaſſe, were eftſoones returned to the campe: But truely the difficultie to paſſe the riuer was not litle: and the bandes that partly had fought, and partly were kept armed in the fielde, were ſo weary and ouertrauelled, that by the councell of the french capteines,it was determined to ſeeke harbor: And ſo they went to lodge vpon the hill in the village of Medeſane, of litle more diſtance then a myle from the place of the battell: there they pitched their lodging without any order, but with great incommodity,for that the moſt part of their baggage and ſtuffe was made pillage by thennemie.

This was the diſcourſe of the battell betwene the Italians and the french vpon the riuer of Taro,not vnworthy of memory for that it was the firſt of very long time that was fought in Italy with ſlaughter and bludd, ſeeing that in all battells or actions of warre in that contrey,the liues of men were wont more to be put to raunſom, then ſolde with the price of bludde: But in this,notwithſtanding of the french parte, the ſlaughter skarcely conteyned three hundreth bodies, yet of th Italians were founde deade more then three hundreth men at armes,and of others as many as made vpp the number of three thowſand perſons,amongeſt whom was Ramiccio de farneze leader of the Venetian horſemen with many other gentlemen of marke: Barnardyn de Montone alſo a Capteine of horſemen vnder the Venetians, whoſe name was more populous and renowmed by Braccio de Montone his grandfather,one of the firſt bewtifiers of th Italian diſcipline of warre,then by his proper vertue or fortune, receiued a blow with a maſſe vnder his helmet,with the which being fallen from his horſe,he was left on the ground for dead. This ſlaughter was ſo much the more wonderfull to th Italians, by how much the encownter endured not aboue an hower,euery one on both ſides fighting with his proper force and vallour without helpe of the artillerie or ſhott: Touching the honor of the iorney, either part labored to approyat to his particular,the renowme and glory of the victorie: Th Italians occupied this reaſon,for that their tentes and cariages remeyned vntouched,where the frenche of the contrary,had their lodgings rifled and loſt much of their beſt ſtuffe, yea parte of the proper pauilions of the king: They alleaged further, that they had vtterly diſconfeted thennemies,if one part of their people appoynted to enter the battell,had not turned to the pillage of their trenches,a thing which the french confeſſed to be true: The Venetians were ſo partiall, that with a peculiar glorie they made them ſelues victors, and by publike commaundement thorow all the landes of their obedience,and ſpecially at Venice they made bonfyers, with other feaſtes and teſtimonies of gladnes: This publike example was followed with no leſſe affection of ſundry particulars,for that vppon the ſepulcher of Melchior Treuiſan, were ſtamped theſe carecters of letters in the Church of the Frear minors, he fought proſperouſly vpon the riuer of Taro againſt Charles king of Fraunce: But by the vniuerſall conſent of men indifferent the palme,merit, and true glorie of the victorie,was adiudged to the french men,both for the numbers of the dead ſo farre different and vnequal,and for the chaſſe of thennemies ouer the riuer,and alſo for that they wonne their libertie to paſſe further,which was the controuerſie for the which they came to the battel. The king remeyned all the day following incamped in the ſame place,procuring by the meane of Argenton a parley with thennemies,by which was accorded a truce till night: that abſtinence or truce was not vnwelcome to the king, for that he deſired to paſſe with ſewertie,knowing that many of thItalian armie had not yet fought, and remeyning in order about their trenches, the marche of ſo many dayes iorney thorow the Duchie of Myllan with thennemy in his tayle,could not but be daungerous: Beſides,he knew not what reſolucion to take, ſuch was the ſimplenes of the councell with whom he vſed moſt conference and direction in his moſt waightieſt deliberacions,reiecting for the moſt part the aduiſes of men graue & experienced: No leſſe dowt and interteintie trauelled alſo the mindes of thItalians, who albeit at the beginning were falne into no ſmall aſtoniſhment, yet they were eftſoones ſo reaſſured,that the night after the battell,they held councell, (by the encouraging and comfort chiefly of the Count Petillane) to inuade the french campe in the night, being diſordered with many incommodities,and not fortefied:by the pluralitie of voices this councell was reiected, as bringing more perill then profitte. There ronne a brute thorow all Italy that the bandes of Lodovvyk Sforce,according to his ſecret direction,would not fight much,leaſt hauing ſo ſtrong an armie of the Venetians vpon his eſtates,he was in more feare of their victorie, then of the fortunes of the french, touching whom he was indifferent whether they were victors or vanquiſhed: And therefore for his better ſewertie in all chaunces, he was blamed for this ſuttletie to keepe his forces whole, vppon which was impoſed thoccaſion that thItalian armie did not obteyne the victorie: This opinion was mēteyned by the Marquis of Mantua and the other Venetian capteines,to make their reputacion the greater: neither was it receiued with leſſe wil of all ſuch as deſired the augmentacion of the glorie of thItalian ſouldiers: But I haue heard this brute confuted by a perſonage of iudgment & grauitie and remeyning then at Myllan in ſuch degree,as the abſolute & true knowledge of affayres was brought to him: he purging Lodovvyk,aſſured the world, that hauing ſent moſt of his forces to the ſeege of Nouaro, he had not ſo many at the battell of Taro as were of great conſequence for the victorie, which in deede the armie of the confederats had obteyned, if their proper diſorders had not hurt them more then the want of a great number of men,ſeing withall, that many whole companies of the Venetians fought not at all: And where the Count Caiazze ſent againſt thennemie but one parte of his companies, and that very coldly: he did it perhaps, for that the vauntgard of the french was ſo ſtronge, that the daunger was apparant to committ him ſelfe to fortune,and perhaps becauſe ordinarily actions couragious & venterous haue made him more wonderfull,then ſuch wherein was ſewertie: Notwithſtanding,the companies of Sforce were not altogether vnprofitable,for that albeit they fought not,yet they kept at a bay the vauntgard of the french,and were the cauſe that it gaue no ſuccors to the king, who with the leſſe or moſt weake parte of tharmie,ſuſteyned with the great daunger of his perſon, all the brunt and ſwaigh of that dayes fight: In my iudgement this teſtimonie is no more confirmed with authoritie then with reaſon: for, how is it likely that if that intencion had bene in Lodovvyk,he would not rather haue inſtructed his capteines, to diſſwade from letting the french men to paſſe: ſeing that if the victorie had falne on the french, his bands being ſo neare thennemie,had bene no more in ſafetie then the others,notwithſtanding they medled not in the battell: And with what diſcourſe with what conſideracion cion, or with what experience of thinges could he promiſe to him ſelfe, that comming to the fight, fortune would be ſo equall, that the french king ſhould neither be victor nor vanquiſhed.

The morning following the king departed with his armie before day, without ſownd of trompets to couer his diſcamping as much as he could: And for that day he was not followed by tharmie of the confederats, who though they had had will to haue purſued him, yet they ſhould haue found impediments in the waters of the riuer, which were ſo much increaſed by raynes that fell in the night, that there was no poſſibilitie of paſſage for the day following: Only at the declining of the Sunne paſſed ouer not without daunger the Count Caiazze with two hundred light horſemen, & following the trace of the french men, who marched the right way towards Plaiſance, he gaue them the day following many alarms and impediments: And yet, all wearied and trauelled as they were, they kept their way without diſorder, the villages refreſhing them with plẽtie of vittells, partly for feare to receiue hurt by them, and partly by the meane of Triuulce, who skouring before for the ſame effect with the light horſemen of tharmie, made perſwaſions to men, ſometimes by threates, & ſometimes with his authoritie, great in that Duchie with all ſortes, but more great with the famulie of the Guelffes: The armie of the league which remoued the day after the diſcamping of the french, and but litle diſpoſed (ſpecially the prouiſors of the Venetians) to put them ſelues any more in the arbytrement of fortune, came neuer ſo neare them, as to annoy them with any litle diſcommoditie: But being lodged the ſecond day vpon the riuer of Trebia a litle beyond Plaiſance, (the Svvyzzers & two hundreth launces and almoſt all the artillerie remeyning betwene the riuer & the citie of Plaiſance for the commoditie of incamping,) the fludds were ſo great by reaſon of the raines falling in the night that notwithſtanding their extreame diligence, it was impoſſible that either the footemen or horſemen coulde paſſe but at high daies and then with difficultie, although the waters began to abate: notwithſtanding all which oportunities fauoring tharmie of the league, yet they neuer executed any action againſt the french but a farre of, nor yet the Count de Caiazze who was entred within Plaiſance for ſuſpicion of reuolt or tumult: which ſuſpicion was not altogether without occaſion, for that it was beleeued that if the king according to the councell of Tryuulce, had diſplaied his enſeignes vnder the name of Frauncis the litle ſonne of Iohn Galeas, the Duchie would eaſily haue falne into ſome mutacion, ſo plawſible was the name of him whom they held for their lawful Lord, and ſo hatefull the remembrance of the vſurper, and of ſpeciall importance the credit and friendſhips of Triuulce: But the king in whom was ſetled no other impreſſion then to paſſe on, would not be intangled with newe practiſes, but followed his way with diligent and ſpeedie marche, finding great want of vittells after the firſt dayes trauel, and in all places, the fortes & peeces well garded, Lodovvyk hauing diſtributed what into Tortone vnder Iaſper S. Seuerin ſurnamed Frecaſſe, and what into Alexandria many horſemen with twelue hundred launceknightes which he had drawne from the campe of Nouaro: After the king was paſſed Trebia, his armie was alwayes vexed in the tayle by the Count Caiazze, who had ioyned to his light horſemen fiue hundreth launceknightes of the garriſon of Plaiſance, not being able to obteine to be ſent to him from the army, all the reſidue of the light horſemen and foure hundreth men at armes, for that the Venetian Commiſſioners, warned by the perill at the battell of Taro, would giue no conſent eftſoones to hazard their forces: At laſt the french men taking (when they were neare to Alexandria) their way more high towards the moũtaine where the riuer of Tanaro ronnes with ſhalloweſt water, were brought without loſſe of men in eight remoues or ſoiornings of the campe afore the walls of Aſt: In which citie after the king was entred, he diſperſed his men of warre into the champion with intencion to encreaſe his armie, and to abide in Italy vntill he had ſuccored Nouaro: And the campe of the league which had purſued him to the contrey of Tortone diſpairing now to vexe him more, went & ioyned it ſelfe to the companies of Lodovvyk Sforce beſeeging the ſayd citie of Nouaro: which euen nowe began to ſuffer great skarcetie of vittels, for that by the Duke of Orleans nor his people had bene vſed any diligence for prouiſion, which by reaſon of the fertilitie of the contrey, they might haue done in great plentie and at eaſie rate: but like men either blinded with ſecuritie, or elſe of litle pollecie, they neuer conſidered of the daũgers, till the meane of the remedie were paſt, conſuming without ſparing all the ſtore of vittells which they found there.

The french kinges attẽpt vpon Genes ſpedd euill.

About this ſeaſon returned to the king thoſe Cardinals and capteines, who with ill ſucceſſe had bene at thenterpriſe of Genes: for after the kinges armie by ſea had taken the towne of Spetia, it ſet vpon Rapalle and poſſeſſed it eaſily: But there yſſued out of the port of Genes a nauie of eight light gallies, one carracke, and two barkes of biskayes, which by night put on lande ſeuen hundreth footemen, who without any difficultie tooke the borow of Rapalle with the french garriſon that were within, and then accoaſting the french nauie retired to the golffe, after long fight they remeyned victors taking and burning all their veſſells, the Capteines made priſoners, and the place, by this victorie made more renowmed, for that in the yeare before, th Arragons were there defeated: Neither was this aduerſitie recompenſed by the armie that went by land, who guided by the eaſt riuer to Valdibiſague and ſo to the ſuburbs of Genes, found them ſelues deceiued in their hopes that in Genes would riſe tumults: And therefore vnderſtanding of the ſpoyle and loſſe of the nauie by ſea, they tooke way with no leſſe ſpeede, then feare, to the mounteyne ſharpe and vneaſie, and from thence diſcended to the valley of Pozzeuere which is of the other part of the citie: from whence, notwithſtanding their trowpes were ſtronge and great by the concurſe of payſants and other populars whom the Duke of Sauoye had ſent in their fauors, they drew with the ſame diligence towards Pyemont: In the action of this enterpriſe it is certeine, that if they within the towne had not bene reſtrained from yſſuing forth for dowt leaſt the faction of Fregoſa woulde make ſome innouacion, they had wholly broken the french armie and put them to flight: The horſemen alſo of Vitelli (comen now to Chiauere, vnderſtanding the ſucceſſe & great diſorder of thoſe with whom they went to ioyne in ſtrength) retired with no leſſe haſt then daunger, to Serezana: In ſo much, that except Spetia, all the places of that riuer that had bene occupied by the baniſhed, reappealed or called againe forthwith the Genovvays, as did in like ſort in the riuer of the ponent, the citie of Vintemille, which in the ſame dayes had bene occupied by Pavvle Baptiſta Fregoſa, and certeine others of the baniſhed.

Ferdinand to reconquer his kingdom of Naples.

In the ſame times, the warre was alſo as hoat in the realme of Naples, as in the partes of Lumbardye, but with a more diuerſe fortune: for, Ferdinand after he had takẽ Regge, conſidered how he might recouer the places bordring, hauing in his army ſix thowſand men comprehending ſuch of the contrey and Sicile as willingly followed him, togither with the horſemen and footemen of the Spaniſh, ouer whom was Capteine, Conſaluo Eruandes of the houſe of D'aghilar and contrey of Cordone, A man very valiant and long exerciſed in the warres of Granado: This man, at his firſt comming

ning into Italy, being called (by a Spaniſh bragge) the great Capteine, the better to ſignifie with this title, the ſoueraigne power that he had ouer them, did well deſerue by many goodly victories which he there achiued, that that ſurname might be iuſtly appropriated, confirmed, and perpetuated in him by vniuerſall conſent in teſtimony of his great vertue and excellencie in the knowledge of warre: To this armie, which had already ſtirred vp a great part of the contrey, Monſr D'Aubygny preſentes him ſelfe neare Somynare, a towne vppon the ſea, with the men at armes of Fraunce remeyning for the gard of Calabria and ſuch bandes of horſemen and footemen as the Lordes of the contrey of the french faction had ſent to him: And being come to the battell, the vallour of the ſouldiers which were of trayne and exerciſe, caried the victorie againſt the ignorance of the other litle experienced: for, not onely the Italians and Sicilyans which Ferdinand had gathered in haſt, but alſo euen the Spanyardes, were ſouldiers new and vntrayned to ſeruice: with whom notwithſtanding, he mainteyned the skirmiſhe with great ſtoutnes, for that the vertue and authoritie of the Capteines failing nothing of their place and office, ſuſteyned ſuch as for all other regardes, were much inferior: Ferdinand aboue the reſidue, applying vertue to thinnocencie of his quarrell, behaued him ſelfe as well apperteyned to his vertue: In ſo much as his horſe being ſlayne vnder him, he had in all coniecture, remeyned either dead or taken, if Iohn de Capua brother to the Duke of Termyny, (who had bene his page from his childhood, & whom he intyerly loued in that flower of age) had not alighted and remounted him vpon his horſe, and with an example of faith and loue very notable and worthy, offered his owne life for the ſafetie of his Lorde, in whoſe preſence he was ſlaine vpon the place: Conſaluo fleeth along the mounteines to Regge, and Ferdinand to Palma which lyeth vppon the ſea neare to Semynara, and there tooke gallies and ſayled to Meſſina: And as in aduerſities neceſſitie is mightie to make men reſolute, ſo by this ouerthrow, there increaſed in him a new courage and will to aſſay againe the triall of fortune: for, he was not onely aduertiſed that the whole citie of Naples thirſted with great deſire to haue him, but alſo by ſecret intelligence he knew that he was generally called by the principalls of the nobilitie & people: And therefore eſchewing delayes where was ſo great neceſſitie of expedicion, and fearing leaſt lingring ioyned to the reapport of his ouerthrow in Calabria, might not eftſoones make cold that new diſpoſicion: After he had aſſembled (beſides the gallies which he had led from Yſchia, and the foure that ſerued his fathers firſt departure from Naples) the other veſſels that brought the Spanyardes into Sicyle, with all others that he could recouer of the cities and Barons of Sicyle: he hoyſſeth ſayle out of the port of Meſſina, not tarying for that he had not men of warre ſufficient to arme them: wherein wanting forces conuenient for ſuch an enterpriſe, he was conſtrained to furniſh and ſerue his turne no leſſe with demonſtracion and apparance, then with theffect and ſubſtance of thinges: he departed from Sicyle with lxx. veſſells of cable and anker, and twenty others of leſſe proporcion, accompanied with Ricaienſe of Catelognia Capteine of the Spaniſh veſſels, a man whoſe experiẽce was equall to his reſolucion in ſeruices at ſea: he had ſo ſmall proporcions of fighting men, that in moſt parte of theſe veſſells there were almoſt no other ſortes or natures of men, then ſuch as neceſſarily were appoynted to the ſeruice of the nauigacion: In this ſort his forces were ſmall, but great towards him were the fauors and goodwills of the people: in ſo much that being arriued in the roade of Salerne, Salerne it ſelfe, the coaſt of Melff, and of Cauo, hoyſſed their ſtreamers to the winde: After wards he remeined two daies aboue Naples, in expectacion to heare of ſome tumult

in the towne: But for the time his fortune being ſlow made his deſire vaine, for that the french men ronning preſently to armes, and planting ſure garde vpon places of perill, ſuppreſſed immediatly the rebellion that euen already was kindled: yea, they had put remedie to all their daungers, if they had valiantly followed the councell of ſome amongeſt them, who geſſing that the veſſells of th Arragons were ill manned with ſouldiers able to fight, aduiſed Monſr Montpenſier to returniſh the french veſſells which were in the hauen with bodies reſolute and men of action, and ſo giue the charge to thennemie: The third day Ferdinand deſpairing of commotion in the citie, turned his ſayles into the ſeaward to retyre to Tſchia: by which it hapned, that the conſpirators with Ferdinand, conſidering that their faction and intelligence was now diſcouered, and therefore his cauſe was become theirs, and proper and general to euery one of them, drew them to an aſſembly, and determined to be blind againſt all daungers and difficulties, making of their common neceſſitie a ſpeciall vertue: This deliberacion was followed to effect, for that they diſpatched ſecretely a litle boate to call home Ferdinand, beſeching him to put on land either all or the greateſt part of his companies, to thende to ioyne meane and courage to ſuch as were inclined to make inſurrection in his fauor: vppon this intelligence, Ferdinand returned eftſoones aboue Naples, and the day after the battell of Furnoue, he approched neare the ſhoare to take land at Magdalena a mile from Naples, and where the riuer of Sebeta falls into the ſea: it is rather a ſmall brooke then a riuer, which yet had lyen vnknowen if the verſes of the Poets of Naples had not giuen it a name: Monſr Montpenſier to whom all thinges were diſcloſed, ſhewed him ſelfe no leſſe hardy and ready to charge them when was cauſe to feare them, then he was vnreſolute and fearefull the day before when courage was neceſſary: In ſo much that yſſuing out of the city almoſt with all his ſtrength to ſtoppe the diſcending of Ferdinand: The Neapolytans taking thoportunitie of thoccaſion (which was ſuch as they could not haue deſired better) roſe ſuddeinly into armes: And ſounding a larme by ringing the greate bell of the frears next to the walls of the towne, all the other Churches doing the like, they ſeazed vpon the gates of the towne, and began to publiſh the name of Ferdinand: This ſudleine tumult ſo amazed the french men, that holding it a place of no ſewertie to remeyne betwene thennemies and the citie rebelled, and leſſe exſpectacion to returne by that way they yſſued out, they determined to reenter Naples by the gate that belonged to the new caſtell, for thaccompliſhment whereof they muſt take a long way ful of hills & troubleſom & compaſſing the walls of the towne: But in this meane while Ferdinand being entred, and mounted on horſebacke with certeine of his followers by the Neapolytaines, rode thorow the towne to thincredible ioy and gladnes of euery one, the communaltie receiuing him with great cryes and ſhewtes, and the Ladies and women beholding him out of windowes and caſements, could not be ſatisfied to couer him with flowers and ſweete ſmelling waters: yea many of the nobles ronne in the ſtreete to embraſe him & wype the ſweate from his face, not being negligent for all this in thinges neceſſary for the defence of the citie: for, the Marquis of Piſcaire accompanied with the ſouldiers which were entred with Ferdinand and the youth of Naples, looked to the intrenching and fortefying of all places for their defence againſt the french: who after they were come vpon the greene of the newcaſtell, and doing what they could to reenter into the hart of the citie, were ſo repulſed by crosbow men and ſmall ſhot, that finding at all the entreyes and commings to the ſtreetes, a reſiſtance ſtronge and ſufficient, and the night nowe drawing on, they retyred to the caſtell, leauing almoſt of all ſortes two thowſand

thowſand horſes vpon the greene, hauing no place nor feeding for them in the caſtell: within the caſtell were incloſed with Monſr Montpenſier, Meßire Yues D'alegro, a Capteine of reputacion, and Anthony Prince of Salerne, with many others french and Italians of marke: who albeit ſpent certeine dayes in skirmiſhing, aſwell on the caſtell greene as about the port, diſcharging their artillerie into the towne, yet finding in their repulſes a redobled vallour in thennemie, they remeyned voyd of hope to be able to recouer the citie of them ſelues.

The example of Naples was immediatly followed by Capua, Auerſa, the rocke of Montdragon, & many other peeces there aboutes, yea moſt part of the kingdom was ſuddeinly in reuolt: Amongeſt whom thoſe of Caietta taking armes with more courage then force, and their hopes farre greater then their fortune, for that certeine gallies of Ferdinand were diſcouered afore the haue, they were with general ſlaughter oppreſſed by the french garriſons there, who with a furie agreing with the cauſe giuen, ſacked all their citie.

At the ſame time the nauie of the Venetians being come neare to Monopoly one of the cities of Powylla, after they had ſet on lande their eſtradiots and many of their footemen, aſſalted it both by ſea & land, where Peter Bembo owner of one of the Venetian gallyes was ſlayne with a ſhot out of the towne: But in the ende fortune yelding to vertue, the citie was taken by force, and the caſtell likewiſe rendred for feare which the french Capteine had that kept it: the ſayd nauie tooke alſo by compoſicion the towne of Puligniane.

Ferdinand was not without apparant hopes to haue the newcaſtell and the caſtel of the egge, for that famine (which is an ennemie troubleſom) ſerued more for him then his force or pollicie there remeyning a very ſmal quantitie of vittells in regard of the proporcion of men that were within: And winning vppon them continually the places about the caſtel, to thend to keepe them at a ſtraiter compaſſe: the french men ſuccoring the aduerſities of their fortune with induſtrie & pollicie, ſeeing their armie by ſea had no ſewertie in the hauen, which conteyned fiue ſhippes, foure light gallies, a galliot, and a gallion: they retyred them betwene the tower of S. Vincent, the eggecaſtell, and Pizifalcone, which yet they helde, as alſo the hinder partes or skirtes of newcaſtell where were the gardyns of the kinges: In ſo much as keeping peeces euen to Capella, and fortefying the monaſterie of the croſſe, they made incurſions euen to Piegrotte and S. Martyn: Againſt whom Ferdinand hauing taken and fortefyed Hipodrome, and made couert wayes by Incoronato, he poſſeſſed the Mount of S. Herme, and afterwards the hill of Pizifalcone, the french holding the caſtell ſeated in the higheſt part of it: To hinder the ſuccors that were to come from it (for in taking it they might endomage and batter from the ſteepe places the nauie of thennemie) Ferdinand aſſailed the monaſterie of the croſſe: At whoſe firſt approch they receiued ſuch harmes by the artillerie, that diſpairing to winne it by force, they deuiſed to betray it by practiſe and intelligence: A deuiſe very vnhappy and wretched to him that was thautor: for that a Moare which was within, hauing fraudulently promiſed to the Marquis of Piſcare (aforetimes his maſter) to put him within the place, and in that action, hauing made him come by night by a ladder faſtened to the wall of the monaſterie to ſpeake with him, to thende to agree vpon the manner and time to enter it the ſame night: he was by great treaſon and double intelligence ſlaine with the ſhott of a crosbow ronning thorow his throate. Marquis of Piſcare ſlain.

It was not of litle importance for the affayres of Ferdinand, the reuolt firſt of Proſper and then Fabrice Collonne, who during the bonde of their ſeruice and othe contracted with the french king, (going with the ſtreame of the time) returned to the pay of Ferdinand almoſt aſſoone as he had recouered Naples: They excuſed themſelues that they were not ſatisfied in time of their due payments promiſed, And that to Virginio Vrſin and the Count Petillane (with ſmall regard to their merits) were giuen many fauors and aduauncements of the king: A reaſon that ſeemed to many very weake, and farre inferior to the greatnes of the benefits which they had receyued of him: But it may be dowted, that that which reaſonably ought to ſerue as a bridle to reſtrayne them, was the very mocion that led them to doe the contrary, ſeing by how much the benefits they had receiued were great and many, by ſo much perhaps was great in them the deſire to keepe them, looking withall into the ill diſpoſicion of the affayres of the french which began euen then to ſhake and declyne.

But now the caſtell thus hemmed in, and the ſea reſtrayned by the nauies of Ferdinand, the want of vittells increaſed more and more, and they that were beſeeged interteyned themſelues onely with hopes to haue ſuccors out of Fraunce by ſea, the rather for that the king (aſſoone as he was arriued at Aſt) had diſpatched Peron de la Baſche to rigge in the hauen of Ville franche neare to Nice an armie at ſea of two thowſand Gaſcoins and Svvyzzers with prouiſion of vittells, whoſe leader and Capteine ſhould be Monſr D'Arban, a man warlike, but not experienced in the ſeruice of the ſea: This nauie being put vnder ſayle and arriued as farre as the yle of Poreze, diſcouering thereabout the nauie of Ferdinand conteyning thirty ſayles and two great ſhippes of Genoua, retyred and fell forthwith into flight: And being purſued vnto the yle of Elba, they made way in ſuch feare to the hauen of Lyuorne, with the loſſe of a litle ſhippe of Biskay, that it was not in the power of the Capteine to withhold moſt of his men from going on ſhoare, and againſt his diſcipline and will to ronne amayne to Pyſa: By reaſon of the retyre & defeate of this armie at ſea, Monſr Mountpenſier with his companies, preſſed with want of vittells, accorded to render the caſtell to Ferdinand hauing now endured the ſeege three monthes, & from thẽce to goe to Prouence, if they were not reskewed within thirty dayes: This contract included ſewertie of life and goodes to all ſuch as were within the caſtell, giuing in oſtage to Ferdinand, Tues D'Alegre with three others for aſſurance of the condicions. But the ſhortnes of time made impoſſible all hope or expectacion of ſuccors, other then ſuch as they had within the realme: In which reſpect Monſr de Perſy one of the Capteines of the king, accompanied with the Svvyzzers and parte of the french launces, and the Prince of Byſignian with many other Barons, drewe ſtraight to Naples: Againſt whom, Ferdinand hauing eſpiall of their comming, ſent out to Eboly the Count of Matalono with an armie for the moſt part confuſed, compownded vpon bodies whom he truſted and eſteemed his friendes: This armie albeit was much ſuperior in numbers and furniture, yet encowntring thennemie at the lake of Pizzola which is a litle borow neare Eboly, they fell into generall diſorder and preſent fleeing without fighting. In which chaſe was taken priſoner Venantio ſonne of Iulius Varano Lord of Camaryn: but being not purſued by the frenche, they retyred without great loſſe to Nola and ſo to Naples: The frenchmen (taking courage by this felicitie) followed their enterpriſe to ſuccour the caſtells, and that with ſo great reputacion for the victorie obteyned, that Ferdinand was at poynt once againe to abandon Naples: But receiuing courage by the comfortes of thoſe of the towne, who were no leſſe puſhed forward perhaps with the feares they had of their liues, (remembring their rebellion) then with the friendſhip they bare to Ferdinand: incamped at Capella: And the better to let thennemies for approching the caſtel, caſting a trench from the Mount S. Hermo vntill the egge caſtell, he furniſhed with artillerie and footemen all the hills vntill Capella and aboue Capella: In ſo muche that albeit the frenchmen, who being come to Nocere by the way of Salerna, paſſing by the caue and the hill Pi-egrotte, were guided to Chiaie neare to Naples: yet all thinges hauing good defence, and by the vallour of Ferdinand, the artilleries thundring vppon the frenchmen, but ſpecially thoſe that were planted vpon the hill of Pizifolcone which commaunded the egge caſtell (where earſt were the ſingularities and pompes ſo much renowmed of Lucullus) they could paſſe no further, nor approach Capella: And hauing no meane to make further abode there, for that nature fauoreth the place with all pleaſures & commodities ſauing freſh waters, this neceſſitie conſtrayned them to retyre ſooner then they would, leauing behinde at their diſcamping three peeces of artillerie, and parte of the releeffes which they had brought to reuittell the caſtells: They tooke their way towards Nola, againſt whom Ferdinand oppoſed him ſelfe leauing the caſtell beſeeged, and incamped with his companies in the plaine of Palma neare to Sarny: Monſr Mentpenſier ſeeing by their departure, nothing but an vtter loſſe & priuacion of all hopes for reskewes, leauing three hundreth men within the caſtell (a number no leſſe proporcioned for the vittells whieh nowe were ſhort, then for the ſeruice and defence) and a garriſon within the eggecaſtell: drew away with him the reſidue (which were in all two thowſand fiue hundreth ſouldiers) and by night embarking him ſelfe and companies in the veſſells there, he went to Salerna, not without the great complaintes of Ferdinand, who pretended that it was not lawfull for him (during the tearme wherein he had promiſed to yeld) to depart with ſuch a cõpany, onles he had rendred both the caſtells according to the contract: This eſcape wrought many paſſions in Ferdinand, in whom was no want of inclinacion (according to the rigour of the contract) to reuenge the iniurie and infidelitie of Montpenſier, vpon the bludd and life of the Oſtages: for that the caſtells not redeliuered at the tearme accorded, he had abuſed the wordes of his promiſe with a meaning diſſembled: Notwithſtanding extremities redoubling with time vppon thoſe that remeyned, not able any longer to keepe force againſt the rage of hunger, within leſſe then one month after he was parted, they rendred the caſtell with condicions to haue the oſtages deliuered: And almoſt at the ſame time, and for the ſame occaſion they that were within the eggecaſtell, agreed to yeld the firſt day of the next lent, if they were not reskewed before: Much about this time dyed at Meſſina Alphonſo of Aragon: the glorie and fortune of whom (by the which whileſt he was but Duke of Calabria, his name was made honorable and famous,) were conuerted into a great infamie & infelicitie when he came to be king of Naples: It was ſayd, that a litle before his death, he made inſtance to his ſonne to returne to Naples, where the hatreds that were generall againſt him before time, were now almoſt reconuerted into affections and good lykinges: To whom it is ſuppoſed that Ferdinand (ambicion and deſire to reigne bearing more rule in him then reuerence and reſpect to his father) anſwered no leſſe ſuttelly then in skorne, that he ſhould attend and expect til he had ſo aſſured the realme, that he ſhould not eftſoones be driuen to abandon it and flee.

Alphonſo king of Aragon dyeth.

Ferdinand, to enterteyne him in the friendſhips of the king of Spayne with a bond more ſtraite and aſſured, tooke to wife with diſpenſacion of the Pope, Iane his aunt, doughter to Ferdinand his grandfather and of Iane ſiſter to the ſayd king of the Spaniſhe.

den and brought to very ſtraite and hard termes: for the Duke of Myllan had there a puiſſant armie, which the Venetians had ſuccored with ſuch a readines, that in no enterpriſe within memorie haue they bene knowen to make leſſe ſparing of charges, nor vſed more fidelitie and diligence: there were in this campe of the confederats three thowſand men at armes, three thowſand light horſemen, a thowſand Almaines on horſ backe, & fiue thowſand footemen Italians: But the principal ſtrength of their armie ſtoode vpon the tenne thowſand launceknightes (for ſo are the Almaine footemen called) interteyned moſt part by the Duke of Myllan, to be oppoſed againſt the Svvyzzers, for that th Italian footemen could not endure their name, and much leſſe heare ſpeake of them without feare, ſo greatly were they diminiſhed in reputacion and courage, ſince the french men had action in Italy: ouer them were gouerners many Capteines of vallour reſolute, & for experience generally recommended, Amongeſt whom bare a name moſt ſinguler George Pietrepante of the contrey of Auſtrich, who a few yeares before, being in the pay of Maximylian king of Romaines, conquered with an honorable prayſe vpon the french king, the towne of S. Omer in Picardye: The Senat of Venice was not onely carefull to ſende to this ſeege many bandes of ſouldiers, but alſo to interteyne them in a greater courage, they created gouernor and Capteine generall ouer the armie, the Marquis of Mantua, honoring in him by the collacion of that dignitie, the vertue he ſhowed in the battell of Furnoue or Taro, and with an example worthy of eternall memorie, they had not only increaſed the paies of ſuch as ſhowed vallour there, but alſo indued with penſions and ſundry recompenſes the ſonnes of many that dyed in that battell, and transferred dowrie to their daughters: The ſeege of Nouaro was continued with this mighty armie, for that the councell of the confederats (referring all thinges apperteyning to that action to the will of Lodovvyk Sforce) was not to hazarde the triall of battell with the french king, onles they were conſtrayned, but rather in fortefying about Nouaro the places neceſſary, their intencions were to let vittells for entring: They hoped that thoſe within could not hold out long, for that they had leſſe ſtore of vittells then would ſerue their numbers and proporcion, and no expectacion of remedie in a caſe ſo reſtrayned: for, beſides the people of the citie, and the payſants which were thether retyred, the Duke of Orleans had of french and Svvyzzers more then ſeuen thowſand of choyſe: In which reſpectes, Galeas de S. Seuerin, giuing ouer all cogitacion to take the towne by force, for the multitudes of men of warre that were within, had incamped him ſelfe with the Dukes armie at Mugnes, a place of ſewertie vppon the high way very conuenient to giue impediments to the prouicions that might come to Verceill: And the Marquis of Mantua with the bandes of the Venetians, taking at his arriual by force, certeine peeces there about, together with the caſtell of Brione, a ſeruice of ſome importance, had alſo refurniſhed Camarian and Bolgare which are betwene Nouaro and Verceill, diſtributing the armie into ſundry places about Nouaro, the better to ſtoppe the courſe of vittels, and fortefying euery particular lodging and trench, to be the more eaſie and ready to reſiſtance.

On the other ſide the french king, to haue more oportunitie to the ſuccors of Nouaro, was remoued from Aſt to Thuryn: And albeit he made many iorneyes euen to Chyars, to make court to a Ladie remeyning there, yet that vanitie brought no negligence to the common affayres, for that they ceaſed not without intermiſſion to cõſider of the prouicions for the warres, ſoliciting continually the companies come out of Fraunce, with intencion to put to the field two thowſand frenche launces. They were no leſſe diligent to ſolicit the diſcending of tenne thowſand Svvyzzers for the

leuie of whom was diſpatched the Baylif of Dyon: Their reſolucion was, that aſſoone as the armie was poſſeſſed of them, to aduaunce all meanes poſſible to reskew Nouaro: without the ſtrength of the Svvyzzers, there was litle abilitie in the french to accompliſh any worthy enterpriſe, ſeeing the realme of Fraunce in thoſe tymes albeit mighty in horſemen, and well furniſhed with artilleries and men moſt apt and nymble to manage them, yet it was very weake in footemen of the proper region: The reaſon was, that armes and exerciſes of warre reſting onely in the nobilitie, the auncient vallour of that nation was failed in the multitudes of men of baſe condicion, ignorant in ſeruice martiall for the long tyme they had not managed armes, in place of which they had giuen them ſelues ouer to trades, profits, & delites of peace: for, many of the auncient kinges before, fearing the furie of the popular ſort by the example of diuerſe conſpiracies & rebellions hapning in the ſame kingdō, thought it neceſſary in pollicie to diſarme them, and draw them from the vſe and practiſe of armes: for theſe reaſons the french men, not truſting in the vertue of their owne footemen, neuer went to the warres with courage, onles their armie were ſtrengthned with certeine bandes of the Svvyzzers: which nation in all ages reſolute and hardy in armes, had about twenty yeares before much increaſed their reputacion, for that being aſſailed by a mighty armie led by Charles Duke of Burbon (he that for his power and fiercenes was much redowted not onely in the realme of Fraunce, but of all his neighbours) they had in leſſe then one month put him thryſe to flight, and at the laſt chaſe, either as he fought, or as he fled (the certeine manner being dowtfull) they tooke from him his life: So that, what for their reſolute vallour, and that the french had no controuerſie with them, and leſſe feare to dowte them for their intereſts particular, as they had of the launceknightes, they interteyned no other forreine ſouldiers then the Svvyzzers, vſing their ſeruice in all their warres of importance: but more willingly at that time then at any other, for that they ſaw howe hard a thing it was and full of daunger, to reskew Nouaro enuyroned with ſo great an armie, and wherein were ſo many bandes of launceknightes gouerned by the ſame diſcipline that the Svvyzzers were.

The citie of Verceill is ſcituated in the midd way betwene Thuryn and Nouaro, and hauing in auncient times bene a member of the Duchie of Myllan, it was giuen by Phillipp Maria Viſcounte (during the long warres he had with the Venetians and the Florentyns) to Ayme Duke of Sauoye, to ſeparat it from them: Into this citie was not yet entred any bandes of either part, for that the Ducheſſe mother and tutor to the yong Duke of Sauoye, who in her hart was wholly french, woulde not diſcouer her ſelfe for the king till he were more ſtronge, giuing in the meane while to the Duke of Myllan gracious wordes and hopes: But aſſoone as the king was ſtronge in men and come from Thuryn, a citie of the ſame Duchie, ſhe conſented that he & his ſouldiers ſhould enter within Verceill, when by the oportunitie of that place he entred into a greater hope to be able to ſuccor Nouaro when all his ſtrength ſhould be aſſēbled: And on the other ſide the confederats, for the ſame reaſon began ſo to dowt, that to debate with a more rype and full councel how they ſhould proceede in ſuch difficulties, Lodovvyk Sforce went to the armie with Beatrix his wife, who ordinarily accompanied him no leſſe in matters of importance, then in actions familiar: In the preſence of whom, and (as the brute went) chiefly by her councel, the capteines after many reaſonings, concluded with one conſent, that for the more common ſewertie of them all, the bandes of the Venetians ſhould be ioyned to tharmie of the Duke of Mugnes, leauing ſufficient gard in all the other places about Nouaro ſeruing to the ſeege: That Volgaro ſhould be abandoned, for that being within three myles of Verceile, it was neceſſary, if the french men came with ſtrength to get it, either to loaſe it with infamie, or to ſuccor it with the whole armie. That in Camarian three myles from Mugnes where the campe was, the garriſon ſhould be refurniſhed: laſtly, that the whole campe being fortefied with trenches and rampiers, and ſupplyed with ſufficient artilleries, the Capteines and aſſiſtants ſhould daily enter into other councells according to the behauiors of thennemie: They forgatt not in this conſult to giue order to ſpoyle and cut downe all the trees euen to the walls of Nouaro, to giue incommodities to men and forage for horſes, wherof there were great quantities in Nouaro: Theſe reſolucions eſtabliſhed, and a generall mooſter made of the whole armie, Lodovvyk returned to Myllan to make with more readines ſuch prouiſions as daily ſhould growe neceſſary for the ſeruice: wherein to giue fauors to the forces temporal, with the authoritie & armes ſpirituall, the Venetians & he wrought ſo much with the Pope, that he ſent one of his officers at the mace to the king, cõmaunding him within tenne dayes to depart Italy with all his armie, and within an other ſhort tearme to ſend all his people out of the realme of Naples: otherwayes that vnder the ſpirituall paynes wherwith the church is wont to threaten, he ſhould appeare before him perſonally at Rome: This remedie the auncient Popes haue vſed in tymes before: for according to tradicions written, Adrian firſt of that name, conſtrayned with no other armes then theſe, Deſiderius king of Lumbards going with a ſtronge armie to trouble the citie of Rome, to retyre from Terny (where he was arriued) to Pauia: But the reuerence and feare which for the holines of their life, was nouriſhed in the hartes of men, being now fayled, it was a thing hard to hope, that of manners and examples ſo contrary, would come like effectes: The ſame enabling the french king, skorning at his commaundement, to aunſwer the Meſſenger, that the Pope refuſing at his returne from Naples to tary him in Rome, whether he went deuowtely to kiſſe his feete: he could not but maruell, by what reaſon he coulde require him now to go thether: Notwithſtanding he ſayd, that to obey him, he would looke to open his way, and prayed him leaſt he tooke thoſe paynes in vayne, to attend him there till he came.

The Pope commaundes the french king to goe out of Italy.

In this tyme, at Thuryn the king contracted with th Embaſſadors of Florence new capitulacions not without the great contradiction of ſuch as afore tymes had made reſiſtance: who now had ſo much the more occaſion to impugne it, by how much the Florentyns (after they had recouered the other borowes and ſtronge places of the hills of Pyſa) their campe being afore Pont de Sac, and the ſouldiers that were within rendring it with condicion to haue their life ſaued: they did (contrary to their faith and promiſe giuen) put to the ſworde almoſt all the Gaſcon footemen which were found with the Pyſans, and vſed many cruelties againſt the bodies dead: This accident albeit hapned againſt the wills of the Florentyn Commiſſioners, who with great difficultie ſaued a great part of them, but altogether by the ſtirring vp of certeine ſouldiers, who being priſoners to the frenche, were very rigourouſly dealt withall: yet in the court of the king, all being taken by their aduerſaries as a ſigne manifeſt of mindes malicious to the name of all the frenchmen, many impediments were obiected to the ſolicitacion and practiſe of thaccord, which notwithſtanding had his paſſage & full concluſion, hauing more power then all other reſpectes, not the memorie of promiſes and othes ſolemnly made, but the vrgent neceſſitie and want of money, and other commodities to ſuccor the affayres of the kingdom of Naples: This was thaccord: That without any delay, all the townes & caſtells which Capitulacion betwene the french king and the Florentyns.

were in the kinges poſſeſſion, ſhould be reſtored to the Florentyns, vpon condicion that the ſtate of Florence ſhoulde be bownd to deliuer (within two yeares next comming at the pleaſure of his Maieſtie receiuing ſufficient recompenſe for them) Pietraſanta and Seraʒana to the Genovvays, in caſe their eſtate ſhould fall to the iuriſdiction and obedience of the king: That vnder this hope, the Florentyns ſhould make preſent paymēt of the thirty thowſand duckats remeyning of the capitulaciō made at Florence, receiuing a pawne of iewels for their ſewertie and reſtitucion, if for any occaſion their places were not rendred: That after the redeliuerie of their places, they ſhould lende to the king vpon bondes of the generalls of the realme of Fraunce (ſo are called the foure officers royall which receiue the reuenues of the crowne) three ſcore and tenne thowſand duckats, and to ſend parte of them in his Maieſties name to the bandes which were in the realme of Naples, and an other part to be miniſtred to the Collonnoys, in caſe they were not reconciled and reaccorded with Ferdinand, whereof his maieſtie albeit he had ſome apparance, was not yet in ſuch certeinty as to beleue it: That if they had no warres in Tuskane, they ſhould ſend to Naples to thaide of the french armie there, two hundreth and fifty men at armes: And in caſe their warres were but for the quarrel of Montpulcian, yet they ſhould be boūd to ſend them thether to accompanie the bandes of Vitelli, & not to interteyne them in that ſeruice longer then the month of October: That they ſhould remit and pardon the Pyſans for all their offences committed, giuing them a forme certeine for the reſtitucion of their goods which had bene taken from them, together with conuenient and liberall meanes to exerciſe their traffikes and marchandiſe: That for the ſewertie and obſeruacion of theſe thinges, they ſhould deliuer as oſtages at the election of the king, ſix of the principall Citiſens of Florence, and they to remeine a certeine tyme in his Court: This accord concluded, and the thirty thowſand duckats (which were immediatly ſent to make a leuie of Svvyzzers) giuen vnder gage of the kinges iewells, the commiſſions and commaundements of the king were immediatly diſpatched to the Capteines of the places, to make preſent redeliuerie to the Florentyns without any difficultie or ſtanding.

But within Nouaro albeit the vertue of the ſouldiers was great, & moſt great (for the memory of the rebellion) the obſtinacie of the towneſmen to defend the towne, yet thinges diuolued daily to more hard and difficult tearmes the ſtore of vittells ſo faſt diminiſhing that they began euen now to be pinched with the want of neceſſaries, and (according to the nature of extremities) their hopes to be releued were no leſſe deſperat then their deſires great, and their preſent lackes greeuous: Notwithſtanding the Duke of Orleans, ſomwhat to eaſe and fauour the hardnes of their condicion, had ryd out of the towne all mouthes and members vnprofitable: yet it was no remedie ſufficient to ſo great a calamitie, for that many ſouldiers of the french & Svvyzzers not able to beare the fretting anguiſh of hunger, and leſſe enured to the other diſcommodities of a cloſe ſeege, began to languiſhe in diſeaſes and ſicknes: By reaſon whereof the Duke, being alſo troubled with a feuer quartyne, made many ſolicitacions to the king by meſſengers & letters not to deferre their ſuccours: which could not be aduaunced with ſuch readines as might be able to miniſter to their generall neceſſities, for that there was not aſſembled ſuch ſufficient ſtrength as imported the eſtate of their daunger: The french armie for their partes, ſhowing more forwardnes of action then able to doe good, made many attempts to reuittell the towne by night, vſing in that purpoſe the ſeruice both of horſemen and footemen: But being alwayes diſcouered by thennemie, there ſucceeded no other frutes of their enterprises then great harmes to them selues, and no lesse disapoyntments to their friendes being made more wretched by their ill fortune: But to stoppe altogether the passage of vittells into the towne, the Marquis of Mantua assayled the monasterie of S. Frauncis standing neare to the wals of Nouaro, and taking it, he manned it forthwith with a garrison of two hundreth men at armes, and three thowsand footemen of the Almaines: By this meanes the armie confederat was discharged of a great care, the way being nowe made sure by the which releeffe was brought into the towne, the way also of the gate that leades to the mount Biandrane was stopped, for that in it was most facilitie to enter Nouaro: The day after he tooke also the bastylle made by the french vpon the poynt of the suburbes of S. Nazare, and the night following were surprised the whole suburbes together with the other plotteformes neare to the gate, wherein he bestowed a garde and fortefied the suburbes, the Count Petillane (whom the Venetians had taken into their pay with title of gouernor) being hurt there with a small shott neare the girdle place and in great daunger of death: For the succesſe of these places, the Duke of Orleans distrusting to be able to defende any more the other suburbes which he had at his entrey into Nouaro, he sette fire on them the night following, & drew all his strength to the defence & garde of the city onely: And touching the extremitie of famin, he yet nourished him self with hopes of succors, the rather for that the Svvyzzers beginning now to arriue at the campe, the kinges armie passing the riuer of Stesia was marched out of Verceill a myle to lodge in the fielde, and hauing bestowed a garde in Bolgare, expected the residue of the Svvyzzers: who being once assembled, the armie was resolued to minister succors to Nouaro: an action notwithstanding full of many difficulties, for that th Italian bandes were lodged in places of aduauntage well furnished and fortefied, and the way from Verceill to Nouaro, full of lakes and waters, and very vneasie for horsemen almost impassible for the broade and deepe ditches thorow the whole contrey: Besides, betwene Bolgare holden by the french, and the campes of th Italians, was Camarian, which the Italians garded: In respect of these difficulties, there appeared not in the mind of the king nor of the others, a readines answering the expectacion of those that attended in distresse: And yet it was supposed, that if the Svvyzzers had sooner arriued, they had aduentured the fortune of battel, the euent whereof could not but be doutfull to either of the armies: And therefore, they both hauing regarde to the daunger present, there wanted no secret trauell to solicite an accorde betwene the king and the Duke of Myllan, albeit it was with smal hope for the indifferent distrust that was betwene those two Princes, and for that both the one and other, for their greater reputacion, made showes that they had no deuocion to peace. But fortune layed open an other meane more expedient for so great a conclusion. For about the same tymes, the Lady Marquise of Montferat being dead, and being in debate, who ought to take the gouernment of a litle sonne whom she had left, to which regentship aspired with one desire, the Marquis of Saluzze, and Constantyn brother to the sayd Lady decessed one of the auncient Lordes of Macedonia which Mahomet Ottoman had occupied many yeares before: The frenche king fauoring much the tranquillitie of that estate, sent Argenton to Cæsar Cernas, to ordeyne and establishe a protectorship according to the consent of the subiectes: and being gon thether also as a mourner for the death of the Ladie one of the principall officers of the Marquis of Mantua, they two meeting vppon the way, fell into discourse and deuises to haue a peace, alleaging many benefits that would redownd to both parties: This voluntary reasoning betwene them two succeeded to so good frute, that the Lord of Argenton

tooke occaſion to write to the Venetian Commiſſioners, reitterating the reaſons and matters which had bene begon to be debated euer ſince they were at Taro: & they fauoring the mocion with very forward affections, communicated immediatly with the Capteines of the Duke of Myllan, and ſo with one agrement, ſent to require the french king (nowe come to Verceill) that he would aſſigne ſome of his councell to meete in ſome place conuenient, to common with ſuch as they ſhould appoynt in deputacion for their part: whereunto the king conſenting with a readines equall to his deſire, there aſſembled the day following betwene Bolgare and Camarian for the Venetians the Marquis of Mantua and Bernard Contaryn gouernor of their eſtradiots: for the Duke of Myllan was ſent Frauncis Barnardin Viſcounte: & for the french king the Cardinall of S. Mallovv, the Prince of Orange (to whome being newly come to the campe, the king had giuen the principal charge ouer the whole armie) the Mareſhall of Gie, Monſr de Pienes, and Monſr d'Argenton: who making many meetings and certeine particulars of them making many iorneyes from the one armie to the other, the differences and chiefe controuerſies fell at laſt vppon the citie of Nouaro: for that the french king making no difficulty in theffect of the reſtitucion, but in the manner, the leſſe to offend his honor, labored that it might be referred (in the name of the king of Romaines direct Lord of the Duchie of Myllan) into the handes of one of the Almaine Capteines which was in the campe of th Italians: Of the contrary, the confederats required that it might be left frankly: Theſe and other dowtes happning, not being able to be reſolued with that ſpeede which they that were within Nouaro required, being now falne vpon ſuch extremities that what by famine, and other raging diſeaſes riſing by it, there were dead of the Dukes companie aboue two thowſand bodies: A truce was made for eyght dayes, with ſufferaunce to the ſayde Duke and the Marquis of Saluzze, to goe with a ſmall companie to Verceyll, but vnder promiſe & faith to returne to Nouaro with the ſame companie, if the peace proceeded not: And for the ſewertie of the Dukes perſon (for that he was to paſſe thorow the campe of thennemie) the Marquis of Mantua went into a tower neare to Bolgare in the keeping of the Count de Foix: The ſouldiers that were to remeyne in Nouaro, would not haue ſuffered him to depart, if he had not giuen them his faith, that within three dayes he would returne, or elſe by his meane they ſhould haue libertie to goe out, the Mareſhall of Gie being there for his conduit leauing alſo one of his nephewes for oſtage: for that not onely the vittells were conſumed which ordinarily ſerued for the ſuſtenance of man, but alſo the vncleane and filthy skrappes, from which they could not abſteyne in ſo great an extremitie: Immediatly after the Duke was come to the kinges preſence, the truce was eſtſoones proroaged for a certeine few dayes, with condicion that all his companies ſhoulde goe out of Nouaro: that the towne ſhould be left in the power of the people, and they to make an othe not to giue it to either partie without common conſent: And that thirty footemen, who ſhould be vittelled daily by the campe of the Italians, ſhould remeine in the caſtell for the Duke of Orleans: Thus all the ſouldiers yſſued out of Nouaro, whom the Marquis of Mantua and Galeas de S. Seuerin protected and conducted till they were in place of ſewertie. But ſo much were they weakened and conſumed with hunger, that they were no ſooner arrined at Verceyll, then many of them died, and the reſidue remeyned altogether vnprofitable for the ſeruice of that warre.

About this tyme, the Baylyf of Dyon arriued at the campe with the reſidue of the Svvyzzers, of whom albeit his commiſſion was to leauye but tenne thowſand, yet he could not chuſe but at the reapport of the kinges money, there diſcēded by trowpes

a farre greater number riſing in the whole to an armie of twenty thowſand: The one halfe was admitted to ioyne to the campe neare Verceill, and the reſidue remeyned tenne miles of,becauſe in pollicie it was not thought ſure that ſo great a proporcion of men of one nation ſhould be at one tyme in one campe: if their comming had bene ſomewhat ſooner,the practiſes of peace had bene eaſily broken, ſeeing without them there were in the campe eyght thowſand french footemen,two thowſand of thoſe Svvyzzers which had bene at Naples,and eyghtteene hundreth launces.

But thinges being now ſo farre aduaunced, and Nouaro already abandoned, the enteruiewes did not diſcontinue, although the Duke of Orleans vſed all his labor to the contrary, hauing many of the greateſt of the Court of his opinion: Therefore the Deputies were euery day at the campe of thItalians to ſolicit with the Duke of Myllan,who was newly returned thether to thend to debate him ſelfe in a matter of ſo great conſequence, doing all thinges (notwithſtanding) in the preſence of the confederat Embaſſadors: At length the Deputies returned to the king,bringing the laſt concluſion of all thinges that they could for the accord: Firſt that betwene the french king and the Duke of Myllan, there ſhould be a peace and friendſhip perpetuall (the Duke nothing derogating notwithſtanding his other confederacions:) That the king ſhoulde conſent that the towne of Nouaro ſhoulde be rendred to the Duke by the people,together with the caſtell left to his Maieſtie by the gard of xxx. footemen: That the towne of Spetia and all other places occupied by either parte, ſhould be rendred: That it ſhoulde be lawfull to the king to arme at Genes (his freehold and chiefe) ſo many veſſells as he would,ſeruing his turne of all the commodities of that citie,ſo that it were not in fauor of thennemies to the ſtate of the ſame: That for aſſurance of this article, the Genovvays ſhould giue him certeine oſtages: That the Duke of Myllan ſhould cauſe to be rendred to the king, the veſſells loſt at Rapale and the twelue gallies reſtrayned at Genes, and to arme for him preſently at his proper charges two groſſe carrakes of Genes,which with foure others of his own he determined to ſend to the ſuccors of Naples: That the Duke ſhould alſo deliuer to the king the yeare after,three others in the ſame manner: That the Duke ſhould giue free and friendly paſſage to the companies that the king ſhould ſend by land to the ſame ſuccors,vnder this couenant that there ſhould not paſſe by his eſtate more then two hundreth launces at a tyme: That if the kinge returned eſtſoones to the ſame enterpriſe, the Duke ſhould followe him with certeine bandes of men: That the Venetians ſhould haue power to enter this contract within two monethes, And if they did enter,then to retyre their armie by ſea from the kingdom of Naples, and to be bownd to giue no ſuccors to Ferdinand: But if they did not obſerue this & the king ſhould leuye warre againſt them,the Duke ſhould be bownde to ayde him,reaping to his vſe all that ſhould be conquered of the Venetian eſtates: That the Duke ſhould pay fiftie thowſand duckats in the next march to the Duke of Orleans for the charges of the warre of Nouaro And acquite the king of lxxx. thowſand duckats percell of the money he had lent his Maieſtie, when he marched firſt into Italy, the reſidue to be rendred by his Maieſty at a longer tearme: That Iohn Iackes Triuulce ſhould be abſolued of the confiske and condemnacion wherein he had bene conuicted by the Duke,and enioy reſtitucion of all his goods: That the baſtard of Burbon taken in the iorney of Furnoue,and the Lord of Myolans taken at Rapale, together with all other priſoners ſhoulde be redeliuered: That the Duke ſhoulde withdraw from Pyſa Fracaſſe whom he had ſent thether a litle before,together with all his bandes and the companies of the Genovvays: That he ſhould giue no impediment to the Florentyns

to recouer that which apperteyned to their iuriſdiction: That within one month he ſhould put by way of confidence the caſtell of Genes into the handes of the Duke of Ferrara, who called to that ende by both the parties, was now come to the campe of th Italians, and that the ſayd Duke of Ferrara ſhoulde keepe it two yeares at their common charges, and to be bownde by othe to redeliuer it within the ſayd tyme to the handes of the french king in caſe the Duke of Myllan ſhoulde not holde his promiſes, who immediatly vpon the concluſion of the peace, ſhould giue oſtages to the king for aſſurance to aſſigne the caſtell at the tyme agreed vpon: Theſe condicions brought to the king by his Deputies that had debated them, were propownded in his publike and priuat councell, wherein being founde no leſſe variacion of mindes thē contrariety of reaſons, euery one diſputing particularly, Monſr Trymouille reaſoned in this ſort. If in the councell preſent we had not to debate but of meanes to encreaſe the glorie of the crowne of Fraunce by actions of vallour and vertue, I ſhould not perhaps be ſo forward to encourage your Maieſties perſon to newe daungers, although the example of your ſelfe giues you councell to the contrary, ſeeing being caried with no other affection then a deſire & ambicion of glory, you determined the yeare paſt, againſt the councells and humble peticions of the face and body of your realme, to diſcend into Italy to conquer the kingdom of Naples: where your enterpriſe drawing a ſucceſſe happy and with encreaſe of your name and honor, it is a thing manifeſt that nowe we haue not onely to deliberat whether thoccaſion to winne new honors and glorie is to be reiected, but alſo if we may eftſoones loſe againe that reputacion which you haue got with ſo great aduentures, charges, and daungers, and conuerting the honors already wonne into imputacions & infamies perpetuall, whether you ought to be the perſonage ſo impugnant and contrary to your proper reſolucions, as to reprehende and condemne the councells eſtabliſhed by your ſelfe: for your Maieſtie might without any loſſe to your reputacion haue remeyned in Fraunce, and that which now the world will wrappe in opinions of diſhonorable feares and cowardiſſe, could not as then be referred to any other thing then to negligence, or to an age occupied in pleaſures: your maieſtie aſſoone as you had bene arriued in Aſt, might eftſoones haue returned into Fraunce, with the ſame ſpeede, & leſſe ſhame, making as though the matters of Nouaro concerned you nothing at all: But nowe by the preſence of your armie ſo long incamping here, you haue publiſhed your intencion, and that you were touched with deſire to deliuer the towne from ſeege, for which regard alſo hauing aſſembled out of Fraunce ſo great a proporcion of nobilitie and a leuye of Swyzzers at a charge intollerable: who will dowt that if you depart and not ſatisfie theſe exſpectacions but leaue the towne to her perills, that your glorie, with the reputacion of your whole realme, will not take a contrary conuerſion of iuſt reproch and infamie perpetuall. But (if in the hartes of great kings may be mocions more violent then deſires of renowne and glorie) there be yet reaſons more mighty, or at leaſt more iuſt and neceſſary: ſeeing our retrait into Fraunce conſenting to the loſſe of Nouaro neither is, nor wil be thought any other thing then the loſſe of the whole kingdom of Naples, and the vnworthy ſlaughter of ſo many Capteines and Nobles of Fraunce left there for the defence of the ſame vpon your hopes ioyned with your faith and promiſes to ſende them ſpeedy ſuccors: wherein, how miſerable will be their expectacions, but more wretched and deſperat their eſtates and condicions, when they ſhall vnderſtand that your Maieſtie incamping vppon the frontyers of Italy with an armie ſo populous, and forces ſo reſolute, ſhal yet retyre & giue place to thennemie: The ſucceſſe of warres, dependes partly

thoritie, or money, one trench which we ſhall winne, one rampier which we ſhall force, will put into our boſomes (things honorable and great) not onely the empire and treaſors of Italy, but alſo the meane to be reuenged of all our common and priuat wronges: which two ſpurres or mocions alwayes accuſtomed to pricke forward mindes baſe and cowardly, if they ſtirre not with an other quicknes our nation warlike & reſolute, we may iuſtly ſay that our vallour hath rather failed vs then our fortune, by whom is prepared thoccaſion to winne in ſo litle place, & in ſo few howers, ſo great and worthy recompenſes, that the wiſedom and deſires of men reaſonable can wiſhe no more: The time, the place, thoccaſion, our fortune, & all other oportunities and circumſtances to be conſidered in enterpriſes, offer vs the victorie. there wanteth nothing but action in men, which for ſo much ought to be more ready in vs, by how much it importeth men of vertue not to loſe the honor they haue gotten, nor leaue ſuſpicion that want of vallour makes them vnworthy of that which their fortune offereth with ſo great fauor and further reputacion. The Prince of Orange hauing a contrary affection, ſpake againſt this opinion in this ſort.

If your affayres (right Chriſtian king) were not ſo much preſſed with time, but that they would giue you leaſure to accompany your forces with induſtrie and diſcreſſion: or if they ſtoode not vpon degrees and condicions ſo immoderat, as you are conſtrained (if you will continue the warre) to proceede with importunities contrary to all the precepts and directions of warre: I coulde be one of thoſe that would giue councell to reiect the peace: for that by many reaſons we are encouraged not to accept it, as alſo it can not be denied that it would not be a thing honorable to continue the warre, and no leſſe conuenient for the affayres of Naples: But the tearmes whereunto are brought the towne and caſtel of Nouaro, not prouided of vittells for one day, compell vs (if we will ſuccor it) to ſet ſpedely vpon our enemies, & with a reſolucion ſuddeine to take away that reſpitt which makes them ſtronge and able, and increaſeth in our armie incommodities hurtfull and daungerous: And if (in ſuffering it to be loſt) we meane to tranſport the warre into an other parte of the ſtate of Myllan, The ſeaſon of the winter nowe at hande very vnfit to make warre in places ſo low and full of waters, and the qualitie of our armie for the nature & great multitudes of Svvyzzers who being not ſpedely employed may be more preiudiciall to vs then to our ennemies: And laſtly our generall want of money making our aboade here impoſſible for any long time, enforce vs (not accepting thaccorde) to ſeeke the meane to put ſuddeinly an ende to the warre: A thing which can not be done otherwayes, then directly to goe & charge thennemies, which aſwell for their condicions, as the diſauauntages of the contrey, is ſo daungerous, that in reaſonable conference of thinges, the action can not but hold of raſhnes and indiſcreſſion: for that their campe is ſo ſtrong by nature and art, according to the time they haue had to rampier and fortefie it: The places round about where their garriſons are ſo conuenient for their defence, and ſo well manned: the contrey, for the quantitie of ditches and impediment of waters, ſo vnapt to the ſeruice of horſemen: That to goe ſeeke them directly, and not to accoaſt them with commodities and aduauntages, and (as the ſaying is) to winne vpon them by litle and litle: is no other thing then to tempt fortune, and aduenture vppon perills moſt certeine and deſperat: for with what diſcourſe, with what reaſon of warre, or with what example of notable Captaines, may we with ſuch raſhnes and importunitie inuade ſo great an armie, & that in trenches ſo ſtrong and well furniſhed with artillerie? No, it is better (if you will proceede otherwayes then at aduenture) to ſeeke to driue them from their trenches rogat reputacion and honor. The Duke of Orleans rebuked ſharpely the ſpeeches of the Prince of Orange, either of them taking ſuch libertie of paſſion, that falling from wordes to reproches and iniuries, the Duke gaue him the lye in the whole preſence of the councell: But thinclinacion of moſt part of the councell and conſequently of the multitude of tharmie, was to embraſe the peace, bearing ſo much power in them all, and no leſſe in the perſon of the king a ſweete deſire to returne into Fraunce, that they were not able to diſcerne the daunger of the kingdom of Naples, and much leſſe to ſee how ſlaunderous it was to ſuffer to be loſt afore their eyes the citie of Nouaro, and laſtly to depart out of Italy with condicions ſo vnequall conſidering the incerteintie of thobſeruacion: which diſpoſicion was ſo vehemently fauored by the Prince of Orange, that many dowted leſt to gratifie the king of Romaines, to whom he was moſt affectioned, he had no leſſe regard to the profit of the Duke of Myllan thē to the commodities of the french king, with whom truely his authoritie was great, partly for the excellencie of his wit, and partly for the credit of his vallour, but moſt of all, for that it is a cuſtom and propertie with Princes, to eſteme moſt wiſe, ſuch as are moſt conformed to their inclinacions.

At laſt the peace was made, which was no ſooner ſworne by the Duke of Myllan, then the king, reiecting all other thoughtes then ſuch as made for his returne into Fraunce, wēt forthwith to Thuryn: his haſt was the more importunat to depart from Verceill, for that thoſe bands of the Svvyzzers that were in the campe, to aſſure their payes of three whole moneths (according to the cuſtom of Lovvys the xj. as they alleaged) began to ſpeake of ſtaying the king or the chiefteines of his Court for the ſewertie of their pay: notwithſtanding they could not clayme ſo much by promiſe, nor yet had ſerued ſo long time: from which daunger albeit the perſon of the king was deliuered by his ſuddeine departure, yet they hauing made priſoners the Baylif of Dyon and others that leauyed them, he was in the ende conſtrayned to aſſure all their demaundes aſwell with promiſes as with oſtages: from Thuryn the king deſiring to make a perfect eſtabliſhment of the peace, ſent to the Duke of Myllan the Mareſhall of Gie, the Preſident of Ganuay, and Argenton, to induce him to ſpeake with his Maieſtie: The Duke ſeemed to be of the ſame deſire, but it was not without ſome dowt of treaſon: In ſo much, that either for that ſuſpicion, or obiecting perhappes ſome expreſſe difficulties, as not to giue occaſion of ielowſie to the confederats, or for that his ambicion woulde not ſuffer him to come in a behauior inferior to the french king: he propownded to haue the meting vpon the middeſt of a riuer, where a bridge being made either with barkes or other matter, there ſhoulde be betwene them a barre of wodde: A manner of commoning together vſed heretofore by the kinges of England and Fraunce, and other great Princes of the Weſt: This the king refuſed as a thing vnworthy his greatnes, and therefore without any enteruiewe, he receiued his oſtages, and diſpatched Peron de la Baſche to Genes to receiue the two carrakes that were promiſed him, and to rigge foure others at his owne charges for the ſuccors of the caſtells of Naples, which he knew had not receiued the reskewes ſent from Nice, for that they ſuffred ſo many impediments as they could not be profitable to the ſeruice of Naples: In which reſpect, his peoples there beſeged had made compoſicion to render vp the caſtells if they were not ſuccored within thirty dayes: The king made his plot to arme the ſayd veſſells with three thowſand Svvyzzers, & to adioyne them to the ſayd nauie parted from Nice nowe retyred to Lyuorne, and to certeine other veſſells exſpected from Prouence: All which (without the great ſhips of the Genovvays) had not bene ſufficient for that ſuccors, the hauen of Naples being now full of a huge armie by ſea both for the veſſells of the prouiſions of Ferdinand, and alſo for twenty gallies and foure ſhippes ſent thether by the Venetians: The king after he had diſpatched Monſr Argenton to Venice to ſolicit the Senat to enter into the peace and participat with thaccord, tooke his way into Fraunce with all his Court, & that with ſuch equall ſpeede and deſire to be there, that there was nothing coulde ſtay him any fewe dayes in Italy, no not till the Genovvays had deliuered him their oſtages promiſed vppon the contract at Verceill, which certeinly they had accompliſhed, if his haſtie departure had not preuented their true intencion and meaning. Thus then vpon the ende of October 1495. his maieſtie returned on thother ſide the mountes, reſembling rather a perſonage vanquiſhed then a Prince victor (notwithſtanding the conqueſt and victories he had obteyned:) he left as his Lieſetenant in Aſt (a citie which it ſhould ſeeme he bought of the Duke of Orleans) Iohn Iacques Triuulce with fiue hundreth frenche launces, who not many dayes after of their propper authoritie followed the king, by whome was left no other ſuccors for the kingdom of Naples, then the nauies preparing at Genes and Prouence, and the aſſignacion of the aydes and moneyes promiſed by the Florentyns.

The french pocks & their beginning.

After the diſcourſe of other things, me thinkes it can not be out of purpoſe (ſpecially it being a deſtinie fatall that the calamities of Italy ſhould take their beginning of the paſſage of the french men, or at leaſt were imputed to them) to leaue to memorie and tradicion in what ſort began the diſeaſe which the french call the euill of Naples, and the Italians name the botche, or more commonly the diſeaſe of Fraunce: It hapned as an infection to the french men whileſt they were at Naples, and by them in their returne from that warre, was diſperſed and ſpredd thorow all Italy: This diſeaſe either altogether newe, or at leaſt vnknowne in that age in our hemiſpheare otherwayes then in the moſt extreame and furtheſt partes, was for certeyne yeares ſo horrible, that it well deſerueth mencion and monument, as a calamitie greeuous & lamentable: for it appeared alwayes either in vile botches or buttons, which oftentimes proued vlcers incurable, or elſe they tormented the whole bodye with payne and aches in the ioyntes and ſinewes: And the Phiſicions hauing no experience in maladies of that nature, and therefore ignorant in the remedies proper and naturall, applied oftentimes cures directly reſiſting and contrary, which inflamed the infection to greater rage, euen to the killing of many bodies of all ages and ſexes: Many became deformed with them, and ſubiect almoſt to perpetuall torments, yea ſome ſuch as ſeemed to be deliuered of them, returned eftſoones in ſhort time to the ſame miſerie: But after the courſe of many yeares (either the influence aboue being appeaſed which bredd them ſo horrible and raging, or by long experience their proper remedies and cures being founde out) the diſeaſe began to be leſſe malicious, chaunging it ſelfe into diuerſe kindes of infirmitie, differing from the firſt calamitie, whereof truely the regions & people of our times might iuſtly complayne, if it hapned to them without their propper diſorder, ſeeing it is well approued by all thoſe that haue diligently ſtudied and obſerued the proprieties of that euil, that either neuer or very rarely it hapneth to any otherwayes then by contagious whoredom or immoderat incontinencie. The french thinke it reaſonable to acquite them of thignominie, for that it is knowen ſince that ſuch a diſeaſe was tranſported out of Spaine to Naples, & yet not proper or natural of that nation, but brought thether from the yles, which in thoſe ſeaſons began to be made familiar to our regions by the nauigacion of Chriſtofer Colonus a Genovvay: In which yles by the fauor of nature, are remedies ready to the cure of that ill, by drinking onely of the iuice of a wodd (moſt

LODOWYK SFORCE keepeth not the treatie of peace: The Venetians take the towne of Pyſa into their protection: The french king determineth to returne into Italy: The king of Romaines beſeegeth Lynorne: The Pope makes warre vppon the Vrſins: The french King dyeth at Amboyſe: Frear Ieronimo Sauonarola is hanged at Florence.

THE THIRD BOOKE OF THE hiſtorie and diſcourſſe of Guicciardin.

BY the diſhonorable returne of the frenche kinge ouer the Mountes, proceeding notwithſtanding more of indiſcreſſion and diſorders, then by puſillanimitie or weakenes of his armie: wiſe men grew into hopes and iudgements, that Italy, after ſo many skourges and greeuous ſtormes of infelicities, would now at laſt reſume her libertie, or at leaſt, be redeliuered of the inſolent iuriſdiction of the french: wherein by ſo much more were worthy and notable the vertues & actions of the Senat of Venice and Duke of Myllan, by how much the taking armes with a wiſe and reſolut councell, were the onely lets, that ſo goodly a part of the world fell not into the ſeruitude of ſtraungers: But as nothing can ſatisfie the couetouſnes of man, ſo if they had not bene caried with ambicious reſpectes touching their intereſts and deſires particular, nor (to their propper infamie and common harmes) had ſo corrupted the vniuerſall benefitte and common weale of that region: No man might haue dowted that Italy, (readdreſſed by their armies and councells, and eſtſoones repoſſeſſed of her auncient dignities and prerogatiues) had not bene for long time aſſured againſt the importunities, furies, and violent inuaſions of the prowde nations beyonde the Mountes: But ambicion, which would not ſuffer either of them to be contented with his lymitts, was the cauſe not onely to returne vpon Italy new inuaſions and troubles, but alſo that they could not enioy the frute of the victorie which their fortune brought into their hands againſt thoſe miſerable remeynders of the frenche in the kingdome of Naples; A victorie which the negligence & vnwiſe councells of the king made of eaſie action to them, for that the ſuccors which he had leuyed at his departure out of Italy, were either vtterly vaine,or at leaſt of ſo litle frute, that they brought no comfort to his people, his prouicions of nauigacion and the aydes promiſed by the Florentyns ſeruing alſo to like effect.

" This is a rule in the nature of man, that to him that is iniuried and can not haue
" iuſtice,nothing is more ſweete then the paſſion of reuenge: euen ſo by howe much
" the remembrance of thoffence is greene and freſhe, by ſo much ſtronger is the de-
" ſire of reuenge in the mind greeued,and ſo much leſſe the truſt or confidence in the
" partie that hath offended: Lodovvyk Sforce conſented not to the peace with the king with a ſownd faith and meaning,for that remembring the iniuries he had done him, he thought it ſtoode not with his ſewertie eftſoones to commit him ſelfe to the fidelitie of the king: But the deſire to recouer Nouaro, & deliuer his owne eſtate from thincommodities of the warre,induced him to promiſe that which he had no deſire to keepe,following the kinges humor with wordes, and keeping his intencions diſſembled: And it may be ſuppoſed,that in the peace made with this ſemblance, did participat the conſent of the Senat of Venice, willing to disburden their ſtate without their infamie,of the very huge and great expenſes occupied vppon the warre of Nouaro: But Lodovvyk,to whom in actions of ſhift and conning, nothing was more familiar then moderacion of wit,becauſe he would not in vnaduiſed ſort breake the articles of the capitulacion,but ſhadow his doings with ſome coller, accompliſhed that which he could not deny to be in his power:he deliuered oſtages: he ſette at libertie the priſoners paying their raunſoms of his propper treaſors: he reſtored the veſſells taken at Rapale: he withdrew from Pyſa Frecaſſe whom he could not diſſemble to be in his pay: laſtly he put the caſtell of Genes into the handes of the Duke of Ferrare who went thether in perſon to receiue it: But on thother ſide,he left within Pyſa Luke Maluezzo with many bandes of ſouldiers as though he were in the wages and payes of the Genovvayes: he ſuffered that two carrakes which were armed at Genes went to Naples for the ſeruice of Ferdinand, vſing this excuſe, that for that he had interteyned them afore the concluſion of the peace, they of Genes woulde not conſent that they ſhould be denied to him: he labored ſecretly that the Genovvays ſhould not deliuer in their oſtages to the king: And that which was of greater conſequence for the loſſe of the caſtells of Naples,after the king had armed and manned the foure ſhippes, and that he had furniſhed him of the two for the which he was bownd: he wrought ſo with the Genovvays,that making ſemblances of feare, they gaue impediments that the kinges ſouldiers ſhould not be armed, if firſt they receiued not of him ſufficient caution that he ſhoulde not employe them againſt them ſelues,nor attempt with that force to chaunge the gouernment of Genes: For theſe cauillacions the king complayned by men expreſſe to Lodovvyk,who (according to his cuſtom in euaſions)aũſwered him with exceptions, ſometimes that he had promiſed to furniſh him with the ſhipps,but without conſent that they ſhould be manned with french ſouldiers: And ſometymes he alleaged that the iuriſdiction which he had of Genes was not abſolut,but limited and reſtrayned to ſuch condicions,as he had no power of compulſion, and much leſſe was his authoritie to enforce their wills to his deſires, ſpecially in thinges which they pretended to be daungerous for their eſtate,or to derogat the liberties of their citie: wherein the better to iuſtifie his excuſes, he wrought ſo that the Pope commaunded the Genovvays and him vppon payne of the Church cenſures, that they ſhould not ſuffer to be drawne from Genes by the french king any veſſells of no ſort or nature: In ſo much as the ſuccors exſpected with ſo great deſire by the french which were wretched in the kingdom of Naples, ples,ſoarted to no comfort or releeffe to them: No more did the aydes and moneyes promiſed by the Florentyns: ſeeing after thaccord made at Thuryn,Guind Anthoine Veſpucci one of their Embaſſadors aſſiſtant at the concluſion, departing immediatly with all the neceſſary diſpatches,and paſſing without ſuſpicion thorow the Duchie of Myllan,for that the common weale of Florence was not declared ennemie to eyther part: he was reteyned in Alexandria by the Dukes commiſſion: And all his papers and diſpatches taken from him,he was led forthwith to Myllan,where the capitulacion and promiſes of the Florentyns being bewraied,the Venetians and the Duke tooke councell,not to ſuffer the Pyſans to periſh: who aſſoone as the french king was gone out of Italy,had by newe Embaſſadors recommended their affayres to Venice and Myllan: Their reſolucion to reskew the Pyſans was not without the conſent of the Pope and thEmbaſſadors of the other confederats,vnder pretence to hinder the money and aydes which the Florentyns reentring into Pyſa and their other places,were to ſende to the realme of Naples: And alſo for that being conioyned with the frenchking,and by the recouering of that citie,made more mighty, they might in many ſortes endomage the common ſafetie of Italy: but the principall humor that ſed that mocion was their ambicion & great deſire to make them ſelues Lords ouer Pyſa: A ſweete pray to intyce ambicious mindes,and as it had bene afore tyme vehemently aſpired by Lodovvyk, ſo the Venetians began nowe in like ſort to looke into it with couetous eyes,as people, who ſeeing the auncient vnitie of other Potentats broken,and one parte of thoſe weakned which had wont to oppoſe againſt them, embraſed alreadye with thoughtes and hopes the Monarchie of all Italy: Whereunto they eſteemed the imperie of Pyſa a very conuenient inſtrument, to beginne with the commoditie of his hauen (which they thought could not be long kept by Florence not holding Pyſa) to ſtretch out their lymits euen to the inferior ſea: hauing withall by thopportunitie of that citie, an entrey of great importance into Tuskan: The Duke of Myllan ſhowed moſt readines to miniſter to their ſuccors,who interteyning at the ſame inſtant the Florentyns with diuerſe practiſes, had ordeyned that Fracaſſe,vnder cooller of his priuat buſines (for he had poſſeſſions in that contrey) ſhould goe to Pyſa,and the Genovvays to refurniſh them with newe ſupplies of footemen: The Venetians alſo forgot not to nouriſh them with promiſes and comfortes of ſpeedy ſuccors, and accordingly diſpatched one of their Secretories to Genes to make a leauye of footemen, and perſwade the Genovvays not to abandon the Pyſans: yet they were long in ſending their ſtrength thether,perhaps by this opinion,that ſo long as the citadell was holden by the french king,& ſo long as he were in Italy,it was not conuenient to lay any great foundacion of thoſe thinges: On the other ſide, the Florentyns,aduertiſed of the newe couenants made with the king by their Embaſſadors at Thuryn, had increaſed their armie, to be the more able to conſtrayne the Pyſans to receiue them aſſoone as they ſawe the diſpatches of the king: And albeit as you haue heard, they were reſtrayned together with their Embaſſador by the Duke of Myllan,yet they forbare not to take the borow of Palaye, and ſo planted their campe afore Vicopiſan: the beſeeging of which place was of no effect, partely for that the Capteines (either by ill councell, or for that they iudged their ſtrength not ſufficient to bring their campe on that ſide towards Pyſa,the Pyſans hauing erected a baſtyllyon on a mount neare the towne) encamped on that ſide vnderneath towardes Bientina: A place of litle commoditie to hurt Vico,and keeping it,the way of Fyſa and Caſina lay open to thoſe that were beſeeged: partely for that Pavvle Vitelli hauing receiued three thowſand duckats, went thether to defend it,

The Venetians in mind to reskew the Pyſans.

entring with his companies and the bandes of his brethren vnder a fayned cooller to haue letters of the king,& commaundement from the generall of Languedok brother to the Cardinall of S.Mallovv remeyning ſicke at Pietra Santa, to protect Pyſa and thappurtenance, vntil other order were taken: Certeinly it is a thing right wonderfull in reaſon,and no leſſe rare in experience and example, that the Pyſans were at one tyme defended by the ſouldiers of the french king, and ayded by the ſuccors of the Duke of Myllan,and nouriſhed alſo with hopes by the ſtate of Venice,notwithſtanding that Senat & the Duke of Myllan were in open warre with the french king: " But ſuch is the rage of ambicion, and ſo ſweete thinſinuacion of rule and imperie, " that in whom they haue kindled their infection,they ceaſe not to inflame more and " more their deſires without reſpect to fidelitie, conſcience, difficultie, or common " obſeruancie,holding all thinges lawful that make for their purpoſe,and nothing vn- " ſemely that may ſerue to ſatisfie their inſatiable aſpiring thoughts: with the reskew that came with the bandes of Vitelli,Vicopiſan defended it ſelfe eaſily,and gaue no litle domage to the campe of the Florentyns, the ſame being pitched in a place ſo open and diſcouered,that it receiued many harmes by the artilleries which the Pyſans had caried within Vico: In ſo much that hauing endured the harmes by many dayes, the Capteines found it neceſſary to their ſafetie, to leuye the ſeege to their reproch and ſhame: After this,the kinges diſpatches being at laſt come, which written into copies,were ſecretly ſent out by many wayes,the towne,caſtell,and port of Liuorne were immediatly rendred to the Florentyns by Salliane Liefetenant to Monſr Beaumont to whom the king had giuen them in charge: when M.D'iſle Deputie Commiſſioner to receiue of the Florentyns the ratificacion of thaccord made at Thuryn, and to ſee the reſtitucion executed,began to treate with Entragues Capteine of the cytadell of Pyſa,and of the caſtells of Pietra Santa and Mutton, to reſolue with him of the day and manner to reſigne them vppe: But Entragues induſed either by the ſelfe ſame inclinacion common with the other frenche men that were then in Pyſa,or by ſome ſecret commiſſions from M.de Ligni, vnder whoſe name and as depending vpon him,he was preferred to that charge,or perhaps drawne by the loue which he bare to a litle Graciana doughter of one of the Citiſens of Pyſa (for it is not credible that onely the deſire of money led him,ſince he might receiue a greater quantitie of the Florentyns) he began to oppoſe many difficulties:ſometimes giuing to the kings letters pattents an interpretacion contrary to the true ſenſe: and ſometimes he alleaged that at the beginning he had commaundement not to render them but by ſecret aduertiſements from Monſr de Ligny: vpon which impediments, after they had in vayne diſputed certeine dayes, it was neceſſary for the Florentyns to make a new inſtance to the king remeyning yet at Verceill, to remedie that diſorder expreſſed with ſo great an offence to his maieſtie,and hurt to his ſpeciall profit: The king became much moued with the diſobedience of Entragues, and commaunded M.de Ligny (not without indignacion) to conſtrayne him to obey, determining to ſende thether a man of authoritie with newe letters pattents and threates from the Duke of Orleans whoſe ſeruant he was: But the reſolut obſtinacie of M.de Ligny and the fauors which he had in court,being of more power then the ſlender councell of the king,the diſpatch was delayed certeine dayes, and in the ende ſent not by a man of authoritie,but by M.Launcepugno a ſimple gentleman: with whome went Camylla Vitelli to leade his companies to the realme of Naples,and withall to conduit thether one part of the money to be defrayed by the Florentyns, to whoſe armie, aſſoone as the kinges letters pattents were arriued, were ioyned the men of warre of both the

Vitellis: This diſpatche wrought no more effect then the firſt, notwithſtanding the Capteine had receiued two thowſand duckats of the Florentyns, to interteyne (vntil the kinges aunſwer came) the bandes of footemen which were in garriſon within the Citadell: And to Camilla were payed three thowſand duckats, becauſe otherwayes he would haue hindred that the kinges letters ſhould not haue bene preſented: for the Capteine of the citadell (to whom as was ſuppoſed de Ligni had ſent by an other way, commiſſions quite contrary) After he had many dayes abuſed their exſpectacion, and iudging that the Florentyns (for that there were within the towne beſides thinhabitantes, a thowſand footemen forreyners,) coulde not force the ſuburbes of S. Marke ioyned to the gate of Florence leaning to the citadell where the Pyſans had made a great baſtyllion, and that ſo he might come to the ende of his intencion without manifeſt obiecting againſt the kinges will: he ſent to thother Florentyn Commiſſioners, to preſent their armie afore the ſayd gate, (which they could not doe onles they wonne the ſuburbs) for that if the Pyſans would not receiue them in by accorde, he would force them to abandon it, the ſame gate being ſo ſubiect to thartillerie of the citadell, that it was not able to meinteyne defence againſt the will of ſuch as had it in gard: The Florentyns inclining readily to this deuiſe, went thether with a great preparacion, a courage reſolute, and an inflamed diſpoſicion of all the campe then lodging at S. Remy, a place neare to the ſuburbes: And with ſuch vallour they aſſayled the baſtyllion on three ſides (in the forme, ſeate, and rampiers whereof, they had bene fully inſtructed by Pavvle Vitelli) that they brake and put to flight ſuch as ſtoode in defence, and purſuing the chaſe, they enter Pelle Melle the ſuburbes by a draw bridge which ioyned to the baſtyllion, killing and making priſoners the moſt of them: In this furie there was no dowt, (without the ayde of the citadell) but at the ſame inſtant they might haue made perfect the conqueſt of Pyſa by that gate, many of their men at armes being entred, for that the Pyſans put to flight, made no reſiſtance: But the Capteine of the citadel ſeeing thinges ſucceede otherwayes then he looked for, began to diſcharge thartillerie vpon the Florentyns: with which accident vnlooked for, the Commiſſioners and leaders marueling not a litle, many of their ſouldiers ſlayne and hurt by thartillerie, and Pavvle Vitelli wounded in one of his legges, they ſownded the retraict, holding it impoſſible to take Pyſa at that time for the furious reſiſtance of the citadell: yea within fewe dayes after, they were conſtrained for the harmes they receiued by thartillerie to abandon the ſuburbes which they had brought into their power, and ſo retyred with great diſcourage and no leſſe diſcontented to Caſsina, till the king had reformed ſo manifeſt a diſobedience of his ſubiectes.

Peter de medicis at the inſtigacion of the Confederats determineth to returne to Florence.

In this meane while alſo, the Florentyns were not without their perplexities, for new and daungerous practiſes ſtirred vp principally by the Potentats of the league: Who to giue the more impediments to the conqueſt of Pyſa, and by ſome newe neceſſities at home, to enforce them to leaue thalliance of the french king, incenſed P. de medicis to make triall, with the ayde of Virginio Vrſin, (fled from the french campe the day of the battell of Taro,) to returne to Florence: A matter of right eaſie perſwacion both to the one and other: for that to Virginio it ſoarted to good purpoſe (what ſo euer came to thenterpriſe) to reaſſemble at the charges of others, his auncient bandes and partakers, and readreſſe him ſelfe eftſoones in the reputacion of armes: And Peter according to the cuſtom of men baniſhed, had no want of diuerſe hopes for the multitude of frendes which he had in the citie, by whom he had intelligence that the gouernment popular was diſpleaſing to many of the nobles, and no leſſe in-tollerable to many of his faction and followers, which by reaſon of the auncient greatnes of his houſe, was almoſt vniuerſal thorow the whole dominion of Florence: It was beleued that this plot tooke his firſt deuiſe and beginning at Myllan, for that Virginio was no ſooner eſcaped out of the hands of the french, then he made his firſt office to goe viſit the Duke: but afterwards the reſolucion ſucceeded at Rome, where did negociat many dayes with the Pope, th Embaſſador of Venice and the Cardinall Askanius, who proceeded by commiſſion from Lodovvyk his brother: Theſe were the groundes and hopes of this enterpriſe: that beſides the bandes which Virginio ſhould leauye of his olde ſouldiers, and with tenne thowſand duckats gathered by P. de medicis of his owne and by the liberalities of his frendes: John Bentyuole being then in the pay of the Venetians and the Duke of Myllan, ſhould at the ſame inſtant make warre againſt them vppon the frontyer of Bolognia: And alſo that Kattherine Sforce whoſe ſonne tooke pay of the Duke of Myllan, ſhould vexe them by the cities of Imola and Furly, confyning vpon the landes of the Florentyns: Laſtly they made promiſe to them ſelues (not in vaine) to haue at their deuocion the Syennoys, no leſſe inflamed with an old hatred againſt the Florentyns, then deſirous to embraſe occaſions to preſerue Montpulcian, A towne which they diſtruſted not to be able to defend of them ſelues, for that hauing attempted not many monethes before with their owne ſtrength, and the bandes of the Lord of Plombyn and John Sauelle (whome the Duke interteyned in common with them) to make them ſelues Lordes of the contrey of the marryſſe of Chianes, which marryſſe had bene long time the lymit or markeſtone of that ſide betwene the Florentyns and them, and to that ende they had begonne to make neare to the bridge of Valiane, A baſtyllion to beate a tower erected by the Florentyns vpon the poynt towards Montpulcian: things fel out contrary to their hopes and exſpectacion: for that the Florentyns, moued with the daunger of the loſſe of this bridge, which not onely tooke from them all meanes to moleſt Montpulcian, but alſo gaue entrie to thennemies into the territories of Cortona and Aretze and other peeces, which on thother ſide of Chianes apperteyne to their iuriſdiction, ſent thether a ſtronge ſuccor, which forced the baſtyllion begon by the Syennoys: And for their full ſewertie of that peece, they planted neare the bridge (but on thother ſide Chianes) a baſtyllion conuenient to beſtow many ſouldiers in: by whoſe helpe and commoditie they made roades euen to the gates of Montpulcian, vexing with like actions all the townes of the Siennoys on that ſide: To which ſucceſſe was ioyned this fortune, that a litle after the paſſage of the french king, they had broken neare to Montpulcian, the bandes of the Siennoys and made priſoner Iohn Sauella their Capteine: But Virginio and Peter de medicis hoped to obteine place of retraite with other commodities of the people of Peruſia, not onely for that the famulie of the Baillons, (who with armes and aydes of their followers were almoſt become Maiſters of that citie) were vnited to Virginio in a common fidelitie to the name and faction of the Guelffs, and had withall familiar and ſtraite frendſhipps with Lavvrence and Peter de medicis whileſt he ruled in Florence, by whoſe fauors and other miniſtracions they had ſpeciall countenance againſt all action of their ennemies: but alſo being the ſubiectes of the Church (but more in demonſtracions then in effectes) it was beleued that in thinges concerning principally their eſtates, they would yeld to the will of the Pope, haumg communitie therein the conſent of the Venetians and Duke of Myllan: Virginio then and Peter de medicis departed from Rome with theſe hopes, & occupying amongeſt them ſelues theſe perſwacions, that the Florentyns trauelled with ciuill diuiſions at home, and vexed by their neighbours abroad vnder the name of the confederats,coulde hardely make reſiſtance: And remeyning certeine dayes betwene Terni and Todi and theſe confynes, where Virginio ſtudying by all meanes to plucke downe the Gebelyn faction,leauyed men and money of the Guelffes: At laſt they ſetled their campe in fauor of the Peruſins,before Gualde, A towne poſſeſſed by the communaltie of Fuligni, but ſolde before by the Pope for ſix thowſand duckatts to the Peruſins, who were no leſſe inflamed with a deſire to haue it, then incenſed with the contencion of the parties,by reaſon of whoſe dealinges all the townes about inclined then to emocion and inſurrection: for not many dayes before,the famulie of the Oddies,baniſhed from Perouſa& chieftaines of the factiõ contrary to the Bayllions,hauing aydes of them of Fuligni,Aſceſe, and other peeces there adioyning, which embraſed the parte of the Gebylins, were entred Corciana, (a ſtronge peece within fiue myles of Perouſa) with three hundreth horſe, and fiue hundreth footemen: for which accident,all the contrey being riſen (for Spolette,Camerin,and other places of the Guelffes were fauorable to the Bayllons) they of Oddy within fewe dayes after entred by night within Perouſa,and that with ſuch aſtoniſhment to the Bayllons, that hauing loſt hope & abilitie of defence, they began to put them ſelues to flight: But the Oddies, by a ſinall and vnlooked for aduenture, loſt that victorie,which the power of their ennemies coulde not depriue them of: for that being come without impediment to one of the entries of the principall place, and one of them who for that purpoſe caried a hatchet,offring to cut in peeces the chayne drawne ouer the way according to the cuſtom of cities in faction: And being ſo troubleſomly enuyroned with the preſſe of his companies, that he had no ſpace to lift vp his arme to hewe the chayne,cryed with a lowde voyce giue backe, giue backe, to thende that hauing more roome,his libertie might be more furthering to the action he went about: This voyce being wrong vnderſtanded, and repeated from hand to hand by ſuch as followed him, and ſo deliuered to others in a ſenſe ſounding to retyre and flee,it was the cauſe that all the companies without other encownter or let, fell ſuddeinly to flee,not one knowing by whom they were chaſſed, nor for what occaſion they fledd: This diſorder reſtored thaduerſaries to ſuch preſent courage, that reaſſembling their ſtrength, they charged them in the chaſſe and made great ſlaughter taking priſoner Troyllo Sauello, who for the ſame affection to the faction, had bene ſent to the ſuccors of the Oddies by Cardinall Sauella: And applying their forces to thoccaſion that was offered,they followed the chaſſe euen to Corciana, which they recouered in this action,and with the ſame furie: And laſtly not contented with the death of ſuch as they had ſlaine in the chaſſe, they hanged many at Perouſa, following the crueltie which for the moſt part other factions are wont to vſe: of which tumultes,many murders hapning in the places bordring, for that in ſeaſons dowtfull, the parties are careſull,and doe cuſtomably draw into inſurrection, either for deſire to cut of their ennemies,or for feare to be preuented by them: The Peruſins inflamed againſt the Fulignians,had ſent the campe to Gualda, And hauing giuen thaſſault to it in vaine,with no leſſe diſtruſt to cary it by their owne ſtrength, they accepted the aydes of Virginio who offered him ſelfe to them, to thende that at the brute of bootie and ſpoyle,the ſouldiers might ronne with more readines to the warre: And albeit they were preſſed by him and by Peter de medicis to miniſter openly to their enterpriſe,or at leaſt to giue ſome peece of artillerie or place of retraite for their people at Chaſtillion du lac confyning vpon the territorie of Cortonne, with commoditie of vittells for tharmie: yet they conſented to neuer one of the demaundes,notwithſtanding the Cardinall Askanius made in the name of the Duke of Myllan great in-

ſtance,and the Pope commaunding no leſſe by writts vehement and full of threats: All this was,for that ſince the taking of Corciana, the Florentyns lending them money,and giuing yearly penſion to Guido and Radolpho chiefe of the Baillons,and laſtly hauing taken into their pay Iohn Pavvle ſonne to Radolpho,they were of their ſide & conioyned with them: Beſides theſe, they were eſtraunged from thamitie of the Pope,for that they feared he ſtoode fauorable and inclined to the cauſe of their aduerſaries,or at leaſt,by thoccaſion of their diuiſions, they ſuſpected that he aſpired to put abſolutely that citie vnder the obedience of the Church: In this time,Pavvle Vrſin,who with three ſcore men at armes of the olde companie of Virginio, had remeyned many dayes at Montpulcian,and afterwards was gon to the borow of Pieua: interteyned (by the direction of Peter de medicis) A practiſe in the citie of Cortone, with intencion to execute it at ſuch time as the bandes of Virginio ſhould approch, whoſe numbers nor vertue aunſwered not the firſt plots: But during that reſpitt of time, the practiſe being diſcouered which was builded vppon the foundacion and meane of one of the exiles of baſe condicion: one part of their generall groundes & deuiſes began to fayle,and withall many great impediments to appeare: for the Florentyns,in whom was alwayes nouriſhed a carefull pollicie to prouide for daungers, leauing in the contrey of Pyſa three hundreth men at armes & two thowſand footemen,had ſent to encampe neare Cortone two hundred men at armes & 2. thowſand footemen vnder the leading of the Count Rinucce de Marciane whom they had made Mercenarye in their pay: And to thend the bandes of the Syennoys ſhould haue no oportunitie to ioyne with Virginio accordinge to the practiſe betweene them: they ſent to Poggi imperiall vpon the borders of the contrey of Sienna (vnder the gouernment of Guidobalde of Montfeltre Duke of Vrbyn, whom they had interteyned into their pay a litle before)three hundreth men at armes,and fiueteene hundreth footemen,beſides many baniſhed from Sienna (with whom they adioyned) to keepe the citie in greater feare: But after Virginio had giuen many aſſaultes to Gualda where Charles his baſtard ſonne receiued a wound with a ſmall ſhot, and hauing embraſed the moneyes ſent ſecretely to him as was ſuppoſed by the Fulignians, he rayſed his campe without mention or reſpect to thintereſts of the Ferruſins, and marched to the tabernacles and ſo to Panicale in the contrey of Perouſa, making newe inſtance that they would be declared againſt the Florentyns: A thing which they did not only deny to him, but alſo for the diſcontentment they had of his actions at Gualda, they cõpelled him almoſt with threatnings to depart out of their territories: In ſo much that Peter and he going firſt with foure hundreth horſe to Orſaia a towne neare to Cortone,hoping that in that citie (which to auoyde the harmes of the ſouldiers had refuſed to receiue the men at armes of the Florentyns)they ſhould find ſome tumult: After they ſaw all thinges in quiet and ſtabilitie,they paſſed ouer Chianes with three hundreth men at armes,and three thowſand footemen, but the moſt part in confuſion & ill order,becauſe they had bene driuen backe hauing but a very ſmal proporcion of money: They retyred vpon the contrey of Sienna neare to Montpulcian betwene Chianciana,Torrite,and Aſinalongue, where they remeyned many dayes without other action then certeine incurſions and pillages,hauing the bandes of the Florentyns,(which paſſed Chianes at the bridge of Valiance)incamped directly oppoſite vpon the hill Sanſouyn and other places thereabouts. Neither of the ſide of Bolognia (as they hoped) was any inſurrection, for that Bentyuole, not determining for the intereſts and regardes of an other to enter warre with a common weale mighty and his neighbour, refuſed the quarrell and the defenſe, notwithſtanding the perſwacions of the confederats,to whom he made many excuſes, and vſed no leſſe delayes,neither was he curious to conſent that many demonſtracions ſhould be made by Iulian de medicis,who being come from Bologna,laboured to ſtirre vp the frendes which they were accuſtomed to haue in the Mounteynes of that contrey: Amongeſt the confederats there was not one conſent of will and inclinacion, for that it was very acceptable to the Duke of Myllan that the Florentyns ſhould be vexed with thoſe trauells,thereby to be leſſe able for the matters of Pyſa: but it nothing pleaſed him that P.de medicis ſo greatly iniuried by him,ſhould returne to Florence,notwithſtanding (to declare that hereafter he would wholly depend vpon his authoritie) he had ſent to Myllan in ſolemne order his brother the Cardinall: And touching the Venetians, they liked not to haue the burden of that warre impoſed vppon them,and much leſſe to embraſe alone the qûarrell: Beſides,the Duke and they were buyſie to leauye prouiſions to expulſe the french out of the kingdom of Naples: In which reſpectes,fayling in Peter and Virginio not onely the hopes which they exſpected, but alſo the moneyes greatly diminiſhing to enterteyne their bandes of footemen and horſemen: the neceſſities of their eſtates,and conſideracion of their proper ſafeties, cauſed them to withdraw to Bagno Rapulano in the contrey of Chiuſa, a citie ſubiect to the Siennoys: where not many dayes after (Virginio being drawne by his deſtinie*)* arriued Camylla Vitelli and M.de Gemel,ſent by the french king to interteyne him into his pay and leade him into the kingdom of Naples,where the king deſired to ſerue his purpoſe of him,hearing of the defection of the Colonnoys: This offer (albeit many of his frendes impugned it,aduiſing him rather to follow the ſeruice of the confederats who made great ſolicitacion to him or elſe to become for th Arragons) was embraſed and accepted by him, either for that he hoped by that meane to be more able to recouer the landes and contrey of Alba and Taille couſſe: or elſe,remembring eſtſoones how thinges hapned in the loſſe of the kingdom, and ſeeing the authority of the Collonnoys his auncient aduerſaries was ſo great with Ferdinand,that there was no confidence of reconciliacion, and much leſſe to be readdreſſed into his former greatnes: or laſtly for that he was moued,(as him ſelfe did aſſure)with a diſcontentment which he had of the Princes confederat fayling to accompliſh thoſe promiſes which they made to him to miniſter fauors to Peter de medicis: Virginio then entred pay with the french king receiuing cõtract aſwel for him,as for others of the houſe of the Vrſins for ſix hundreth men at armes: notwithſtanding vnder this obligacion (ſuch be the frutes of thoſe that once haue made their faith ſuſpected) to ſende his ſonne Charles into Fraunce for the kinges ſewertie: And being poſſeſſed of the kings money,he prepared him ſelfe to goe with the Vitellies to the kingdome of Naples, where both before the loſſe of the caſtells and after, was continuall inſurrection in many places with diuerſe accidents and fortunes.

Virginio Vrſin in pay with the french king.

For,after Ferdinand had in the beginning made heade in the playne of Sarny, the frenchmen that were retyred from Piedgrotte,were incamped at Nocere within foure myles of thennemie,where their forces being equall, it appeared their diſpoſicions did not differ,for that they conſumed the time vnprofitably in skyrmiſhing without any action worthy of memorie: ſauing that ſeuen hundred of the armie of Ferdinand aſwell footemen as horſemen, being led by a double intelligence to enter the borow of Giſone neare the towne of S. Seuerin,remeyned almoſt all vppon the place either ſlaine or made priſoners: But the bandes of the Pope being come to the ſuccors of Ferdinand,and by that meane the french made more inferior, they retyred from Nocere, which by that occaſion,together with the caſtell,was taken by Ferdinand with a greater ſlaughter of ſuch as had followed the french quarrell: In this time Monſr Montpenſier had foreſeene to furniſh of horſes and other thinges neceſſary for the warre, ſuch as were come with him from the new caſtell: with whom, after he had remounted them in good order, he went to ioyne with the others, and after came to Ariana, A towne abounding with vittells: of the other ſide, Ferdinand ſeeing him ſelfe leſſe ſtronge then thennemie, ſtayed at Montfuskule to temporiſe, without aſſaying of fortune vntill the confederats had refurniſhed him with a greater ſuccor: M. Montpenſier tooke the towne, and afterwards the caſtell of S. Seuerin, and with that fortune had done farre greater thinges if the want preſent of money, and the difficulties to get ſome, had not bene impediments to his oportunitie and vertue: for hauing no releeffe ſent out of Fraunce, nor meane to leauye any in the kingdom of Naples, he could not pay the ſouldiers, by which reaſon the armie inclining to diſcontentment, and the Svvyzzers drawing into murmure, he had no poſſibilitie to doe thinges whoſe effectes might aunſwer the forces he had: In ſuch like actions were conſumed by the one and other armie, about three monethes: In which ſeaſon, Dom Federyk hauing with him Ceſar of Aragon, made warre in Pouylla: he was ayded by thoſe of the contrey, againſt whom made head the Barons & peoples that embraſed the french part: of the other ſide Gracian de Guerres made valiant defence in Abruzze againſt Ferdinand, and the Preſect of Rome who had the kinges pay for two hundreth men at armes, vexed with his eſtates the landes of Montcaſin, and the contrey thereabouts, where was ſomewhat declined the proſperitie of the french by the long ſicknes of M. d'Aubigny, the ſame breaking the courſe of his victorie, although almoſt all Calabria and the principallitie remeyned at the deuocion of the french king: But Conſaluo, who with a ſtrength of the ſpaniſh bandes, with ſuch of the contrey as bare frendſhip to th Arragons (now well increaſed by the conqueſt of Naples,) had taken there certeine places, and made ſtronge in that prouince the name of Ferdinand, where the french founde the ſame difficulties which were in the armie for want of money: Notwithſtanding the eitie of Coſenze being drawne into rebellion againſt them, they recouered it and ſackt it: But in theſe great neceſſities and daungers, appeared no ſuccors at all out of the realme of Fraunce: for that the king ſtaying at Lyons, amuſed the time about iuſtes, torneyes, and other pleaſures of Court, leauing there all his thoughtes of the warre: And albeit he aſſured his councell alwayes that he would eftſoones conſider of thaffayres of Italy, yet the effects & actions that proceeded from him, diſcredited the promiſes he had made to haue remembraunce of them: And yet Argenton brought him this aunſwere from the Senat of Venice, that they pretended to haue no disfrēdſhip with him, for that they entred not into armes vntill he had gotten Nocere, and yet for no other cauſe then for the defenſe of the Duke of Myllan their confederat: and therefore they thought it a thing ſuperfluous, to ratifie eftſoones the auncient frendſhip with a new peace: Beſides they offered him, that by the mediacion of perſons indifferent, they woulde induce Ferdinand, to giue him preſently ſome ſumme of money, with conſtitucion of a tribut of fifty thowſand duckats by yeare, and to leaue in his handes for his ſecuritie, Tarenta vntill a certeine time: The king, as though he had had a prepared & puiſſant ſuccor, refuſed to open his eares to theſe offers, notwithſtanding (beſides theſe perplexities of Italy) he was not without vexacions vpon the frontyers of Fraunce: ſeeing Ferdinand king of the Spaniſh come in perſon to Parpignian had made incurſions into Languedock, where they did no ſmall harmes, adding to their preſent furie other demonſtracions of farre greater emocions: Beſides it was not long ſince the Daulphyn of Fraunce the onely ſonne of the king, dyed: All which thinges (if he had bene bene capable to make wiſe election of peace or warre) ought to haue brought him with more facilitie to condiſcend to ſome accord.

About the ende of this yeare were determined the controuerſies hapning by reaſon of the citadell of Pyſa: for the french king vnderſtanding by good informacion thobſtinacie of the capteine, ſent thether at laſt Monſr Gemel with threatnings and cõmaundements rigorous not only addreſſed to him, but generally to all the french apperteyning to the charge and ſeruice of the ſayd citadell: And a litle after, he diſpatched thether expreſly M. Bonne Couſin to the Capteine, to thende that being informed by a perſon whom he might truſt, both of the kinges meſſage, and alſo the meane to ſatisfie with preſent obedience his former faultes and contumacie: and of the other part, the daunger wherin he ſtoode continuing in diſobedience: he might with more readines proceede to thexecucion of his Maieſties commaundement & iuſt will: All theſe could not remoue the Capteine from his firſt reſolucion, who abiding in his tranſgreſſion, made no reckoning of the meſſage of Gemell ſtaying there a few dayes according to his commiſſion to goe with Camylla Vitelli to find Virginio: And much leſſe was thē comming of Bonne (who was hindred many dayes for that by direction of the Duke of Myllan he was reteyned at Serazena) to any purpoſe to turne the Capteine from his obſtinacie: But hauing wrought Bonne to his conſent & opinion, he made a contract with the Pyſans (Luke Maluezze communicating in the name of the Duke) by vertue whereof he deliuered to the Pyſans the firſt day of the yeare 1496. their citadell, receiuing of them twenty thowſand duckats, whereof xij. thowſand to remeyne to him ſelfe, and eyght thowſande to be deuided in ſhares amongeſt the particular ſouldiers: This money was not leuyed of the ſtores or welth of the Pyſans, in whom was no meane to interteyne their proper condicion, & much leſſe to refurniſh expenſes extraordinary, onely not to loſe thopportunitie of the citadell, they prayed the aydes of their frendes, hauing foure thowſand of the Venetians, foure thowſand of the Genovvays and Luckoyes, and foure thowſand of the Duke of Myllan: who vſing at the ſame time his ordinary ſhiftes and practiſes (whereunto was giuen litle faith) he ſolicited faintly to enter with the Florentyns into firme intelligence and amitie, & was already agreed of condicions with their Embaſſadors.

It can not in any conſtruction cary likelihood of truth, that Monſr de Ligny, or the Capteine, or any other would haue vſed ſo great tranſgreſſion without the kings will and liking, ſeeing chiefly the matter was ſo much to his diſauauntage: for that albeit the Capteine had capitulated that the citie of Pyſa ſhould continue in the obedience of the crowne of Fraunce, yet it remeyned manifeſtly at the deuocion of the confederats: and for that the reſtitucion tooke not effect, the french men that were left in the realme of Naples were naked of the ſuccors of men and money promiſed in the contract of Thuryn: The Florentyns obſeruing diligētly the action of all things, (albeit in the beginning they made great dowt) were poſſeſt at laſt with this opinion, that all was done contrary to the will of the king: A thing which might ſeeme incredible to all others that knew not what was his nature, nor what were the condicions of his wit and cuſtomes, nor how litle authoritie he bare amongeſt his people, And laſtly how eaſily men are emboldened againſt a Prince that is falne into indignitie and contempt.

After the Pyſans were entred by heapes into the citadell, they razed it flat with the earth: And knowing their owne ſtrength not ſufficient to beare out the defenſe and protection of their cauſe, they ſent at the ſame inſtant Embaſſadors to the Pope, to the king of Romans, to the Venetians, to the Duke of Myllan, to the Genovvays, to the Syennoys, and to the Lucquoys, praying ſuccors of euery one by particular ſute & diſcourſe, but with greater inſtance of the Venetians & Duke of Myllan, towards whom they nouriſhed a franke inclinacion to transferre the iuriſdiction of their citie: wherin they had this cogitacion and ſeeming, that they were conſtrayned not ſo much to looke to the preſeruacion of their libertie, as to eſchew the neceſſitie to returne eftſoones into the power of the Florentyns: Their hopes alſo were more partiall in him then in any of the reſidue, for that beſides he was the firſt ſtirrer of them to rebellion by reaſon of neighbourhood, yet reaping from the other confederats no other thing then generall hopes, they had alwayes receiued from him preſent & ready ſuccors: But the Duke (notwithſtanding his deſire and ambicion were importunat) ſtoode dowtfull whether he ſhoulde accept it, for feare leaſt the other confederats woulde grow deuided by it, in whoſe councells was now begonne to treate of the affayres of Pyſa, as of a common cauſe: By reaſon whereof ſome times he woulde deſire the Pyſans to deferre, and ſome times aduiſed them that it might be done in publike action & in the name of the Sainct Seueryns, and he to diſcloſe that all was done to his profit, when he ſhould ſee his time: But in the ende (deſire of dominion is troubleſom till the appetite be ſatisfied) when he ſaw the french king was gone out of Italy, and finding withall that his neceſſities & occaſions with the confederats were not now ſo great, he determined to embraſe it.

But this inclinacion of the Pyſans began to grow colde for the great hopes they had to be ſuccored by the Senat of Venice: and withall, they had this councell of others, that more eaſily might they defend their eſtate with the ayde of many, then to ſtand vpon the ſuccors of one alone, finding by this meane a more greater hope to menteyne their libertie with full protection: According to theſe conſideracions, after they had obteyned the citadel, they labored to bring to their defenſe & ſtrēgth, the fauors and ſuccors of euery one: for the furtherance of which intencion, the diſpoſicion of the eſtates of Italy ſerued to good purpoſe: for the Genovvays, for the malice they bare to Florence, and the Siennoys and Lucquoys for hatred and feare, were alwayes to miniſter ayde to them in ſome ſort, wherein to proceede with more reſolucion and order, they ſolicited to make a contract with obligacions reſolut for that effect: To the Venetians and Duke of Myllan, interteyning one deſire to be their ſoueraigne Lordes, it could not but be intollerable that they returned to the rule of the Florentyns: And with the Pope and th Embaſſadors of the Spaniſh, much helped them, their common deſire to plucke downe the Florentyns as being too much inclined to the doings of Fraūce: So that hauing bene graciouſly heard in euery place, and obteyned of the elect Emprour the priuiledge of confirmacion of their libertie: they brought from Venice and Myllan the ſame promiſes to preſerue them in their libertie which they had made afore with one common conſent to helpe to deliuer them from the french: And the Pope in the name and conſent of all the Potentats of the league, incouraged them by a ſpecial ſigneture, with promiſe that they ſhould be mightely defended of euery one: But in theſe great promiſes & hopes, the moſt apparant ſuccors came from the Venetians and Duke of Myllan, the Duke augmenting the number of men that were there firſt, and the Senat refurniſhing them with a proporcion ſufficient: An action wherein if they had both continued, the Pyſans had not bene conſtrayned to ſticke more to the one then to the other of them, & by that meane alſo the common benefit had bene more eaſily preſerued: But as in all things not followed with the ſame induſtrie wherein they are begon, the ende is leſſe then the exſpectacion: ſo it hapned to the Duke of Myllan, who (fearing alwayes great expenſes, and being inclined of nature to proceede in all actions with apparances and ſhiftes) made his accompt that the iuriſdiction of Pyſa coulde not but fall into his handes, and therefore beganne with ſmal proporcions to furniſh thinges which the Pyſans demaunded of him: In which diſtruſt and incerteintie of dealing, they tooke occaſion to transfer all their inclinacions to the Venetians, in whom they foūd a plentifull releeffe in all their neceſſities without any ſparing: from whence proceded, that a few monethes after the french had redeliuered the citadell, the Senat of Venice required by the generall and importunat ſutes of the Pyſans, determined to take the citie into their protection, the Duke of Myllan rather perſwading them to it then making any ſhow of diſliking: This was done without the priuitie of the other confederats, nor once communicating with them either generally or a parte, notwithſtanding in the beginning they had giuen them comfort to ſend bandes of men to their ſuccors: but nowe they alleaged that they were no more bownde to thoſe promiſes, for that without their conſent, they had particularly couenaunted with the Venetians.

The Venetians in minde to take vpon them the defence of Pyſa.

It is moſt certeine, that neither the deſire to preſerue the libertie of their neighbours (which in their owne contrey they loue much) nor any regarde to the common benefitt and ſafetie (as they did alwayes publiſh with honorable wordes) but the only deſire to get the iuriſdiction of Pyſa, were the cauſes that the Venetians made this reſolucion: By the meane whereof they dowted not in ſhorte time to reape a ſweete frute of their ambicious deſire, euen with the wil of the Pyſans them ſelues, in whō was a willing election to liue vnder the rule of Venice, the better to be alwayes aſſured, not to be repaſſed eftſoones into the ſeruitude of the Florētyns: And yet notwithſtanding this inclinacion to protect the Pyſans, it was often times and with long diſcourſe debated in the Senat, the generall diſpoſicion being almoſt hindred for the authoritie of ſome of the moſt auncient and eſteemed Senators, who impugning it with mighty reaſons aſſured the reſidue, that to appropriat the gouernment and defenſe of Pyſa, was a matter full of difficulties, for that by land it was a ſtate farre from their confynes, and by ſea much farther remoued from all their good oportunities, hauing no meane to goe thether, but by the dwellings and hauens of others fetching a compaſſe about both the ſeas that inuironeth Italy, for which reaſons they could not defend it from the continuall vexacions of the Florentyns but with intollerable expenſes: They could not deny but ſuch an enlargement would be very honorable for the ſtate of Venice: But they wiſhed there might be made aduiſed conſideracions of the difficulties to keepe it, and much more conference of the condicions of the time preſent, together with that which might happen by ſuch a deliberacion: for that all Italy being ſuſpicious of their greatnes, ſuch an encreaſe of Lordſhip coulde not but be extremely ielous and diſpleaſing to all, wherin would be bred eaſily more great and daungerous accidents then happly were looked into of many: ſuch were greatly deceiued in whoſe perſwacions was this ſewertie, that the other Potentats would ſuffer without gainesaying, that to their Lordſhip and imperie ſo redowted thorowe all Italy, ſhoulde be ioyned ſo great oportunities by the demeane of Pyſa: wherein if they were not (as they haue bene) ſo mighty to withſtand it of their proper ſtrength, they were not (ſeeing the way was tought to them on the other ſide the mountes to paſſe into Italy) without great occaſion to oppoſe againſt them forreine force, to the which (no dowt) they would haue ready recourſe aſwell for hate as for feare (this being a vice common to all men, to ſeeke rather to ſerue ſtraungers, then to giue place to their owne:) And touching the Duke of Myllan, how can it be belegreateſt number, were ſurmounted and caried ouer with the perſwacions of Auguſtyn Barbarin Duke of the ſame citie, whoſe rule was become ſo great and generall, that exceeding the modeſtie of the Dukes paſt, he aſpired rather to a power abſolut, then authoritie lymited or regulated: for that, beſides that he had many yeares managed that dignitie with happy ſucceſſe, and beſides his many excellent giftes & graces of the minde, he had ſo preuayled with ſingularitie of conning dealing, that many Senators, (willingly oppoſed againſt ſuch, as in a name to be wiſe for long experience, and for that they had obteyned ſupreme dignities, were of greateſt reputacion in that common weale) linked to him, and followed commonly his opinions rather in a manner of confederats and partakers, then with that forme of grauitie & integritie which duely is requiſit in the office of Councellors. He deſirous to leaue with the increaſe of the ſtate, a worthy memorie of his name, not putting any ende to his appetit after glorie, and much leſſe contented that during his rule, the yle of Cypres (failing the kinges of the houſe of Luſignian) ſhould be annexed to the Empire of Venice: was importunat to embraſe euery occaſion to make great their eſtate: In which inclinacion, oppoſing him ſelf againſt thoſe who for the regard of Pyſa, councelled the contrary, he ſhowed with rounde diſcourſe of wordes and reaſons howe much it imported the Senat in vtilitie and conueniencie to haue Pyſa, & how much it concerned them to repreſſe by this meanes the arrogãcie of the Florentyns, who in the death of Phillipp Maria Viſconte, had made them loſe thoccaſion to be Lordes of the Duchie of Myllan, & of late in their action of loanes of money during the french warres, had done more harme then any one of thother Potentats: he declared that ſeldom are offered ſo goodly occaſions, what infamie to loſe them, and afterwardes what repentance would follow for not embraſing them: That the condicions of Italy were not ſuch, that in the other Potentats was power of them ſelues to oppoſe againſt thenterpriſe, and much leſſe was their dowte, that for this indignacion or feare, they would haue recourſe to the french king: for that neither the Duke of Myllan hauing ſo highly offended him, durſt neuer eftſoones truſt him, neither ſuch thoughtes moued the Pope: And the king of Naples, when he had recouered his kingdom, would heare no more ſpeaking of the french men: Beſides their entrie into Pyſa (albeit greeuous to others) was not an accident ſo furious, nor a perill ſo neare, as in regard of that, the other Potentats ſhould runne raſhly into thoſe remedies which are vſed in the laſt diſpaire, no more then in ſleight diſeaſes the Phiſicion makes no haſte to giue ſtronge medicines, eſteeming that the patient hath time enough to take them: That if in this weakenes and ſeparacion of the other Italians, they were fearfull to make reckoning of ſo goodly occaſion, it were an exſpectacion vaine, to tary to be able to doe it with more ſewertie, the other Potentats being returned into their former ſtrẽgths, & no leſſe aſſured from the feare of them on thother ſide the Mountes: That for a remedie of too great a feare, they had to conſider that all worldely actions were ordeyned to many perills: But wiſe men knewe that there falles not alwayes in queſtion all the ills that may happen: for that either by the benefit of fortune, or by aduenture, many daungers are diſſolued, and many auoyded with induſtrie and helpe of the time: And therefore it is no office in men deliberating vppon enterpriſes, to confound (as many affirme conſidering litle the proprietie of names and ſubſtance of thinges) feare with diſcreſſion, and much leſſe are to be reputed wiſe, thoſe ſortes of people, who making certeine all perills that are dowtfull, (and therefore haue feare of all,) doe rule their deliberacion as if they ſhould all happen, ſeeing in no manner can merit the name of wiſe or diſcreete, ſuch

by decree publike, and ſpeciall promiſe to defend their libertie: which deliberacion was not in the beginning conſidered by the Duke of Myllan as was conuenient: For by this meanes being excluded to enterteyne any bandes there, he held it very acceptable to be deliuered of ſuch expenſes: he eſteemed it alſo not out of the way of his profit, that Pyſa at one time ſhoulde be thoccaſion of great charges both to the Venetians and the Florentyns: Laſtly he perſwaded him ſelfe that the Pyſans, for the greatnes and neighbourhood of his eſtate, and for the memorie of thinges done by him for their deliuerie, would be ſo dedicated to him, that they would alwayes pre-ferre him before all others.

thinges) he nouriſhed him ſelfe, to haue as it were vnder his feete, fortune, whoſe ſonne he would not ſtick with publike vaunting to ſay he was: ſo much was he pufſed vp with vayne glorie by the proſperous ſucceeding of his affayres, and no leſſe o-uerruled with ſingular weening, for that by his meanes and his councells the french king firſt paſſed into Italy, appropriating to him ſelfe the chaſſe giuen to Peter de me- dicis by the Florentyns with loſſe of his eſtate, the rebellion of the Pyſans, and the fleiing of th Arragons from the realme of Naples: And afterwards with a councel chaunged, he was the cauſe by his deuiſes and authoritie, of the confederacion of ſo many Potentats againſt the french king, of the returne of Ferdinand into the kingdom of Naples, of the departing of the french out of Italy with condicions vnworthy ſuch a greatnes: And laſtly in the action of the Capteine who had in charge the citadell of Pyſa, wherein his induſtrie or his authoritie had more power then the wil & commaundements of his king: with which rules meaſuring thinges to come, and iudging the wiſedom and pollicie of all others to be farre inferior to the excellencie of his ſpirit, he flattered him ſelfe to be alwayes able to addreſſe & gouerne the affayres of Italy as he would, and with his induſtrie to turne and wynde the mindes of euery one: This fonde perſwacion he could not diſſemble neither in him ſelfe, nor in his peoples, and no more in wordes and geſtures, then in demonſtracions and actions, making it a thinge acceptable to him that euery one beleued and ſpake ſo by him: In ſo much that Myllan day and night was repleniſhed with voyces vayne and glorious, celebrating with verſes latyne and vulgar, and with publike orations full of flattery, the wonderful wiſedom of Lodovvyk Sforce, of the which they made to depend the peace and warre of all Italy: they magnified his name euen to the third heauen,

& the ſurname of More,(impoſed vpon him from his youth for that he was of complexion browne, and for thopinion of his craftes which now were mãniſeſt)he was contented to reteyne willingly ſo long as he remeyned Duke of Myllan: Then no leſſe was thauthoritie of this More in the other caſtells of the Florentyns,then it had bene in the citadell of Pyſa,ſo that in Italy, it ſeemed that aſwell ennemies as frendes were ruled by the meaſure of his will ſo cloking his ſuttelties with apparances of frendſhip, that his intencions were not diſcerned,till his purpoſe was executed: for albeit the kinge of the french, hearing the greeuous complaintes made to him by thEmbaſſadors of Florence,was not a litle diſcontented, & to thend at leaſtwiſe that their other places might be rendred , had diſpatched Robert de Veſte his Chamberlaine with new commiſſions,and letters ſpecial from Monſr de Ligny: yet his authoritie bearing no more power with others,then with him ſelf,the audacitie of Monſr de Ligny was ſo great (aſſuring many that he proceeded not but by the kinges will) that his Maieſties commaundements bare ſmall reputacion by meane of his newe commiſſions ioyned to the froward will of the caſtell keepers: In ſo much that the baſtard of Vyenne Lieftenant to Ligny in Serazana, after he had drawne his companies thether with the commiſſioners of the Florentyns,to receiue poſſeſſion of them, he gaue them to the Genovvays for the price of fiue and twenty thowſand duckats. The Capteine of Serazanella did the like for a ſumme of money,of which the author and onely meane was the More,who hauing oppoſed againſt the Florentyns(but vnder the name of the Genovvays) Frecaſſe with a hundreth horſe and foure hundreth footemen,gaue hindrance that the Florentyns,who by meane of their bandes ſent to receiue Serazana, had recouered certeine peeces in the contrey Lunigane,ſhoulde not recouer all their places they had loſt there: And a litle after, Entragues late capteine of the citadell of Pyſa,vnder whoſe garde alſo remeyned yet the caſtells of Pietra Santa,and Mutron,together with that of Librafrate, which not many monethes after he gaue to the Pyſans, ſold the reſidue to the Lucquoys for ſix and twenty thowſand duckats,as preciſely was directed to him by the Duke of Myllan: who firſt wiſhed they might fall to the Genovvays,but afterwards chaunging aduiſe,he thought it better to gratifie them of Lucque , to thende they might haue occaſion to miniſter ready aydes to the Pyſans,and to reduce them more to his deuocion by this benefitt: All theſe thinges were caried into Fraunce,for the which albeit the king ſhowed him ſelfe much diſcontented with Ligny, and pronounced Entragues baniſhed out of all his realmes: yet at the returne of Bonne (who not participating with the money of the Pyſans,had treated at Genes the ſale of Serazana)his iuſtificacions were accepted, and graciouſly receiued an Embaſſador of the Pyſans ſent with him to perſwade the king that the Pyſans would remeyne faithfull ſubiects to the crowne of Fraunce, and to proteſt their fidelitie by othe, albeit a litle after, his commiſſions not being liked, he had franke leaue to depart: to Monſr de Ligny was impoſed no other payne, then (to ſhowe that he had no more the kinges fauor) the grace to lye in his Maieſties chamber as he was wont,was taken from him, to the which he was immediatly reſtored: and Entragues remeyned onely in contumacie, but no long time: to which thinges gaue good ayde (beſides the kinges nature with other meanes and fauors)A true perſwacion that was made,that ſuch were the neceſſities of the Florentyns, that they could not endure ſeparacion from him: for that the ambicion of the Venetians and Duke of Myllan being manifeſt,it was a certeine probabilitie in diſcourſe & reaſon,that if they were not repoſſeſſed of Pyſa, they would neuer accorde to be confederat with them for the defenſe of Italy, whereunto they ſought to induce them by threatnings and meanes rigorous, and did not for the preſent, aſſaie any other thing againſt them, but reſted ſufficed, (with the bandes they had put into Pyſa) to ſupport that citie, and not ſuffer her wholly to loſe her iuriſdiction (the daunger of the kingdom of Naples drawing them from all other care) for Virginio, who had gathered at Bagno de Rapolano and in the contrey of Peruſin, many companies of ſouldiers, marched with the other Vrſins towards Abruzze, holding alſo the ſame way with their bandes, Camylla & Pavvle Vitelli, by whom the borow of Montlion (refuſing to giue them vittells) was put to the ſacke: which ſo amaſed the other places of the church by the which they ſhould paſſe, that notwithſtanding the expreſſe defenſes of the Pope, they were receiued in all townes and releeued with vittells: By the reapport of theſe marchings, but much more for the brute of an aſſured ſuccor comming by ſea out of Fraunce, by which the french affayres ſeemed to ſtand vpon good tearmes in the kingdom of Naples: Ferdinand no leſſe deſtitute of money, then enuyroned on all ſides with aſpectes of daungers and difficulties of warre, and not able without great ſuccors, to ſuſteyne ſo great a burthen, was conſtrayned to ſtudy for new remedies to his preſent defence: it is ſo, that in the beginning the other Potentats had not comprehended him in their league: And albeit ſince he had recouered Naples, the king of Spaine made inſtance to haue him admitted to the confederacion, yet the Venetians would neuer agree to that poynt, perſwading them ſelues that his neceſſities would be a ready meane to aduaunce the expectacion of their plott that one part of that realme might fall into their obedience: So that Ferdinand left to the miſeries of many aduerſities, and made naked of all hopes (for he exſpected no newe ſuccors from Spaine, and the other confederats would not intangle them ſelues with ſo great exſpenſes) was conſtrayned to couenant with the Senat of Venice, (promiſing with all obſeruances to the Pope and the kinge of Spaine:) That the Venetians ſhould ſend to his ſuccors into the realme of Naples, the Marquis of Mantua their Capteine with ſeuen hundred men at armes, fiue hundreth light horſemen, & three thowſand footemen, menteyning ſtill their armie by ſea which was there already: with this condicion notwithſtanding to reuoke thoſe aydes at all tymes when they ſhould haue neede to imploy them in their proper affayres: That they ſhould lende to him fiueteene thowſand duckats to ſerue his neceſſities preſent: And for the ſecuritie of theſe expenſes, Ferdinand to aſſigne vnto them Otrante, Brunduſa, and Trane, with conſent that they might ſtill reteyne Monopoli and Puligniana which then were in their hands, vnder this couenant to render them, when their expēſes ſhould be reſtored and ſatisfied: prouided alwayes, that neither by reaſon of the warre, nor for the garding or fortificacions which they ſhoulde make, they ſhoulde not redemaunde of him aboue two hundred thowſand duckatts: Thoſe portes being in the ſea ſuperior, & therfore of great oportunitie to Venice, augmented much their greatnes: which (no man now oppoſing againſt them, and ſince they embraſed the protection of Pyſa, not hearing more of the councells of ſuch, as wiſhed that to windes ſo fauorable, they had giuen leſſe ſayles) began to be ſtretched thorow all the partes of Italy: for beſides the thinges of the kingdome of Naples and Tuskane, they had of new taken to their pay, Aſtor Lorde of Faenza, and accepted the protection of his eſtates: A man very conuenient to keepe in feare the Florentyns, the citie of Bolognia, with all the reſidue of Romagnia.

Couenants be twene Ferdinand king of Naples and the Venetians

To theſe particular aydes of the Venetians, were added other ſuccors of the confederats, the Pope, the Duke of Myllan, and they ſending to Ferdinand a ioynt ſupply of bandes of men at armes interteyned at their common paye: And albeit the Duke of Myllan, in whom remeyned as yet many ſemblances to keepe thaccord at Verceill, (notwithſtanding the moſt parte of thoſe thinges were directed by his councells) woulde not either in the leuies of men or money, or other demonſtracions, that his name were vſed: yet he agreed ſecretly to contribute euery moneth tenne thowſand duckats for the ſuccors of the kingdom of Naples.

The marching of the Vrſins and the Vitellies aſſured greately the affayres of Abruzze which were in no ſmall confuſion, againſt the french men: ſeeing Terame & the citie of Chieta were drawne into rebellion, with great dowt that Aquilea the principall towne of that region, would doe the like: which they at their comming hauing reconfirmed in the deuocion of the french, and recouered Terame by compoſicion, and ſacked Iulyanoue, almoſt all Abruzze was with one fortune eſtſoones ſo reeſtabliſhed, that thaffayres of Ferdinand began to ſhowe manifeſt declinacion thorowe the whole kingdome: for that almoſt all Calabria was in the power of Monſr d Aubigny, notwithſtanding his long ſicknes, for the which he ſtayed in Terace, gaue oportunitie to Conſaluo to keepe the warre kindled in that prouince, with the Spanish bandes, and ſtrength of ſome Lordes of the contrey: Beſides, Caietta with many places aſſiſting followed the obedience of the french: The Prefect of Rome, with his companie and the forces of his eſtate, after he had recouered the peeces of Montcaſin, inuaded the land of Lauora on that ſide: And Monſr Montpenſier, albeit by the want of money he was muche reſtrayned to vſe his forces, yet he compelled Ferdinand to incloſe him ſelfe in ſtronge places, being vexed with the ſame neceſſitie of money, and many other wants, but wholly reappoſed vpon the hope of the ſuccors of Venice, which for that contract betwene them was made not long before, coulde not be aduaunced with readines and expedicion equall with the exſpectacion of his affayres: Montpenſier labored to betray Beneuent by intelligence, but Ferdinand eyther hauing dowt or ſome aduertiſement of the practiſe, preuented thexecucion by his ſuddeine entring the towne with his bandes: The french notwithſtanding came neare to Beneuent, and lodging vpon the bridge of Fynoche, they tooke Sinezana, Apice, and many other townes bordering: But theſe places bearing no fauor to their armie for vittells, they diſcamped, hauing alſo regard to the tyme drawing on to gather the tribute of the cattell of Powylla, one of the greateſt reuenues of the kingedom, for that it was wont to amount euery yeare to lxxx. thowſand duckats, which were all gathered almoſt in the ſpace of a moneth: Monſr Montpenſier to depriue them of this commoditie, and no leſſe for thextreme neceſſities of his people, turned his way to Powylla, whereof one parte was holden by him, and the other at the deuocion of Ferdinand, marching after him by the ſame way, with intencion rather to hinder by art and diligence the actions of the ennemie vntill his ſuccors were ariued, then to fight with them in playne battell.

About this tyme arriued at Caietta, an armie by ſea of the french, of xv. great veſſells, and ſeuen others of leſſer burden, in which were imbarked at Sauone eyght hundreth launceknightes, leauyed in the contreyes of the Duke of Gueldres, and thoſe Swyſſers and Gaſcoyns appoynted before by the kinge to be ſent with thoſe great ſhips which were to be armed at Genes: To this nauie the armie of Ferdinand which were aboue Caietta to ſtoppe the paſſage of vittells (being in deede for want of money ill appoynted) gaue ſuch place, that they entred the hauen without impedimēt, ſet their footemen on land, & with the ſame fortune toke Itry with other places aſſiſting, And after they had made a great pray thorow the cōtrey, they hoped to haue Seſſe by the meane of Dom Baptiſta Caracciol, by whom they had promiſe to be put ſe-cretely within it: But Dom Federyk (who with the bandes that followed him being withdrawne to the borders of Tarenta, was afterwardes ſent by Ferdinand to the gouernment of Naples) beinge aduertiſed of the conſpiracie, marched thether with ſpeede equall to the daunger, and made priſoner the Biſhop with certeine others conſenting to the treaſon.

In Povvylla, where was the force and ſtrength of the warre, the affayres ſucceeded with diuerſitie of fortunes to both the one and the other armie, which were diſperſed into the townes, aſwel for the ſharpnes of the ſeaſon, as ſtraitnes of the place not ſufficing to receiue one of the armies wholly: Their exerciſes were to make incurſions and roades on horſebacke to pill and pray the cattell, vſing rather induſtrie and agilitie, then vertue or force of armes. Ferdinand was lodged in Fogge with one part of his people, and had beſtowed the reſidue, partely in Troye, and partely in Nocere: where vnderſtanding that betwene S. Seuera (within which towne was lodged Virginio Vrſin with three hundreth men at armes come to be vnited with the armie of Montpenſier) and the towne of Portina (where was Marian Sauella with a hundreth men at armes) was brought almoſt an infinit quantitie of Muttons & other natures of cattell: he marcheth thether with ſix hundred men at armes, eyght hundred light horſemen, and fiueteene hundreth footemen: And comming by the breake of the day afore S. Seuera, he planted him ſelf there with his men at armes to giue reſiſtance to Virginio if he made any erupcion, & making his light horſemen to skowre abroad, they ouerſpred forthwith the whole contrey, and led away almoſt lx. thowſand head of cattell: whereto Marian Sauella offering to make reſiſtance, and yſſuing forth of Portina, they conſtrayned him to retyre with the loſſe of thirty men at armes: This loſſe and ſhame procured Monſr Montpenſier, (reaſſembling all his forces) to march towardes Fogge, for the recouery of the praye and honor loſt: where being fauored with a ſuccor aboue his hopes or exſpectation, he encowntred betwene Nocere and Troye, eyght hundreth launceknightes newly arriued by ſea, and entred into the pay of Ferdinand: Theſe launceknightes departing from Troye where they were incamped, went to Fogge to ioyne with Ferdinand: A iorney more vpon their owne braine and raſhnes, then by the kinges commaundement, and altogether againſt the councell of Fabrice Colonne, incamped likewiſe at Troye: And albeit they ſaw by thextremitie of their perill and place, that their fortune had left them no poſſibilitie of ſafetie, either by fleing or by fighting, yet they were obſtinate and refuſed the libertie of the lawe of armes to be made priſonners, but were killed euery creature of them, exchaunginge their liues with a great deathe and ſlaughter of thennemie: After this, Montpenſier preſented him ſelfe before Fogge in aray of battell: but Ferdinand not ſuffering others to goe out then light horſemen, the french men went to incampe in the woode of Nicoronata where after they had remeyned two dayes with no ſmall difficulties for vittels, and hauing recouered the moſt part of the cattel, they appeared eſtſoones afore Fogge, & abiding there a whole night, they returned the day following to S. Seuera, but not with all the pray they had recouered, for that in their retrait, the light horſemen of Ferdinand tooke a great part from them, In ſo much, as the cattell being harried by the one and the other, neither part drew any great profit of the reuenues of that tribute. Not many dayes after the french men made weary with want of vittells, went to Campobaſſo which was holden by them, and tooke by force Coglioneſſa or Grigoneſſa A towne faſt by, where the Svvyzzers againſte the will of the Capteines, vſed ſuch execucion and crueltie, that albeit it brought great aſtoniſhment vpon the contrey, yet it eſtraunged from them thaffections of many:

And

And Ferdinand laying to defende his eſtate aſwell as he could, whileſt he yet exſpected the Marquis of Mantua, he reordeyned his bandes, by the meane of ſixteene thowſand duckatts which the Pope had ſent him, and with ſuch other proporcions as he could leauy of him ſelfe.

About this time, did ioyne with Montpenſier the Swyzzers, and other footbands which were come by ſea to Caietta, as alſo on the other part, the Marquis of Mantua, now entred into the kingdom of Naples by the way of S.Germyn, taking in his marching partly by force, partely by compoſicion, many places (albeit of ſmall importance) about the beginning of Iune, vnited his forces with the king at Nocere, whether Cæſar of Aragon led the bandes that had lyen vpon the borders of Tarenta: And ſo by reaſon of the places, the forces of both the factions being almoſt made neighbours, the french more ſtronge in footemen, and th Italians more mighty in horſemen, the euent of thinges ſeemed very dowtfull, being not poſſible to diſcerne to whether of the parties the victorie ſhould incline. The Marquis of Mantua for the Venetians in the kingdom of Naples.

In this meane while, the french king made care for prouiſions to reskew his people, And vnderſtanding of the loſſe of the caſtells of Naples, and that his bands were not ſuccored by the Florentyns neither with men nor money, for that they had not reſtitucion of their fortreſſes: ſeemed to draw to him a new ſpirit, and awaking out of that ſlumber of negligence with the which he ſeemed to haue returned out of Fraunce: he began eftſoones to turne his thoughtes to the actions of Italy: wherein to be more at libertie from all thinges that might reteyne him, and (ſhowing to acknowledge the benefits receiued in his daungers) that he might with more cõfidẽce haue recourſe againe to the aydes celeſtial, he takes a iorney in poſt to Tours, & after to Parys, to ſatiſfie to the vowes he made to S.Martyn, & S.Denys the day of the battell of Furnoua: And returning from thoſe places, with the ſame diligence to Lyons, he kindled more and more in thoſe deſires and thoughtes, whereunto of his owne nature he was moſt inclined: for he interpreted it as an action much to his reputacion and glorie, to haue made a conqueſt of ſuch a kingdom, being the firſt of all the french kinges, in whoſe perſon haue bene renewed in Italy theſe many worldes, the memorie of the armies and victories of the french: he made perſwacion to him ſelf that the difficulties which he encowntred in his return from Naples, proceded more by his proper diſorders then by the powers or vertue of th Italians, whoſe name (concerning the action of warre) caried no reputacion with the french: To his inclinacions to diſcẽd eftſones into Italy, were not a litle furthering thinticemẽts of th Embaſſadors of Florence, of the Cardinall of S.Peter ad vincla, and of Triuulce, who was come to the Court for the ſame occaſion, with whom were aſſiſtant in that inſtance Vitellezze and Charles Vrſin, together with the Count Montoire, ſent to his Maieſtie in that negociacion by the Barons of Naples holding parte with the french: as alſo there came to him at laſt by ſea, the Seneſhall of Beaucaire, by whom were declared many hopes of the victorie, in caſe his Maieſtie did not deferre to ſende a ſufficient ſuccor: as of the contrary to delay a releeffe ſo neceſſary, were to abandon the kingdom and be giltie of the death of ſo many noble Capteines and ſouldiers: To theſe were ioyned the fauorable perſwacions of many the great Lordes of Fraunce, euen ſuch as afore had giuen councell againſt thenterpriſe of Italy: they aduiſed the king to giue a new life to that expedicion, to auoyd the diſhonor that would falvpon the crowne of Fraunce, to loſe by cowardiſſe that which they had conquered with ſo great felicitie and fortune, but much more to preuent the ſpoyle of ſo great a part of the nobilitie as lay open to deſtruction in the realme of Naples: Neither were theſe The french king makes a poſting pilgrimage to Towers and S.Dennys.

councells hindred by the emocions which the Kinge of the Spaniſhe made on the frontyer of Parpignian, ſeeing the preparacions being greater in brute then in effect, and the forces of that king more mighty to defend his proper realmes, then meete for thinuaſion of an other, it was iudged ſufficient to ſende to Narbone and other townes vpon the frontyers of Spaine, bandes of men at armes with conuenient companies of Svvyzzers: So that in the preſence of the councell of the kinge wherein were aſſembled all the Lordes and perſons notable then at the Court: it was determined that Tryuulce ſhould returne to Aſt with as much diligence as he could vnder the title of the kinges Lieftenant, leading with him eyght hundreth launces, two thowſand Svvyzzers, and two thowſand Gaſcoyns: That after him the Duke of Orleans ſhould paſſe the Mountes with other bandes: and laſtly ſhould march the kings perſon with all other prouiſions: and paſſing with a power royall, there was no dowt but the ſtates of the Duke of Sauoye, of the Marquis of Montferat and Saluce, (very fit inſtruments to make warre vpon the Duchie of Myllan) woulde be for him: Like as alſo it was beleued, that except the Canton of Berne, who had promiſed the Duke of Myllan not to moue againſt him, all the other Svvyzzers would reſort to the kinges paye with no leſſe readines then full numbers: Theſe reſolucions were made with conſents ſo much the more generall, by how much was great the deſire of his Maieſtie, who afore they entred into councell, had much coniured the Duke of Burbon to ſet forth with vehement & liuely ſpeeches, how reaſonable and neceſſary it were to make a ſtronge warre: and of him ſelfe in open councel, with the ſame affection he refuted th Admirall, who (not ſo much in impugning directly, as propownding many difficulties) aſſayed to qualifie indirectly the wills of the councell, hauing but a fewe fauorers of his opinion: The kinge aduauncing his particular deſire aboue all councell, aſſured them publikely that it was not in his power to make other reſolucion, for that ſuch was the will of God that he ſhoulde in perſon marche eftſoones into Italy: it was agreed in the ſame councell, that a nauie of thirty ſhippes, (whereof was one moſt huge carrack called the Norman, and an other groſſe carrack of the region of the roades) ſhould paſſe along the coaſt of the Occean into the hauens of Prouence, where ſhould be armed thirty gallies and gallions with a mighty ſuccor of men, money, munition and vittells for the ſeruice of Naples, which was ſuppoſed to ſtand vpon ſuch condicions of neceſſities and wantes, that afore this nauie could be diſgeſted into order and poynt, it was determined to ſend forthwith certeine veſſells charged with vittells and ſouldiers: it was ordeyned alſo in this councell, that Rigault the kinges Steward ſhoulde goe to Myllan, for that the Duke, (notwithſtanding he had not redeliuered the two carrackes, nor ſuffered to rigge a nauie for the kinge at Genes, but onely reſtored the veſſells taken at Rapale, & not the twelue gallies reſtrayned in the port of Genes) labored to excuſe him ſelfe vppon the diſobedience of the Genovvays, and had alwayes with ſundry practiſes interteyned ſome of his people about the king, to whom he had newly ſent Anthoyne Maria Palvoiſin, both to aſſure his Maieſtie that he was diſpoſed to obſerue thaccord paſt, and to demaund prolongacion of tearme to pay to the Duke of Orleans the fifty thowſand duckats promiſed in the ſame accord: of which deceites and ſuttelties, albeit he reaped but a very litle frute, the king being well informed of his intencion, aſwell by thexamples of his actions paſt, as for that by his letters and inſtructions which were ſurpriſed, it came to light that he ſtirred vp with continuall ſolicitacion the king of Romains and king of Spaine to make warre in Fraunce: yet hoping that feare perhaps would induce him to thinges whereunto his will was eſtraunged, Rigault was charged, that (without ſpeaking of the diſobedience paſt) he ſhould ſignifie to him that it was in his power, to deface the memorie of offences, in beginning now to obſerue, as to reſtore the gallies, to redeliuer the carrackes, and by giuing ſufferance to arme a nauie at Genes: And that he ſhoulde adde to theſe aduertiſements that the kinge was determined to returne into Italy in perſon, which ſhould be to his great harmes, if whileſt he was offered the meane, he would not reenter into that amitie, whereof his Maieſtie was perſwaded, that he had vndiſcreetely made accompt, rather by vaine ſuſpicions, then for any other occaſions: This brute of theſe great prouiſions being come into Italy, much troubled the minds of the confederats: but aboue all Lodovvyk Sforce ſtanding in the mouth of the daunger, & to be the firſt oppoſed to the furie of thennemie, ſuffered no leſſe perplexities then the conſideracion of his perill required, ſpecially vnderſtanding that ſince the departure of Rigault, the king had diſmiſſed & giuen leaue to all his agents with hard wordes and bitter demonſtracions: By reaſon whereof, looking deepely into the greatnes of his daunger, as vppon whoſe eſtate would fal the ſubſtance of the warre: he had eaſily accorded to the kings demaunds, had it not bene for the ſuſpicion and conſcience of thoffences he had made to him, the ſame cauſing on al ſides ſuch a diſtruſt, that it ſeemed more hard to find a meane to aſſure both the one and the other, then not to accord to the articles: for taking from the ſewertie of the one, that which was conſented to aſſure the other, the one would not referre to the faith of the other, that which the other refuſed to referre to his owne: So that neceſſitie compelling Lodovvyk to take the councel that was moſt greeuous, he thought (at leaſt to make ſlow his daungers) to interteyne Rigault with the ſame connings which he had vſed to that preſent, aſſuring him with great firmenes, that he would bring the Genovvays to obey whenſoeuer the kinge woulde giue into the citie of Auignion ſufficient ſekuritie for the reſtitucion of the ſhippes, & that both parties woulde promiſe (giuing mutually oſtages for all obſeruacions) not to enterpriſe any thing preiudicially one to thother: which practiſe continuing many dayes, had laſtly for many cauillacions & difficulties obiected, the ſame effect which others had had before: But Lodovvyk to whom it belonged not to waſt time vnprofitably, diſpatched during theſe areaſonings, Embaſſadors to the king of Romaines, to induce him to paſſe into Italy with the ayde of him and the Venetians, to whom alſo he ſent meſſengers to require that Senat, (to thende to prouide for the common perill) to contribute to that charge, and to ſend into Alexandria a ſufficient proporcion of force to make head againſt the french: To this they offered a ready action: But they ſhowed not ſuch facilitie to aſſiſt the paſſage of the king of Romaines bearing litle frendſhip to their common weale for thoſe peeces which they poſſeſſed in the firme land apperteyning to thempire and houſe of Auſtrich: Neither were they content, that at a common expenſe, ſhould paſſe into Italy an armie, which ſhould wholy depend vpon Lodovvyk: Notwithſtanding Lodovvyk continuing ſtill to ſolicit & make inſtance, for that beſides the other reaſons that moued him, the onely forces of the Venetians in the ſtate of Myllan were ſuſpected to him: The Senat alſo fearing leaſt he, in whom they knew was no litle feare, woulde ſuddeinly draw to reconcilement with the french king, gaue in the ende their conſents, and for the ſame occaſion, ſent Embaſſadors to the king of Romaines: Beſides theſe coniectures, the Venetians and the Duke feared, leaſt the Florentyns, aſſoone as the kinge were paſſed the Mountes, would not make alteracion or inſurrection in the riuer of Genes: To meete with which accident, they ſent to Iohn Bentyuole interteyned in the pay of the confederats with three hundreth men at armes, to make warre vpon the Florentyns in the frontyer of the contrey of Bullognia, promiſing that at the ſame time they ſhould be vexed by the Syennoys: wherein as to giue him more courage to this action, they offered to be bownd, that if he tooke the towne of Piſtoya, to keepe it for him: ſo albeit he fed them with hopes, yet his mind was farre remoued from that ſeruice, and fearing not a litle the comming of the french, he ſent ſecretly to the king, to excuſe him ſelfe for matters paſt vpon the neceſſitie of the place wherein Bolognia was ſeated, & to offer a good will to depend vpon his Maieſtie hereafter, & for his ſake, to abſteine from vexing the Florentyns.

But touching the prouicions for Naples, the wil of the king (albeit very vehement and forward) was not ſufficient to put in execucion the reſolucions of the councell, notwithſtanding aſwel for his honor, as for the daungers of the kingdom, there needed a moſt ready expedicion: for the Cardinall of S. Mallovv, in whoſe direction, beſides the managing of the treaſure, reſted the ſubſtance of the whole gouernment, albeit he impugned not theſe doings apparantly, yet he made ſo ſlow all expedicions with delaying the neceſſary payments, that not one prouiſion was aduaunced in due tyme: it was thought that he did thus, either for that he iudged it was a better meane to perpetuat his greatnes (not making any expenſe which apperteyned not to the preſent profit or pleaſures of the king) not to haue occaſion to propownd euery day the difficulties of thaffayres and neceſſities of money: or elſe for that (as many dowted) being corrupted with preſents and promiſes, he had ſecret intelligence with the Pope, or with the Duke of Myllan: To which dilatorie and ielous dealings, the expreſſe commaundements of the king ful of diſdayne redoubled with wordes reprochfull, could giue no remedie: for that according to thexperience he had of his nature, he ſatisfied him alwayes with promiſes contrary to the effects: In ſo much as thexecucion of thinges determined, hauing bene begonne to be lingred by his meane: there hapned an accident, by the which they became more ſubiect to delayes, and almoſt deſperat altogether: for the king in the ende of May, and when was generall exſpectacion of his ſpeedy paſſage into Italy, determined to goe to Paris, alleaging theſe reaſons, that following the cuſtome of the auncient kinges of Fraunce, it was neceſſary afore he parted out of Fraunce, to take leaue of S. Denys with all the ceremonies vſuall, and likewiſe of S. Martyn in paſſing by Tours: And that being determined to march into Italy with a great prouicion of money, it was needefull (to auoyd the neceſſities wherein he had falne the yeare before) that he induced the other cities of Fraunce to contribucion by thexample of Paris, of whome he ſhould not obteyne that he deſired, onles he went thether in perſon: That being in thoſe quarters, he ſhould make to march in greater diligence the men at armes that came from Normandie and Picardy: he aſſured them that afore he departed from Lyons, he would diſpatche the Duke of Orleans, and would make his returne thether againe within one moneth: But it was ſuppoſed that the moſt true & principal cauſe of his going, was for that he was amarous of one of the ladies of the Queenes chamber, being gone a litle before to Tours with her Court: wherein he was ſo reſolute, that neither the councels of his peoples, nor thimportunat humilities followed with teares of th Italians, coulde withdrawe him from a voyage of ſuch deuocion: They ſhowed him how hurtfull it would be to waſte tyme proper for the warre, ſpecially in ſo great a neceſſitie of his ſeruice in the kingdome of Naples: to what ſlaunder he ſhould be ſubiect in the mouthes of all Italy, to drawe backe when he ought moſt to goe forward: That the reputacion of enterpriſes chaunged for euery litle accident and light brute: That it was hard to recouer it, after it began once to declyne, yea

though he ſhould make greater offers, then afore were either promiſed or needful: That of all worldely thinges, nothing was more voluble then renowme, which falling once into a clowde or ſhadow, ſhines neuer after with a cleare light: Theſe perſwacions much leſſe that they could draw his wauering minde from wandring, ſeeing with an obſtinacie vnruled, he vtterly deiected them, eſteeming it perhappes a breache of his religion, to goe out of Fraunce afore he had gon on pilgrimage to the Sainct he ſo deuoutly worſhipped: In ſo much that after he had yet taried a moneth longer at Lion: he tooke his way to goe to Tours, not hauing otherwayes diſpatched the Duke of Orleans then only by ſending Trimulce into Aſt with a very ſlender companye, not ſo much prouided for the warres, as inſtructed to confirme in his frendeſhip and deuocion, Phillipp new ſucceeded to the Duchie of Sauoye, by the death of the litle Duke his Nephewe: And touching the prouicions for Naples, all that was done afore his departure, was the diſpatche of ſix ſhippes loaden with vittells to Caietta, carying many hopes that the mayne armie by ſea ſhould followe with ſpeede: And to ſet order with the Marchantes (but very late) to aduaunce forty thowſande duckats to Montpenſier, to whom the Swyzzers and the launceknightes had proteſted, that if they were not payed before the ende of Iune, they would paſſe to the campe of thennemies: The Duke of Orleans, the Cardinall of S. Mallovv, and al the councell, remeyned at Lyon, with commiſſion to haſten the prouicions, wherein if the Cardinall proceeded ſlowely in the preſence of the kinge, it was nothing to the lingring he vſed in his abſence.

But the affayres of Naples could not attend ſuch ſlow remedies, the daungers being drawne into thoſe tearmes (both for thaſſembly of armed bandes on euery ſide, and many difficulties diſcloſed by both the parties) that if the delayes were long, the warre would determine by neceſſitie: for Ferdinand after he had ioyned to his peculiar force, the bãds of the Venetians, tooke the towne of Caſtelfranke, where arriued at his campe accompanied with two hundreth men at armes Iohn Sforce Lord of Peſere, and Iohn Gonſague brother to the Marquis of Mantua, Capteines of the confederats: In ſo muche as the proporcion of his campe amounted to xij. hundreth men at armes, fifteene hundreth light horſemen, and foure thowſand footemen: At the ſame tyme the french men were incamped at Circelle tenne myles from Beneuent, towards whom Ferdinand marched, and approching them within foure myles, he pitched his campe before Frangette de Montfort, A place of ſo good prouicion & prouidence, that it was not taken at the firſt aſſault: The french rayſed their campe from Circella to reskewe it, but they came not in tyme, for that the launceknightes which were within, yelded them ſelues for feare of the ſecond aſſault, and left the place to diſcreſſion: which occaſion knowen to the french, had bene the cauſe of their felicitie, if either by indiſcreſſion or ill fortune, they had not ſuffered it to be loſt: for (as was confeſſed generally) they had at eaſe that day broken the whole armie of thennemy, ſo vniuerſally confuſed in the ſacke of Frangette that they gaue no regarde to the directions of the Capteines, who ſeeing no other diſtance betwene the french and them then a valley, labored with all diligence to reaſſemble them: Montpenſier ſawe well enough into thoccaſion, and Virginio was not ignorant in thoportunitie offered, the one commaunding, and the other perſwading the victory to be certein, deſired with teares in their eyes, to marche ouer the valley, whileſt in the campe of th Italians all thinges were in tumult, ſome of the ſouldiers buſie in the pillage, and ſome laboring to packe away the things they had pylled, no one within rule or commaundement of his Capteine: But Monſr de Perſy one of the chieftaines of tharmy

next to Monſr Montpenſier, ouerruled either with the naturall lightnes of a younge man, or elſe enuying the glory of the D. Montpenſier, perſwaded vehemently againſt the paſſage ouer the valley, alleaging that they ſhoulde riſe euen vnder the feete of thennemie, which waighed with the ſtronge ſcituacion of their campe, he made an argument to the ſouldiers of no ſmall daunger, And therefore wiſhing openly that they ſhould not fight, he was the onely hinderer of ſo good a councel, and ioyned to their misfortune a perpetuall diſhonor, the rather for that the Svvyzzers & launce-knightes receiuing courage by him, drew into mutiny and demaunded money: for this cauſe Montpenſier compelled to retyre, returned to Circelle, where, as they were the day after in the action of thaſſaulte, Camylla Vitelli, whileſt about the walls he did thoffice of an excellent Capteine, was ſtricken in the head with a quarrel, whereof he dyed: for which accident the french men leauing thinuaſion of the place, brake vp from thence, and marched towards Argana, diſpoſed to aſſaye the hazard of battell if occaſion were offered: To which reſolucion was flat contrary the councell of the armie of th Arragons, with whom ſpecially the Commiſſioners of the Venetians conſented in opinion, for that ſeeing into the condicion of thennemies, they iudged that to their preſent want of vittels was ioyned a generall lacke of money, & waighing withall that the ſuccors out of Fraunce were intangled with delayes and reſpits, they hoped that their miſaduentures and neceſſities woulde riſe dayly growing and increaſing, ſtanding ſubiect to as great diſpleaſures in other partes of the kingdome: for that in Abruzze, Annyball naturall ſonne to the Lord of Camerin, being voluntarily gon to the ſuccors of Ferdinand with foure hundred horſemen leauyed at his proper charges, had newely broken the armie of the Marquis of Bitonte: beſides there was exſpectacion of the comming of the Duke of Vrbyn with three hundreth men at armes lately entred into the pay of the confederates, whoſe fortune and greater condicions hauing determined to followe, he had abandoned thalliance of the Florentyns (to whom he was yet bownd for more then a yeare) vnder this excuſe, that being feodarie of the Church, he was bownd in reaſon and equitie of office to obey the commaundements of the Pope: And Graciano d Aguerre, who had taken the field to encownter him, was charged in the playne of Sermone by the Count of Celane and the Count de Popoli, with three hundreth horſes and three thowſand footemen, whom he put to flight: But with the loſſe of thoccaſion of the victorye about Frangette, the fortune alſo of the french began manifeſtly to declyne, concurring in them at one tyme theſe natures of difficulties, extreme want of money, ſkarcetie of vittells, hate of the people, diſagreement of Capteines, diſobedience of ſouldiers, & the ſtealing away of many from the campe, partely by neceſſitie, and partely by will: They had no meane to draw out of the kingdome any great proporcion of money, neither had they receiued from Fraunce any ſumme notable, ſince the forty thowſand duckats leauyed for their releeffe, were too late ſent from Florence: In ſo much as no leſſe for that cauſe, then for the neighbourhood of many townes ſupported by tharmie of thennemie, they could not rayſe prouiſions neceſſary for their foode and ſuſtenance: And in their armie was nothing but diſorder, aſwell for that the courages of the ſouldiers were abated, as for that the Svvyzzers & launceknightes drawing into tumult, demaunded importunatly their payes: And touching the diſcorde of the Capteines, that which moſt hurt all their deliberacions, was the continuall contradiction of Perſy againſt Montpenſier: to be ſhort, ſuch were their neceſſities and diſorders, that the Prince of Biſignian was compelled to depart with his people to goe to the gard of his owne eſtate for feare of the bands of Conſaluo, by whoſe examples

amples, the particular ſouldiers of the contrey abandoned the campe by trowpes, wherein they had reaſon, for beſides they neuer receiued paye, yet the frenche and Svvyzzers vſed them very ill, aſwell in the diuiſion of booties, as in diſtribucion of vittells: Theſe difficulties, but chiefly the extreme want of vittells, conſtrained the french armie by litle & litle to retyre and wander from one place to an other, which diminiſhed greatly their reputacion with the people: And albeit the ennemies followed them as it were in a continual chaſſe, yet they had no hope to be able to fight as was ſpecially deſired by Montpenſier and Virginio: for that not to be enforced to battell, they incamped alwayes in places of ſtrength, & where no impediment could be giuen to their commodities: At laſt, the french being incamped vnder Montcalvole and Caſalarbore neare to Arriana, Ferdinand ouertaking them within the ſhoote of a crosbow (but alwayes keeping him in ſtronge places) brought them into great neceſſitie of vittells, taking from them in like ſorte the vſe of freſhe water: In ſo much as by the aſpect and conſideracion of theſe perils, they thought it beſt to draw towards Povvylla, where they hoped to find commoditie of vittells, And fearing by reaſon of the nearenes of the ennemies, the difficulties that ordinarily follow armies that retyre, they rayſed their campe in the beginning of the night, not making any brute to bewraye their goinge, and marched xxv. myles afore they reſted: Ferdinand followed them in the morning, but diſpairing to make that ſpeede to ouertake them, which they did to goe from him, hauing ſo much leſſe tyme, as they had more, he incamped before Geſnaldo, A towne which heretofore had ſuſteyned a ſeege of foureteene moneths, and now taken by him in one day, greatly to the diſapoynting of the frenche: for that determining to putt them ſelues within Venouſa, A towne ſtronge by ſcituacion, and moſt plentifull with vettells, the opinion they had that Ferdinand coulde not ſo eaſily take Geſnaldo, was the cauſe that they amuſed them ſelues about the ſacke of Atella which they had taken, & for the time they loſt there, afore their departure, they found tharmie of Ferdinand at their backes, who aſſoone as he had taken Geſnaldo, diſpatched way: And albeit they repulſed diuerſe skowtes and forerıders, yet ſeeing the mayne armie marched after with ſuch ſpeede, as they had no meane nor ablenes to recouer Venouſa which was eyght myles diſtant, they remeyned in the towne of Attella, with intencion to exſpect if ſuccors woulde come from ſome parte, hoping that for the nearenes of Venouſa and many other peeces thereabout holding yet for them, to receiue fauors with many commodities of vittells and releeff: Ferdinand with a ſpeede accordinge to his fortune, incamped before Attella, laboring onely (for the hope he had to obteyne the victorie without perill and blud) to cut them from vittels: for the better auauncement whereof, he caſt many trenches about Attella, and loſt no opportunitie to make him ſelfe Maiſter of the places adioyning, forgetting no diligence, trauell, or action of a Capteine pollitike and valiant: And as in warres, there is no further aſſurance of the ſouldier Mercenary, then he findes ſewertie of his paye, and leſſe confidence in his faith and ſeruice, by how much he is ſo ſtrange of his owne nation, that he feareth not the diſcipline of his patron: So the difficulties of the french, made euery day all things more eaſie to Ferdinand, for that the launceknightes in the french campe, hauing receiued but two monethes pay ſince they departed from their houſes, and ſeeing by ſo many diſappoyntments of dayes and tearmes paſt, all further exſpectacion was vayne, they drew into councell & went wholly to the campe of Ferdinand: In ſo much that hauing meane ſo much the more to greeue thennemie, & to enlarge his armie with more skope, he ſuffered a more hard paſſage of vittels which came from Venouſa and other places about,to Attella,wherin was not refreſhing to ſuffice to feede the frēch numbers a very few dayes: for beſides,that corne bare a very skant proporcion, yet the Arragons pluckt downe a myll ſtanding vppon the riuer which ronneth neare to the walls,whereby they wanted meane to turne their litle ſtore of corne into meale: neither were their diſcommodities preſent, recomforted by hoping in any good to come,ſeeing that from no part appeared ſo much as one ſigne of ſuccors: extremities ſo much the more intollerable to the french, by how much their felicities in the conqueſt had ſayled with ſo full gales,that they neuer looked backe to thoſe reuolucions which naturally doe follow all humane actions: not that fortune doth ſo prouide (a reaſon which many vaine men occupy) but that ſo it is ſet downe in theternall councell of God, who by the ſame power doth diſpoſe and gouerne all thinges of the earth,by the which he created them of nothing.But the cauſe of their full ruine,was the miſauentures that fel in Calabria: for by occaſion of the ſicknes of Monſr d'Aubigny,in which infirmitie many of his people went to tharmie of Montpenſier, Conſaluo ſeruing his turne of his ſicknes,tooke many peeces in that prouince,incamping at laſt with his Spaniſh bandes & ſtrength of popular ſouldiers of the contrey, at Caſtrouillare: where hauing aduertiſement that the Count Melete,and Albert de S. Seuerin,with many other Barons were at Laine with bands of ſouldiers almoſt equall to his,and that increaſing their numbers daily, they made their plott to aſſaile him, when their whole ſtrength was aſſembled: he determined to preuent them, hoping to ſurpriſe them vnprouided by the confidence they had in the ſcituacion of their place,the caſtell of Laine ſtāding vpon the riuer Sabry which deuideth Calabria from the principallitie: & the borow is on the other ſide the riuer,wherein being intrenched,they were garded by the caſtell againſt all inuaſions by the high way: laſtly betwene Laine and Caſtrouillare was Murana, with certeine other peeces of the Prince of Biſignian which held for them: But Conſaluo with a councell all contrary, departed a litle before night from Caſtrouillare, accompanied with all his bandes, and leauing the high way, he tooke the large way notwithſtanding it was both more longe and harde, for that he was to marche by certeine mounteynes: And being arriued neare the riuer,he commaunded the footemen to take the way to the bridge which is betwene the caſtell of Laine & the borow,which bridge was but negligently garded for thopinion of the ſewertie of the place: And him ſelfe with his horſemen paſſing the riuer at a foarde two myles higher, was at the borow before day, where finding thennemies without watche and garde, he brake them in a moment ſleeping in the ſecuritie of the place: he made priſoners xj. Barons, and almoſt all the ſouldiers,for that fleeing to the caſtell,they fell amongeſt the footemen, which now were poſſeſt of the paſſage of the bridge: By this honorable victorie being the firſt which Conſaluo had got in the kingdom of Naples,his ſtrength was ſo increaſed,that hauing alſo with the like vertue and fortune,recouered certeine other places in Calabria, he determined with ſix thowſande men to goe and ioyne with the campe of Ferdinand, which was afore Attella: And in that campe was arriued a litle before, an hundreth men at armes of the Duke of Candia, Capteine of the confederats,but him ſelfe with the reſidue of his bandes remeyned in the towne of Rome.

The declinacion of the french in the kingdom of Naples.

Conſaluo ſurpriſeth the french.

By the comming of Conſaluo, (cauſed by the ſurpriſe of thoſe which were for the french in Calabria:) they that were beſeeged were brought into harde ſtraites, their towne being enuyroned on three ſides,th Arragons occupying one, the Venetians an other,and the Spanyards the third: In ſo muche that there was almoſt left no entrey for vittells,ſpecially the Venetian ſtradiots ronning ouer the whole contrey, and taking king many french men which brought releeffe from Venouſa: They alſo that were within, had no meane to goe on forraging but at howers extraordinary, & that with a ſtronge garde: And Pavvle Vitelli making a ſaylly at midday with a hundreth men at armes, was drawne by the Marquis of Mantua into an ambuſh, where he loſt part of his company.

And being thus depriued of all commodities without, they were at laſt reduced to that extremitie, that they could not with garde and ſtrength ſerue their vſe of the riuer to water their horſes: and within the towne their neceſſities were no leſſe of freſhe water for the refreſhing of their perſons: So that being ouerwearied with ſo many aduerſities, and no leſſe abandoned of all hopes, their perills more generall & preſent, then their ſuccors likely or aſſured: After they had endured the ſeege two and thirty dayes, and being now left to the laſt remedie in warre, they demaunded a ſafe conduit, which was graunted, vnder the protection whereof, they ſent to capitulat with Ferdinand, Monſr de Perſy, Bartlemevv d'Albyane, and one of the Svvyzzer Capteines: Amongeſt whom were agreed theſe couenants following: That there ſhould be no enterpriſe attempted by either part one vppon an other for xxx. dayes: That during that time, not one of the beſeeged, (to whom ſhould be miniſtred day by day by th Arragons neceſſary vittells) ſhould depart out of Attella: That it ſhoulde be ſuffered to Montpenſier, to aduertiſe his kinge of thaccorde: That if he were not reskewed in the ſayd tearme of thirty dayes, he ſhould leaue Attella, and all that he had in his power in the kingdom of Naples, together with all thartilleries that were there: That the ſouldiers ſhould be in ſafetie for their perſons and iewells, and with them it ſhould be lawfull to euery one to goe into Fraunce either by land or ſea: And to the Vrſins and other Italian Capteines, to returne with their bandes whether they would out of the kingdom: That to the Barons and others which had followed the faction of the french (In caſe they would returne to Ferdinand within xv. dayes) all puniſhments ſhould be remitted, & reſtitucion of all the goods they poſſeſſed when the warre began: The tearme of this abſtinence expired, Monſr Montpenſier, with all the french, and many Svvyzzers, together with the Vrſins were conduted to ſea caſtell of Stabbie, where they began to diſpute, if Montpenſier as Lieftenant generall vnder his king, and by that meanes aboue all others, were bownde (as Ferdinand ſayd) to make to be rendred all that was poſſeſſed in the kingdome of Naples in the name of the french king: for that Monſr Montpenſier pretended that he was bownd to no more then was in his owne power to render, and that his authoritie ſtretched not to commaunde other Capteines and caſtellkeepers which were in Calabria, Abruzze, Caietta & many other townes & peeces, which the king had giuen them in charge, and not to him: The argument being trauerſed by many reaſons on both ſides for certeine daies, they were at laſt conduited to Baia, Ferdinand making ſemblance that he woulde lette them goe: And there (vnder cooller that the veſſells wherein they ſhould be imbarked, were not yet ready) they were ſo long reteyned, that being diſperſed betwene Baya and Pozzola, they fell into ſuch diſeaſes by the ill ayre and many other incommodities, that both Monſr Montpenſier dyed, and of the reſidue of his company which were more then fiue thowſand bodies, there skarce returned into Fraunce ſafe and ſownd, fiue hundreth. Virginio and Pavvle Vrſin (at the requeſt of the Pope who was now determined to take from that famulie their eſtates) were ſent priſoners to the egge caſtell, and their companies conduited by John Iordan ſonne to Virginio, and Bartlemevv d'Aluiano, were by the appoyntment of the Pope, ſtripped in Abruzze by the Duke of Vrbyn: John Iordan alſo and Aluiano, leauing their people in the way,& returning to Naples by the commaundement of Ferdinand,were made priſoners:but Aluiano,either by his induſtrie,or by the ſecret ſufferance of Ferdinand (who loued him much) had meane to eſcape.

After Ferdinand had taken Attella,he made diuiſion of his armie into many parts, for the more eaſie recouering of the reſidue of the kingdome: he ſent before Caietta, Federyk of Aragon & Proſper Colonne: And to Abruzze,where the towne of Aquila was already reuolted to his deuocion,he diſpatched Fabrice Colonne: And him ſelf taking by force the rocke of S. Seuerin,and cutte of the heades of the caſtell keeper and his ſonne the more to terrifie others,went to incampe before Salerna, where the Prince of Biſignian had parley with him, and compownded for him ſelfe, for the Prince of Salerne,for the Count of Capaccie,& for certeine other Barons, with condicion that they ſhoulde remeyne poſſeſſed of their eſtates, but that Ferdinand for his ſewertie ſhoulde keepe in his handes the fortreſſes for a certeine time: After which accorde they went to Naples: In Abruzze was not made any great reſiſtance, for that Graciano,who was there with viij. hundreth horſemen,hauing no more meane of defenſe, and leſſe exſpectacion of ſuccors in a fortune ſo declining, retyred to Caietta: Into Calabria,of which the greateſt quantitie held yet for the french,returned Conſaluo,againſt whom, albeit Monſr d'Aubigny made ſome reſiſtance, yet being in the ende driuen to take Groppoly after he had loſt Manfredonie and Coſenſa,which had bene ſacked before by the french,And laſtly ſeeing all hopes became deſperat, and no apparaunce of ſuccors from Fraunce,he conſented to deliuer vp all Calabria,vppon ſufferance to returne by land into Fraunce.

The Prince of Biſignian compowndeth for him ſelfe and others.

Monſr d'Aubigny conſents to depart the kingdom of Naples.

It is certeine that many of theſe reuoltes and chaunges hapned by the negligence & indiſcreſſion of the french: for albeit Manfredonia, for the ſcituacion of the place was ſtronge,for the fauors of the people there free from ſuſpicion, and for the fertilitie of the contrey full of plentifull meanes and prouiſion of vittells, And that the king had left for the gard of it Gabriell Montfalcon eſteemed a Capteine valiant: yet after it had endured a very ſhort and eaſie ſeege, they were conſtrayned to render it for famine: Like as alſo (in misfortunes examples doe much) other peeces of good abilitie to defende them ſelues, became recreant,and yelded, either for feare, (which is propper to cowardes)or for impacience of thincommodities,which ſuch muſt ſuffer as are beſeeged: Some caſtellkeepers finding their rockes well prouided for,ſold the vittells at their firſt entrey,and ſo aſſoone as thennemie appeared,made their willing neceſſities and wants a ſlaunderous detection of their infidelitie & cowardiſe: By theſe diſorders,ioyned to the negligence of the king, the french loſt in the kingdom of Naples that reputacion, which the vertue of that man had won vnto them, who holding many yeares after the victorie of Ferdinand, the caſtell of the egge which Iohn of Aniovv had left in his charge,could neuer be brought to render it,but by compulſion of vittells altogether conſumed.

Thus no more remeyning for the recouery of the whole realme then Tarenta and Caietta,with other peeces holden by Charles de Sanguyn: and Mont Saint Ange kept by Dom Iulyan de Lorraine,who with great merit and praiſe,made his vertue knowne in all the places thereabouts: it hapned that Ferdinand,raiſed into great glory, and no leſſe hopes to be equall in greatnes with his predeceſſors, went to Somme, A towne ſeated at the foote of the hill Veſune to ſee the Queene his wife, where he became very ſicke, either for his trauells paſt, or by new exceſſiue diſorders: And feeling by his diſpoſicion no hope of recouery, he cauſed him ſelfe to be caried to Naples,where he dyed not many dayes after,ſomewhat before the ende of the yeare af-after the death of his father king Alphonſo: he left behind him, not onely in his kingdom but alſo thorow all Italy, a ſingular opinion of his vallour, not ſo much for his victories obteyned, which in times and condicions ſo deuided metited much, as by the life and readines of his ſpirit, wherein he was founde reſolute in both fortunes, with many other royall vertues, wherein he became a worthy example to many: he dyed without yſſue and therefore his Vncle Dom Federyk ſucceeded him, being the fift king ſeene to ſucceede in that kingdom in three yeares time.

Aſſoone as Federyk was aduertiſed of the death of his Nephew, he leauied his ſeege from before Caietta, and went to Naples where was the olde Queene his mother in law, who put into his handes new caſtell, albeit many were of opinion that ſhe would reteyne it for her brother Ferdinand king of the Spaniſh: In this accident were moſt ſingular towards Federyk, not onely the wills of the peoples, but alſo thinclinacions of the Princes of Salerne, and of Biſignan, together with the faith of the Count Capaccie, all which were the firſt that pronownced his name within Naples, & going to meete him ſaluted him as king at his diſcending from the ſhip: They were farre better content with him, then with the laſt king, no leſſe for the mildenes and moderacion of his mind (which they honored with great reuerence and humilitie) then for the fewertie of their owne eſtates, hauing no ſmall ſuſpicion that Ferdinand aſſoone as he had addreſſed his affayres, had intencions to call to aunſwere all thoſe that in any ſort had bene fauorers of the french.

Federyk made king of Naples.

But theſe alteracions and diſorders hapning with ſo great diſhonor and domage to the french faction, had no power to giue a new life to the king, & much leſſe haſten his prouiſions, who ſtāding intangled with the delites & pleaſures of the court, made yt foure monethes afore he returned to Lyons: And albeit in this amarous negligence, he often times recommended to ſuch as he had left there, the ſolicitacion and diſpatch of all prouiſions aſwel for ſea as land, and the Duke of Orleans was prepared to depart: yet by the auncient connings of the Cardinall of S. Mallovv, the men at armes which were ſlenderly payed marched as ſlowly towards Italy, And the nauie by ſea which was to be aſſembled at Marſeilles, aduaunced ſo ſlackly, that the confederats had leaſure enough, to ſende firſt to Ville franche a large hauen neare to Nice, and afterwards euen to the roades of Marceilles, an armie by ſea leauied at their common charges at Genes, to giue impediments to the veſſells of Fraunce that were to goe to the realme of Naples: And to theſe great and generall delayes proceeding principally from the Cardinall of S. Mallovv, wiſe men dowted, that there was ioyned ſome other cauſe more ſecret, interteyned in the kinges mind with a ſingular art and diligence of ſuch as with many reaſons labored to turne him from the enterpriſes of Italy, for that they thought, that for his proper regard and intereſt, he ought to be ielous ouer the greatnes of the Duke of Orleans, on whom (if the victorie ſucceeded) the Duchie of Myllan ſhoulde fall: Beſides they occupied with him this diſcourſe of perſwaſions, that it was farre from pollicie and his propper ſewertie to goe out of Fraunce, afore he had made ſome contract with the kinge of Spaine, who expreſſing a deſire to be reconciled, had ſent Embaſſadors to his Maieſtie to induce a truce, and inſinuat an agreement: Many councelled him to tary till the Queene was brought to bed, for that it agreed not with his wiſedom, & was contrary to the loue he ought to beare to his peoples, to obiect his perſon to ſo many perills, afore he had a ſonne & heire to receiue ſo great a ſucceſſion: A reaſon which made the deliuerie of the Queene more painefull, and her frute more wretched & vnfortunat, ſeeing that not many dayes after, the maſculyn yſſue which God had giuen him, dyed:

So that partely by particular negligence in the king, but more by the errours & vices of his ſimple councell, and partly by the difficulties which others ſuggeſted, the prouiſions waued ſo long in delayes, that the ruine of his people, and whole loſſe of the kingdom, made lamentable vnto them, the operacions of their owne indiſcreſſion: yea the like had hapned to his frendes and confederats in Italy, if of them ſelues they had not conſtantly defended their proper eſtates.

It hath bene ſet downe before, how for feare of the french prouicions, and more for the contentment of Lodouvyk Sforce, then any thing agreeable to the Venetians, there was a plot layd to make paſſe into Italy Maxymilian Cæſar, with whom whileſt that feare indured, it was agreed that the Venetians ſhould giue him for three whole monethes twenty thowſande duckats for euery moneth, to thende he ſhould bring with him a certeine proporcion of horſemen and footemen, vpon the which paſſing of accord, Lodouvyk accompanied with th Embaſſadors of the confederats, went to Manza (a place on thother ſide the Mountes vpon the confyns of Almayne) to communicat with his Maieſtie: where after they had vſed great conference, Lodouvyk came backe againe the ſame day to Borny, A towne of the Duchie of Myllan on this ſide the Mountes, whether came Maxymilian the day following vnder cooller of going on hunting: And after in that enteruiewe of two dayes, they had ſet downe the time and maner of his marching into Italy, Maxymilian returned into Iermany to ſolicit the execucion of thinges that were contracted: But the brute of the prouiſions of Fraunce inferior to all exſpectacion, growing now ſo cold, that for that regard it ſemed not neceſſary that the king of Romaines ſhould marche: yet Lodouvyk determining to ſerue his ambicion of that which afore he had procured for his proper ſewertie, continued ſtill to ſolicit him to deſcend into Italy, wherein to remoue all impediments that might hinder his deſire, albeit the Venetians would not be concurrant in the promiſe of thirty thowſand duckats which he demaunded ouer and aboue the lx. thowſand that were accorded to him: yet he forbare not to binde him ſelfe alone to that demaund: In ſo much that in the ende Maxymilian marched and paſſed into Italy, a litle afore the death of Ferdinand: of the which when he was aduertiſed, being neare to Myllan, he entred into thoughts and deuiſes ſo to handle thinges, as by his meane the kingdom of Naples might come to Iohn the only ſonne of the king of Spaine, and his ſonne in law: But that being farre from the purpoſe of Lodouvyk and his ſecrete ambicion, he tolde him that in that action he ſhould diſcontent and trouble all Italy, and be the cauſe to diſſolue the vnitie of the confederats, and conſequently to make eaſie the enterpriſes of the king of Fraunce, occupying ſuch other conning perſwacions, that his ſuttelties ſo vanquiſhed all the intencions of Cæſar, as he did not onely giue ouer and denownce his firſt cogitacion, but alſo fauored and ratified by letters the ſucceſſion of Federyk: he deſcended into Italy with a very ſmall company of men, but the brute ronne, that there marched after euen to the proporcion and quantitie which he had promiſed: And being come to Vigenena, where he ſoiorned, Lodouvyk and the Cardinall of Santa Croce (ſent vnto him as Legat by the Pope,) together with the Embaſſadors of the confederats, aſſembled with him in councell to reſolue what were beſt to be done: therein this was thought the firſt and moſt neceſſary action, that he ſhould march into Pyemont to take the towne of Aſt, and ſeparat from the french king the Duke of Sauoye, and Marquis of Montferat, as members depending of the Empire: to them he addreſſed aduertiſements to come to ſpeake with him in a towne in Pyemont: but his forces being inferior to his title & dignitie, and by that occaſion theffects not anſwering thauthoritie of the name imperiall, Lodouvyk will as well ſerue his turne of the king of Romaines for his ambicion, as he had dõe of the french king in his neceſſitie.

periall,they ſhowed contempt, not one of them conſenting to goe to him: like as alſo for thenterpriſe of Aſt,there was no apparance that it ſhould happily ſucceede: he made like inſtance to come to ſpeake with him,to the Duke of Ferrara, who vnder the name of Feodarye of thempire,poſſeſſed the towne of Modene and Regge:And albeit he offered him for his ſewertie,the faith of Lodovvyk,his ſonne in lawe,yet he refuſed to go to him,alleaging that the action were not cõuenient for his honor, for that he held as yet in deputacion,the caſtell of Genes.Finally Lodovvyk (led ſtill with humors of his auncient couetouſnes, and no leſſe diſcontented that Pyſa ſo ambiciouſly deſired of him, ſhoulde fall with the daunger of all Italy into the power of the Venetians,ſought wonderfully to hinder ſuch a matter) and councelled thEmprour to goe to Pyſa, perſwading him with diſcourſes full of deceites, that the Florentyns, being not mighty enough to reſiſt him and the ſtrength of the confederats, woulde depart by neceſſitie from thalliance of the french king, and could not refuſe to refer thaccord and arbitracion of all their controuerſies to the perſon of Maxymilian, to thende that,if not by reconcilement,at leaſt by way of iuſtice, might be determined the differences betwene them and the Pyſans: In which regard as Pyſa ſhould be put into the handes of Cæſar,and all the appurtenances apperteyning to it: So he hoped by his authoritie to make the Pyſans conſent, and that the Venetians (being concurrant in this action the wills of all the other confederats) woulde not oppoſe them ſelues againſt a concluſion ſo conducible to the common benefit,and no leſſe iuſt & honeſt of it ſelfe: for Pyſa being aunciently a towne of the Empire, the reknowledging of the rightes of ſuch as aſpired to it,apperteyned to no other then to Cæſar: & ſo being committed of truſt into the hands of Cæſar,Lodovvyk hoped that he ſhould eaſily come by it, either by money, (which makes way into great kingdoms) or for the grace and authoritie which he had with him, the ſame ſeruing as an inſtrument to aduaunce his ambicion: This deuiſe was propownded in the councel vnder cooler,that ſeeing for the preſent,the feare of the french warres ceaſſed, the comming of Cæſar might be vſed tò induce the Florentyns to knitt with the other confederats againſt the french king: A deuiſe not diſpleaſing to Maxymilian, who was not a litle diſcontented that his deſcending into Italy bred no effect, hoping withall, that where by reaſon of his infinit plots and inuencions,and no leſſe for his diſorders and vnbridled prodigalities,he had alwayes want of money, Pyſa would be an inſtrumẽt conuenient,to gather ſome great quantitie either of the Florentyns,or others. The deuiſe alſo was approued by all the confederats as a thing very profitable for the ſewertie of Italy:The Embaſſador of Venice not impugning it,for that that Senat, perceiuing well enough to what endes tended the thoughtes of Lodovvyk, dowted not to beguile him eaſily, and hoped that by meane of the preſence of Cæſar might be gotten the hauen of Lyuorne,which being vnited once to Pyſa, the Florentyns had no further hope to recouer that citie.

Lodowyk perſwades Cæſar to goe to Pyſa.

It hath bene declared how the confederats afore made many meanes & requeſtes to the Florentyns to enter vnitie and league with them, And at the times when moſt they feared the deſcending of the frenchmen, they gaue them hopes ſo to worke & trauell in thinges,that Pyſa ſhould eftſoones returne vnder their iuriſdiction:But the couetouſnes of the Venetians and Lodovvyk being ſuſpected to the Florentyns, who woulde not lightly deuide them ſelues from the amitie of the french kinge, bare no ready deuocion to thoſe ſuggeſtions: wherein as one thinge that kept them backe, was a hope to recouer by the comming of the french king, Pietra ſanctа, and Serazena,places which they could not exſpect by any working of the confederats: ſo that which turned them & drew them quite away, was an ouerweening no leſſe vnprofitable to the condicion of their affayres, then cõtrary to the courſe of the time: They meaſuring rather their owne merits, and that which they endured for the king, then his nature, or his cuſtoms, promiſed to them ſelues by the meane of his victorie, not onely the citie of Pyſa, but almoſt all the reſidue of Tuskane: In which perſwacion they were nouriſhed by the opinion and wordes of Ieronimo Sauonarole, who in his ſermons pronounced many felicities and augmentacion of imperie appoynted to that common weale after ſo many trauells & afflictions, publiſhing in like ſtyle moſt greeuous calamities and euills to happen to the court of Rome, and all the other Potentats of Italy: wherein albeit this fonde Preacher was not without his aduerſaries skorning at this particular doctrine, yet what for his own authoritie, and the ſimple inclinacions of many, there was no litle faith giuen to his holy aduertiſements, no leſſe by moſt part of the popular multitude, then by many of the principall Citiſens, wherof, ſome of innocent deuocion, ſome by ambicion, and ſome for feare, reappoſed ſuch religion in his vayne forewarnings, that the whole eſtate of Florence caried ſuch generall diſpoſicion to continue in the frenche amitie, that the confederatts thought it not vnreaſonable to labor to reduce them by force, to that whereunto their wills were ſo ſtraunge and contrary: They ſuppoſed thenterpriſe to inuade them coulde not conteyne many difficulties for that they were hated of all their neighbours, and no exſpectacion or hope of ſuccours from the french king, who abandoning the ſafetie of his owne people in Naples, coulde not in any reaſon be thought carefull to miniſter to the wants of others: Beſides their great expenſes for theſe three yeares, with ſo generall diminucion of their reuenues, had ſo drayned them, that it was not credible that they were able to ſuſteyne long trauells: ſeeing withall they had for this yeare paſt continually followed the warres againſt Pyſa, wherein thaccidents haue bene diuerſe and notable, more for the reſolucion of corage ſhewed in many valiant actes and factions of warre by either part, and by the deſperat obſtinacie wherewith ſuch thinges were done, then for any huge proporcion or greatnes of armies, and much leſſe for the qualitie of places for the which they fought, being but villages and borowes not famous, & therefore of them ſelues of no great conſequence: for (to vſe more large diſcourſe) a litle after the citadell was giuen to the Pyſans, and afore the ſuccors of Venice arriued there, the bandes of Florence hauing taken the borow of Buty, & from thence encamped at Calcy, and before they tooke it, beginning (for their better ſewertie of vittells) to build a baſtillion vpon the Mount of Doloroſa: the bandes of footemen that were there for the garde of the place, were broken by their owne negligence, by the enſeignes of the Pyſans: And a litle after, as Franciſco Secco was encamped with a great trowpe of horſemen in the borow of Buty to ſee to the ſafe conuey of vittells to Hercules Bentyuole, incamped with the foote bandes of the Florentyns about the litle caſtell of the hill Verrucole: he was ſo charged at vnwares by the footemen that came out of Pyſa, that by thinconueniencie of the place to apply the ſeruice of his horſemen, he loſt a great parte of them: for which ſucceſſes the affayres of Pyſa ſeeming to riſe increaſing in fortune and that with hope of greater proſperitie for that the ſuccors of the Venetians beganne to arriue: Hercules Bentyuole lodging in the borow of Bientina, hearing that Iohn Paulo Monſrin Capteine of the Venetians, was with the firſt part of their companies come to Vicopiſan two myles from Bientina, fayned to haue feare, In ſo much that preſently he tayſed his companies and went into the fielde; and immediatly aſſoone as the Venetian bandes were diſcouered, he eftſoones retyred into Bientina.

But after he ſaw his ennemie full of boldnes and ſecuritie, he trayned him one day with great pollicie into an ambuth, where he put him to the worſe, with the loſſe of the moſt part of his companies, giuing him the chaſſe euen to the wals of Vicopiſan: In which encownter the victory was not in all pointes happye, for that Frauncisco Secco, come to the campe that morning to ioyne with Hercules, in the retyre was ſlayne with a ſhot of harquebuze: After theſe followed the other bandes of the Venetians, amongeſt whom were eight hundreth ſtradiots led by Inſtynian Moroſin: By whoſe comming the Pyſans being nowe farre ſuperior, Hercules Bentyuole to whome the partes of the contrey were well knowne, neither willing to put him ſelfe in daũger, nor altogether diſpoſed to abandon the field, encamped in a very ſtronge place, betwene the borow of Pontadere, and the riuer of Ere: with thopportunitie of this place, he reſtrayned much the importunitie of thennemies, who in all that tyme tooke no other place or peece then the borow of Buty which yelded to their diſcreſſion: And as they ſent out their ſtradiots to make pillage of the contrey, there were three hundreth of them ronning vp euen to Valdere, charged and broken by certeine bandes which Hercules ſent after them: The Florentyns were in the ſame ſeaſons vexed by them of Sienna, who by thoccaſion of the harmes they ſuffered in the contrey of Pyſa, and at the incenſing of the confederats, ſent to incampe afore the baſtillion of the bridge of Valiane, the Lord of Plombyn and Iohn Sauelle: But hearing that Riuuccio de Marciano arriued with ſuccors, they retyred in great haſte from before the baſtillion, leauing behind them one part of their artillerie: by reaſon whereof the Florentyns ſeeing them ſelues aſſured on that ſide, cauſed Riuuccio to turne his force to the quarter of Pyſa: In ſo much that their ſtrength being almoſt equall, the warre was nowe brought to the borowes about the hills: But for that they were at the deuocion of the Pyſans, thinges fell out more to the diſaduauntage of the Florentyns: for that the Pyſans entring by intelligence into the borow of Pont de ſac, ſtripped a whole company of men at armes, and tooke priſoner Lodovvyk Marciana, yet they abandoned forthwith the ſayd borow for feare of the Florentyn bandes which were not farre of: But the better to commaund and gouerne the hilles, which were of great importance to them, aſwell for the vittells brought from thence to Pyſa, as for that they gaue impediments to the Florentyns in the traffike of the hauen of Lyworne: they fortefied the moſt part of thoſe borowes, amongeſt the which Soiana was made noble by one accident by chaunce: for the campe of the Florentyns beinge marched thether with intencion to take it the ſame day, and for that cauſe, hauing ſpoyled all the paſſages of the riuer of Caſtina, and put their men at armes in battell vpon the banke, to cut of the ſuccors of thennemie: It hapned that Peter Capponi a chiefe commaunder amongeſt the Florentyns, as he was about to plant thartilleries, was ſtriken in the head by a bullet out of the towne, whereof he dyed preſently: An end vnworthy of his vertue, aſwell for the ignobilitie of the place, as for the litle importance of ſuche an enterpriſe: By the chaunce of this accident, they rayſed the campe without attempting any further action: Beſides, the Florentyns euen in thoſe tymes were compelled to ſende bandes of men into Lunigiana to the ſuccors of the caſtell of Verroncole which the Marquis of Maleſpina held beſeeged, by the ayde of the Genovvays, from whence he eaſily gaue them the chaſſe: So that the ſtrength of the Pyſans was mighty for certeine monethes, for that beſides the towneſmen and popular ſouldiers leuied of the contrey became bodies warlike by long experience, the Venetians and Duke of Myllan had there many bandes of horſemen and footemen, the Venetian numbers being greateſt: But for that afterwards the Dukes companies began to diminiſh becauſe they were not payed as appertayned: the Venetians vſing that defect to their aduauntage, ſent thether a new ſupply of a hundreth men at armes, and ſix gallies loaden with prouiſion of vittells, wherein they ſpared no neceſſary exſpenſes for the ſewertie of that citie, the ſame hapning in good ſeaſon to winne, and draw to them the affections of the Pyſans, who euery day more and more eſtraunged their mindes from the deuocion of the Duke of Myllan, as neyther contented with his nigardiſe in the expenſe and prouiſion of thinges neceſſary, nor with his incerteinties and variacions, expreſſing rather a mind neuter, then affection reſolut, for that ſometimes he would be forward in the ſuccor of their affaires, and eſtſoones careles and colde, leauing all to aduenture: In ſo much as beginning almoſt to dowt of his will, they impoſed vpon him by imputacion that Iohn Bentyuole did not aduaunce to endomage the Florentyns according to the commiſſion he had of the confederats, the rather for that they knewe he had fayled him in a greate part of his payments, either through his couetouſnes, or els, that the diſpleaſures of the Florentyns were acceptable to him, but not their whole ruyne and oppreſſion: By meane of which operations, he had layed of him ſelfe (touching the ſtate of Pyſa) foundacions contrary to his chiefeſt endes and intencions, for thaduauncement whereof he onely induced the councell of the confederats to determine that Maxymylian Ceſar ſhould goe to Pyſa.

The Pyſans begin to diſclayme the Duke of Myllan.

But now returning from whence we came: after it was reſolued that Ceſar ſhould march to Pyſa, he diſpatched two Embaſſadors to Florence to aduertiſe them, that by reaſon of an enterpriſe which he intended with a mighty armie againſt the Infidels, he iudged it firſt an action chiefe and neceſſary to paſſe into Italy, the better to pacifie and aſſure the controuerſies there, for which cauſe he exhorted the Florentyns that they would communicat togethe with the other confederats in the common defence of Italy, or at leaſt if they had an other inclinacion, that they woulde make manifeſt their will and intencion: That for the ſame occaſion, and for that it apperteyned to thauthoritie imperiall, he woulde knowe the controuerſies that were betwene them and the Pyſans, requiring them, till he had taken knowledge of the reaſons of both the one and other, that they would ſurceaſe the warre, which he aſſured would not be refuſed by the Pyſans, to whom he had imparted the like ſignifications: laſtly, he gaue them great ſewertie with ſweete and familiar wordes, that he woulde be ready to adminiſter iuſtice indifferently: To which meſſage (receiuing the offers of th Emprour with reuerence and recommendacion, & expreſſing no leſſe ſhowes of ſingular confidence in his iuſtice and pietie) was aunſwered by the Florentyns, that they would giue him particularly to vnderſtande of their intencion by ſpeciall Embaſſadors to be addreſſed to his Maieſtie with ſpeede.

Ceſar ſendes Embaſſadors to Florence.

But in the meane while the Venetians, not to leaue to Maxymylian or the Duke of Myllan, any meane to be Maiſters ouer Piſa, ſent thether with conſent of the Piſans a new ſupply of a hundreth and fiftie men at armes, ſome ſtradiots, and a thowſande footemen vnder the leading of Anniball Bentiuole, ſignifying to the Duke that they had ſent thoſe ſuccors thether, for that their common weale, which loued to chearish free cities, was vniuerſally inclined to ayde the Piſans to recouer their contrey, as in deede by the ſuccor of thoſe bandes, they went thorow with the recouerie of almoſt all the borowes of the hills: In regard of which benefits, and for the franke readines of the Venetians to gratifie their demaundes which were in great number, ſometimes wanting men, ſometimes lacking money, and moſt commonly ſuffering neceſſities of vittells and munitions: The will of the Piſans was become ſo conformable

mable to the desires of the Venetians, that all that office of deuocion and confidence which they were wont to owe to the Duke of Myllan, being now transported into them, they greatly desired that that Senat would continue their protectors, defenders, and patrons: And yet they solicited still the comming of Cæsar, for hoping that what with the strength they had already within Pysa, and the bandes which his Maiestie would leade with him, they should with more facilitie get Liuorne: On the other side, the Florentyns, who besides other encombrances, were at that tyme pressed with a great skarcetie of vittells, were occupied with no small feares, being left alone to resist the power of so many Princes: for that in Italy, there would not rise one in their ayde and fauor, and from their Embassadors in Fraunce, they were certefied by letters, that they could hope for no reskew in the king, to whome they had recõmended their daungers with many sutes and humilities, though not to haue of him a full succor, yet to be releeued with some quantitie and proporcion of money: But their petitions were in vayne, and all their requests embraced with the same coldnes of care wherewith he comforted the perplexities of his peculiar peoples in the kingdom of Naples: Peter de medicis alone did not molest them, because it was an article in the councell of the confederats, not to vse in this action, either his name, or his fauor, knowing by experience, that the Florentyns for that feare, did the more increase their vnitie for the preseruacion of their libertie: And Lodovvyk Sforce, vnder cooler to be ielous of their safetie, but more discontented with the greatnes of the Venetians, ceased not to apply all his discourse of witt & perswacion, to induce them to refer all thinges to the arbitracion of Cæsar, wherein he alleaged many great and sensible daungers, and insinuated with arguments and reasons, that this was the only meane to draw the Venetians from Pysa, and so consequently to accomplish their full reintegracion: A thing very necessary for the vniuersall stabilitie of Italie, and no lesse (for that occasion) desired by the king of Spaine, and all the other confederats: But the Florentyns not suffering them selues to be carried with fayre and deceitfull apparaunces, and much lesse amased with the contemplacion of so many daungers and difficulties, determined to make no declaracion with Cæsar, neither to refer their rightes to his arbyttrement, if first they were not restored to the possession of Pisa, for that they were not assured either of his will or of his authoritie, being manifest that hauing not of him selfe any forces, or money, he proceeded as it best seemed to the Duke of Millan: Neither did they discerne in the Venetians, any disposicion or neede to leaue Pisa: Therefore they prepared with a franke and liberall resolucion of courage, to fortifie and refurnishe Liuorna aswell as they could, and to drawe all their strength into the contrey of Pisa: And yet, for that they would not appeare estraunged from the league, laboring withall to appease Cæsar, they sent Embassadors who founde him at Genes where he was then arriued: Their commission was (for aunswer of the thinges propownded by his Embassadors at Florence) to aduertise him and perswade him, that it was not necessary to proceede to any declaracion, because, for the reuerence they bare to his name he might promise to him selfe of the common weale of Florence, euen as much as he would desire: And to beseech him to thinke, that for his most holy resolucion to reduce Italie to peace, there was nothing more conuenient then immediatly to restore Pisa to the Florentins, for that it was the roote and riuer from whence spronge all their deliberacions so discontenting to his Maiestie and the confederats, & Pisa also being in that regarde, the cause that made some to aspire to the Empire of Italie, who to that ende labored to keepe it in continuall trauells of warre, by which wordes (notwithstanding it was not otherwayes expreſſed) was ſignified and ment the ambicion of the Venetians: That alſo it was not agreeable to his iuſtice, that ſuch as had bene diſpoiled by force, ſhould be conſtrayned contrary to the diſpoſicion of the lawes imperiall, to referre their rightes to compromiſe, if firſt they were not reſtored to their poſſeſſion: concluding that the common weale of Florence obteyning this beginning of him, and by that meane, remeyninge no cauſe to deſire any thinge but peace with euery one, they would make all ſuch declaracions as he ſhould thinke conuenient, and reappoſing wholly in his iuſtice, would with ready humilitie recommende vnto him the knowledge of their rightes.

This aunſwer ſatisfied not Ceſar, who deſired aboue all thinges that they might enter into the league vnder faith and promiſe to be reſtored to the poſſeſſion of Pyſa within a tearme conuenient: notwithſtanding after many diſcourſes and debating of reaſons, they could draw no other aunſwer from him, then (vpon the plotforme of Genes as he entred the ſea) he told them they ſhould vnderſtande further of his will by the Popes Legat which was at Genes, by whom, being ſent backe againe to the Duke, who from Tortone whether he had accompanied Ceſar, was returned to Myllan, they went into the ſame citie, where as they were demaunding audience, they receiued Commiſſions from Florence, (already vnderſtandinge the frute of their legacion) commaunding them without ſeeking other aunſwer, to returne home: So that being come to the hower appoynted for their audience, they turned their demaund to haue aunſwer, into a ſignification of their office, that returning to Florence, they were bolde to lengthen their way, to come to doe him reuerence afore they parted out of his contrey, as well apperteyned to the frendſhip, which their common weale had mutually with him: The Duke thinking they would demaund aunſwer according to their direction from the Legat, had aſſembled all the Embaſſadors of the confederats, and the whole maieſtie of his owne councell, to make ſhow (according to his manner) of his eloquence, and his arte, & to take pleaſure in the calamities of others: But being not a litle confuſed with the nature of their propoſicion altogether diſappoynting his exſpectacion and looking, he asked them ſuddeinly what aunſwer they had of Ceſar: to which demaund they aunſwered, that according to the lawes of their common weale, they might not communicat nor treate of their commiſſion, with any other Prince, then with him to whom they were aſſigned Embaſſadors: he replyed ſomewhat troubled: If we giue you aunſwer, for the which we know that Ceſar hath referred you to vs, would you not heare it: It is not forbidden to heare (ſay they) & much leſſe can we let an other to ſpeak: he aunſwered, we are content to giue you the aunſwer, but that can not wel be don, if you pronownce not that which you haue ſayd to him: The Embaſſadors eſtſoones aunſwered, that beſides they had no power for the ſelfe ſame reaſons alleaged before, yet it would be ſuperfluous, for that it was neceſſary that Ceſar had imparted their propoſicion with thoſe, to whom he had giuen thimmediat charge to make the aunſwer in his name: for theſe reſolut dealings of th Embaſſadors, he could not, neither in wordes, nor in ieſtures diſſemble his indignacion, And with moodes full of variacion and diſcontentment he diſmiſſed th Embaſſadors with all the reſidue which he had aſſembled, receiuing in him ſelfe one part of the mockerie, which he ment to haue giuen to an other.

In the meane while, Ceſar departed from the hauen of Genes with ſix gallies which the Venetians had in the ſea of Pyſa, and with many other veſſells of the Genoweays very well furniſhed with artillerie, but not with fighting men, for that there was no other men of warre, then a thowſand launceknightes: with whom he ſayled to the hauen of Spetia, and from thence went by land to Pyſa: And there hauing ioyned to his armie fiue hundreth horſemen & a thowſand other launceknights which had marched by land, he determined to incampe before Lyuorne, hauing for his back the companies of the Duke of Myllan, and one part of the Venetian bandes: his intencion was to charge it both by ſea & land, ſending the other Venetian companies to Pont de ſas, to thende the Florentyn campe which was not ſtronge, ſhould not be able to moleſt the Pyſans, nor giue ſuccors to Lyuorne: But there was no enterpriſe which leſſe aſtoniſhed the Pyſans, then that of Lyuorne, ſufficiently furniſhed with mē and artillerie, with dayly exſpectacion of ſuccors from Prouence: for that a litle before, to augment their forces with the reputacion wherein were at that tyme in Italy, the armies of the french, they had with the conſent of the french king, interteined to their pay, Monſr d'Albigois one of his capteines with a hundreth launces, and a thowſand footemen aſwell Svvyzzers as Gaſcoins, which were to come by ſea to Lyuorne vpon certeine ſhipps, which by their directions were loden with graine, to releeue the generall want of vittells raigning in all the landes of their obedience: This deliberacion, made with other thoughts, and for other endes, then for their defence againſt Cæſar, albeit it was full of difficulties, for that both Monſr d'Albigois with his company already conduted to the ſhippes, refuſed to take the ſea, only ſix hundreth footemen being imbarked: yet it found ſuch plentifull fauors of fortune, that there could not be deſired a prouiſion, neither more great nor more conuenient: ſeeing that the ſame day that a Commiſſioner of Pyſa, (ſent before by Cæſar with a greate ſtrength of horſemen and footemen to make bridges & plankes for the armie which was to follow) arriued before Lyuorne, the nauie of Prouence conteyning fiue ſhippes and certeine gallions, together with a great carracke of Normandie which the kinge appoynted to reuittell Caietta, were diſcouered aboue Lyuorna with ſo fauorable gales and tydes, that without any reſiſtance of the fleete of Cæſar (for they were conſtrayned by the tyme to ſpred abroad aboue Melorie, a rocke very famous, for that in a ſea battell made there in tymes paſt betwene the Genovvays and the Pyſans, the Pyſans were ouerthrowne) they entred the port without other loſſe, then of one gallion loden with corne, which was taken, as being ſtrayed from the other nauie.

Cæſar is come to Pyſa.

This ſuccor gaue no leſſe life & courage to thoſe that were within Lyuorne, then much aſſured the mindes of the Florentyns, who interpreted this ſuddeine comming of the ſhippes to a ſigne, that though earthly and worldly forces would fayle them, yet God beholding their calamities, would not abandon them according to thaſſurance which often tymes Sauonarola had preached to the people euen when euery one was moſt aſtoniſhed: But notwithſtanding theſe diſcouragements of vittells & ſuccors, the King of Romains ceaſed not to marche with his campe to Lyuorna, whether hauing ſent by land fiue hundreth men at armes, a thowſand light horſemen, & foure thowſand footemen, he paſſed vppon gallies euen to the mouth of the poole which is betwene Pyſa & Liuorna: And hauing appointed the one parte of the place to be inuaded by the Count Caietta whom the Duke of Myllan had ſent with him, he preſented him ſelfe afore the other: wherein albeit the firſt daye he had no ſmall a doe to ſetle his campe there for the perillous impediments which thartilleries of Lyuorna gaue to him: yet after he had approched his armie before day on that ſide to the fountaine, and hauing a chiefe deſire to be firſt maiſter of the hauen, he began to batter with the cannon, Magnane, which was well fortefied by them within, who ſeeing the campe drawne on that ſide, had on thother ſide ruyned Polazzotte and the tower ſtanding on that ſide to the ſea, as a thing not only not gardable, but alſo conuenient to make them loſe the newe tower. He cauſed at the ſame tyme to come neare the hauen, his armie by ſea, to beate the partes on the ſea ſide: for the french ſhippes, after they had landed their men, and vnladen one part of their corne as they were bownd, returned into Prouence, and the Normans ſet ſayle to Caiette, notwithſtanding many importunities & requeſtes to haue them tary, thinking to haue made thē to the ſeruice of this defenſe: The batterie that thundred againſt Magnane, nouriſhing an intencion to aſſault the towne afterwards by ſea, profited very litle: for that the defenſe was ſufficient againſt all aſſaultes, and had litle regard to the furie of the ſhot, the defendants alſo very often making ſayllies to enterteyne skyrmiſh with thennemie. But as the hopes of the Florentyns began by the fauor of the windes, ſo it was a deſtinie that in the benefit of the windes ſhould be wrought their whole perfection, for by a great ſtorme riſing vpon the ſuddeine, the windes and all the ill diſpoſed weathers agreeing, the nauie of Cæſar was greatly cruſhed, and the great ſhip Grymavvd a Genovvay which had caried his Maieſties perſon, after ſhe had long endured the conflict of the weather and waues, and wrought againſt the rage of the ſtorme, ſhe was drowned right againſt the new tower of Lynorne with all the men & artillerie that ſhe bare within boarde: the like hapned at the poynt towardes S. Iacques, to two gallies of the Venetians, and all the other veſſells ſo diſperſed and ſhaked by this calamitie, that they became vnprofitable for the preſent enterpriſe, ſpecially the defendants following the fauor of this accident, yſſued out and recouered the gallion, which before had ſalne into the power of the ennemies: The conſideracion of the loſſes and miſeries hapned by this ſhipwracke, procured Cæſar to returne to Pyſa, where after many councels, euery one diſtruſting the poſſibilitie of thenterpriſe of Lynorne, it was agreed to leauy the campe from thence, and transfer the warre to an other part: And therefore Cæſar went to Vicopiſan, and cauſed to be built a bridge vpon Arne, betwene caſcine and Vico, and an other vpon Cilecchio: But whileſt he occupied men with exſpectacion that he would paſſe ouer, he departed vpon the ſuddeine, and returned by land the right way to Myllan, hauing brought forth no other action in Tuskane, ſauing that foure hundred of his horſemen ſackt Bolgheri, a towne almoſt vnknowen in the ſhoares of Pyſa: he excuſed his ſuddeine departure vppon the difficulties that increaſed vpon him euery day, aſwell for that they ſupplyed him not with money as often as he demaunded, as for that the Venetian Commiſſioners would not conſent that the greateſt part of their bandes ſhould yſſue out of Pyſa for the ſuſpicion they had of him, beſides that they had not fully ſatisfied him of their porcion of the threeſcore thowſand duckats, for which iniuries (extolling greatly the Duke of Myllan) he made many greeuous complaintes againſt them: he paſſed by Pauya, where was taken a newe councell: And albeit he had publiſhed that he would eftſoones returne into Almanie, yet he agreed to reappoſe in Italy all the winter with a thowſande horſemen, and two thowſande footemen, ſo that they woulde make pay to him for euery moneth, of xxij. thowſand florins of Rhein: wherein whileſt the action of this plot was ſolicited, with exſpectacion of aunſwer from Venice, he went from thence to Lomelline, at the tyme when there was loking to receiue him at Myllan, being a thing fatal & ordeyned to him (asw as wel approued by thexperiences following) not to enter into that citie: from Lomellina, with a mind chaunged, he turned his way to Caſagne ſix myles from Myllan, from whence contrary to all opinions, & vnweeting to the Duke and his Embaſſadors which were there, he went to Coma: where vnderſtanding as he ſat at dinner, that the Popes Legat, to whom he had had ſent that he ſhould not follow him, was arriued: he aroſe from the table, & embarked with ſo great haſt, that there was skarce leaſure to the Legat to deliuer to him a few words within the barke: to whom he aunſwered in ſhort, that he was conſtrayned to goe into Almanie, but that he would returne with ſpeede: And albeit, after he was brought by the lake of Coma to Vellaſie, he was aduertiſed that the Venetians would condiſcend to all thinges that were agreed vppon at Pauya: yet he continued his voyage, and gaue them new hopes to returne to Myllan: But a very fewe dayes after, according to thinconſtancie and variacion of his nature, he left one part of his horſemen and footebandes, and ſayled directly into Almanie, hauing ſhowed with a very litle honor to the name imperiall, his weaknes in Italy wherein long tyme before had not bene ſeene any Emprours armed: Lodouvyk diſpayring now by the going away of Cæſar (without new remedies for new accidents) to be able any more to draw Pyſa to him ſelfe, and much leſſe to keepe it out of the handes of the Venetians, withdrew from thence all his people, making it ſome conſolacion to his diſpleaſurs, that the Venetians onely ſhould remeyne intangled with the warre againſt the Florentyns: wherein alſo he nouriſhed this perſwacion, that the long trauells and perplexities of both the one and other part, might with tyme rayſe vp ſome occaſions fauorable to his deſires: By the departure of the bandes of Lodouvyk, the Florentyns whoſe power was ſtrongeſt in the contrey of Pyſa, recouered againe all the borowes about the hills: by reaſon whereof the Venetians, conſtrayned to leauy newe prouiſions to hinder their further procedings, adioyned ſo many bandes more to the companies they enterteyned already within Pyſa, that in all, their armie contayned foure hundred men at armes, ſeuen hundred light horſemen, & more then two thowſand footemen: In this meane while in the kingdom of Naples, there was almoſt an ende put to all the reſidue of the warre againſt the french: for that the towne of Tarente, preſſed with famin, was rendred with her caſtells to the Venetians, who had beſeeged it by ſea, and who, after they had kept it certeine dayes, growing into ſuſpicion that they would appropriat it to them ſelues, rendred it at laſt to Federyk, by the great inſtance of the Pope and the Kinge of Spayne: And as it was vnderſtanded at Caietta, that the great ſhip Normain, hauing fought aboue the port Hercules with certeyne Genouvay ſhippes which ſhe encowntred, and ſayling afterwards in her courſe, was ouerbeaten with the rage of ſtormes, and drowned: So the french men that defended Caietta, whether the new king was eftſoones marched with his campe, albeit the brute went that there were vittells & munitions enough to beare out the ſeege certeine monethes: yet entring into the examples and actions of their kinge, in whome they iudged woulde be as ſlowe diſpoſicion to miniſter to their ſuccours, as he was careleſſe of ſo great a part of his nobilitie, and to reskew ſo many places holding for him: they accorded with Federyk, by the ſolicitacion of Monſr d Aubigny (who for ſome difficulties hapning in the aſſignement of the fortreſſes in Calabria, was not yet departed from Naples) to leaue the towne and caſtel, and returne by ſea into Fraunce with ſafetie and protection of their liues and goods: By reaſon of this agreement, the french king ſeeing him ſelfe deliuered of ſo many cares and thoughtes to miniſter ſuccors to the kingdom of Naples, and on thother ſide, being indifferently greeued with the harmes and infamies of thoſe warres, determined to ſette vppon Genes: wherein he hoped much in the faction of Baptiſtyn Fregoſa (aforetimes Duke of that citie,) and in the trayne and followers which the Cardinall of S. Peter ad vincla, had in the towne of Sauone, and in thoſe riuers: he applyed alſo to the fauor of his deuiſe, the occaſion and conſent of the tyme, for that in thoſe ſeaſons Iohn Louvys de fieſco, and the famulie of the Adornes, were in diſcorde, and all the Genouuays generally ill contented with the Duke of Myllan, both for that in the ſale of Pietra Sancta, he had preferred the Lucquoys before them, and alſo, hauing promiſed to reduce it eſtſoones to their hands, vſing in that action (the better to appeaſe thindignacion conceiued againſt him) the authoritie of the Venetians, he had nouriſhed them many moneths with vayne hopes: But for feare of this determinacion of the king, Lodouvyk (who for thoccaſion of Pyſa was almoſt eſtraunged from the Venetians) was compelled to knit of new with them, and to ſend to Genes the horſemen and footemen of the Almains which Ceſar had left in Italy, for whome (if this neceſſitie had not happened) there would haue bene neither employment nor prouicion made.

Whileſt theſe thinges were thus in deuiſe & ſolicitacion, the Pope (finding now a great oportunitie to occupy the eſtates of the Vrſins, for that the principals of that famulie were reſtrayned in Naples) pronownced rebells in the conſiſtory, Virginio & the reſidue of that race, & confiſked their eſtates, for that contrary to his commaundement they had taken pay of the french: After which beginning he proceeded in

The Duke of Candia generall of the Popes armie. of the Church, ouer whom was Capteine general the Duke of Candia, and in the office of Legat, the Cardinall La luna borne at Pauya, A Cardinall wholly depending vpon Askanius: to this armie alſo, king Federyk of Naples ſent Fabricius Colonne: This armie now drawne into a campe, after it had compelled many peeces to be rendered, marched to incampe at Tryuignian, which towne menteyning a valiant defence for certeine dayes, yelded at laſt to diſcreſſion: But during the defenſe of that towne, Bartlemevv d'Aluyano yſſuing out of Bracciane, put to flight within eyght myles of Rome, foure hundreth horſemen that guided the artilleries to the campe Eccleſiaſticke: And an other day ronning with the ſame fortune euen to the croſſe of Montmarie, he lacked not much of taking the Cardinall of Valence, who comming out of Rome to the chaſſe, found his beſt ſafetie in the ſwiftnes of his horſe: After the rendring of Tryuignan the campe dreweto the yle, where after they had battered one part of the rocke with thartillerie, they obteyned it by cõpoſicion: At length all the warre was reduced to Bracciana, where the Vrſins had layed vp all the hope of their defenſe: for that the place which had bene made ſtronge before, was of new reforteſied with munitions and rampiers, and the ſuburbes reenforced, hauing at the entry thereof erected a baſtyllion, and beſtowed within it a ſufficient ſtrength of men vnder the gouernment of Aluyano, whoſe youth gaue him a body diſpoſed, and his wit no leſſe quicke and reſolut, then his diligence incredible, increaſed in him (with exerciſe in armes) thoſe hopes & exſpectacions to the which in tymes ſucceeding, his actions were nothing inferior: The Pope ceaſed not to increaſe dayly his armie which he had of new refurniſhed with eyght hundreth launceknights of thoſe that had bene employed in the warres of Naples: There were dayly skyrmiſhes and tryal

armes on both partes,and that with great contencion, the campe without planting their artillerie in many ſeueral places,and they within, not forgetting to repaire and fortefie with preſent diligence and aſſurance: And yet within fewe dayes,the defendants were conſtrayned to abandon the ſuburbes, which being taken, the eccleſiaſticks gaue a furious aſſault to the towne,wherein albeit their fortune made them able to aduaunce their enſeignes vpon the walls, yet by the vertue of the defendants they were eftſoones forced to retyre,ſuffering a great loſſe,in which action was hurt Anthony Sauelle: The defendants expreſſed the like vallour in an other aſſault, repulſing the ennemy with a furie more reſolut & a loſſe more generall,for that two hundred of them were either ſlayne or very ſore wounded,wherein appeared with great merit the particular vallour of Aluyano,to whom was iuſtly giuen the principall glory of that defenſe: for that within, he was of a liuely readines to all offices neceſſary, and without, with continuall erupcions and ſallies, he kept tharmie of thennemie day and night in alarams: In this ſpeciall action, he added much to his reputacion, that by his diſpoſing,certeine light horſemen yſſuing out of Ceruette (which the Vrſins helde) ſhould make incurſions euen to the campe,and he him ſelfe taking thoccaſion of this tumult,charged them out of the towne,& put to flight the footebands that garded the artilleries, of which, he caried into Bracciana certeine ſmall peeces: And albeit at length,rather ouerlayed with numbers,then ouercome in vallour, he and his companies were ouerwearied with the continuall trauells and perplexities of that warre,hauing neither the day nor the night fauorable to their quietnes: yet they began eftſoones to readreſſe them ſelues with hope of ſuccors, for that Charles Vrſin,and Vitellozze,who was knit to the Vrſins by a bond of the faction of Guelffes,& being now paſſed into Italy vpon the veſſells of Prouence come to Lyuorne, with money of the french king to reerect their bandes diſperſed in the kingdome of Naples: they prepared to ſuccor them in ſo great a daunger: for which cauſe Charles went to Soriana,to reaſſemble the olde ſouldiers,frendes and followers of the Vrſins: and Vitellozzo in Citta de Caſtello made the like leauy of the ſouldiers and footemen of the contrey,adioyning with great diligence,his whole ſtrength to Charles at Soriano, hauing in his regiment two hundreth men at armes, and xviij. hundreth footemen of his owne, with proporcion of great artillerie vppon wheeles after the manner of Fraunce: By reaſon whereof the Capteines eccleſiaſtick,foreſeeing that if they marched forward,it could not but be daungerous to be incloſed in the middeſt of a circle,betwene the new ſuccors, and the olde ennemies within Bracciana,and withall, holding diſhonorable to the renowme of merit and vallour,to leaue them in pray al the contrey thereaboutes, wherein he had ſackt and made hauocke of diuerſe borowes: they leauied their campe from before Bracciana, and retyring all their great artilleries within Anguillare, they marched directly to that quarter where thennemies were: And encowntring them betwene Soriana and Baſſan, they fought together with great furie for certeine howers: But in the ende(the ſucceſſe of warres depending chiefly vpon the innocencie of the quarrell) albeit at the entry into the encownter, theccleſiaſticks tooke priſoner Franciot Vrſin, yet their whole campe was put to flight, with the loſſe of their baggage and artilleries: They loſt, what in the ſlaughter,and by taking priſoners,more then fiue hundred men, Amongeſt which priſoners were the Duke of Vrbyn, Iohn Peter of Gonſague Count of Nugolare, with many other bodies of marke: the Duke of Candia,lightly hurt in the face, and with him the Popes Legat,and Fabrice Colonne found ſafetie by fleeing into Roncillon. Aboue all the reſidue,Vitellozze caried the honor and merit of this victorie, for that the bandes of footemen of Citta Caſtello, who had bene afore trayned and managed by him and his brethren, with the orders and diſciplines of the french, were that day greatly ayded by his induſtrie, & hauing armed them with pykes longer by an arme length then thoſe which were cuſtomably vſed, they had ſo much aduauntage when they came to the ſhock with the footemen of thēnemies, that wounding them with the oddes of length in their pykes, they put them eaſily to the chaſe, ſo much the more to their greater honor, by how much in the contrary battell, there were eight hundred footemen of th Almaines, of which nation the infanterie of Italy, haue had a continuall feare euer ſince the diſcending of king Charles: After this victory, the victors begon to ronne without reſiſtance ouer all the contrey on this ſide Tyber, And afterward hauing paſſed part of their companies ouer the riuer beneath the hill Rotonde, they ſtill inuaded thoſe wayes where they ſuppoſed was any retrait for thennemie: In regard of which daungers, the Pope applying his witts to the neceſſities of his affayres, ſtudying to make a new leauy of men of warre, called to his ſuccors from the kingdom of Naples, Conſaluo, and Proſper Colonne: And yet not many dayes after, what by the diligence of th Embaſſadors of Venice, to doe pleaſure to th Vrſins, and the ſolicitacion of the king of Spayne, fearing leaſt theſe beginnings would draw ſome ill conſequence or innouacion to the league: A peace was made, with a moſt ready inclinacion aſwell of the Pope, who naturally hated exſpences, as of the Vrſins, who being no leſſe poore in money, then naked in frendes, knew that their neceſſitie in the ende would compell them to yeld to the power of the Pope: The articles of the Pope were theſe: That it ſhoulde be ſuffered to the Vrſins to continue in the paye of the french till the ende of the tyme for the which they were hyered by the king, with expreſſe mention that they ſhoulde not be bownde to take armes againſt the Church: That all the places which they had loſt in this warre ſhould be reſtored, paying to the Pope fifty thowſand duckats, of the which thirty thowſand to be payd aſſoone as Iohn Iordan and Pavvle Vrſin ſhoulde be ſet at libertie, (for Virginio not many dayes before dyed within the caſtell of the egge, either of an ague, which was naturall, or by poyſon which was violent and therefore much ſuſpected) and the other twenty thowſand duckats within eight monethes: for aſſurance of which payment, Anguillare and Ceruetre ſhould be committed of truſt into the keeping of the Cardinalls Askanius and S. Seuerin: That all the priſoners taken in the iorney at Soriana, ſhoulde be redeliuered, except the Duke of Vrbyn, for whoſe libertie, albeit th Embaſſadors of the confederats made great trauell, yet the Pope would ſolicite nothing: for that he knew the Vrſins had ho meane to rayſe the money they were to pay to him but by the raunſom of the Duke, for whome a litle after, was agreement made for xl. thowſand duckats, but with this adiection, that he ſhould not be deliuered afore Pavvle Vitelli (who remeyned priſoner to the Marquis of Mantua at the rendring of Atella) had obteyned his libertie without paying any raunſom.

Capitulacions betweene the Pope and the Vrſins.

The Pope hauing thus to his litle honor diſpatched his hands of the warre againſt the Vrſins, made diſtribucion of money to the companies which Conſaluo brought with him, whom ioyning to him his owne bandes, he ſent to take Oſtia as yet holden in the name of the Cardinall of S. P. ad vincla: wherein his ſucceſſe communicating with his common fortune, was no leſſe eaſie then ſpeedy, for that aſſoone as he had braked his artilleries, the caſtell keeper rendred all to diſcreſſion: After which victory, Conſaluo made his entry into Rome almoſt in maner triumphant, with a hundreth men at armes, two hundreth light horſemen, & fifteene hundred footemen, all ſouldiers of the ſpaniſh, leading before him as priſoner the caſtell keeper, whome a litle after after he ſet at libertie: There came to meete him many Prelats of the Popes howſhold, with Cardinalls, followed with much people, and almoſt all the Court ronning with great deſire to ſee a Capteine whoſe name bare ſo great fame and merit in Italy: By thoſe Prelats he was led to the preſence of the Pope ſitting in the conſiſtory, who receiuing him with great honor, gaue him in teſtimony of his vallour, the roſe which Popes are wont to beſtow euery yeare: After this, Conſaluo returned to reioyne eſtſoones with king Federyk, who had inuaded the eſtate of the Prefect of Rome, and reſumed all thoſe places, which taken from the Marquis of Piſcaire in the conqueſt of the kingdom, were beſtowed vpon him by the french king: And hauing taken Sore and Aret (but not the caſtells,) he lay incamped before the rocke Guillaume, for that he had had by accord the eſtate of the Count d'Olyuer, before he ſold his Duchie of Sora to the Prefect of Rome.

But as there is no earthly bliſſe ſo perfect, which hath not his aleye with ſome bitternes or bale, nor no proſperitie ſo well aſſured, which draweth not with it his proper aduerſities: So notwithſtanding theſe felicities heaped vpon Federyk, yet he was not without his perplexities, not onely by his frendes, ſeeing Conſaluo kept one part of Calabria in the name of the king of Spayne, but alſo of his enemies reconciled: for that the Prince of Biſignian, being one euening ſore hurt by a certeine Greeke, as he went out of the new caſtell of Naples, the Prince of Salerne was in ſuch feare that the blow was giuen by the kings commaundement in reuenge of thoffences paſſed, that immediatly (not diſſembling the cauſe of his ſuſpicion) he went from Naples to Salerna: And albeit the king ſent to vſe at his will, the Greeke deteyned in priſon, to iuſtifie (as the truth was) that he had giuen the blow for an iniurie to him done by the Prince of Biſignian in the honor and perſon of his wife: yet (in auncient & great grudges it is hard to eſtabliſh a faithfull reconciliacion, for that it hath his propper impediments either by ſuſpicion, or deſire of reuenge) the Prince of Salerne coulde neuer after diſpoſe him ſelf to truſt him: which ielouſie, giuing yet ſome hope to the french (keeping ſtill the Mont S. Ange, and other ſtronge places,) of ſome new innouacion or inſurrection in the kingdom of Naples, procured them with more conſtancie to ſtand to their defenſes.

The french prepare new enterpriſes againſt Italy.

In theſe ſeaſons, were tokens and demonſtracions of farre greater daungers in Lombardye, by the emocions of the french, aſſured for the preſent by the threatnings of the Spaniſh: for that paſſing betwene them, rather light incurſions and apparances of warre, then any thinge of notable action, ſauing that the french burned the towne of Sauſſes: They had begon a parley of accord, and for the more eaſie negociacion of it, had made a ſurceaſing of armes for two monethes: By meane whereof the french king, hauing a more facilitie to harken after the affayres of Genes and Sauona, diſpatched to Aſt an armie of a thowſand launces, three thowſand Suyzzers and a like number of Gaſcoyns, aduertiſing Trymulſo his Liefetenant in Italy, to applye aydes to Baptiſtyn and the Cardinall of S.P. ad vincla: his intencion was to ſend after, the Duke of Orleans with a ſtronge armie, to execute in his proper name thenterpriſe of the Duchie of Myllan: And to make more eaſie thaccion of Genes, he ſent Octauyan Fregoſe to require the Florentyns to inuade at the ſame tyme Lunigana and the riuer of the Eaſt, ordeyning alſo that the ſowtherne riuers ſhould be troubled by Pauvle Baptyſta Fregoſe with ſeuen gallies: This enterpriſe was begon with ſuch aſtoniſhment to the Duke of Myllan, not prepared ſufficiently of him ſelfe, and leſſe ſewertie of the aydes promiſed by the Venetians: that if it had proceeded with the ſame directions and councells, it coulde not but haue brought forth ſome effect of importance,and more easily in the Duchie of Myllan,then in Genes:for at Genes Iohn Lovvys de fiesque,& the Adornes,who were entred into reconcilement by the meane of Lodovvyk,had leauyed many bandes of footemen, and rigged at the charges of the Venetians and Lodovvyk an armie at sea,to the which were ioyned six gallies sent by Federyk: But the Pope interteyning the name of a confederat, more in councells and demonstracions,then in workes and meaninges, woulde not in those daungers contribute to any exspenses, neither by sea nor land: The proceedings of this expedicion were that Baptistyn,and with him Trymulce,marched to Nony, of which towne Baptistyn had ben despoiled afore by the Duke of Myllan,but not of the castell, which he had alwayes kept,and held yet: But by reason of their comming in such stronge order,the Count Caiezze,which was there in garrison with threescore mē at armes, two hundreth light horsemen,and fiue hundred footemen, distrusting muche to be able to defend it,retyred to Saruall: The conquest of this towne augmented greatly the reputacion of the banished: for besides that the towne is capable of many people,it stoppes the passage from Myllan to Genes,and by reason of thopportunitie and seate of the place,it is very conuenient to endomage the contrey assisting: After this,Baptistyn made him selfe Lord of certeine other peeces neare to Nony,and at the same tyme the Cardinall with two hundreth launces, & three thowsand footemen, hauing taken Ventimille,coasted ouer to Sauona,where finding no insurrection by the inhabitants,and hauing espiall that Iohn Adorne approched with a stronge bande of footemen,he retyred to Altare,A place of the Marquis of Montferat distant eyght myles from Sauone: But Trymulce in the beginning,did an action of greater importance: for that hauing a desire to giue occasion to kindle the warre in the Duchie of Myllan,notwithstanding the kinges commission was to execut first the affayres of Genes and Sauone: he tooke Bosco a borow of great importance in the contrey of Alexandria: Wherein this was his pretext & cooler,that for the sewertie of the bands which were gone to the East riuers,it was necessary to take from those of the Duke, the meane to goe into Alexandria vpon the landes of the Genovvays: But tempring his desire,with regard to the kinges commaundement,which he thought not reasonable to impugne manifestly,he forbare to passe further, losing a most fayre occasion: for that all the contrey there about drew into great sturre and tumult for the taking of that place, some for feare,as the multitude popular,some for desire of innouacion, which commonly is familiar with the condicion of witts least moderat: And of that side,there was no greater strength for the Duke,then fiue hundreth men at armes,and six thowsand footemen: besides,Galeas de Saint Seuerin, who was with in Alexandria began to distrust his defense without greater forces: And Lodovvyk him selfe, being vexed yet but with apparances and threatnings, showing him selfe no more tymorous in this aduersitie, then by the propertie of his nature he expressed in all other accidents,solicited the Duke of Ferrara to worke some accorde betwene the french king and him: But the soiorning of Trymulce betwene Bosco & Nony,gaue sufficient tyme to Lodovvyk to furnish him selfe, and good respit to the Venetians (who seeming most ready and prepared for his defense,had sent afore to Genes fifteene hundreth footemen) to send into Alexandria, bandes of men at armes & light horsemen: yea the Venetians appoynted the Count Petillane generall of their regimentes, (for that the Marquis of Mantua was withdrawne from their paye) to marche with the moste parte of their companies to the succors of that state: Thus thinges begon with so great hope,now growing cold,Baptistyn hauing nothing profited at Genes,(for the citie was quiet for the prouisions that were made) returned to

ioyne with Tryuulce, publiſhing that his exployts brought forth no ſucceſſe of ſeruice, for that the riuer of the leuant was not aſſayled by the Florentyns, who iudged it not a councell wiſe to enter into warre, if firſt the thinges of Fraunce appeared not more proſperous and more puiſant: In like ſort came and ioyned with Tryuulce, the Cardinall advincla, by whom was done no other execution, then that he had taken certeine places of the Marquis of Finale, for that he declared him ſelf for the defenſe of Sauone: The french armie drawne now all into one ſtrength, made certeine offers to Caſtellat, a place neare to Boſco which had bene afore tyme fortefied by the Capteines of the Duke: But the armie of the confederats which reaſſembled in Alexandria, increaſing dayly in qualitie of ſouldiers and quantitie of prouiſions: And of the contrary, both money and vittells beginning to fayle amongeſt the french, and their Capteines not a litle impatient to obey Tryuulce, it was neceſſary for him to leaue Nony and Boſco to garriſon, and retyre neare the towne of Aſt.

It was beleued that the diſtribucion of the bandes into ſeuerall places, brought great harme to thenterpriſe, as often tymes hapneth in the like examples: And that if they all ioyned into one ſtrength, had bene at the beginning addreſſed to Genes, thexpedicion perhaps had drawne ſome better ſucceſſe: ſeeing that beſides thinclinacion of factions, and indignacion conceiued for Pietra ſanta, one part of the horſemen and footemen of the Almains, which the Duke ſent thether, reuolted from the ſeruice and returned vpon the ſuddeine into their contrey: It might be alſo, that euen thoſe who the yeare before had hindred the kinges diſcending into Italy, and the ſuccors of the kingdom of Naples, applying now the ſame meanes, did giue impediments to the preſent enterpriſe by the difficultie of prouiſions: This likelihood of truth was iuſtified with a brute that ronne, that the Duke of Myllan (to the oppreſſion of his ſubiectes) made great preſents to the Duke of Burbon, and others that had grace and fauor with the king, in which infamie the Cardinall of S. Mallovv had not the leaſt intereſt: But whatſoeuer was in it, it is moſt certeine that the Duke of Orleans appoynted to paſſe to Aſt, and called vppon by the vehement ſolicitacion of the king, made all his preparacions neceſſary for thexpedicion: But he lingred, either for that he diſtruſted the continuacion of the prouiſions, or, (as ſome interpret) he had no forwardnes to depart out of Fraunce, the king being continually ill diſpoſed of his health, and (in caſe of ſterrilitie) the ſucceſſion of the crowne apperteyning to him.

But the king reaping no frute of his hope for the mutacion of Genes and Sauona, continued with more diligence his practiſes begonne with the King and Queene of Spayne, which hetherto had bene lingered for this onely difficultie, that the frenche king deſiring that he might be in libertie to proſecute his enterpriſes on this ſide the Mountes, would not that in the truce then in negociacion, ſhould be comprehēded the things of Italy: And the kings of Spayne, ſhowing that they made no difficultie to conſent to his will for other reſpect then in regard of their honor, ſolicited much that the Italian actions might be comprehended, alleaging that the common intencion of them both being to make a truſſe, to thende a peace might more eaſily ſucceede, they might afterwards with greater libertie of honor & honeſtie, depart from the confederacion which they had with th Italians: In ſo much that after many meetings and diſcourſes of th Embaſſadors of both ſides, (the Spaniſh ſuttelties in thend carying it) they made a truſſe for them, their ſubiectes, and dependants, and alſo for ſuch as either of them ſhould name: which truſſe beginning betwene them the fift day of march, (but betwene ſuch as ſhoulde be nominated, fifty dayes after,) ſhoulde

laſt vntill the ende of the next October: Euery one of them named thoſe eſtates & Potentats of Italy which were their confederats & adherents, but the kings of Spaine named moreouer king Federyk and the Pyſans: After this, they agreed to ſend men to Montpellyer to ſollicit a peace, where were to aſſemble th Embaſſadors of the confederats: In this practiſe the kinges of Spayne gaue hope to vnite them ſelues with the french king againſt th Italians vnder a certeyne occaſion iuſtificable, and from that tyme, they commoned of factions & meanes to deuide the kingdom of Naples: The truſſe, albeit it was made without the participation of the confederats of Italy, yet it was agreeable to them all, but ſpecially acceptable to the Duke of Myllan, to whom nothing was more welcome then the meane to make ceaſe the warre in his quarter: But the power remeyning free to offend one an other in Italy, vntil the xxv. of April, Tryuulce, Baptiſtyn, and Sereuon taking the aduauntage of that article, returned with fiue thowſand men to the riuer of the Sowth, where they aſſaulted the towne of Albinge, which albeit they had almoſt caried at the firſt aſſault, yet they ſuffered repulſe by a very ſmall ſtrength of thennemie, for that their entry was in diſorder: Afterwards they fell vpon the Marquiſdom of Finale, to giue occaſion to th Italian armie to make to their ſuccors, hoping by that meanes to draw them to battell: which not ſucceedinge accordinge to their exſpectacion, they did no further action of importance, the diſcord of the Capteines continuing in increaſing, & their payments fayling dayly more and more by reaſon of the truſſe: In which tymes, the confederats had recouered all their places loſt before (except Nony) which alſo they obteyned at laſt by compoſicion, notwithſtanding the Count Caiazze which had beſeeged it, had bene repulſed: There remeyned in the power of the french no other thinge of the places conquered, then certeine litle townes in the Marquiſdom of Finale: during all which emotions and ſtyrrs, the Duke of Sauoye, who had bene ſolicited on all partes with no ſmall promiſes, and the Marquis of Montferat (whoſe gouernment had bene confirmed by the king of Romains to Conſtantyn of Macedonia) ſtoode newters, declaring neither for the king nor for the confederats.

In this yeare was nothing done of importance betwene the Florentyns & the Pyſans, notwithſtanding the warre continued without intermiſſion: ſauing that the Pyſans led, vnder the direction of John Pavvle Mantſron foure hundred light horſemen, and fifteene hundred footemen, to recouer their baſtyllion vppon the bridge of the poole, which they loſt when the Emprour went to Lyuorne: The Count Riuucce hauing eſpiall of this enterpriſe, put him ſelfe vpon the way of Lyuorne, to reskewe the baſtyllion with a good trowpe of horſemen: the Pyſans not looking to be charged but by the way of Pontadere, were ſet vpon as they begon to aſſault the baſtyllion, & being eaſily put to the chaſſe, many of them were made priſoners: But at laſt, armes and actions of warre ceaſed alſo betwene them, by reaſon of the truſſe, notwithſtanding it was with an ill wil accepted of the Florentyns, who iudged it very inexpedient for their affayres to giue leaſure to the Pyſans to take breath, ſeeing withall, that notwithſtanding the truſſe, neceſſitie compelled them to continue the ſame expenſes, both for dowt of Peter de medicis, alwayes conſpyring againſt them, and for feare of the Venetian bandes within Pyſa, aſpyring to the ſoueraigne imperie of the whole.

Thus armes being layd a ſide on all partes, or at leaſt at poynt to ceaſe from all action: The Duke of Myllan, albeit in his lateſt daungers, he had expreſſed with what great contentment he embraſed the Senat of Venice for the ready and full ſuccours he had receiued from them: no leſſe exalting with publike and heroicall words the vertue and power of the Venetians then greatly commending the prouidence of John

Galeas

Galeas firſt Duke of Myllan, for that he had committed to the faith of the ſame Senat the execution of his Teſtament: yet hauing no patience to endure that the pray of Pyſa, followed by him with ſo many paynes and practiſes, ſhould be transferred to them, as was likely in manifeſt apparance of reaſon, And therefore aſſaying to obteyne with induſtrie and councell, that which he could not winne with armes and force: he ſo wrought, that the Pope, and the Spaniſh Embaſſadors (to both which ſuch a greatnes of the Venetians was diſpleaſing) ſhould ſet downe, that to leaue to the french no foundacion in Italy, as alſo to reduce all into one concord, it were neceſſary to induce the Florentyns to enter into the common league, cauſing Pyſa to be reſtored to them, ſeeing otherwayes they could not be brought to it: for that ſo long as they were ſeperated from the reſidue, they would not ceaſe to ſtirre vp the french king to diſcend into Italy, to whom in ſuch an action, they might (hauing their ſcituacion in the middeſt of Italy) with their money, and with their forces, doe thinges of great importance: But this propoſicion was impugned by th Embaſſador of Venice, as very preiudiciall to their common ſafetie, alleaging withall thinclinacion of the Florentyns to be ſuch to the french king, that not with this benefitt, it was not reaſonable to truſt them, if they deliuered not ſufficient ſecuritie to obſerue the thinges they ſhould promiſe: And that in a matter of ſo great eſtate, there was no other ſewertie, then to put Lyuorne into the handes of the confederats: This was very artificially alleaged by him, to thend to haue alwayes a greater meane to gayneſay the propoſicion, knowing well they would neuer conſent to commit to deputacion a place of ſuch reſpect for their eſtate: wherein, the matter drawing afterwardes ſuch ſucceſſe as he loked for, he ſtill oppoſed againſt it with ſuch vehemencie, that the Pope and the Duke of Myllans Embaſſador, not daring to obiect againſt him for feare to eſtraunge the Venetians from their frendſhip, the deuiſe reſted there: And there begon betwene the Pope and the Venetians a new plot to turne away with violence the Florentyns from the amitie of the french: (The ill condicions of that citie giuing corage to whom ſo euer would offend it.)

For from the beginning that thauthoritie popular was founded, there was not introduced thoſe temperatures, which aſſuring the libertie with due and reaſonable meanes, might haue bene the let, that the common weale ſhould not haue bene diſordered by the ignorance and licence of the multitude: In ſo much that the Citiſens of greateſt qualitie and condicion, being leſſe eſteemed then ſeemed conuenient, and on thother ſide, their ambicion being ſuſpected to the people, and many oftentymes intruding into deliberacions waighty who were but litle capable, and the ſoueraigne Magiſtrate to whome was referred the ſumme of the moſt waighty affayres, being chaunged from two monethes to two monethes, the common weale was gouerned with a great confuſion: To this was added the great authoritie of Sauonarola, whoſe auditorys were almoſt entred into ſecret intelligēce: And albeit ther were amongeſt them many honorable Citiſens, and they ſurpaſſing in number ſuch as were of thoppinion contrary, yet it ſeemed Magiſtracies and publike honors were diſtributed rather to thoſe that followed him, then to others of better merit: And therefore the city being manifeſtly deuided, in thaſſemblies and councels publike, one faction charged an other, no man making conſcience (which hapneth in ſtates falne into diuiſion) to hinder the benefit publike, to embaſe the reputacion of his aduerſaries: Theſe diſorders were ſo much the more daungerous, by howe much, for the long trauells and great exſpenſes ſuffered by the ſayd citie, there was that yeare a generall darth and want of vittells of all natures, by reaſon whereof it might be preſumed that the people vexed with hungar, would be deſirous of newe thinges.

P. de medicis determineth once againe to returne to Florence.

This ill diſpoſicion of the ciuill affayres of Florence, gaue hope to Peter de medicis, (who beſides thoſe occaſions was puſhed on by certeine particular Citiſens) to be able with eaſe to be Maiſter of his long and iuſt deſire: And therefore applying induſtrie and diligence to thoportunitie of the tyme, he communicated his intencion with the Cardinall Saint Seueryn his auncient frend, and with Aluyano in whom he much reappoſed for the merits of his vallour and long familiaritie: And herein being alſo ſecretly incouraged by the Venetians, to whom it ſeemed that by the trauells of the Florentyns, the affayres of Pyſa would be aſſured: he determined to ſurpriſe the towne of Florence, the rather being aduertiſed that they had created their ſupreame Magiſtrate (which they cal Gonfaloniere of iuſtice) Bernardyn de Nero, A man of auncient grauitie and authoritie, and had bene of a continued frendſhipoe with his father and him: hauing in the ſame election ioyned to him in aſſiſtance of that Magiſtracie certeine others, in whom (for auncient merit and benefits) he ſuppoſed was no ſmall inclinacion to his greatnes: The Pope fauored this plot with his full liking and conſent, deſiring to deuide the Florentyns from the frenche kinge with iniuries, ſeeing he could not ſeparate them with benefits: Neither was the Duke of Myllan againſt it, to whom it ſeemed that albeit he could not make a foundacion or intelligence ſtable with that citie, becauſe of the diſorders of the preſent gouernment: yet, on thother ſide, he tooke no delite in the returne of Peter, aſwell for the wronges he had done him, as for dowt leaſt he ſhould depend too much of the authoritie of the Venetians. But aſſoone as Peter had leauyed, what by his owne meanes, and with the ayde of his frendes and fauorers, as much treaſure as he could poſſible, hauing receiued (as was beleued) ſome ſmall quantitie in preſt of the Venetians, he went to Siena, and after him Aluyano with the horſemen & footemen, marching alwayes by night, and by wayes particular, to thende his comming might be conceiled from the Florentyns: At Siena, by the fauor of Iohn Iacques, and Pandolphe Petrucci principalls in that gouernment, and aſſured frendes to his houſe, he was ſecretly refurniſhed with bandes of ſouldiers: So that with ſix hundreth horſemen, & foure thowſand footemen of choyſe, two dayes after the truce was begon, (wherein they of Sienna were comprehended) he put him on the way to Florence, hoping that ariuing there by the breake of the day, and at vnwares, he ſhould finde his entrey eaſie, either for the general diſorder or ſpecial tumult, which he exſpected would riſe in his fauor: A plot which happely had drawne ſome good yſſue for him, if fortune had not ſupplyed the negligence of his aduerſaries: for, as in the beginning of the night, he was lodged in the tabernacles (certein ſmal houſes vpon the high way) with intencion to march the reſidue of the night, ſo he was ſo hindred by wonderfull raynes and ſtormes continuing long, that he could not preſent him ſelfe before Florence, till long ſpace after the ſunne riſing: A chaunce which gaue leaſure to ſuch as made profeſſion to be his particular enemies (for the communaltie and all the reſt of the Citiſens ſtirred not, exſpecting quietly what woulde be the yſſue of thinges) to take armes with their frendes and followers, and to prouide that the citiſens ſuſpected ſhould be called & reſtrayned in the publike pallaice by the Magiſtrats: And laſtly to make them ſelues ſtronge at the gate which leades to Siena, was at their requeſt Pavvle Vitelli ariuing there the night before, in his returne from Mantua: In ſo much as no commotion appearing in the citie, & Peter not ſtronge enough to force the gate (which he had approched within a bow ſhoote:) And after he had remeyned there foure howers,

fearing with his daunger the ſuddeine comming of their men at armes, whome he thought (and his conceite was true) the Florentyns had ſent for from the ſeruice of Pyſa: he returned to Sienna where Aluiano parting from him, and let into Tody by the Guelffes, he ſacked almoſt all the houſes of the Gebelyns, and put to the ſlaughter liij. of the principall bodies of that faction: According to which example, Anthonie Sauelle entred into Terny, and Gatteſquies, by the fauor of the Colonnoys, and lett into Viterby, did the like execucions againſt the Guelffes in both the one and the other place, and all the peeces thereabouts: without that the Pope prouided for ſo great diſorders in the ſtate eccleſiaſtike, becauſe he abhorred all exſpenſes in like caſes, & bearing by the propertie of his nature, no compaſſion to the calamities of others, he was nothing troubled with thoſe thinges that offended his honor, ſo that his profits or pleaſures were nothinge hindered: yet he coulde not auoyde the ſecret iuſtice of God, expreſſed in domeſticall miſeries, troubling his houſe with examples tragicall, and a whordom and crueltie horrible aboue all the barbarous regions: for where he had determined from the beginning of his election pontificall, to appropriat all temporall greatnes to the Duke of Candia his eldeſt ſonne: The Cardinall of Valence (who altogether eſtraunged from prieſthood, aſpired to the exerciſe of armes) hauing no patience to ſuffer that place to be vſurped by his brother, & enuying withall that he had better part then he in the loue of Madonne Lucrecia their common ſiſter: inflamed with luſt, and with ambicion (mighty miniſters to all miſchiefs) cauſed him to be killed one night as he rode alone in the ſtreetes of Rome, caſting his bodye ſecretly in the riuer of Tyber: The brute was (if ſuch an enormitie be worthy to be beleued) that in the loue of Mad. Lucrecia were concurrant, not onely the two brethren but alſo the father, who when he was choſen Pope, taking her from her husband being inferior to her degree, he maried her to Iohn Sforce, Lorde of Peſere: And afterwards, not able to ſuffer her husband to be his corriuall, he made diſſolucion of the mariage already conſomated, hauing made proofe, before Iudges & delegats of his owne creacion, by witneſſes ſubborned & afterwards confirmed by apoſtolicall ſentence, that her husband was imperfect in the operacion of nature, and vnable to cohabitacion: The death of the Duke of Candia, afflicted not a litle the Pope burning aboue all other Popes in a vehement loue to his children: And as it is the greateſt tryall of wiſedom and courage of men, to be temperat in mortall chaunces: ſo, ſuch as are not accuſtomed to aduerſities, haue leaſt rule ouer their paſſions, & they that neuer felt but proſperitie, can litle iudge of the worthines of patience: This Pope was ſo vnacquainted with the accidents of fortune, & much leſſe enured with earthly loſſes and priuacions, that from his infancie to that age all thinges had happely ſucceeded to him: the ſame making this affliction ſo greeuous and intollerable to him, that in the conſiſtory, after he had with a great compaſſion of minde, and publike teares, greeuouſly bewayled his miſerie, accuſing many of his propper actions, and manner of liuing which he had vſed till that day: he aſſured with wordes full of efficacie, that hereafter he would gouerne his life with other thoughtes, and with a forme of liuing more moderat and ruled: And for a beginning he aſſigned preſently certeine of the number of Cardinalls, to ioyne with him in the reformacion of maners & orders of the Court: wherein after he had employed certeine dayes, at what tyme began to be manifeſt the author of the death of his ſonne, (for the which at the firſt, he had the Cardinall Askanius and the Vrſins in ſtronge ſuſpicion) he left there his former holy intencion, his teares, and all his complaints, and returned more diſorderly then euer, to thoſe thoughtes and operacions, wherin he had conſumed his age till that day.

The faction and intelligence which Peter de medicis had in Florence is diſcouered.

There hapned in thoſe ſeaſons new trauells within Florence, by reaſon of thenterpriſe of Peter de medicis: for thintelligence and faction which he had with certeyne particlers in the citie, was diſcloſed: by reaſon whereof many noble Citiſens were impriſoned, and ſome fled, And after the Magiſtrates had vſed meanes iudicial to verifie the order of the conſpiracie, not onely many were condemned to death which had ſolicited him to come and giuen him releeſe of money: but alſo Bernardyn de Nero, to whom was imputed no other thing, then that knowing the practiſe, he had not reuealed it, which fault (of it ſelfe puniſhable by the head by the ſtatutes of the Florentyns, and by thinterpretacion which moſt part of lawyers giue to the common lawes) was found ſo much the more haynous in him, by howe much he was chiefe Magiſtrate when Peter came to Florence, as if he had bene more greatly bownd to do the office rather of a perſon publike, then priuate: But the parents and kindred appealing from the ſentence, to the great councell of the people, and that by vertue of a law made when the popular gouernment was eſtabliſhed: Thoſe that had bene authors of the condemnacion, fearing leaſt the compaſſion of the age, of the nobility, and of the multitude of parentes, woulde moderat in the mindes of the people, the ſtraitnes of the iudgement, wrought ſo muche that they obteyned, that to the leſſer nũber of the Citiſens, ſhould be referred the reſolucion, whether the appeale ſhould be ſuffered to be proſecuted or reſtrayned: wherein, being more ſtronge the authoritie and number of them which held it a thing daungerous, and no leſſe drawing to ſedicion, ſeeinge that the Lawes them ſelues ſuffered, that to auoyde tumultes, the ſtatutes in like caſes might be diſpenſed withall: ſome of thoſe that helde the chiefe offices, were with great importunities, and almoſt by force, and with threatninges, conſtrayned to conſent, that notwithſtanding thappeale interpoſed, execucion was done the ſame night: To which extreame iuſtice, appeared more affectioned then the others, the followers of Sauonarole, not without his proper infamie, forbearing to diſſwade (euen his auditors) the violacion of a law publiſhed a few yeares before by him ſelfe as a ſtatute conuenient and neceſſary for the preſeruacion of the common libertie.

The Pope inueſteth Federyk in the kingdom of Naples.

In this yeare, Federyk king of Naples, hauing obteyned of the Pope thinueſtiture of the kingdom, and making his coronacion perfect with all ſolemnities, recouered by accord, Mont Saint Ange, which had bene valiantly defended by Dom Iulian de Lorraine, whom the french king left there: he reconquered alſo Cuita, with other peeces holden by Charles de Sanguyn: And aſſoone as the truce was ended, he chaſſed out of the realme the Prefect of Rome, conuerting his forces to execute the like action vpon the Prince of Salerne, who being at laſt beſeeged, in the rocke of Dyana, & abandoned of all ſuccors, had permiſſion to goe his way in ſafetie with his goods, leauing that part of his eſtate which he had not yet loſt, in the handes of the Prince of Biſignian, with condicion to paſſe it ouer to Federyk, aſſoone as he vnderſtoode that he was conduted in ſafetie to Sinigale.

New practiſes betweene the kinges of Fraunce and Spayne.

About the ende of this yeare (the dyet which had bene transferred from Montpellier to Narbonne, being afore interrupted by the immoderat demaunds of the king and Queene of Spayne) the french king & the ſayd king of Spayne, returned eftſoones to new practiſes, wherein were founde the ſame difficulties that before: for that as the french king had determined not to conſent to any accord wherein Italy ſhoulde be comprehended: ſo it was againſt the pollicie of the Spanyard to leaue him a libertie free, & a way open to ſubdue the iuriſdiction of it: And yet it was farre from the

deſires of the Spaniſh to interteyne warres with him on thother ſide the Mountes, becauſe it was a warre full of troubles and exſpenſes, and no hope of honor or profit: At laſt the truce was concluded betwene them, to indure (without limitacion) till it were reuoked and two monethes after: There was no Potentat of Italy comprehended in it to whom the king of Spayne gaue ſignification of the truſſe and the articles and capitulacions of the ſame, alleaging that in him was no leſſe power to reſolue the contract without the knowledge of the other confederats, then the duke of Myllan made it lawfull (without their conſent or priuitie) to conclude the peace of Verceill: And albeit (according to the forme and couenants of the league) he had begon the warre in Fraunce, and continued it many moneths, without receiuing one porcion of the money promiſed by the confederats, wherein he had iuſt occaſion not to make care of them that had conſented to his diſappoynting: yet he had by many meanes and tymes aduertiſed them, that if they would make payment of the hundreth and fifty thowſand duckats, which they ought to him for the exſpenſes of the warre he had made, he was contented to accept that payment, in reckoning of all other actions and enterpriſes hereafter (hauing determined to enter Fraunce with a ſtronge armie:) Whereunto as the confederats would ſhow no wil or inclinacion, and much leſſe keepe faith, or be carefull ouer the common ſafetie: So he in that regard, and ſeeing withall that the league made for the libertie of Italy, was turned into an vſurpacion and oppreſſion of the regions of the ſame, for that the Venetians not contented with ſo many portes falne to their ſhare in the kingdom of Naples, had made thē ſelues Lordes ouer Pyſa without any right he could not but hold it indifferent, reaſonable, and iuſt, ſeeing by others, the affayres common were diſordered, to prouide for his owne particular with a truce, bearinge notwithſtandinge ſuche a forme and manner, that it may rather be called an admonicion, then a will to ſeperat from the league: for that it was alwayes in his power to diſſolue or reuoke it, which he would doe, when he ſhoulde diſcerne an other intencion, with other prouiſions, in the Potentats of Italy, for the ſtay of the common benefit: About this tyme dyed Iohn Prince of Spayne, onely ſonne to the Kinge and Queene, to whome the accident brought no ſmall ſorowes and heauines, for that, beſides diſappoynting of the ſucceſſion, his death gaue no litle impediments to the ſweete delites & pleaſures which they reckoned to reape in their new tranquillitie and reſt.

To this was alſo ioyned the death of Phillip Duke of Sauoye, leauing for a poſteritie, one ſonne of litle age, and therefore of no iudgement touching his exſpectacion or towardnes: This late Duke, after he had wauered long tyme in ſuſpenſe and newtralitie, beholding all their actions without mocion or inclinacion particular, ſeemed at laſt to fauor the faction of the confederats, who had promiſed to pay him euery yeare, twenty thowſand duckats: And yet euery one of them had ſo great dout of his faith, that they could aſſure nothing of his promiſes and trueth, if the frenche king ſhould diſcend to make any ſtronge enterpriſe. Phillip Duke of Sauoye dyeth.

With this yeare, ended the two yeares touching the deputacion of the caſtell of Genes, which the Duke of Ferrara, (receiuing it in truſt) did eſtſoones render to Lodowyk his ſonne in law: he firſt demaunded of the french king, that according to the capitulacions of Verceill, he would ſee him ſatisfied of the halfe of thexſpenſes employed in the garde and keeping of it, whereof the king conſented to make paymēt, ſo that the Duke would put into his handes the caſtell, as he ſayd he was bownd for the inobſeruacion of the Duke of Myllan: To this the Duke of Ferrara aunſwered, that that was not verefied, and that to put the Duke of Myllan in contumacie, it were The caſtell of Genes rendred to the Duke of Myllan.

neceſſary to haue interpellacion: The kinge offered to committe the money into a third mans hand, to thende that afore payment were made, there might be conſtruction in iuſtice, reaſon, and lawe, whether he ought not to render to him the caſtell: But the inſtance made to the contrary by the Venetians and his ſonne in lawe, caried farre more force in the fancie of the Duke of Ferrara: wherein he was not onely moued by the prayers and ſolicitacions of Lodovvyk, who not many dayes before, had indued the Cardinall Hippolite his ſonne, with tharchbiſhoprike of Myllan: but alſo he had regard to the daungers that threatned him, if he ſhoulde prouoke the malice of ſo mighty ennemies, ſpecially at a tyme wherin was continuall diminucion of the hope that the french men would diſcend: So that, applying his actions to thinclinacion of the tyme, he firſt called home from the Court of Fraunce, his ſonne Ferrand, and then ſurrendred the caſtell to Lodovvyk, who ſatisfied all charges for keeping it, together with the porcion which apperteyned to the king to pay: By reaſon wherof, the Venetians, to expreſſe how much they congratulated his doings, toke his ſayd ſonne into their pay, with a hundred men at armes: This reſtitucion made with no iuſtice, albeit was of great importance againſt the kinges reputacion in Italy, yet he diſſembled the wronge, and made no ſuch apparance of diſliking as was conuenient to the grauitie of the diſhonor: And that which more is, the Duke of Ferrara, excuſing the action by an Embaſſador ſent to his Maieſtie, that by reaſon of the neighbourhood of the Venetians and Duke of Myllan, (both prepared to pronownce warre againſt him) he was conſtrayned to obey neceſſitie: yet the king gaue as negligent eare, as if the nature of the matter had bene light and trifling: Wherein this might be one reaſon of the kinges negligence, that, beſides he proceeded almoſt at auenture in all his actions, yet he was ouerwearied with a continuall care and trauell of minde, ioyned to his auncient deuocion to repaſſe into Italy, hauing now greater occaſions then euer, for that he had made truce with the king of Spayne, renewed thalliance with the Svvyzzers, and many late cauſes of diſagreement hapned amongeſt
« per impediments, and to Princes their deſires doe ſeldom ſucceede, when their neg« ligence is more common then their reſolucions certeine: ſo, the kinges diſpoſicion was ouerruled with newe meanes ſubborned by ſuche as were in moſte principall grace about him: Wherof ſome ſet afore him his pleaſures, others encouraged him to embraſe thenterpriſe, but with ſo mighty preparacions both by ſea and lande, and with ſo great prouiſions of money, as could not be refurniſhed but with a long ſpace and interpoſicion of tyme, others made the action ſlowe & impoſſible by many difficulties and obiections: And the Cardinal of S. Mallovv forgat not his accuſtomed delayes in thexpedicion of money: In ſo much, that not onely the tyme to marche into Italy, was more incerteine then euer: but alſo many things were ſuffered to ſuſpend and miſcary, which were almoſt brought to their perfection: for the Florentyns (continually incenſing the king to marche) had contracted with him, to take armes on their ſides, aſſoone as the warre ſhould begin by him, and for that effect, they did agree that Monſr d'Aubigny with an hundred and fifty french launces (the hundred to be payed by the king, and the fifty to be mercenary by them) ſhoulde paſſe by ſea into Tuskane, to be generall of their armie: And the Marquis of Mantua, who when he returned victorious from the kingdom of Naples, had bene diſhonorably diſappoynted of the pay of the Venetians, for ſuſpicion that he ſolicited to be mercenary to the french king: did now with great diligence and in good earneſt, negociat with him to that ende: The new Duke of Sauoye was confirmed in his good amitie and alliance:

alliance: Bentyuole promiſed to follow his authoritie, aſſoone as he were come into Italy: And the Pope, dowting whether he ſhould ioyne with him, (as he was continually labored) determined at the leaſt not to be againſt him.

But all exſpectacions began nowe to diſſolue, and mens mocions and mindes to grow colde for the detraction and negligence which the king vſed: for that, neither his men of warre, (as was promiſed) paſſed into Italy to reaſſemble at Aſt: neither was Monſr d'Aubigny diſpatched, and much leſſe money ſent to pay the Vrſins & the Vitellis his ſouldiers, (A thing of no litle importance for the warre he ment to make) By reaſon whereof the Vitellis inclining to enter pay with the Venetians, the Florentyns who feared they ſhoulde not haue ſufficient reſpit to giue aduertiſement to the king, kept them interteyned for one yeare in common, for the ſeruice of the king & them ſelues: The king commended much theſe actions in them, but he made no ratificacion nor prouiſion of payment for his part: onely he ſent Gemell to them, to intreate them to lend him for the furniture of his enterpriſe, an hundred & fifty thowſand duckats: Laſtly, the king (as he did at other tymes) meaſuring the wils of others by his owne, left all thinges to confuſion, and departed almoſt vppon the ſuddeine from Lyon, to goe to Tovvars, and then to Amboyſe, with his accuſtomed promiſes to returne immediatly to Lyon.

The Duke of Myllan proſecutes his practiſe againſt the Venetians.

For which reſpects, hope fayling in all thoſe that followed his faction in Italy: Baptiſtyn Fregoſe was the firſt that reconciled him ſelfe with the Duke of Myllan, who taking courage by theſe good euentes and ſucceſſes, diſcouered euery day more and more, the ill diſpoſicion he bare towards the Venetians for the regard of Pyſa, ſoliciting (with continuall importunities) the Pope, and the king of Spayne, eftſoones to call into queſtion (but with more efficacie) A parliament for the reſtoring of the ſame citie: And the better to aduaunce the practiſe, the Florentyns, receiuing councell and direction from him, diſpatched an Embaſſador to Rome, but with a commiſſion quallified to proceede ſo aduiſedly, that the Pope & the reſidue might perceiue, that if Pyſa were rendred to them, they would ioyne in vnitie with the others for the defenſe of Italy, againſt the french: But in caſe the reſtitucion of the citie ſucceeded not, to keepe all things from the knowledge of the french, to whom they were carefull to giue any occaſion to hold them dowtfull or ſuſpected: This conference continued many dayes at Rome, wherein was omitted nothing by the Pope, th Embaſſadors Spaniſh, the Duke of Myllan, and the king of Naples, that might reaſonably induce the Venetian Embaſſador to hold it neceſſary for the common ſewertie of Italy, that by the redeliuery of that citie, the Florentyns might participat in the generall league againſt the french: They told him that the Senat of Venice ought to conſent thereunto together with others, to thende, that the rootes of all emotions and troubles being ſupplanted, there ſhould remeyne to no eſtate or degree in Italy, any occaſion to call eftſoones forreine armes ouer the Mountes: They told him alſo that if in that regarde the vnitie of Italy ſuffered impediment, there woulde perhaps be giuen, matter & occaſion to others to take new councells, by the which (to the common preiudice) might happen ſome alteracion of importance. But to this, was quite contrary the deliberacion of the Senat of Venice, who couering their couetouſnes with many coolers, and no leſſe perceiuing from whome proceeded principally ſo great an inſtance, made aunſwer by the ſame Embaſſador, complayning not a litle that ſuch a mocion proceeded not of a reſpectiue care to the vniuerſall benefit, but of an ill tempered affection which ſome of the confederats bare to them: for that (ſayth he) the Florentyns, hauing with the french men a ſecret affinitie and coniun-

ction of minde,and being perſwaded that by their returning into Italy,the moſt part of Tuskane woulde diuolue to their rule and iuriſdiction: it was without dowt,that to reeſtabliſh them in Pyſa,would not ſuffice to draw them from ſo ambicious inclinacion: But of the contrary,the reſtitucion was a thing daungerous,for that by how much they ſhould be mighty and ſtronge, by ſo much would they be hurtfull to the ſewertie and quiet of Italy: he ſayd that in this reſtitucion, it went of the honor and faith of euery one, but principally of their common weale,ſeeing the confederats hauing promiſed the Pyſans with one conſent to protect their libertie,& afterwards (euery one in particular putting an vnwilling hand to furniſh thexpenſes of the cōmon buſines) impoſed the whole burden vpon them alone,who(for that cauſe)had refuſed no charges,cares,nor trauells, it coulde not but turne to their ſpeciall diſhonor,to leaue them abandoned when they were in moſt neceſſitie of ſtaye and comfort,and to withdraw their faith and promiſe, which though others eſteemed litle, yet with them it had alwayes caried this reputacion,not to ſuffer ſtayne or violacion in any ſorte: he alleaged it was a thinge moſte greeuous to the Senat of Venice,that (without reſpect reaſonable) others ſought to lay vppon them by imputacion, that which had bene begon with one common and generall conſent, and continued for the benefit of euery one,and that with ſo great an ingratitude, they were puniſhed for their good workes: That thintollerable exſpenſes which they had defrayed in this enterpriſe and many others, ioyned to ſo many perills and trauells ſuſteyned ſince the creacion of the league,deſerued not ſuch recompenſe & retribucion, their actions bearing that nature and quallitie both for exſpenſes, pollicie, and care,that they may ſay with reaſon and iuſtice, that Italy hath bene preſerued by their meane: for that neither the battell of Taro was fought with other armes then theirs, nor the kingdom of Naples recouered with other forces then of their common weale: That no other armie conſtrayned Nouare to render,and chaſed the french king to returne beyond the Mountes: That no other ſtrength then theirs,was oppoſed againſt him in Pyemont,as often as he aſſayed to returne: And that it coulde not be denyed that thoſe actions proceeded not principally of the deſire they had to protect the ſafetie of Italy,ſeing as their eſtates were alwayes furtheſt remoued from perills,ſo,for their occaſion,there were no diſorders hapned which they ought to readdreſſe or amēd: for they called not the frenche kinge into Italy, nor accompanied him when he was come ouer the Mountes,& much leſſe for ſparing their proper treaſures, haue they ſuffered to fall into perill,the affayres common and vniuerſall: No,rather neceſſitie and occaſion haue ſo required,that the Senat of Venice did giue remedy to the diſorders happened by the faultes of others,to the common harmes of the whole: All which operacions,albeit they were not knowē, or though they were ſo ſoone committed to forgetfulnes, yet they would not for all that (forbearing the ill excuſable example of others) defile neither the faith nor dignitie of their common weale, the rather,for that to the preſeruacion of the libertie of the Pyſans, was ioyned the ſewertie and well doing of all Italy.

The death of king Charles the eyght.

Whileſt thinges paſſed in theſe practiſes amongeſt the confederats,with a manifeſt and generall diſagreement,there hapned a newe accident, which engendred effects diuerſe and much different from the thoughtes of men: The night before the eyght day of April,king Charles dyed at Amboyſe, of a catterhe which the Phiſicions cal apoplexie,the ſame riſing in him with ſuch abundance, as he beheld a match plaied at tennyſſe, that in fewe howers he ended at the ſame place his life, duringe the which, he had with greater importunitie then vertue, troubled the whole worlde,

with great apparance of daunger to kindle eftſoones newe fiers of innouation and troubles: for that it was beleued of many, that being puſhed forwardes with a vehement deſire to returne into Italy, he had in the ende, either of his proper knowledge, or by the emulacion of ſuch as bare enuy to the Cardinall of S. Mallovv, remoued al the difficulties that had withholden thaction: In ſo much, that albeit in Italy (according to his variations) ſometymes he increaſed, and ſometymes he diminiſhed the opinion that men had that he would marche: yet he kept them in continuall ſuſpicion, and made his intencions to trouble their coniectures and councells: And for that cauſe, the Pope puffed with ambicion to rayſe his ſonnes, had begon already to ſolicit with him touching ſome ſecret innouacion, the Duke of Myllan hauing done the like (as was bruted) to thende he would not liue in continuall feare.

Lowys Duke of Orleans ſucceedeth to the crowne.

King Charles dying without yſſue, the realme of Fraunce deſcended to Lovvys Duke of Orleans, as nearer in blud then any other of the maſculyne lyne: to whome (remeyning then at Bloys) came to doe reuerence, the kinges garde, and all the generall trayne of the Court, together with the nobilitie of the kingdome, by whome he was ſaluted as king with titles and inuocacions royall, notwithſtanding ſome did ſecretly murmure, that (according to thauncient ſtatutes of the lande) he was vnworthy to aſpire to the crowne, againſt the which he had taken armes in the warres of Brittaine.

The death of Sauonarola.

The day after the death of king Charles, (a day obſerued in many places by a celebracion and ſolemnitie of palmes) tooke ende the authoritie, life, and doctrine of Sauonarola: who hauing bene long tyme before accuſed by the Pope, that he preached ſlaunderouſly againſt the manners of the Clergy and Court of Rome, that he nouriſhed ſects and diſcordes in Florence, & that his doctrine was not fully catholyke, and for thoſe reaſons called to Rome by many writs, refuſed to appeare there, alleaging many excuſes: and therefore after much a doe he was at laſt (the yeare before) ſeparated by the Pope with cenſures from the fellowſhip of the Church: of which ſentence (hauing abſteyned from preaching for certeine monethes) he had eaſily obteyned abſolucion, if he had longer continued, for that the Pope, who held ſlender reckoning of Sauonarola, had proceeded againſt him more by the incenſing and perſwacion of his aduerſaries, then any other occaſion: But he iudging that it was for his ſilence, that his reputacion came ſo to be diminiſhed, or at leaſt, that it brake the purpoſe for the which he ſtirred (for he was principally aduaunced for his vehemēcie in preaching) he fell eftſoones to deſpiſe the Popes commaundements, and returned publikely to his olde office, wherein affirming that the cenſures publiſhed againſt him were vniuſt & of no force, he opened his mouth eftſoones to blaſpheme the Pope and the whole court of Rome with great vehemencie: of this aroſe no ſmall emotion, for that his aduerſaries (whoſe authoritie increaſed dayly in greatnes with the people) deteſted ſuch inobedience rebuking the action, for that by his innouacion and raſhenes, the Popes minde was drawne in vncerteinties and alteracion, in a tyme ſpecially, wherein the reſtitucion of Pyſa being negociated by him and the other confederats, it was neceſſary to doe all thinges to confirme him in that inclinacion: On the other ſide, his diſciples and partakers defended and iuſtified him, alleaging that men ought not for the regard of humane thinges, to trouble the operacions diuine, nor conſent that vnder ſuch coolers, the Popes of Rome ſhould begin to intrude into thaffayres of their common weale: But after there were certeine dayes ſpent in this contencion, & the Pope wonderfully inflamed, ſending out new thunderbolts with threates of cenſures againſt the whole citie: he was at laſt commaun-

ded by the Magiſtrats of the citie to forbeare to preach, to whom though he obeyed, yet diuerſe of his brethren ſupplyed his office in ſundry Churches: And the diuiſion being no leſſe amongeſt the ſpiritualtie then the layetie, the Fryers and brethren of other orders ceaſed not to preach feruently againſt him: ariſing at laſt into ſuch high and malicious inflammation, that one of the diſciples of Sauonarole, & one of the Frear minors, agreed to enter into the fier in the preſence of the whole people, to thende that the diſciple of Sauonarole either being burned or preſerued, the people might be left ſatisfied and certeine whether Sauonarole were a Prophet or an abuſer: ſeeing that at tymes afore, he had affirmed in his ſermons, that for the iuſtificacions of the truth of his prophecies, he could in all neceſſities obteyne of God the grace, to paſſe without hurt, thorow the middeſt of a flaming fire: And yet notwithſtanding greuing not a litle with the reſolucion made without his priuitie touching a preſent experience, he labored to breake it with all his deuiſes and diligence: But the matter being ſo farre proceeded of it ſelfe, and earneſtly ſolicited by certeine citiſens deſiring to haue the towne deliuered of ſo great troubles, it was neceſſary at laſt to paſſe further: In ſo much as the two religious brethren, accompanied with all their brotherhoods and couent, came at the day appointed to the place afore the publike pallaice, where was not onely a general concurſſe of the people of Florence, but vniuerſall aſſemblies of the cities adioyning: There the Fryer Minors were aduertiſed that Sauonarole had ordeyned, that his diſciple and brother entring the fire, ſhould beare in his hand the Sacrament: which deuiſe they impugned greatly, alleaging that there was ſought by that meane to put in daunger thauthoritie of Chriſtian faith, which in the mindes of thignorant would not a litle decline if that holy oſte ſhould be burned: by which contencion, Sauonarole being there preſent, & perſeuering in his reſolucion, there aroſe ſuch factions and diſagrements, that the action of experience proceeded no further, the ſame diminiſhing ſo much of his credit, that the day following in a tumult then hapning, his aduerſaries tooke armes: whereunto being ioyned thauthoritie of the ſouereigne Magiſtrat, they entred the Monaſtery of S. Marke where he was, and drawing him out of the place, they ledde him with two other of his brethren to the common priſons: In this tumult, the parentes of thoſe that had bene executed the yeare before, killed Franciſque Vatori a Citiſen of great authoritie, and the moſt apparant fauorer and follower of Sauonarole: the chief mocion inducing this quarrell, was, that aboue all others, his authoritie had depriued them of the facultie to haue recourſe to the iudgement of the councell popular: Sauonarole was afterwards examined with torments but not very greeuous, and vpon the examinacion, a proceſſe publiſhed, which (taking away all imputacions that were layed on him for couetouſnes, corrupcion of manners, or to haue had ſecret intelligence or practiſe with Princes) conteyned, that the matters by him propheſied, were not pronownced by reuelacion diuine, but by his propper opinion grounded vpon the doctrine and obſeruacion of holy Scripture: Wherein he had not bene moued by any wicked intencion or purpoſe, & much leſſe by that meane, to aſpire to any office or greatnes in the Church: onely he had a holy deſire, that by his meanes might be called a generall councell wherein might be reformed the corrupt cuſtomes of the Clergie, and the eſtate of the Church of God, (ſo farre wandred and gone aſtray) to be reduced, as neare as might be, to the reſemblance of the tymes drawing neareſt the Apoſtles: A glory, which, to giue perfection to ſo great and holy an operacion, he eſteemed farre aboue the obteyning of the popedom: for that the one could not ſucceede but by meane of an excellent doctrine and vertue,

and a ſingular reuerence of all men: where the Popedom moſt often was obteyned, either by ſiniſter meanes, or elſe by the benefitt of fortune: vppon which proceſſe confirmed by him in the hearing & preſence of many religious perſons euen of his owne order, but (if that be true which his owne faction bruted afterwardes) with wordes darke, and ſuch as might receiue diuerſe interpretacions: there were taken from him and his two other companions with ceremonies inſtituted by the church of Rome, the holy orders, and that by ſentence of the generall of the Iacobins and of the Biſhop Romolyn, Commiſſioners delegate by the Pope: And ſo being paſſed ouer to the power of the ſecular Court, they were (by their iudgements) hanged and burned, being at the ſpectacle of the degradacion & execucion, no leſſe multitudes of people, then at the day of the experience of entring the fire, when was an infinit concurſſe to beholde the yſſue of the miracle promiſed by Sauonarole: This death conſtantly endured (but without expreſſing any word whereby might be diſcerned, either their innocencie or fault) quenched not the diuerſitie of iudgements and paſſions of men: for that many ſuppoſed he was but an abuſer: and others (of the contrary) beleued, that the confeſſion that was publiſhed was falſely forged, or perhaps, in his aged and weake complexion, the torments had more force then the truth: wherin they excuſed that manner of frailtie with the example of S. Peter, who neither impriſoned, nor conſtrayned with torments, or by any other extraordinary force, but at the ſimple wordes of the handmaides and ſeruantes, denied that he was the diſciple of his Maiſter, in whom he had ſeene ſo many holy miracles.

The ende of the third booke.

THE ARGVMENT OF THE FOVRTH BOOKE.

LOWYS Duke of Orleans ſucceedeth to the crowne of Fraunce: he determineth to recouer his Duchie of Myllan: Pyſa and Florence make warre: Lodowyk Sforce fleeth from Myllan: the Florentyns giue batterie to Pyſa, and agree with the french king: Pope Alexander aſpireth for his ſonne to the iuriſdiction of Romagna: Lodowyk Sforce recouereth Myllan, but being betrayed by the Swyſſers, he is taken, and led into Fraunce.

THE FOVRTH BOOKE OF THE hiſtorie and diſcourſſe of Guicciardin.

IT was almoſt an vniuerſall coniecture amongeſt th Italians, that by the death of king Charles, al the regions of Italy were now deliuered of thoſe feares, afflictions, & daungers which the power and nation of the french did threaten: Their opinions were induced by this reaſon, that the newe Kinge Lowys preſently aſcended to the crowne, would not intangle the beginning of his raigne with forrein warres, hauing firſt to looke with great ſtudy into the ſtate of his owne go- Lowys 12.

uernment at home, which commonly to kinges newly inueſted, bringes many cauſes of new councells & alteracions: But the ſpirits of ſuch as diſcourſed with iudgement vpon the trayne and euent of things, nouriſhed alwayes a ſecret ſuſpicion, that thafflictions that then were but defferred, would with tyme redouble, and riſe growing to greater daungers and more generall harmes, ſpecially ſo great an Empire being falne vpon a king type in age, full of experience, ruled in his councells, reſolut in action, moderat in exſpenſes, and in all things (without compariſon) holding more of him ſelfe, then did his predeceſſor: and to whom withal, did apperteyne (as in the right of the crowne of Fraunce) not onely the inheritance of the realme of Naples, But alſo he menteyned that the Duchie of Myllan was his freehold by the ſucceſſion of the Lady Valentina his grandmother, who was maried by Iohn Galeas Viſconte his father (afore that, of viccare of thEmpire, he had obteyned the title of the Duke of Myllan) to Lovvys Duke of Orleans, brother to kinge Charles the ſixt: At which mariage, there was added to the ſtate of the dowrye (which was the citie & contrey of Aſt with great ſummes of money) an expreſſe condicion, that as often and when ſo euer as the lyne maſculyne of the ſayde Galeas ſhoulde fayle, the Lady Valentina ſhould ſucceede to the Duchie of Myllan, or ſhe being dead, her next heires and diſcendents: which couenant albeit ſtronge enough of it ſelfe, was confirmed (if the frenche tradicions be true) by the authoritie of the Pope (thimperiall ſeate beinge voyd at that tyme, for the Popes of Rome pretend that the adminiſtracion of thEmpire vacant belongeth to them:) by which meanes, the blud male of Iohn Galeas, determining afterwards by the death of Phillipp Maria Viſconte, Charles Duke of Orleans, ſonne to the Lady Valentina, began to pretēd to the ſucceſſion of the ſayd dukedom: But as thambicion of Princes is ready to helpe on their titles with euery apparant coler, ſo there aſpired at the ſame time to the ſayd dukedom, not only thEmprour Federyk, alleaging that it was reuerted to the Empire, for that the lyne nominated in thinueſtiture made to Iohn Galeas by Vinciſlaus king of Romaines, was extinct and diſſolued: But alſo Alphonſo king of Aragon and Naples, who was inſtituted heire by the Teſtament of Duke Phillipp: And amongeſt the reſidue, Frauncis Sforce with a fortune, force, and felicitie, more fauorable then the others, quarrelled the ſame title, who to giue a better ſhadowe to the armies which he leuyed in that cauſe, alleaged that his wife Blanche, the onely daughter (but a baſtard) of Phillipp, had peculiar intereſt in that ſucceſſion: So that Charles Duke of Orleans, who (being taken priſoner at the battell of Agincourt in the warres betwene thengliſh and french, and remeyning reſtrayned in England xxv. yeares) was able to doe nothing, by reaſon of his pouertie and hard fortunes to iuſtifie his title, and much leſſe could he obteyne ayde of king Lovvys the xj. notwithſtanding he was his neareſt kinſman: the reaſon was, that the ſame king, in the beginning of his raigne, was much moleſted and manifeſtly inuaded in diuerſe partes of his kingdom, by the great Lordes and Barons of the ſame, ſhadowing their conſpiracies with a ſhowe of publike profit: But becauſe the king ſaw that their intencions drew with them priuat regardes and particular intereſts, he kept them alwayes in bridle, and eſteemed his eſtate and ſewertie to conſiſt in the embaſing of the great ones of his realme, but chiefly his neareſt competitors: And for that reaſon, Lovvys Duke of Orleans ſonne to Charles, albeit he was his ſonne in law, could draw no fauors or ſuccors from him: the ſame driuing him, after the death of his ſayd father in law, together with his impaciēce that the Lady Anne Ducheſſe of Burbon the kinges ſiſter, was preferred afore him to the gouernment of Charles the eyght then in minoritie, to trouble Fraunce with a very ſlender ſucceſſe,

and after retyred into Britain with a worſe fortune: for ioyning with thoſe that were againſt thintencion of Charles, to obteyne Brittain by marying with Anne heire of the ſtate by the death of Frauncis her father leauing no yſſue male, (yea aſpiring ſecretly to the ſame mariage) he was taken in an encownter betwene the french and the Brittons neare S. Aulbyn in that contrey, & from thence led priſoner into Fraunce, where he remeyned two yeares: In ſo much as fayling then of meanes, and finding no ſuccors in king Charles after he was out of priſon, he ioyned no further action to that enterpriſe, but when the king left him within Aſt, he made him ſelfe Lord of Nouaro with a very litle profit: But being now become king of Fraunce, he held nothing of greater affection, then to reconquer the Duchie of Myllan as a ſucceſſion iuſtely apperteyning to him: This deſire planted in him from his youth, was eftſones wonderfully increaſed and aduaunced, by the ſucceſſe he had at Nouaro, and withall, for that he greatly hated Lodovvyk Sforce by reaſon of the inſolent demonſtracions and behauiors which he vſed to him, when he had the kings deputacion in Aſt: Therfore, not long after the death of king Charles, by reſolucion ſet downe in his elect councel, he intitled him ſelf not only king of Fraunce, and (for the regard of the realme of Naples) king of Ieruſalem & both the Cycillyes, but alſo ſoueraigne Duke of Myllan: And becauſe he would make knowen to the world what was his inclinacion to the things of Italy, he wrote letters full of amitie and congratulacion touching his aſcending to the crowne, to the Pope, the Venetians and the Florentyns, and withall diſpatched mē of ſpeciall credence, to giue hopes of new enterpriſes, but chiefly of his determinacion to conquer the Duchie of Myllan: wherin the tyme running, nouriſhed for him many fauors and oportunities, for that the death of his predeceſſor had innouated in the mindes of the Italians many new humors & inclinacions, much differing from the cogitacions & purpoſes they had afore: for the Pope (whoſe ambicious thoughts could not be ſatisfied if Italy ſtoode in tranquillitie) wiſhed that thinges might grow to hurly burly, ſeeking his peculiar aduauncement in the common diuiſion of principallities and ſtates: A deſire not vnlikely to deriue from ſuch a mind, to whom all thinges were hatefull that held of equitie, conſcience, or religion, and nothing vnſauery that ſmelled of troubles, innouacion, and chaunge: And the Venetians, being now deliuered of the feare they had of king Charles for the wronges & iniuries they had done him, expreſſed manifeſtly that they had no diſtruſt in the new king, which diſpoſicion increaſed dayly more and more: for that Lodovvyk Sforce (notwithſtanding he knew that he had to doe with an ennemy more mighty and leſſe plyable) feding him ſelfe with this hope, (the ſame alſo beguiling Federyk of Aragon) that the frenche kinge coulde not with ſuch expedicion execute any action on that ſide the Mountes, forbare not to oppoſe him ſelfe againſt the Venetians in the quarrell of Pyſa, wherein his ſpyte preſent would not let him ſee the daunger that was to come: an error familiar with Princes ambicious, who meaſuring the euent of things more by their propper fancie and imaginacion, then by any rule or compariſon of tymes and reaſons, are often in that ſecuritie, caried to their vndoing, as men that wander and beleue an eccho which beguiles them to their extreame ruine: The Florentyns onely began to eſtraunge them ſelues in minde from the amitie of the french: for albeit this new king had bene their protector afore, yet now that he is made great with the eſtate & dignitie of the crowne, he had with them no league of amitie, neither in regarde of faith giuen, nor for benefitts receiued, as his predeceſſor had by meane of thoſe capitulacions which were made at Florence and Aſt: for regard of which they would alwayes lay them ſelues open to many perills and perplexities, rather then to abandon his alliance: Beſides, the diſcord which continually increaſed betwene the Venetians and the Duke of Myllan, was the cauſe that the feare being ceaſed which they had of the forces of the confederats, and withal hoping more in the fauors certeine and preſent of Lombardy, then in the ſuccors abſent & dowtfull of Fraunce, they tooke occaſion to hold leſſe reckoning of his frendſhippe or confederacion: In this different diſpoſicion of mindes, were alſo no leſſe diuerſe, thembaſſages that were ſent: for the Senat of Venice diſpatched with great ſpeede to the king, one of their Secretories remeyning at that tyme in negociacion with the Duke of Sauoye: And to eſtabliſh with theſe beginnings, the foundacions of a well aſſured alliance, as the dayly affayres and occurrants of tymes required, they made an election of three other Embaſſadors to goe to his Maieſtie, not onely to congratulat his right worthy aſcending to the crowne, but alſo to proteſt in forme of excuſe, that what they had done contrarye to the likinge of the late kinge Charles, proceeded of no other mocion, then of a tymerous ſuſpicion (confirmed by many apparant ſignes and demonſtracions) that not contented with the kingdom of Naples, he would lift vp his mind to thoſe meanes which might make him Lord ouer the whole Monarchie of Italy: The Pope alſo, whoſe deuocion had this determinacion, ſto appropriat to his ſonne Cæſar at that tyme Cardinall, all temporall greatnes, rayed his thoughtes to highe thinges, and ſending Embaſſadors to the french kinge, was at a poynt to ſell to his Maieſtie ſpirituall graces, receiuing in recompenſe, poſſeſſions temporall: for he was not ignorant that the french kinge had great deſire to refuſe Iane his wife, both barrein & deformed, who was giuen to him almoſt by force by Lovvys the eleuenth: And that he had no leſſe liking to marie Anne now widowe by the death of the late king, not ſo much for the aũcient affection thatwas betwen thẽ afore the encownter of S. Aulbyn, as that by the prorogatiue of that mariage, he ſhoulde inſinuate into the Duchie of Britain, an eſtate great and very conuenient for the crowne of Fraunce: this chaunge could not be done without the authoritie of the Pope: The Florentyns in like ſorte fayled not to ſende Embaſſadors to the king, aſwel to teſtifie thauncient cuſtom and deuocion of that citie to the crowne of Fraunce, as to put his Maieſtie in remembrance of their merits, and the bondes and promiſes of the late king: wherein they were much ſolicited by the Duke of Myllan, hauing two intencions, the one that by their meanes the practiſes of the Venetians might be hindered, (both the one and other common weale intreating of the affayres of Pyſa) and alſo that if they obteyned any credit, amitie, or authoritie, they might vnder ſome occaſion, employ all to worke an accord betwene him and the french king, A thing not a litle deſired and ſought by him: All theſe Embaſſadors were well receiued of the kinge, who began euen at the firſt to ſownde euery one of them ſeuerally, notwithſtanding he had no meaning to put any thinge to action in Italy, afore he had firſt aſſured the realme of Fraunce, by newe leagues and confederacions with the Princes his neighbours and borderers.

The Venetians ſend Embaſſadors to the french king.

The Pope apt to diſpenſe with all things for the greatnes of his ſonne.

But it was a thing fatal, that the fire of Pyſa, to the which the Duke of Myllan gaue the firſt kindling, & nouriſhed by an inflamed deſire to aſſubiect it to him ſelf, ſhould in the ende breake his brande vpon the heade of the author, and conſume him with his propper flame: for that aſwell by his naturall ielowſie which was infinit in him, as for daunger of the greatnes of the Venetians, which he ſaw to aſpire not onely ouer him, but alſo aboue the other Potentats of Italy, he could not endure with reaſonable patience, that the frute of his deuiſes & trauells, ſhould be gathered by them, or transferred to the reputacion of their imperie: wherein, taking occaſion vpon the

diſpoſicion of the Florentyns, reſolute to purſue in all accidents the quarrell of Pyſa, And ſeeming to him that by the death of Sauonarola and Frauncis Valory which were ſtronge parties againſt him, he might now reappoſe more in that citie then he could doe in tymes paſt: he determined to ayde the Florentyns in the recouery of Pyſa with armes, ſeeing neither with his practiſes, authoritie, nor the power and meanes of others, he coulde hetherunto worke no good effect of that plott: he perſwaded him ſelfe vainely, that either afore the french king could execute any action, Pyſa would be reduced by compoſicion or force to the iuriſdiction of Florence, or elſe the Senat of Venice, (guided by that wiſedome which he woulde neuer ſuffer to gouerne him ſelfe) would neuer deſire either for enuie, or other leſſe occaſion, that, (to the common daunger of the whole) the french armies ſhoulde eftſoones returne into Italy, ſeeing it was an vniuerſall trauell to chaſe them out ſo lately.

This indiſcreete reſolucion was furthered by a diſorder which hapned againſt the Florentyns in the contrey of Pyſa: for their people which were at Pontadere, hauing aduertiſement by their eſpyals that a trowpe of ſeuen hundred horſemen, & a thowſand footemen of the Pyſans, were returning home with a great pray of cattell which they had taken in the fieldes of Voltere, yſſued out almoſt all vnder the conduite of the Count of Riuucce & Guillaume of Pazzi, Commiſſioner for the Florentyns, to cut betwene them & home for the recouery of the booty: And encowntring with them in the valley of S. Reale, and as they had almoſt put them to diſorder and recouered the moſt part of the praye, there ioyned to the Pyſans an hundreth and fiftye men at armes ſent out of Pyſa to the ſuccors of their fellowes, who finding the Florentyn armie both weary and diſordered with the trouble of the pillage, and the authoritie of the Count not able to range the horſemen to the feight, they were put all to the chaſe, notwithſtanding the footemen made ſome head and reſiſtance, among whom many paſſed by the ſword, & moſt of their horſemen taken priſoners with the chiefeſt of their leaders: in ſo much as the Count and Commiſſioner for Florence, ſaued them ſelues with great difficultie within S. Reale, where they impoſed one vppon an other (as is the cuſtom in chaunces of aduerſitie) the fault of the diſorder hapned.

This iorney brought no litle affliction to the Florentyns, who to readdreſſe with ſpeede ſo great a daunger, and not able to refurniſh their companies with expedicion, and Counte Riuucce general of their whole armie, hauing loſt his reputacion, for that his regiment was broken, determined to turne to the affayres of Pyſa, the Vitellies who were then in the contrey of Aretze: But afore that contract was perfected, they were conſtrayned to accord to Paulo Vitelli the title, dignitie, and reputacion of Capteine generall of their armie: This ouerthrow conſtrained them eftſoones to demaund ſuccors of the Duke of Myllan, and that with ſo much the more inſtance, by how much ſince the chaſſe, they had beſought the french king, that to put them out of daunger with his forces and with his authoritie, he would ſend three hundred launces into Tuskane, and ratifie the reteyning of the Vitellies according to the contract made in the tyme of the late kinge Charles, prouiding his porcion of their payment, and alſo that he woulde cauſe the Venetians to abſteyne from further vexing them: of all which requeſtes, they reaped but gracious wordes without any effect, for that the king would not bring him ſelfe ſuſpected with the Venetians, nor make any ſturre in Italy afore he put beginning to the warres of Myllan: But in theſe neceſſities and eſtate of thinges, the Duke of Myllan was neither cold nor negligent, who dowting leaſt the Venetians (by the occaſion of this victory) would enter further into the iuriſdiction of Pyſa, then they could be afterwards repulſed but with great difficulty, made knowen to the Florentyns that he had a firme intencion to ſuccor them, but firſt he would eſtabliſh with them, what ſortes and proporcions of prouiſions were neceſſary not onely for his defenſe, but alſo to achieue the enterpriſe of Pyſa, to the which (for that there was no feare of any action in the frenche kinge for that yeare) were turned vniuerſally the eyes of all Italy, being then free from all other troubles: for albeit in the territories of Rome the famulies of Colonne & Vrſin had taken armes, yet their wiſedoms preuayled more in the quarrell, then either their hatreds or their iniuries.

Quarrell betwene the famulies of Colonne and Vrſin.

This was the ſubſtance of the quarrell: The Colonnoys and Sauelles, ſtirred vp belike for thoccupacion which Iacques Counte made of la tour Mathias, had inuaded the places and territories of the Counts: And of the other part, the Vrſins (for the affinitie and coniunction of factions) tooke armes in their fauor: So that many borowes and villages, being vſurped both by the one and other partie, they fought together at laſt with all their forces at the foote of Motitelle in the cõtrey of Tynoly, where, after a long and braue battell, the inflamed paſſion of the parties puſhing them on no leſſe then either regard of glory, or conſideracion of daunger of their eſtates, the Vrſins (whoſe armie conteyned two thowſand footemen & eyght hundred horſemen) were broken and put to the chaſe, their enſeignes loſt, and Charles Vrſin taken priſoner, and of the ſide of the Colonnoys was hurt Anthony Sauelle a Capteine of no ſmall reputacion, who dyed of his wound not many dayes after: After this ſucceſſe of the battell, the Pope, ſeeming that commotions in the contrey ſo neare to Rome, were diſpleaſing to him, made as though he woulde ſolicite an accord, which, whileſt he interteyned in action (not with good meaning and faith, for he was diſguiſed in all his doings) the Vrſins readdreſſed their armie with new ſupplies & planted a campe afore Palombare, A principall towne belonging to the Sauelleis, which the Colonnoys (who after the victory had occupied many places of the Counts) prepared to reskew: But both the parties finding at lengthe the diſſembled behauiors of the Pope, ſometymes giuing courage to the Colonnoys, and eftſoones comforting the Vrſins, and that he did but nouriſh the warre & giue them medicines to weaken them both, to thend he might with more facilitie oppreſſe them when their ſtrengthes were conſumed: they came altogether to a parley (without thinterpoſing of a third) at Tynoly, where, of them ſelues, they eſtabliſhed an accord by the which Charles Vrſin was ſet at liberty, the places taken in the controuerſie reſtored to their proper owners, & the quarrell for the Earledoms of Albe and Tailleconſſe referred to tharbitracion of king Federyk, to whom the Colonnoys were mercenary ſouldiers.

Theſe ſtormes thus reſolued into calmes, and the quarrells that earſt caried apparant ſhowes of blud and murder, being nowe quallified by wiſedom and temperance, there was not diſcerned in any part in Italy any tokens of warre, but about the contrey of Pyſa: wherein, albeit the Duke of Myllan had determined in the beginning not to ſuccor the Florentyns openly, but to miniſter to their wantes with ſecret aydes of money: yet ſuffering his minde to be continually ouer ruled with paſſions of diſdayne and enuy, and not abſteyning from wordes inſolent and full of threats againſt the Venetians, he determined now to declare him ſelfe publikely, and to cut of all regardes and conſideracions of thinges, denying euen then, paſſage to their bands and ſouldiers which marched to Pyſa by the way of Parma and Pontrema, & put them in neceſſitie to paſſe by the Duke of Ferraraes contrey, A way of farre more trauell and greater trouble: he wrought ſo that thEmprour commaunded all thoſe Embaſſadors which were reſident in his Court (except the Spaniſh) to returne home, reuoking

uoking them all within few dayes after except the Embaſſador for the Senat of Venice: he ſent alſo to the ſuccors of the Florentyns three hundred ſhot with crosbow, & contributed to the leuying of three hundred men at armes partly vnder the Lord of Plombyn, and ſome vnder Iohn Paulo Baillon: he lent them at ſundry tymes more then three hundreth thowſand duckats, and laſtly made continuall offers of greater aydes, if their neceſſities ſo required: Beſides all theſe, he made great inſtance to the Pope (the importunities of the Florentyns greatly inducing him) to ayde them in ſome ſort: The Pope knowing how hurtfull & intollerable it would be to the eſtate of the Church, that the Venetians ſhould preuaile to make a foundacion of Pyſa, promiſed to refurniſh them with a hundred men at armes, and the three gallies which were in his pay vnder Capteine Ville Marine, and they to giue impediments to the prouiſions of vittells that ſhould enter Pyſa by ſea: But afterwards (being familiar to him to protract and delay) he deferred with diuerſe excuſes to ſende to them any proporcion, and in the ende refuſed them with open deniall, for that drawing dayly more & more into other deuiſes and thoughtes, he made his reſolucion to reſtrayne him ſelfe onely to the french king, by whoſe meanes he hoped to obteyne no ſmall nor common recompenſes: yea (it is oftentymes the property of men to make eaſie with will and hope, that which in reaſon and wiſedom they know to be hard) he aſcended in weening to the crowne and kingdom of Naples: It was almoſt a thing fatal, that the refuſing of the alliance which the king of Aragon made to the Pope, ſhoulde breede in him the beginning of newe thinges and chaunges: for long before he had wholly determined to ioyne him ſelfe with the french kinge, he had made great inſtance to king Federyk to giue to the Cardinall of Valence (who was reſolued to forſake the habit and profeſſion of the Church vpon the firſt occaſion) his daughter in mariage, with the principallitie of Tarente in dowry wherein he perſwaded him ſelf that if his ſonne whoſe wit was ſutle, and his hart hawty, and rayſed, were once become Lord of ſo large and generall a member of the kingdom of Naples, that then there would be litle difficultie, (hauing the cooler of a daughter deſcending of the king) to take occaſions, what by force and ſtrength, and what by thauthoritie and rightes of the Church, to diſpoyle his father in lawe of the kingdom, both weake in men of warre, and poore in money, and from whome alſo were eſtraunged the affections of moſt of his Barons: This matter was hoatly furthered and fauored by the Duke of Myllan, who debated with kinge Federyk (by his Embaſſador the Marquis Stampe ſent ſpecially to Rome and Naples) how daungerous it would be for him, if the Pope (made fruſtrat of this deſire) went ſuddeinly to ioyne with the french king: And withall he preferred to the kinges remembrance how much it would ſauor of puſillanimitie and indiſcreſſion (ſpecially the matter concerning wholly his ſafetie) to put in conſideracion indignitie onely, and not to haue ſo much rule ouer him ſelfe, as to preferre the protection of his eſtate, afore his proper will: But Federyk fearing that in this ſutteltie of Lodowyk was layd the foundacion of his ruyne, refuſed the plot with continuall obſtinacie, confeſſing that the alyenacion or eſtraunging of the Pope was a degree to put his kingdom in daunger, but he ſtoode aſſured that to giue his daughter with the principallitie of Tarente, to the Cardinall of Valence, were to put his life in daunger, and therefore in two perills he had rather abide the hazarde of that which he might runne into with moſt honor and honeſtie, & which proceeded not of any fault or error of him ſelfe: By this meane, the Pope turning wholly his minde to ioyne with the french, and deſiring that the Venetians woulde doe the like, (whome he was loth to offend) abſteyned altogether to miniſter any fauors or ſuccors to the Florentyns: who receiuing courage by the ready ſuccors of the Duke of Myllan, and for the recommendacion of the vallour of Pavvle Vitelly their newe capteine, forgat nothing that might aduaunce the enterpriſe, notwithſtanding they eſteemed it of very hard action: for that beſides the numbers, experience, and reſolut courage of the Citiſens and contreymen of Pyſa, there was within Pyſa, a ſtrength of the Venetians of foure hundred men at armes, eyght hundred eſtradyots, & more then two thowſand footemen: They were alſo (as occaſion required) ready to refurniſh them with ſtronger ſuccors, for that euen ſuch as at the beginning had no will to conſent to accept the protection of the Pyſans, were nowe no leſſe ready then the reſte to ſupport their quarrell for the regarde of common honor: The contracte made in common by Lodovvyk and the Florentyns, gaue ſuch an increaſe to the armie, that it ſeemed now to cary proporcion ſufficient not onely to recouer all the places within the contrey of Pyſa, but alſo to make a wonderfull induſtrie that the neighbours ſhould forbeare to giue ayde and fauor to the Pyſans, or at leaſt eſchewing the example of the Venetians, not moleſt any more the Florentyns in other places: Lodovvyk hauing afore he determined to proteſt him ſelfe openly, interteyned in common with the Venetians, John Bentyuole with two hundred men at armes, labored him ſo much, that he bownd him with the ſtate of Bolognia, to him ſelfe only: wherin the better to confirme Bentyuole, the Florentyns tooke into their pay, Alexander his ſonne: And to make a more generall reſiſtance againſt the Venetians making inuaſion on the ſide of Romagnia, (who for ſuch a purpoſe had taken into their protection the Lord of Faenza) the Florentyns wonne alſo to their appoyntments & deuocion, together with fifty men at armes, Octauyan de Riare, Lorde of Imola & Furly, who was gouerned according to the direction & will of Katherne Sforce his mother: She followed without any regard, the faction of Lodovvyk and the Florentyns, many occaſions mouing her, but principally for that ſhe was maried to John de medicis, whome the Duke of Myllan (nothing liking of the gouernment popular) labored to make great at Florence, and alſo his brother: Lodovvyk had no ſmall credit with the people of Lucques, whom he ſolicited with all his authoritie and meanes, not to comfort any more the Pyſans with thoſe properties of ſuccors and fauors which they had accuſtomed to miniſter to them: which requeſt albeit they did not obſerue ſo fully as he required, yet they withdrew and abſteyned from many helpes for his regard: There remeyned onely they of Genes and Sienna auncient ennemies to the Florentyns, hauing equall occaſions of controuerſie againſt that ſtate: the one for the intereſt of Montpulcian, and the other by reaſon of the contrey of Lunigiana: Touching the Siennoys, it was a thing much to be feared, leaſt (being made blinde with hate & enuy) they fel not into their auncient error, in giuing to euery one commoditie to trouble and moleſt the Florentyns by the oportunitie of their landes and eſtates, ſuch ſufferance ſometymes not being without their proper domage: And for the Genovvays, albeit by reaſon of auncient iniuries, it greeued them not a litle, that the Venetians ſhould be Maiſters ouer Pyſa, yet (in that citie there is litle care of the cõmon weale) they gaue ſufferance to the Pyſans and veſſells of the Venetians to exerciſe a traffike in their riuers and ſtreames in regard of a priuate gayne which ſome particulars got by it, by the which the Pyſans receiued many great commodities: For theſe reſpects, and alſo by the councell of Lodovvyk ſtill ſoliciting, the Florentyns ſent Embaſſadors to Genes and Sienna, to ſolicit (the rather by his meanes) an accord and finall reſolucion of all their quarrells: But as touching the Genovvays, the practiſe and negociacion was fruſtrat and brought forth no effect, for that they demaunded to be acqui-

ted frankly of Serezana without giuing other recompenſe then a ſimple promiſe to bereaue the Pyſans of all oportunities and commodities of their contreyes, wherein the Florentyns making conference of the qualitie of the demaund, found the loſſe ſo preſent and certeine, in regard of the profit ſo incerteine and litle, that they refuſed to buy ſo dearly their frendſhips.

But whileſt theſe deuiſes occupied the reaſons and mindes of men in diuerſe places, The Florentyn armie, more mighty in horſemen then ſtronge in ſootemen, aduaunced into the field vnder their newe generall: By meanes whereof, as the Pyſans, whoſe eſtradiots ſince the victory of S. Reall had made incurſions at pleaſure ouer the whole contrey, retyred from Pont deſac where they laſt incamped: So Pavvle Vitelli hauing taken Calcinaia, and ſetling his armie there in exſpectacion of a newe ſtrength of footemen, beſtowed one day one part of his ſouldiers in ambuſhe neare to Caſcina, whether the regiment of the Venetians were retyred, who gouerned by Marke Martinenguo were not only without obediēce, but without order, In ſo much as when Pavvle Vitelli gaue the charge to them, he ſlew many of the ſtradiots, wtih John Gradania Capteine ouer men at armes, and tooke priſoner Franque coronell of theſtradiots, with the praye of a hundreth horſes: The ſucceſſe of this encownter much amaſed the companies of the Venetians, and therefore ſuppoſing Caſcina not ſufficient for their ſafety, they retyred to the borow of S. Marke, exſpecting new ſuccors to come from Venice: But Pavvle Vitelli, after he was refurniſhed with his ſtrength of footemen, and making as though he woulde aſſayle Caſcina (which the Pyſans beleued by many apparances) turned his marche, and beguiling the coniectures of his ennemies, paſſed ouer the riuer of Arne, and pitched his campe before the borow of Buti, hauing ſent afore, three hundred footemen to keepe occupied the hills & frontyer places: And hauing drawne thether with the ſtrength and working of a number of Pyonners, thartillerie by the way of the Mounteine not without great difficultie for the troubleſom wayes, he tooke the towne by force the ſecond day after he had braked his artillerie: Pavvle made choyſe of this enterpriſe, for that he iudged that Pyſa, (in the which was an incredible obſtinacie aſwell of thinhabitants as others retyred out of the contrey, in whom by long vſe was great ſufficiencie touching actions of warre) could not be taken by force, the city of it ſelfe being proude in ſtrength of walls and rampiers, and hauing within it many bandes of the men at armes of Venice: he held it an action of better pollicie, to deuiſe rather to languiſh & conſume them, then to execut and enforce them, and ſetling the warre in that parte of the contrey which is on the right hand of the riuer of Arne, he eſteemed it a good councell in warre to lay plots to take the peeces in that quarter, and to commaunde all thoſe places by whoſe helpe and oportunitie, he might giue impediment to the ſuccors that might come to them by land from any forreine contrey: And therfore after the taking of the borow of Buty, hauing rayſed a mount or fort vpon the mountaynes which be aboue S. Iohn de la Vene, he drewe his campe right afore the fort which the Pyſans had made neare to Vicopiſan, drawing thether his artillerie with the ſame difficulties he did before: And taking almoſt in one ſeaſon Valdecalcio & building aboue Vico in a place called Pietro Doloroſo, an other baſtyllion, to keepe that no ſuccors enter there, he held beſeeged the caſtell of Verrucola: In theſe pollicies of this new generall, to thend the Pyſans (dowting that he would not aſſaile Librafratto and Valdeſerclo,) might be leſſe ready to be farre from Pyſa, the Count Rinuccio was incamped with other companies at Valdinievolo: All which notwithſtanding, foure hundred footemen yſſuing out of Pyſa, brake all the regiment of footemen which were necligently beſtowed in the church of S. Michaell to kepe Verrucola beſeeged: But Pavvle Vitelli, after he had got the baſtillion, which yelded vpon condicion to carie their Artillerie to Vicopiſan, encamped affore Vicopiſan, not on that ſide where the Florentyn campe was when he was within to defende it, but he laye towardes S. Iohn de la Vene, to giue impediments to the ſuccours that were to come from Piſa: After the furie of his Artillerie had brought downe to the earth a great quantitie of the walles, the defendants, diſpairing belike of reskewe, rendred the place, their life and goods ſaued: They were perhappes diſcouraged to holde out to thvttermoſt, for that Pavvle when he tooke Buty (to giue terrour to others) cutte of the handes of three Cannonyers Germains which were within the towne, and vſed his victorie with many cruelties: immediatly after the ſucceſſe of Vicopiſan, there followed an other occaſion of happie exployte, for that the bandes which were within Piſa ſuppoſing it woulde be verie eaſie to ſurpriſe the bulwarke of Pietro Doloroſo, they ſent thether affore daye, two hundred light horſemen with many trowpes of footemen, who finding a ſtronger reſiſtaunce then they looked for, loſte more time then the action of their enterpriſe required, in ſo much that whileſt they were giuing the aſſalt, the generall of the Florentyns, diſcouering himſelfe vppon the mountaynes thereabouts, and with part of tharmie diſcending to ſuccour the fort, ſent Vitellettze with the reſidue of the bandes to giue impediment to their retourne: againſt whom as they interteyned skyrmiſhe in the plaine towardes Calcy, the generall fell vpon them on the backes, and putte them to flight, not without the loſſe of many horſemen, and the moſt part of their footebandes.

Embaſſadours of the Florentyns at Venice.

But in this diſcourſe and euent of things, the Florentyns, hauing ſome likely aduertiſments from the Duke of Ferrara and others, that the Venetians were not without a willing inclination to peace, whereunto they woulde be more eaſelie induced, if in the action (as belonged to the dignitie and reſpect of ſo great a common weale) they proceeded with tokens and demonſtracions, as though they negociated not with equalls, but with a ſtate of more greatnes: They ſent as Embaſſadours to Venice to ſound their intencions Guid' Antonio Veſpuccio & Bernard Rucellai, two of the moſt honorable cityſens of their common weale: A matter from the which they had abſteyned till that time, partely for that they woulde not offend the minde of king Charles, but more for that as they knew them ſelues not to be ſtrong enough to oppreſſe the Piſans, ſo they iudged that their peticions woulde be vnprofitable being not accompained neither with reputacion nor forces: but now that they were the ſtronger in the fielde, and that the Duke had publikely declared him ſelfe againſt the Venetians, their hopes were greater then their doutes, to finde ſome conuenient meanes of honorable compoſition. The Embaſſadours were receiued with great office and reuerence, and immediatly brought into councell, the Duke ſitting and the whole reſort of Senatours, in whoſe preſence after they had formed many excuſes for not ſending Embaſſadors to thẽ affore, the ſame being refrained for many regardes proceding of the quallitie of times and ſoundry accidents of their Cytie: they required franckly that they woulde abſteine from the defence and protection of Piſa, a requeſt whoſe moderation putte them in hope not to be denied, ſeeing that both in the common weale of Florence, had bene founde no occaſions of offence or diſpleaſure to them, and alſo according to the rumor and recommendacion that went of the equitie of the Senat of Venice, they hoped they woulde not in this caſe abandon iuſtice, which being the piller and foundation of all other vertues, it was but reaſonable to preferre it affore all other reſpectes. To theſe the Duke made

aunſwere, that as they coulde not charge the Florentyns with any treſpaſſe or iniuries in theſe times, ſo alſo the Senat was not entred into the protection of Piſa for any deſire to offende them, but for that the Florentyns onely, hauing ſupported in Italye the factions of the Frenche, meere and ſimple regardes to the common profitte and ſafetie, had induced all the Potentates of the League to giue faith to the Piſans, to helpe them to defende their libertie: wherein, though ſome others of the reſidue did fall into the errour of forgetfulnes after they had giuen their faith: yet the cuſtom of others ſhould brede no lawe in them, and much leſſe contrary to the vſe of their common weale, would they follow them in a matter ſo vnworthy: Onely if the ſtate of Florence would propound ſome meane, by the which the libertie of the Piſans might be preſerued, they woulde make knowen to all the worlde, that neither for their generall ambycion, nor for their particular or propper profitte, they haue thus long contynued the defenſe of Piſa: vpon this aunſwere, they drew certeine dayes to diſputacion vpon ſome meane which might leaue ſatisfied both the one and other parties, wherein ſome contencion riſing, for that neither the Venetians nor the Florentyn Embaſſadours woulde propounde the meane, they aggreed that the Embaſſadour of Spaine, who incouraged them to thaggreement, ſhoulde interpoſe betwene them: this was the meane he opened, that the Piſans ſhoulde retourne to the deuocion of the Florentyns, not as ſubiectes, but as people recommended, and vnder the ſame capitulations which had bene aggreed vpon at Piſtoia, as a thing indifferent betwene ſeruitude and libertie: But the Venetians aunſwered, that they coulde not acknowledge any part of libertie in a Cytie wherein the fortreſſes and adminiſtracion of the Lawes were in the power of others: by reaſon whereof th'Embaſſadours of Florence interpreting this aunſwere to a denyall of their demaundes, departed from Venice with this coniecture, that the Senate, onles they were compelled by neceſſitie, would not abandon the defenſe of Piſa, whether they ſent ſupplies of ſouldiours continually: beſides, they had in the beginning no great feare of thenterpriſe of the Florentyns, for that deferring the action till the moſt part of the ſpring was paſte, they coulde not long kepe the fielde, the countrey of Piſa, by reaſon of his baſenes and lownes, being much ſubiect to waters: And laſtely hauing of new taken to their paye vnder the Duke of Vrbyn (to whom they gaue the title of gouernour) and vnder certaine other capteines, fiue hundred men at armes, being holpen with all with diuerſe good intelligences: they had determined, (the more eaſely to tourne the Florentyns from offending the Piſans) to begin the warre in an other place, ioyning alſo to their plottes the oportunitie of Peter de Medicis, at whoſe perſwacions they interteyned into their paye Charles Vrſin and Bart. Alviane with two hundred men at armes: They were not alſo without hope, to be able to induce Iohn Bentiuole to cõſent that they might make warre vpon the Florẽtyns on the ſide of Bolognia, for that the Duke of Myllan (ſtirred belike for that in the reteyning which was made of Annyball his ſonne the Venetians were preferred before him, and ioyning to that new offence a recordacion of olde iniuries done againſt him, as he ſayed, when the Duke of Calabria paſſed into Romagnia) had occupied certeine Caſtells which belonged to the Duchie of Myllan, and poſſeſſed by right of dowrie, by Alexander his ſonne: For theſe cauſes albeit he forbare not to vexe him vpon euery occaſion, yet the Caſtells being at laſte reſtored to him againe at the requeſt of the Florentyns, the deuiſe to make warre on that ſide, was broken: Therefore the Venetians labored to diſpoſe them of Sienna to graunt that they might beginne the warre in their Quarters, wherein they grew into hope to preuaile (be-ſides their ordinarie diſpoſition againſt the Florentyns) by a diuiſiō that was in Sienna amongeſt the cityſens: for Pandolphe Petruccio with his witte and ſuttletie, hauing drawen to himſelfe almoſte a ſpeciall authoritie ouer the councells and buſynes of the cytie, Nicholas Borgheſe his father in lawe and the famulie of the Belantis, to whom his greatnes was diſpleaſing, laboured that paſſage might be graunted to the Duke of Vrbyn and the Vrſins, who, with foure hundred men at armes, two thouſand footemen, and foure hundred eſtradyottes, were ſtaied by commiſſion of the Venetians at Fratte in the countrey of Perovvſe: They alleaged alſo that to make truce with the Florentyns according to the ſolicitation of the Duke of Myllan and contynuall inſtaunce of Pandolfe, was no other thing, then to giue them opportunitie and meanes to diſpatch the affaires of Pyſa, which being reſolued, they woulde be ſo much more mighty to bring iniuries and ſubiection vppon them and theirs: And therefore they ought (making their profitte of occaſions, as apperteyned to wiſe men) to be reſolute in this, not to make other accord with them then a peace, which might make thē giue ouer the right they pretended to Montpulcian, a graunt wherevnto they knew the Florentyns woulde neuer agree: And then it woulde follow by neceſſitie, that the demaundes of the Venetians muſt be conſented vnto, with whom hauing obteyned this firſt place of grace, they hoped eaſely to embaſe the authority of Pandolfe, who, hauing made himſelfe authour of the contrarie opinion at the perſwacion of the Duke of Myllan, founde enough to do to menteyne it, for that the hatred which the people bare naturally to the Florentyns coulde do much, and it was not vnlikely that by this feare, it might be brought to paſſe, that they woulde diſclaime the right of Montpulcian: This couetouſnes accompanied with hatred, had more force then the conſideracions alleaged by Pandolfe, either touching the trauells that woulde follow the warre, if it were drawen vpon their countrey, or in regard of the daungers, which with time woulde afflict Tuskane by the greatnes of the Venetians: for iuſtification wherof (ſayth he) we neede not haue recourſe to thex-

Truce betwen the Siennoys & Florentyns.

Mont-

Montpulcian: By this accord Pandolfe, riſing into a ſtomack and greatnes more then before, founde meanes ſoone after to kill his father in lawe, who, with too liberall a diſpoſition of minde, obiected him ſelfe againſt his purpoſes: and ſo by the diſpatch of him, increaſing terror in the reſidue, he confirmed him ſelfe daylie more & more in tyrannie. By this accord, the Venetians, being depriued of the hope they had to diuert or torne by the waye of Sienna, the Florentyns from thenterpriſe of Pyſa, and being not able to obtaine licence of the Peruſins, to manage the warre by their countreys, They determined to vexe them on that ſide to Romagna, hoping with the auncient fauours and factions which Peter de Medicis had there, to aſpire eaſely to thoccupacion of thoſe places which they helde in thappenin: In ſo much, that hauing obteyned paſſage of the little Lorde of Faenze, by the vale of Lamone, with one part of their Regyment which they had in Romagna, with whom Peter and Iulyan de Medicis were ioyned: they occupied the borough of Maradi ſcituat vpon thappenin on that ſide which lookes towardes Romagna, where was made againſt them no reſiſtaunce, for that Dennys of Nalde a man of the ſame vale, interteyned by the Florentyns with three hundred footemen to defende it, together with the ſtrength of the countrey, ledde thether ſo ſmall a force of footemen, that he durſt not abide there: By meanes whereof they incamped afore the Rocke of Chaſtillion built in a place aboue the ſaied borough, which they hoped to carye, though by no other meane, yet by want of many things which they knew to be within it, but ſpecially the lacke of water, and ſo by thopportunitie of that, to haue free waye to paſſe into Mugelle, which is a countrey neere to Florence: But as it is hard to aſſure any thing that dependes vppon the will of an other, and much leſſe can the wiſdome of man warrant all thoſe things which imaginacion and coniecture doe ſuggeſt: So, they founde them ſelues deceyued in the iudgement of thoſe wantes which they ſuppoſed the Rocke did ſuffer, for that the conſtancie and diligence of the Caſtell keeper, ſupplied the ſlender prouiſions of vittelles that were within it, and the liberalitie of heauen auoyded the penurye of water, rayning ſo much in one night as all the veſſells and ceſternes being full, they were deliuered from that paine: And in the meane while, the Count Rinucci with the Lorde of Plombyn & other capteines, being ſtolne vppon the ennemie by the waye of Mugelle, enforced them to the chaſſe, hauing vndertaken this enterpriſe with a greater confidence in their diligence, then with ſufficient ſtrength: Beſides, the Count Caiazze ſent to Cotignole by the Duke of Myllan with three hundred men at armes and a thouſand footemen, together with Fracaſſe interteyned by the ſame Duke, who was within Furly with a hundred men at armes, prepared to charge them vpon the backe: The conſideraciō of theſe daungers, and to auoyde the harmes that threatned, they went and ioyned with the Duke of Vrbyn, then departed from the countrey of Peroūſe, and with other Regiments of the Venetians, who altogether were beſtowed betwene Rauenna and Furly, but with a very ſmall hope of happie enterpriſe, for that, beſides the bandes of the Florentyns, there was in Romagna a ſtrength of fiue hundred men at armes, fiue hūdred crosbow ſhotte, and a thouſand footemen of the Duchie of Myllan, the impediment alſo which Imola and Furly gaue to them, being of great importaunce.

But in this meane while Pavvle Vitelli who, after the taking of Vicopiſan had remeyned there certeine dayes exſpecting prouiſions neceſſarie that were to come, and continuyng in one intencion to cutte of from the Pyſans the commoditie and meanes of ſuccours, was gone to thenterpriſe of Librafatte: And the eaſier to approch that part of the towne which was moſt weake, and to preuent the diſpoſicion of the ennemie to inuade his armie much troubled with artillerie and cariage, he left the waye which diſcendes by the mounteynes to the plaine of Pyſa, and cutting by force of Pionners a new waye through the mounteines, he tooke in his marching the ſame daye, the baſtillion of the Mont Maior, which the Pyſans had built vpon the toppe of the mounteine, and ſo deſcended with great ſewertie into the plaine of Librafatta: where, hauing eaſely the daye after, brought into neceſſitie to yelde the bandes of footemen that had the charge of Potito and the olde caſtell, (two towers aunſwering one an other verie neare Librafatta) he beſtowed in the ſecond tower and in other places, certeine peeces of artilleries to gouerne the towne, which was well manned and garded, conteyning two hundred footemen of the Venetians: from theſe places he battered the wall both on high and belowe, and from the firſt daye had hope to carye it: But after the wall was ſhaken with thartillerie, there fell by chaunce ſo great a parte of it in the night, that the ruinous matter raiſed the rampier which was begonne there aboue foure cubits: In ſo much as Pavvle, aſſaying in vaine three dayes together to mount vp with ladders, beganne to dout much of the ſucceſſe, the rather for that the armie receiued great harmes by a peece of artillerie which came from the towne by a lowe lowpe hoale: But his induſtrie & vertue was aided by the benefitte of Fortune (without whoſe fauour great capteines are oftentimes deceiued in their enterpriſes) for that with a great ſhotte out of the camppe, the peece which bette them was broken, and one of the beſt Cannonyers within the place killed, the boollett paſſing through the towne: which accident ſo amaſed thoſe within the towne, being ſo commaunded by thartillerie of the ſeconde tower, that they durſt not aſſemble to make head: but yelded the fourthe daye, and not long after, the caſtell abyding ſome ſhotte of the cannon, did the like: After the conqueſt of Librafatta, he deuiſed to make certaine baſtillions vppon the hilles thereaboutes, but chiefly he erected one of capacitie to receiue great nombers of men, aboue Santa Maria in Caſtello, called by the name of the mount, where was built the baſtillion of la ventura commaunding the contrey thereaboutes: This and Librafatta being garded, troubled all commodities that might come to Pyſa by the waye of Lucque and Petra ſancta, and brought beſides, generall diſtreſſes to the ſtate of the common cauſe of Pyſa.

The Venetiãs careful to ſuccour the Pyſans.

In this variacion and fortune of things, the Venetians ceaſſed not to ſtudy meanes by the which they might miniſter comfort to Pyſa, ſometimes with immediat ſuccours, and ſometimes by diuerting and drawing awaye the forces of thennemie: Wherein they hoped to preuaile the rather for the differences which hapned betwene the Duke of Myllan and the Marquis of Mantua, entred of newe into the appointments and directions of the Duke: who, becauſe he woulde not take awaye the title of capteine generall ouer all his companies from Galeas de S. Seuerin more great with him by fauour then by vertue: had promiſed to the Marquis to honour him within three monthes with the place of capteine generall in common either with th'Emprour, or with the Pope, or with king Federyk, or with the Florentyns: which being not performed by Lodovvyk at the terme promiſed, Galeas giuing many impediments againſt it, and adding to the wronge, many other difficulties vpon the paymentes of his interteynments: The Marquis determyned to reenter into the paye of the Venetians, who practiſed to ſende him to the ſuccours of Pyſa, with three hundred men at armes: whereof Lodovvyk hauing a liuely doute, and dreading by the propertye of his witte (ſounding the bottom of things) the daungers that might growe by the loſſe of a man of that importaunce, declared him immediatly by the

conſent of Galeas, capteine to th'Emprour and to him: But ſuch is the mutabilitie of men marcenorie, that as their profeſſion is to liue by occaſions & diuiſions of times and Princes, ſo, oftentimes they interprette ſmall faltes to great cauſes of their reuolt and chaunge, holding it no iniuſtice to diſappoint thoſe that breake the firſt promiſe with them, according to the example of this Marquis, who, hauing already bene at Venice, and communicated with the Senat the great confidence he had to enter Pyſa in deſpite of the Florentyne bandes, was reentred into their paye: And receiuing parte of his paye in preſt, he retourned to Mantua, preparing himſelfe to the expedicion, which he had further aduaunced, and put his companies to marche, if the Venetians had vſed the ſame diligence to diſpatche him, which they did to interteine him: But becauſe they beganne to procede ſlowly vppon thoccaſion of a new hope they had, that by certeine auncient fauorers of the Medicis, they ſhoulde be able to obteine Bybiene, a borough in the contrey of Caſentin, they were of opinion that in regard of the difficulties to paſſe to Pyſa, it woulde be more profitable to diuert then to ſuccor: The Marquis taking his aduauntage of theſe delaies, and iuſtely diſpleaſed with the forme of their dealinges, retorned eftſoones to the paye of Lodovvyk with three hundred men at armes and a hundred light horſemen, vnder the honour and title of Capteine to th'Emprour and to him, reteyning the money he had receiued of the Venetians vppon an accompt or reckoning for payes due of olde: The practiſe which was debated with the Venetians, was not without ſuſpicion to the Florentyns, who, beſides their generall meanes of aduertiſement, had certeine dayes before, a particular intelligence from Bolognia: But it often happeneth, that diligent and wiſe councells be vnprofitable when they are executed with negligence and indiſcreſſion: for, the commiſſarie or commiſſioner whom they ſent thether to aſſure them from ſuch a daunger, after he had apprehended ſuch as he douted moſt and bare apparaunt guiltynes of the practiſe, tourning their diſſembled faith into true meaning, and their offence into innocencie, he ſette then eftſoones at libertie, and in other thinges was ſo negligent, that he made the action eaſie to Alviane appointed for the execucion of this practiſe: for, he hauing ſent before certeine horſemen attyred like vittellers, & they marching all night, were at the gate by the point of daye, which they wonne and occupied without difficultie, for that the negligēce of the commiſſarie had not onely left it without garde, but alſo not ſette order that the gate ſhould be opened later then was wont in times nothing daungerous: After theſe firſt troupes, followed with a ready ſpeede & diligence, other bandes of horſemen, who named themſelues by the warres to be of the regyment of the Vitellis: Aſſoone as the gate was poſſeſt by the ſoldiours forreine, the parties to the conſpiracie within the towne, drawing to commotion in their fauour, they embraſed immediatly the whole towne, and were abſolute maiſters of the enterpriſe: At what time they were alſo incouraged with the preſence of Alviano, who arriuing the ſame day, and albeit had but a ſmall proporcion of ſouldiours (his nature being alwayes to follow the aide and benefit of occaſions, yea to preuent them with his incredible diligence) yet he went ſoddeinly to aſſaile Poppi, the principall borough of that vallie, but finding a reſiſtaunce aboue his ſtrength, he deuiſed to occupie the places neareſt to Bybienne, albeit but litle and of no great importaunce: The contrey of Caſentyn, amid the which ronneth the riuer of Arne, is a contrey narrow, barren and full of hills, ſeated at the foote of the Alpes of Appenyn, at that time laden with ſnowes for that the ſpring was but then begonne: Neuertheles it had bene a paſſage verie commodious to goe to Florence, if the enterpriſe of Poppy had ſucceded well to Alviano, and no leſſe conuenient to make entrey into the contreys of Aretze and Valdarno, contreys which for the plentie of great townes and boroughes, were of great importance to theſtate of the Florentyns: who taking occaſion of the preſent perill, not to be negligent, refurniſhed with a ready ſpeede, all places needefull, breaking by that meanes theexecucion of a conſpiracie pretẽded in Aretze: And ſtudying aboue all other things to cutte from the Venetians all meanes of new ſuccours and ſupplies to the contrey of Caſentyn, they called from Pyſa the Count Rinucce, and diſpatched him ſpeedely to occupye the wayes of th'Appenin betwene Valdebagna and the ſtraite of S. Stephen: who, albeit he diſpoſed his Regiment into trowpes and companies as the nature of the place and preſent ſeruice required, yet was both their ſtrength and induſtrie vnprofitable to let the Duke of Vrbyn, Charles Vrſin and other capteines from paſſing, whoſe ſtrength in the ſayed valley being ſeuen hundred men at armes and ſix thowſand footemen with ſome bandes of Lanceknights, cõmaunded all the contrey of Caſſentyn, except a verie few places, and eftſoones gaue a new life to the olde enterpriſe to take Poppy, but their diligence was vnprofitable and the whole action in vaine: By meanes whereof the Florentyns were compelled (according to the proper intencion of the Venetians) to call backe from the affaires of Pyſa Pavvle Vitello with his bandes, leauing ſufficient garde in the places of importance, and alſo in the baſtillion of Laventura: his comming into the contrey Caſentyn, cauſed to retire the Venetiãs, who were remoued to incamppe the ſame day about Pratto Vecchio, and Fracaſſo being ioyned with him (ſent by the Duke of Myllan with fiue hundred men at armes & fiue hundred footemen in fauor of the Florentyns) he brought preſently into harde tearmes and difficulties the ſtate of thennemies, who were diſperſed into diuerſe places, both for thincõmoditie of the contrey, which was ſtraite and narrow, and alſo for that (to thende they might haue free entrey and going out of the contrey Caſentyn) they were compelled to kepe the wayes of Vernia, Chiuſa, and Montalona, places verie high vpon the Alpes: By which meane, being incloſed in that vallye in a ſeaſon verie ſharppe, they were without all exſpectacion of aduauncement either there, or in any other place, the Count Rinucce being within Aretze with two hundred men at armes: And in the contrey Caſentyn, the enterpriſe of Poppy not ſucceding in the beginning, & the name of the Medicis bearing no further power or authoritie, for that the ſpirites and affections of the men of the countrey were againſt them, they had receiued many harmes of the Paiſantes afore the comming of Vitello: In which regard, together with an aſſured intelligence of his comming, and the marching of Fracaſſe, they ſent backe beyond the Alpes, one parte of their cariage and artillerie, & drew them ſelues all together into one ſtrength as the nature of the place woulde ſuffer: Againſt whom, Pavvle Vitelli determined to vſe his coſtume, which was (to carie the victorie with more eaſe and ſewertie) to beare no regard neither to the longnes of time, nor to great paines and trauell, and much leſſe to exſpences, eſteeming it a better office in a generall to proceede with all neceſſarie prouiſions, then, for a deſire of glorie to make the victorie ſpeedy, to putte in perill the yſſue of thinges, and the whole armie in hazarde: In ſo much as (touching the contrey Caſentyn) hiscounſell was, not to attempt ſuddeinly any action vppon the places moſte ſtrong, but in the beginning to make the ennemie abandon the peeces moſt weake, and to choake and cloaſe the wayes of the Alpes and the ſtreytes of the contrey, with baſtillions, gardes, and intrenched wayes, with other fortifications, both to cutte of all ſuccours and ſupplies, and to take from them all meanes of mutuall aides and reskew from one place to an other: hoping that this

ſorme and manner of proceeding woulde in the ende breede occaſions to oppreſſe them further, beſides that the great nombers that were within Bybyenna coulde not but conſume, both by the incommoditie of horſemen and want of vittells: With this councell, hauing recouered certeine places neere to Bybienna, for their qualitie but of ſmall importance, but for their commodities very proper for his intencion (with the which he looked in the ende to preuaile) And wynning euery daye more and more, he ſtripped euery daye many men at armes beſtowed in diuerſe peeces neere to Bybienna: And to cutte of all wayes from the bandes of the Venetians aſſembling beyond the mountes to myniſter reskew to their peoples, he deuiſed to commaunde all the places about the mount la Vernia, & to intrench all the wayes thereaboutes: In ſo much as many difficulties increaſing to the ennemies together with neceſſities and want of vittells, many of them refuſed the camppe, who ſtealing awaye by ſoundry wayes, fell euery day into chaunge of diſtreſſe and fortune, ſometimes vexed with troubleſome paſſages, and ſometimes ſtripped by the paiſantes, & oftentimes ſlaine by the ſoldiours: Theſe were the actions of armes betwene the Venetians and Florentyns.

Meanes of accord.

Now in theſe times, albeit th'Embaſſadors of Florence, were departed from Venice without any hope of accorde, yet was there holden at Ferrara, a new practiſe of compoſicion moued by the Duke of Ferrara at the inſtaunce of the Venetians: Amongeſt whom many of thoſe which held the greateſt authoritie in that Senat, no leſſe weary of the warre drawing with it increaſe of expenſes and difficulties, then now made voyde of all hopes to preuaile further in the contrey of Caſſantyn, deſired to ſhake of the ſtudies and trauells they ſuffred for the defenſe of Piſa, the cares and charges of that warre being greater without compariſon, then the commodities or frutes of the ſeruice, in which regard they were ready to omitte no occaſion which might miniſter any honeſt cooller to be diſcharged of it.

The doings of the frēch king during the warre of Piſa.

But whileſt the regions of Italy were in theſe afflictions for the quarrells of Piſa, the new frenche King forgatte not to make preparacions to execute the conqueſt of Myllan the yeare next following: Wherein he hoped to haue in his fauor and on his ſide the freindſhippe of the Venetians, who, caried with an incredible hate againſt the Duke of Myllan, helde ſtraite negociacion with his maieſtie: No leſſe did ſolicite with the King in no litle ſecrecy & earneſtnes the Pope, who, excluded from the alliance of Federyk and embraſing ſtill the deſire to the kingdom of Naples, was wholly conuerted into the hopes of the Frenche, by whoſe meanes he ſought to obteine for his ſonne the Cardinall of Valence, Charilotta, doughter to Federyk, who was not yet maried, but trained vp in the court of France: Wherein the king nourriſhing him with ſome tokens of hope, for that he ſuppoſed the power ouer her mariage reſted in his maieſtie, the Cardinall (ioyning with the intencion of his father) entred one morning into the conſiſtorie, and with an action in ſpeeche and geſture farre from the office and modeſtie of his profeſſion, beſought his father and the whole colleadge of Cardinalls, that ſeeing he entred not into prieſthood of his proper will and diſpoſicion, that they woulde make it lawfull to him, to leaue the dignitie and the habitte, to follow the exerciſe whereunto his deſtinie and inclinacion drew him: This requeſt being made eaſie in the Cardinalls by purchaſſe and corrupcions, was not denied of his father, whoſe authoritie going with the infected partialities of the Cardinalls, made his demaunde lawfull, and ratified it: And ſo reſuming the habite of a perſonne ſeculer, he prepared ſpeedely to go into Fraunce, by whom the Pope ſent this comfort and promiſe to the King, to make it lawfull by thauthoritie apoſtolike to refuſe his wyfe: And the king, for his part, became bound to ayde him (aſſoone as he had conquered the Duchie of Myllan) to reduce into thobedience of the holy ſea, all the townes poſſeſſed by the Viccairs of Romagna, and withall, to giue him preſently thirtie thouſand duckattes vnder this cooller that he was conſtrained to interteine a greater force for the gard of his perſon: as though to knit himſelfe with the French king were to ſtirre vp many of the Potentates in Italie to ſeeke to hurt and oppreſſe him: For the execution of theſe couenantes, both the king began to make payment of the money and the Pope committed the action of the diuorce to the biſhop of Setto his Nuncio, and to tharchbiſhops of Parys and Roan: And albeit in the trauerſe of the cauſe, the kinges wyfe impugned the iudgement: yet in the ende, holding for no leſſe ſuſpected the conſciences of the Iudges, then the might and greatnes of her aduerſarie, ſhe tooke comfort in her innocencie and diſclaimed her ſuite, receiuing for thinterteinment of her perſon, the Duchie of Berry, with thirtie thouſande Frankes of Reuenue: And ſo the diuorce confirmed by ſentence of the Iudges, there reſted nothing els exſpected, for the diſpenſing and and accompliſhing of the new mariage, but the comming of Ceſar Vorgia, lately of a Cardinall and Archbiſhop of Valence, become a ſoldiour and Duke of Valentinoys: the king hauing giuen him a companie of a hundred Launces and twentie thouſand Frankes penſion: and for his title of dukedome, he indued him with Valence a Citie of Danphyne, with twentie thouſand Frankes of Reuenue: he embarqued at Oſtia vppon the Gallyes which the king ſent him, and arryued about the end of the ſame yeare at the french Court, where he entred with a pomp and pride incredible, and brought with him the Cardinalles hatt for George Amboiſe Archbiſhop of Roan, Who, hauing alwayes affore, participated in the daungers and fortunes of the king, helde with him great authoritie, grace, and reputation. This new Duke albeit he was receiued of the king with great honour and all other offices of court, yet his manner of dealing was not well lyked in the beginning, for that, according to the direction and councell of his father, he denied that he had brought with him the bull of diſpenſacion, hoping that the deſire to obteine it, would make the king more eaſie to aſſiſt his plottes and purpoſes, then would do the remembrance that he had receiued it, vſing this reaſon, that there is nothing endureth ſo ſmall a tyme as the memorie of benefittes receiued, & the more great they bee, the more commonly are they recompenced with ingratitude: But the biſhop of Setto reueiling the truth ſecretly to the king, who making it ſufficient to godwarde, that the bull was diſpatched and ratified, conſommated the mariage openly with his new wyfe, without making more demaundes for the bull: the ſame being the cauſe that the Duke could no longer keepe from him the bull Authentyke and iuſtefied: And finding out after by ſuttle inquirie that the biſhop of Setto had reuealed the matter, he cauſed him ſoone after by ſecret meanes to dye of poyſon, the vnfortunate biſhop not remembring that in matters of eſtate betweene princes he that diſcloſeth his ſecret to another worketh to himſelf the occaſion of his death. The king being now in ſome ſtabilitie of minde by his new mariage, began to be carefull to renue leagues & amities with his neighbours, making preſentlie a firme peace with the king of Spaine, who, bearing now no more regarde to the thinges of Italie, called home all his Embaſſadours remayning there, except him that laye reſident with the Pope, and readiourned Conſaluo into Spaine with all his regiment, leauing to Federick all thoſe peeces in Calabria which he had holden till that day: he had a great deale more trouble to accorde with the king of Romains, who was newly diſcended into Burgongny by occaſion of ſome commotions mocions ſtirring there, being for that expediciō, ayded with a round ſumme of money by the Duke of Myllan, in whom preuayled muche this kinde of perſuacion, that eyther the warre which hee ſhould make vppon the french king, would turne him from thenterpriſe of Italy, or at leaſt, if any agreement ſucceeded betweene them, he ſhould be comprehēded in it as the king of Romains had aſſuredly promiſed him: But at laſt, after much diſcourſe of reaſonings and meetings, the king made a new peace with Tharchduke, by the which were to bee rendered vnto him the places of the countrey of Artoys, a thing which to thende it might bring effect and profit to his ſonne, the king of Romains conſented to make truce with him for many monethes, without making mencion of the Duke of Myllan, againſt whom he ſeemed at that tyme much diſcontented, for that he had not alwayes ſatisfied his infinit demaunds of money: Laſtly, the french king, ratifiyng the peace made with the king of Englande by his predeceſſor, reiected all ſolicitacions and ſuites made to him to receiue the Duke of Myllan to any compoſicion, who for his part albeit he proteſted large offers & offices, & vſed no leſſe corrupcions to induce him, yet all his induſtries and practiſes were vaine in the kings ſight, who to lay a more ſure foūdaciō of the warre pretended, ſought how he might at one time, tie to him in ſuertie of amitie the Venetians & Florentyns, and therefore he required with great importunities that ceaſſing to vexe the Piſans, the Venetians would put Piſa into his hands: wherunto the rather to draw the Florentyns to conſent, he offred ſecretly to reſtore it to thē within a ſhort tyme: This practiſe being founde full of many difficulties, and concurring in it diuers endes and intreſtes, was for many monethes debated with delayes: for that the Florentyns (holding it neceſſarie that in that caſe they ſhould make aliance with the french king, and fearing by the remembrance of thinfidelitie of Charles, the preſent buſines ſhould ſuffer no leſſe breach of promyſe in the king raigning) coulde not agree amongſt themſelues, nor conſent in vnitie of opinion and councell: wherein one reaſon of their diſagreement was, that their citie was vnquietly toſſed betweene thambicion of ſome of the greateſt Rulers, and the vnbridled libertie of the gouernment popular, and being reappoſed (by reaſon of the warre of Piſa) vppon the Duke of Myllan, the whole citie was ſalne into ſuch generall diuiſion, that it was harde to deliberat in peace and quiet vppon matters of importance, ſome of the principall citizens deſiring the victorie to the french king, and others of the contrary, bearing their whole affections to the Duke of Myllan: The Venetians alſo, notwithſtanding all other difficulties had bene ouercome which might hinder the accorde, had yet determined not to conſent to put Piſa into a third hande, hoping that for the regarde of the repayment of their charges, and to leaue Piſa with leſſe diſhonor, they ſhould obteine better condicions in the negociacion that was holden at Ferrara, which was vehemently ſolicited by Lodouvyk, both for feare leaſt the deputacion of Piſa falling to the french, both thoſe common weales would knit with the king: and alſo hoping that the cōtrouerſie being accorded for the profit of Italy, the Venetians would ſhake of & leaue there the malice they had to hurt him: which reſpects & cōſideraciō together with the practiſe that continued at Ferrara, diſpleaſed not a litle the french king: lyke as alſo the Pope, to make his profit of the trauels of others, ſought indirectly to hinder it, For that ſtanding in great place of credit & fauour with the king ſo far as concerned the affaires of Italy, he hoped that making Piſa to diuolue by deputacion to the king, hee ſhould in ſome ſort participate with a plentifull ſhare.

The oration of Anthonie Grymany. It is (my Lords) in the diſpoſiciõ of men, a cuſtome vile & odious, to forget what " they haue receiued of their frendes euen whẽ they were at point to fal into their full
" ruine & deſolaciõ: But it is an vnthãkfulnes too intollerable & euẽ ſlaũderous to na-

" merits & good wills of men, with cõſpiracies & harmes ſtretching to the ſpoiles of

" ing with it a deſire of reuenge, I can not thinke that it is any iniuſtice to be reuẽged
" of him that hath don the firſt wrõg: if therfore (my Lords) you wel cõſider the great-
" nes of the good turnes which the Duke of Myllã hath receiued of our cõmon weale,
" by the which in theſe latter yeares, his whole eſtate hath receiued his whole protec" tion and preſeruacion: and of the contrary, looke thorowly into the parts of his in-

" ger, to preſerue the dignitie, reputacion, and honour of the name of the Venetians:
" and not without reaſon: for that the deliberacions of common weales require not " regardes and endes abiect and priuat, and muche leſſe that all their councelles remembrance of iniuries receiued, nor no readines ſhowed to be reuenged: An action not a litle neceſſary, not ſo much for the ſweetnes and pleaſure in the reuenge, as for that the iuſtice and puniſhment of the offendor, breedes ſuche example to others, that they will haue leſſe courage to attempt the lyke: of ſuche conſequence is that glorie which is founde to bee ioyned with vtilitie, high and honorable deliberacions alwayes declaring themſelues full of commodities and profits: Thus one diſpleaſure takes away from men many other, and oftentymes, by one only & ſhort puniſhment they are founde to bee deliuered from many and very long paynes: And yet if wee conſider the ſtate of thaffaires of Italy, and the diſpoſicion of many great Princes againſt vs, together with thambuſhes which Lodovvyk Sforce dreſſeth continually agaynſt vs, wee may knowe, that wee are ledde to this deliberation, no leſſe by the neceſſitie preſent, then in conſideration of other things: for, Lodovvyk puſhed on by his naturall ambicion equall with the hate he beares to this moſt excellent Senat, hath nothing in more great care or ſtudy, then to diſpoſe the myndes of all the Potentates in Italy againſt vs, to ſet the king of Romains in diſcontentment with vs, to make vs hatefull to the whole nation of the Iermains, and laſtly, he begins for the ſame effect to interteyne intelligence and practiſe with the Turke: you ſee already with what difficulties (by his meanes & working) yea almoſt without hope, wee ſuſteine the defence of Piſa, and manage the warre in Caſentyn: which if it bee continued, it can not bee without heaping greater effectes of daungers and diſorders: And if it be abandoned without laying other foundation to our affaires, it can not bee but with ſo great a diminucion of reputacion, that it miniſtreth a wonderfull courage to who ſo euer hereafter ſhall haue diſpoſicion to oppreſſe vs: and it can not bee vnknowen to all your wiſdomes, that it is more eaſie to oppreſſe him that beginnes to declyne, then him that ſtandes hable to iuſtefie himſelfe in the full of his reputacion: of which thinges the effectes would clearely appeare to vs, and wee ſhould alſo ſee our eſtate full of tumult and brutes of warre, if Lodovvyk were not kept in ſuſpence by the feare he hath, leaſt we ioyne with the french: A feare which long tyme is not hable to conteyne him: for who knoweth not that the king, made fruſtrat of the hope which he hath that we wil ioyne with him, will eyther attempt ſome other enterpriſe beyõd the mountes, or at leaſt, ouercome with the perſwacions & offers of Lodovvyk, by the meanes of his corruptions & fauours he hath in the french court, wil fall to ſome accord with him: So that in the conſideratiõ and compariſon of thinges, neceſſitie to mainteyne our auncient dignitie and glory conſtraines vs to knit with the french king, but much more are we compelled by the aſpecte of the great and imminent daungers, which can not bee auoyded by other meanes: wherein it ſeemes that fortune followeth vs with a ſpeciall fauour, ſeeing ſhe bringes to paſſe that wee are ſought to by ſo great a king, whom it is a iuſt office in vs to ſeeke and beſeech with humilitie, beſides that hee offreth vs ſo great and honourable recompenſes of the victorie, as by thoſe helpes and meanes this Senat may faſhion great hopes, and employe their conceyptes in the plott and compaſſing of great thinges, ſpecially the victorie being to bee gayned with ſo great facilitie, and Lodovvyk ſo farre too weake to reſiſt two powers ſo mightie and well vnited: it is a vaine feare in my opinion to doubt that the neighbourhed of the french king when he ſhall haue conquered the Duchie of Millan, wilbe eyther ſuſpicious or daungerous to vs: for that in iudgement and forecaſt it may bee ſeene, that many thinges which ſeeme nowe contrarie, will then bee chaunged into fauours and good diſpoſicion towardes vs, ſeeing that ſuche an increaſe proſperitie,

proſperitie, glory, and reputation: for theſe reaſons (my Lordes) I wiſhe vs to accept the confederation againſt the Duke of Myllan, for that it putts vs in ſuertie for the preſent, protectes vs againſt all daungers to come, breedes our credit with all other Potentates, and offreth vs the poſſeſſion of thoſe great thinges, which an other tyme we would be glad to get with intollerable expenſes and trauels, aſwell for their proper importance, as for that they be lynes to leade vs to high and honorable actions, drawing with them a marueilous augmentation of the glory and empire of this floriſhing common weale.

This councell and fourme of reaſoning made no ſmall impreſſion in the myndes of the others, who hard his reaſons with iudgement, & fauoured his opiniõ, recommending much the lyuely valour of his ſpirit accompanied with a reſolute loue to his countrey: Againſt him ſtood vp and reaſoned Melchior Treuiſan ſingular for his wiſdom, and excellent in all graces and giftes of the mynde.

The counſell of Melchior Treuiſan

This hath bene alwayes (touching offences and wronges) a wiſe obſeruation in countreys and common weales well gouerned, to make true conference betweene the nature and eſtate of the iniuries, and the oportunities to reuenge: not that thoſe wiſe men beheld altogether the propertie and manner of the wronges (for that belonges to paſſion) but withall they vſed to foreſee whether the hurt in reuenging would not exceed the harmes already hapned by the treſpaſſe committed, a forme of dealing which caried not their affections affore their wiſdomes, but bridling the readines of nature, they oftentymes found more ſecuritie to diſſemble an iniurie thẽ to reuenge it: And albeit it can not bee denied that the iniuries done by Lodouvyk Sforce to our common weale, are not many and great, and offende much our dignitie: yet, by how much they are great, and by their propertie offende our reputation, by ſo much more belonges it to our wiſdom to moderate our iuſt anger with maturitie of iudgement & cõſideration of the publyke intereſt & benefit: for that, for men to commaund ouer themſelues and vanquiſhe their proper paſſions, is ſo much the more cõmendable, by how much leſſe often it hapneth in vſe, & by how much more iuſt are the occaſiõs that kyndle that anger or any other humain affectiõ: And therfore (my Lords) it apparteineth to this Senat to the which is aſcribed of al other nations the true partes of wiſdõ & diſcreſſion, & who not lõg ſince made profeſſion to haue deliuered Italy frõ the frẽch: it is our office I ſay to cõſider wel not only of thinfamy that wil riſe, if now through our occaſiõ they prepare their returne, but alſo to loke carefully into the daũgers that may threatẽ vs if the duchie of Myllã fal into the power of the french King: perils, which if we can not conſider of our ſelues, let vs call to memory what feares were brought vppon vs by the conqueſt which the late King Charles made of Naples, of whom we held not our ſelues aſſured, but when wee conſpired againſt him almoſt with all princes Chriſtians: But in true compariſon there is great difference betweene the one daunger and the other: for, the late king, naked almoſt of all the vertues of a King, was a Prince more in ſhadowe and ſhowe then in body and ſubſtance: and as the kingdome of Naples, ſo farre remoued from Fraunce, helde his forces ſo deuided, that they weakened more then ſtrengthned his power, ſo that conqueſt, (for the feare of their eſtates ſo neare neighbours to the realme of Naples) procured him two great enemies the Pope & the King of Spaine, in whom touching the one are occupied for the preſent many diuers intencions, and the other made weary with the things of Italy, will make himſelfe no partie without very great neceſſitie: But the new King both for his proper vertue is to be feared, and for his wiſe proceeding in this action to be doubted: as alſo the eſtate of Myllan

" bordreth ſo neare Fraunce, that in reſpect of commoditie to ſuccour or reſkew it,
" there is no hope to dryue him backe, but by ſetting all the world in a ſtir: In ſo much,

on be ſtronger in Italie, when of our ſelues we are chiefeſt and moſt abſolute there, or when there is in the hart of the ſame region a prince ſo mightie and ſo neare our neighbour: we haue occupied at other tymes with Lodovvyk, both diſagreementes and frendſhips, as eftſoones may happen dayly betweene him and vs, neyther is the difficultie of Piſa ſuch but there may bee applied ſome remedie, and much leſſe doth it deſerue that for it we make vs ſubiect to ſo great daungers: But hauing the french to our neighbours, we ſhalbe alwayes trauelled in diſcordes, for that occaſions will daily aryſe in the diuerſitie of our owne myndes, in the haughtie pride of the french nation, in the hatred wherein princes do alwayes purſue common weales, and in the ambicion which the moſt mightie haue to oppreſſe the moſt feeble and weake: for which regarde, not only the reſpect of Cremona, can not allure me, but it doeth euen aſtoniſh me, for that in it is aggrauated the occaſion to the french king to vexe vs, which wilbe ſo much the more ſet forward by thoſe of Myllan, by how much leſſe they can ſuffer Cremona to be diſmembred from the Duchie: And the ſame occaſion will alſo ſtirre vp the Iermain nation and the king of Romaines, for that Cremona and Guiaradadda be alſo members of the iuriſdiction of the empire: At the leaſt our ambicion would not be ſo much blamed, and we ſhould not ſearch with new conqueſts to get vs euery daye new enemies, and to make vs ſuſpected to euery one. By reaſon whereof it muſt needes come to paſſe in the ende, that either we muſt be ſouereigne and maiſters ouer all, or ſkourged and beaten of all, & which of theſe two is ſooneſt to happen, it is eaſie to conſider by ſuch as take not pleaſure to beguile themſelues: The wiſdome and grauitie of this Senat by how muche it is knowne and publiſhed throughout Italy and all the world, by ſo much more would the action be infamous and ſlaunderous to defile our doings with a deliberation ſo raſhe and daungerous: ſeeing, to be caried with paſſion againſt our proper profit, is nothing els but lightnes, and to eſteeme more daungers that be litle then ſuch as be great, can not but holde of folly and indiſcreſſion: which two things being directly contrary to the wiſdome and grauitie of this Senat, I hope you will ſet downe a reſolucion ſo moderat & well aduiſed, as both your reputation ſhalbe preſerued, and your cuſtome not broken.

This councell, albeit was ſuſteyned with ſo many mightie reaſons, and fauored of many of the principall and moſt wiſe of the Senat, was not for all that of ſuch force, but that the contrary aduiſe caried the reſolucion, aſwell for reſpect of hatred, as for deſire to beare rule, two things which leade men eaſilie to daungerous deliberations: for, in the hatred which euery one had conceiued againſt Lodovvyk, was neyther meaſure nor limit, and no leſſe was the deſire to adioyne to the iuriſdiction of Venice the citie of Cremona with all the countrey about it, and all Guiaradadda: an enlardgement of no ſmall value, for that it yelded yearely a reuenue of a hundred thouſand Duckatts: but more to be eſteemed for his oportunitie, for that embraſing by this encreaſement almoſt all the riuer of Oglia, they ſtretched out their lymits euen to Pavv: they amplified alſo their iuriſdiction along the ryuer of Adda, and approching within fifteene myles of the citie of Myllan, and ſomewhat nearer the cities of Plaiſance and Parma, it ſeemed in their coniectures that they had the way opened to occupie all the Duchie of Myllan, as often as the French King was either caried with new thoughts, or troubled with great impediments on the other ſide the Mountes: which they hoped woulde happen within ſhort tyme, both for the nature of the Frenchmen who are more apt to get then hable to keepe: & alſo for that their common weale is perpetuall, where, in the kingdome of Fraunce, it often hapneth by the death of kinges, that thinges diuolue to alteration, and gouernments and counſelles chaunge. They brought alſo into conſideration the difficulties of the french to continue the amities and goodwills of their ſubiectes no leſſe for the generall diuerſitie of blud, then for the difference of the french manners from the cuſtomes of Thitalians: So that that ſentence eftſones cõfirmed by the voices of the greateſt nũber, they ſent to their Embaſſadors reſident with the King to conclude the confederation vppon the offers they made, not ſpeaking in any reſpect of the affaires of Piſa.

This exception of Piſa did not a litle trouble the King, for that he hoped by thoportunitie of that deputacion, to vnite the Venetians and Florentyns with him: And knowing that the Venetians were inclined to withdrawe themſelues by compoſition from the defence of Piſa, he helde it but reaſonable, that in that action they ſhoulde rather haue regard to him to make eaſie thenterpriſe of Myllan as a thing nouriſhing common benefit, to them both: then that hauing better conditions in the compoſicion, to be the cauſers that the Florentyns ſhould remayne ioyned with Lodovvyk Sforce, by whoſe meane the king knowing that the Negociacion continued at Ferrara, was in no litle doubt, that he ſhould not haue on his ſide eyther the Florentyns or the Venetians, if Lodovvyk had power to bring the conference of Ferrara to a good concluſion. And ſo the king wauering in many varieties and fancies of mynde, and iudging that to be a reſolucion both vaine & ill aduiſed, which ſhould leaue in neutralitie and doubt both the one and other common weale, and laſtly being moued not a litle with the diſtruſt which they expreſſed to haue againſt him: he began to incline rather to conclude the peace which continually was ſolicited with the king of Romains, bearing this condicion, that it ſhould be lawful to the one to make warre vppon Lodovvyk Sforce, and to the other to vexe the Venetians: In which diſpoſition of mynd, he made aunſwere by the deputies which debated in his name with Thembaſſadors of Venice, that he refuſed to accord with them, if for their parts, they gaue not perfection to the deputation of Piſa, wherein he had ſolicited them before: And in his owne perſon he aſſured the Florentine Embaſſadors that he would neuer make other agreement with the Venetians: But the Duke Valentinois and the Agents of the Pope with the Cardinall of S. P. ad vincla, Tryvulce, and the other Italians, to whom apperteyned many particular reſpectes and intreſts touching this warre, would not ſuffer him to remayne conſtant in that deuiſe: They perſwaded him with many and great reaſons, that waighing with the power of the Venetians, the oportunities they had to annoy the Duke of Myllan, his maieſtie coulde not followe a councell more hurtfull then to ſuffer himſelf to be depriued of their ayde and ſuccors, for feare to leeſe the fauor of the Florentyns, from whom, by reaſon of their owne troubles, and that they were far remoued from the Duchie of Myllan, could bee drawne no great profit or commoditie to his purpoſes: Beſides, in that action, the occaſion would be made eaſie to Lodovvyk, not only to forſake the fauors of the Florentyns, but alſo in reconciling himſelfe to the Venetians (a matter which had bene the very ſpring and originall of all the diſagreements betweene him and that ſtate) to be eftſoones reunited with them: by which alteration if there were no other meane to diſcerne what difficulties and impediments might enſue to thaffaires of his maieſtie, at the leaſt, the experience of thinges paſte giues ſufficient warning of it: for that albeit in the league that was made againſt king Charles, the names of ſo many kinges were concurrant, yet the only forces of the Venetians and Lodovvyk, tooke from him Nouare, and alwayes defended the Duchie of Myllan againſt him: They tolde him that it was a councell daungerous and deceiptful, to make a foundation vppon the vnitie with Maximilyan: In whom the world had ſeene euen till that day farre greater attemptes temptes and diſpoſicions to enterpriſes, then were his meanes and wiſdom to coollour them : But if his actions brought foorth more happie ſucceſſe then in tymes paſt, it ought to be well conſidered, how euill would agree with thintencions of the king, the augmentaciō of ſo great & perpetual an enemie to the Crowne of Fraunce: with theſe reaſons they ſo altered thinclination of the king, & chaunged his former councels, that, without ſpeaking further of Piſa, he conſented and concluded the cōfederation with the Venetians, wherein was agreed, that at the ſelfe ſame tyme that his maieſtie with a mightie armie ſhould aſſaile the Duchie of Myllan, they for their partes, ſhould doe the lyke vppon their frontyers : That the king hauing conquered the reſidue of the Duchie, Cremona with all Guiaradadda ſhould be for the Venetians except foure furlonges along the Ryuer of Adda : Laſtly, that after the king had cōquered the Duchie of Myllan, the Venetians were bound to defende it for a certeyne tyme and with a certeyne proporcion of horſemen and footmen, the king promyſing to do the like office for Cremona, & al the reſt that they poſſeſt in Lumbardy euen vnto the marſhes of Venice: This confederatiō was ſo ſecretly contracted, that Lodovvyk for many monethes could not vnderſtād, whether they had made betwene thē a league only for their common defence as from the beginning had bene publiſhed both in the french court and at Venice, or whether there was any article that touched him, or made mention to manage warre againſt him: Such were the reſpectes to keepe the couenantes of this league ſecret, that the Pope himſelfe notwithſtanding his ſtraite familiaritie with the king, could haue no certeyne aduertiſement of them, but very late.

Conclusion of the league betvveene the french king and the ſtate of Venice.

The league thus cōcluded with the Venetians, the king (without ſpeaking further of Piſa) propounded to the Florentyns condicions much differing from the former: By which occaſion, accompanied with the diſpleaſures which the Venetians did to them, they were eftſoones and further conſtrained to make their ſtaie vppon the Duke of Myllan, by whoſe aydes as their affaires continually proſpered in the countrey of Caſentyn, ſo the enemies receiuing many hurts by the ſoldiours and Paiſants and ſuffring want of vittels and forrage for their horſes of ſeruice, were retyred within Bybiena and other ſmall places, forgetting a neceſſary diligence to commaund the ſtraites of thappenyn, to thende the way of their ſuccours might be kept open, and the meane more aſſured (vppon the firſt neceſſitie,) to abandon the countrey of Caſentyn with leſſe domage : By reaſon whereof Charles Vrſin was beſtowed with his men at armes, and a hundred footemen, for the garde of the ſtraite of Montalona, and a litle more belowe, Aluiana defended the paſſage of La Vernia: But on the other ſide, Pavvle Vitelly proceeding diſcreetly and ſubſtancially according to his cuſtome, after he had ſo reſtrained them into ſtraites and hard termes, laboured to compel them to abandon the countrey of Montalona with intencion afterwardes to dryue ſuch as kept the paſſage of La Vernia to do the lyke, to thende that the regiment of the Venetians being wholly penned in Bybienna, and enuironed on all ſides with enemies and hilles, they might eyther bee the eaſelier vanquiſhed, or at leaſt, bee driuen to conſume themſelues: ſeeing their numbers were already much diminiſhed, for that beſides thoſe that were ſtripped here and there, there were departed from the army at ſundry tymes, both for want of vittels, and ill ſuertie of their lodgings, more then fifteene hundred horſemen with many troupes of footmen, who, being ſet vpon in the paſſage of the Alpes by the Paiſantes, receiued great harmes: In the ende the conſideration of theſe difficulties conſtrained Charles Vrſin with his regiment to abandon the ſtraite of Montalona, not without daunger to be put to the chaſſe, for that many of the Florentyn bandes (to whom his diſtreſſes were knowen) and companies of Paiſantes embraſing the preſent occaſion, ſet vppon them on the way: yet the Vrſins, hauing already taken the aduantage of the ſtraite, albeit, they loſt a great part of their baggage, performed notwithſtanding ſuch defence, that the companies that followed the chaſe in diſorder, taſted of their valour: The example of Charles Vrſin (in regarde of the ſame difficulties) was followed by thoſe of La Vernia and Chiuſa, who forſaking that paſſage, were retired to Bybienna, wherein were incloſed the Duke of Vrbyn, Aluyano, Aſtor Bayllon, P. Marcell ſuperintendent to the Venetian companies, and Iulyan de Medicis, who were reſerued for the garde of that place (their only fortreſſe in the countrey Caſentyn) with a ſtrength of threeſcore horſſes and ſeuen hundred footemen: In which diſtreſſe they were noriſhed with no other comfort then a hope in the ſuccours which the Venetians prepared, iudging that for the regard of honour, but much more to haue better condicions by agreement, it imported them much not to abandon wholly the enterpriſe of the countrey of Caſentyn: And as for that cauſe, the Count Petillane muſtred at Rauenna with great diligence the bandes appoynted for that reskew: whereunto he was ſolicited by the perpetuall complaintes of the Count of Vrbyn and the reſt, who ſignifiyng that their miſerie & want of vittels had brought them to ſuche eſtate of neceſſitie, that without ſpeedy ſuccour they ſhould be conſtrained to offer compoſicion with the enemy: euen ſo, of the contrary, the Duke of Myllan and the Captaines that were in the countrey of Caſſentyn, noriſhed a ſpeciall deſire to preuent that ſuccour by thexpugnation of Bybienna, demaũding for that end to be ſent foure thouſand footmen to ioyne with the ſtrength of the Campp: But their deſire founde many impedimentes, both for that in that countrey colde and ful of hilles, the nature of the tyme hindred much all actions and exerciſe of warre, and alſo there was no franke readines in the Florentyns to furniſh ſuch prouiſion, partly being ouerwearied with the long and intollerable expenſes growing dayly to increaſe and renouacion: And partly for that in the citie (not in great ſtabilitie and quiet) was diſcloſed a new diſſencion, ſome of the citizens fauouring Pavvle Vitelly for his late merits in the warre, and others deſiring to raiſe the Count Rinucce for that hee had bene an auncient and faythfull Capteyne to their common weale, and had parentage of great authoritie within Florence: hee loſt the hope to manage the firſt place or dignitie in their ſeruice, by his miſſortune at. S. Reall, and very vnwillingly did he endure to haue that degree of reputacion transferred to Pavvle Vitelly: And therefore leading his regiment in the countrey Caſſentyn, he expreſſed no diſpoſicion nor readines to aduaũce thenterpriſes, by the which might grow increaſe of reputacion to him whom he had deſire to embaſe: Theſe difficulties alſo became the greater by the natural propertie of Pavvle, who ſeeking to haue his payes before the tyme, could not agree with the Florentyne Commiſſioners, and who oftentimes in the deliberation and expedicion of affaires, poſſeſſed himſelf of more authoritie then ſeemed reaſonable, and had euen at that tyme without the priuitie of the ſuperintendents, giuen to the Count Vrbyn being ſicke, ſafeconduite to repaſſe in ſuertie out of the countrey Caſentyn: vnder the warrant of which ſafeconduit, Iulyan de Medicis was alſo gone with him, to the ſpecial diſpleaſure of the Florentyns, who occupied this reaſon, that if they had made difficultie to ſuffer the Count Vrbyn to paſſe, his deſire to go to recouer his health in his own dominiõs, wold haue conſtrained him to agree to the deliuery of the bandes that were within Bybienna: but much more did they complaine that Iulyan de Medicis ſhould communicat in ſuch a liberall fauour, expreſſing a foretyme manifeſt actions of rebellion, and

euen then was in armes againſt his countrey: Thoſe differences hindred much that at Florence they neyther beleeued councels, nor agreed to the demaunds of Pavvle Vitelly, but much more did they proue impediments to the proceedings of the war which was not continued with his reputacion towardes the people, for that not only many execucions of importance were perfourmed more by the Paiſants then by the Souldiours, but alſo, conſidering the great opinion they had of his valour, they promiſed to themſelues with a quicker expedicio, the victorie of the enemies: wherin perhappes (according to the nature and iudgement of peoples) they attributed to want of will, that which with more equitie they might haue referred to want of power, hauing regarde to the ſharpenes of the tyme, and want of things neceſſarie: By theſe occaſions (hurtfull to their affaires) and the ſtrength of the foure thouſande footemen being too ſlow in comming, the Count Pettillano had leaſure enough to come to the borough of Elcy apparteyning to the Duke of Vrbyn, and very neare the limittes of the Florentyns: A place where were before, Charles Vrſin and Peter de Medicis, and where were aſſembled all the bandes to paſſe Thappenyn, whoſe ſtrength and order (as beſt agreeable to that countrey deſert and rude) ſtoode more vppon footemen then horſemen, and the moſt parte of them armed after the light horſemen: This was the laſt ſtrength which the Venetians made in the countrey Caſentyn, and to breake it, Pavvle Vitelly leauing about Bybienna a certeine forme of a ſeege and ſufficient garde in the ſtraites and paſſages moſt neceſſary, marched with the reſidue of his armie to the ſtraite of S. Stephen, (a towne of the Florentyns ſeated at the foote of the Alpes) to withſtande the enemies diſcending from the hilles: But as in matters of daunger, diſcreſſion and councell are remedies no leſſe aſſured then courage and execucion: So, the Count Pettillano, hauing before him, the Alpes loaden with ſnowes, and at the foote of the Alpes ſo great an impediment, together with the ſtraite paſſages very troubleſome to paſſe euen when the ſeaſon is faire: was content to forbeare to diſcend or paſſe, notwithſtanding with great complaintes he was perſuaded to it by the Senat of Venice, perhappes more vehement to puſhe him forward, then hable to foreſee the perils: But albeit they propoũded to him diuers plots and meanes to retire Pavvle from whence he was, & that already in Valdibagna was done ſome enterpriſe of vexacion vppon the Peeces of the Florentyns, yet he ſtood reſolute in his determinacion, and would not ſtir in any ſort.

The Duke of Myllan made aſtoniſhed with the league, ſolicieth an accord betwene the Venetians and the Florentyns.

But by how much more coldly the war proceeded, by ſo much more hoatly were recontinued the ſolicitacions and practiſes of accorde, equally deſired of both the one and other partie for diuers regardes, and no leſſe followed and ſolicited by the Duke of Myllan: the reaſon & reapport of the league made betwene the french king and the Venetians, made him ſomewhat amazed, and with all drew him to diſpoſicions of hope, that the accord being made, the Venetians would haue leſſe deſire to the paſſage of the french, perſuading himſelfe alſo, that at the leaſt, (contenting themſelues in that regarde with his good will and with his workes) they would bee ſomewhat appaiſed, and cut of the rigour of their indignacion conceiued againſt him: Therefore interpoſing amongſt them a meane by Hercules D'eſte his father in lawe, he conſtrained the Florentyns to condiſcende ſomewhat to the deſire of the Venetians, not ſo much with authoritie (for they ſeeing into his intencions, began to holde him for ſuſpected) as with letting them know, that if thagreement went not forward, his neceſſities would compell him, for the feare he had of the french king, to turne to their diſfauour, and to take from them eyther all his men of warre, or at leaſt the beſt parte of his trained bandes: The matter was debated many monethes at

Ferrara where, after many difficulties diſputed, Hercules was required by the Venetians, to come in perſon to Venice for the more facilitie of the expedicion, wherunto he made ſome reſiſtance: but much more the Florentyns, for that they knewe that the Venetians deſired that a compromiſe might be made in the perſon of the Duke of Ferrara, againſt the which they ſtood, & were very farre of: But ſuch were the importunities of Lodovvyk Sforce, that at laſt he conſented to go thether, & the Florentyns to ſende with him Iohn Baptiſta Rodolpho, & Pavvle Anthony Sodoryn, two of the chieſeſt and wiſeſt citizens of their common weale. The firſt thing that was diſputed vppon at Venice, was to know if Hercules as Arbitrator would put an ende to the controuerſie, or as a friend indifferent, would labour to bring thē to accord, interpoſing, betweene the parties according to their order of proceeding at Ferrara, where they were not farre of from reſoluing the articles moſt principall and importing: The Florentyns deſired that the cuſtome begun ſhould be obſerued, knowing that Hercules, in as much as might depend vppon his arbittrement, would hold more accompt of the greatnes of the Venetians, then of them, and pronouncing the ſentence at Venice, he ſhould bee ſo muche the more compelled to beare reſpect to the Venetians: And yet though he would doe nothing of himſelfe, they were aſſured the Duke of Myllan would induce him, for that he deſired greatly to make knowne to the Venetians that he had ſerued their turne in that action: And albeit many difficulties were almoſt reſolued at Ferrara: yet both in their laſt perfection, and in many perticularities, the power of the arbitrator was not litle, who, notwithſtanding the compromiſe would yet haue a libertie to depart from that which was firſt debated: On the other ſide, the Venetians were at a point, if the compromiſe went not forwarde, to paſſe no further, not ſo much for that they were promiſed more in the Arbitrator then the Florentyns, as for that there were riſen amongſt them many contrarieties & obiections touching the preſent matter: for, albeit the greateſt part of them were weary with the intollerable expenſes that increaſed dayly with a very ſmall hope of profit, which not a litle aduaunced their diſpoſicions to agreement: yet were there many euen in the Senat, who for their experience not ſo well ſtaied as the reſt, & for their mocions of youth, more forwarde then would councel or reaſon, would not conſent to agreement, vnleſſe the libertie of the Piſans were wholly preſerued, or at leaſt vnleſſe that part of the countrey remayned ſtil to them which they poſſeſſed whē they tooke them into their protection: To which opinion they ioyned many reaſons, but chiefly they vrged a promiſe ratified by decree publike to the Piſans to protect their libertie, which they could not breake without apparant blemiſhe to their common honours, and perpetuall ſtayne to the reputacion of their common weale: Some others made eaſie touching all other articles, were immoderat in the quantitie of expenſes, which they required to bee repayed by the Florentyns in abandoning of Piſa: A requeſt which they commended to bee very reaſonable, for that it was no leſſe iuſt for the Florentyns to make recompence of the charges, then for the Piſans to make reſtitucion of that they helde in poſſeſſion: But the chiefe wiſdom and authoritie of the Senat, had a councell contrary: who, ſounding more deepely the eſtate of things, preferred ſtill with many importunities the cōſideration of the great charges, wherein as good ſtewardes of the treaſures of their common weale, it was a iuſt office in them all, to be carefull and circumſpect: They ſaw nothing but diſpaire in the defence of Bybienna, and leſſe poſſibilitie to ſuſteyne any longer the generall quarell of Piſa, without encreaſe of new troubles and charges, for the many difficulties that ſtill appeared aſwell in ſuccouring them, as to diuert and draw away the forces of thennemies the Flerentyns hauing obiected impediments far aboue their eſpectacion in the beginning: Beſides, they cõſidered that albeit thenterpriſe againſt the Duke of Myllan might be ſuppoſed eaſie, yet the french king, being not pacified with the king of Romains, & ſtanding ſubiect to diuers impediments ordinarily hapning at home, might by many aduentures be hindred & made ſlow to proſecute the warre: And though he ſhould put it to action, yet in the buiſines of warre, many daungers vnlooked for & difficulties no leſſe intricat, may chaunce dayly eyther to the vtter diſappointing of his purpoſes, or at leaſt to alter his diſpoſicion: But aboue all, trembling at the great preparacions which was ſaide Baiazet Ottoman made both by ſea and lande to inuade thoſe partes towardes Grece, their reſolucion was, (ſeeing their neceſſitie was more mightie then their inclination) that it was both iuſt, reaſonable, and neceſſarie, rather to conſent that honeſtie in ſome parte ſhould giue place to vtilitie, then, in ſtanding obſtinatly vppon their promiſe and fayth giuen, to perſeuer and nouryſhe as it were a perpetuall intereſt in troubles, charges, and perplexities: And becauſe they were well aſſured that theſe concluſions would be hardly conſented to in their councelles, (albeit they knewe from the beginning that of neceſſitie they muſt bee allowed) they had (whileſt the negociacion was at Ferrara) wyſely procured, that by the councell of the Pregati ſhould bee giuen fulnes of authoritie touching thaffaires of Piſa, and the reſolucion of thaccord, to the councell of the Dieci, which is a councel compounded of a leſſor number, none being called vnto it but ſuch as bee of greateſt grauitie & authoritie which conteined the moſt parte of thoſe that moſt deſired thaccord: But now the ſolicitacion continuing at Venice, and being in no truſt to be able to diſpoſe the councell of the Pregati to conſent to the articles which had bene debated at Ferrara, and knowing withall, that if only the councell of the Dieci condiſcended to them, there might ryſe occaſions to charge thoſe that aſſiſted it: they ſolicited that the compromiſe might bee made, hoping that touching the iudgement that might come of it, men would rather tranſferre thimptuacion to the Arbitrator then to them, and that more eaſely would that bee ratified which had bene alreadie publiſhed in ſentence, thẽ that which ſhould be cõſented vnto with the partie entreating by way of accord: So that after thoſe things had bene debated for certeine dayes, (the Duke of Myllan threatning the Florentyns refuſing to compromit to withdrawe immediatly all his companies out of Tuskan) there was a free and abſolute compromiſe for eight dayes in the perſon of Hercules Duke of Ferrara, who, after he had well conſidered of all thinges, pronounced the ſixt day of Aprill, that within eight dayes next following the Venetians and Florentyns ſhould ceaſſe to offende one an other, and that by the next Saint Markes tyde all the bandes, ſuccors, and aydes of eyther parties, ſhould retyre and returne into their countreys, that the Venetians at the ſame tyme ſhould make iſſue out of Piſa and all the places thereaboutes all their regimentes of Souldiours, which they interteined there: That they ſhould abandõ Bybyenna with all other peeces takẽ vppõ the Florẽtins, & they to pardõ to thoſe of Bybienna all their faltes & treſpaſſes: That for the recõpẽce of al charges (which the Venetiãs aſſured to amoũt to eight hũdred thouſãd duckats) the Florẽtyns ſhould be boũd to repaie thẽ in.xij.yeares, xv.thouſãd duckats by the yeare: That al offẽces ſhold be pardoned to the Piſãs, to whõ ſhold be ſuffred to exerciſe by ſea & lãd all ſorts of ſciẽces & marchãdiſe, & to remein in their gard, al the fortreſſes of Piſa & other thoſe places which were holdẽ by thẽ the day of the ſentẽce: but vnder this charge, that if they beſtowed Garriſons of the coũtreimẽ or others, that they ſhould not be perſons ſuſpected to the Florentyns, and that they

ſhould be paied of the reuenues which the Florentyns ſhould collect of Piſa, encreaſing neither the numbers of men, nor the paies accuſtomed affore the rebelliō: That if the Piſans thought good, they might deface & diſmantle all thoſe citadels & fortreſſes of the proper countrey of Piſa, which had ben recouered by the Florentyns for the time the Venetians held them in their protectiō: That within Piſa the firſt inſtāces of cauſes ciuile ſhould be iudged by a Podeſtat ſtraunger choſen by the Piſans of a place not ſuſpected by the Florentyns, that the Capteine choſen by the Florentyns ſhould not medle but with cauſes of appellacion, & haue no power to proceed in any caſe cryminall concerning bloud, baniſhment, or cōfiſcaciō without the councel of a ſuperintendent to be choſen by Hercules or his ſucceſſors, & of fyue Doctors of law which the Piſans ſhould name to him: That the goods moueable & vnmoueable occupied by the one & other partie, ſhould be reſtored to whō they apperteined, not making reſtituciō of the fruites, of the which euery one was abſolued: That in all other things, they ſhould ſuffer the Florentyns to enioy fully their rightes in Piſa & the territorie, forbidding the Piſans, that neither for the regard of the Citadels & fortreſſes, nor for other cauſe what ſo euer, they ſhold practiſe or cōſpire any thing againſt the commō weale of Florence: This ſentence was no ſooner publiſhed at Venice, but there were heard thorow the citie great complaintes euē of the nobilitie, againſt the Duke of Ferrara & thoſe ſpecial Senators which had managed the whole actiō: The moſt of them, cōſtruing to great blame that faith ſhould be brokē to the Piſans with ſo many infamies to the maieſtie of the commō weale, complained vehemētly, that the article touching the expenſes of the warre was paſt ouer with ſo light cōſideracion: The diſcourſe of this agreement inflamed not a litle Thembaſſadors of the Piſans, who, being before the ſentence cunningly entertèined by the Venetians in many promiſes & hopes, that vndoubtedly they ſhould remeine in full libertie, & that not only the reſidue of the coūtrey ſhold be adiudged to thē, but happly alſo the port of Lyworne, made the reſolutiō ſo much the more greeuous to thē, by how much the effects fel out cōtrary to the perſuaſions wherin they had bene noriſhed: In ſo much as they began with publike cryes to appeale to the equitie of the Senat, to whom they cōplained, that the promiſes to protect their libertie ſo oftentimes reiterated by the Senat, vnder thaſſurāce of whoſe faith they had not only reiected thamities of all other Potētates, but alſo refuſed far better cōdicions offred by the Florētyns, were vnworthely defiled & broken, their ſecuritie being not prouided for but with vaine apparances: for, what degree of ſafetie was that, or how could they be aſſured that the Florētyns reeſtabliſhing their maieſtrates within Piſa & their marchāts & ſubiects returning to traffike there, & on the other ſide their Paiſāts, who had ſerued as a principal member in the defēce of the citie, retiring to their houſes & farmes would not bring vnder their iuriſdictiō by ſome propertie of fraude, the whole gouernment of their town? hauing withal ſo many oportunities but chiefly the gard & cōmaūdemēt of the gates: And how could there but lurcke intēciō of infidelitie vnder that ſuertie, where we holding the fortreſſes, & ſuch as were appointed to the gard of thē, were to be paied by the Florētins, & not to be lawful in a time ſo doubtful, to beſtow a ſtrōger garde thē had ben accuſtomed in ſeaſōs peaſible & aſſured: The pardon for the treſpaſſes committed, was likewiſe a thing vaine, ſeeing the Florētins had good meane to deſtroy them by waies iudicial & by iudgements: for that the marchandiſes & other goods as had ben made pillage in the time of rebelliō amoūted to ſuch a valew, that in recōpēce they wold not only diſpoſe & cōfiſke our ſubſtāces, but alſo in ſuch a reuēgeful authoritie our perſōs ſhould not be aſſured frō impriſōmēt: But to cut of the impor-

importunitie of theſe cõplaints, the principals of the Senat brought to paſſe the day, folowing (although the tearme of the cõpromiſe was expired) that Hercules, (to whõ the general indignacion of the citie brought not a litle feare) added to the ſentence publiſhed, a declaratiõ without the knowledge & priuitie of the Florentyns: that vnder the name of fortreſſes, was comprehẽded & ment the gates of the towne of Piſa, with other peeces that had fortreſſes, for whoſe garde, & interteinmentes of the podeſtat & ſuperintendent, ſhould be aſſigned to the Piſans a certeine part of the reuenues of Piſa. And that the places not ſuſpected, wherof mentiõ was made in the ſentence, & frõ whẽce they might draw ſouldiours, ſhould be the ſtate of the church, of Mantua, of Ferrara, & of Bologna, not comprehending therein ſouldiours of other places: That touching reſtituciõ of goods, there ſhould neuer be ſpeche of it: That it ſhould be in the power of the Piſans, to name the ſuperintẽdent, borne in any place not ſuſpected: That the Capteine ſhould not proceede in any cauſe cryminal, (how litle ſo euer it were) without the ſuperintẽdent: That the Piſans ſhould be wel intreated of the Florentyns according to the cuſtome of other noble cities of Italy, and that there ſhould not be impoſed vppon them any new charges.

This declaracion was not ſolicited for any deſire the Venetians had that it ſhould be obſerued, but ſomewhat to qualifie the iuſt importunities of the Piſan Embaſſadors, & ſo to iuſtefie thẽſelues to the coũcell of the Pregati, that if the libertie of the Piſans were not altogether obteyned, at the leaſt they had ſo well prouided for their ſuertie and commoditie, that they could not bee charged to haue paſſed them ouer as a praye, or left them abandoned: So that in this councel of the Pregati, after much diſcourſe of diſputacion & reaſoning, at laſt what with the cõſideratiõ of the cõdicions of times, & the difficulties to mainteine Piſa, but ſpecially for feare of the Turkes armies, it was reſolued, that the ſentence ſhould not be ratified, with an expreſſe conſent, but that things which were of greateſt importance ſhould be put in execution, making to ceaſe within viij. daies all offences, & drawing all their bands out of Tuskã at the time determined, with intenciõ to medle no more with the quarel: yea many of the Senators begun to deſire, that the Florentyns ſhould rather recouer Piſa, then that it ſhould fal into the power of the Duke of Myllan. At Florence, after the tenor of the ſentẽce was communicated to the citie, moſt of the multitude begã to murmure in their mindes, & not only held thẽſelues oppreſſed in this, that they muſt make repaimẽt of the expenſes of the warre to thoſe who had vniuſtly vexed them: but much more for that it ſeemed to them they had obteined no other thing but the naked and ſimple name of Lordes, ſeeing, both the fortreſſes were in the garde of the Piſans, and thadminiſtracion of cryminal iuſtice (one of the principall members to preſerue eſtates) could not haue his courſe without their Maieſtrates: Neuertheleſſe, the ſame proteſtacions of the Duke of Myllan which had induced them to compromit, conſtrained them to ratifie it, and hoping withall that within a litle tyme, by induſtrie and good behauior to the Piſans, they might redreſſe things in a better forme: they ratified by name the ſentence publiſhed, but not the addicions & declaraciõs which were not yet come to their knowledge.

But farre greater were thindignacions and doubtes of the Piſans, who moued not a litle againſt the name of the Venetians, and ielous of ſome greater deceipt, aſſoone as they vnderſtood the reapport of the ſentence, diſcharged their ſoldiours from the garde of the fortreſſes & the gates: And not ſuffring them any more to lodge in the citie, they ſtoode many dayes in great variacion and doubt, whether they ſhould accept the condicions of the ſentence or not: On thoneſide, feare, being the inſtru-

ment of compulcion, ouerruled their wills, ſtanding now abandoned of all comfort and councell: And on the other ſide, the generall hate they bare to the Florentyns, made their paſſions redouble and kept them reſolute: But muche more did reteyne their inclination to conſtancy, their deſperate exſpectacion to obteyne pardon for their heauy & infinit tranſgreſſiõs, whoſe qualitie they held ſo much the more great and intollerable, by how much they had put the ſtate of Florence to infinit expenſes and harmes, & many times had brought into tearmes daungerous, euen their proper libertie: In theſe doubtes & diuerſities of myndes, the Duke of Myllan councelled thẽ to giue place, offring that he would worke ſo much with the Florentyns that the cõdiciõs of the ſentẽce ſhould bee more in their fauors & to their aduaũtages: yet, they, to make trial if he remeined ſtil poſſeſſed with his aũcient couetouſnes, determining in this caſe to giue thẽſelues wholly to him, they ſent to him Embaſſadours: But at laſt (ſuch are the deſtinies of minds drawne & deuided) after many thoughts & variaciõs, they determined rather to make trial of al extremeties, thẽ to return vnder the yoke of the Florentyns, wherunto as the Piſans had ſecret incitaciõ to by the Genovvays, Lucquoys, & Pãdolffe Petrucci: So alſo it was not doubted of the Florentyns but that the Duke of Myllan (the truth being otherwayes) had encoraged thẽ to that obſtinat reſoluciõ, ſo litle exſpectacion is there of ſinceritie and faithful actions in that man, whom the world hath taken into opinion to be double and ſuttle.

The Piſans not keeping the accord are beſeeged by the Florẽtins.

Thus the Florentyns, being out of hope to recõcile Piſa by accorde, thought they had a great occaſiõ to vãquiſh & force the citie: And therfore, cauſing Pavvle vitelli to returne eſtſones into that coũtrey, they leuied with ready diligence the prouiſiõs demaunded by him: But whileſt that ſtrength was aſſembled & in preparing to action, the daũgers of Lodovvyk Sforce encreaſed wonderfully for that his interpoſicion into thaccord had in no ſort appaiſed the minds of the Venetians, who, for hate to the mã, & hope of their profit, were wholly in deſier to cõſpire his ruine: To theſe diſtreſſes of Lodovvyk, was ioyned this further aduerſitie, that Maxymylian was nothing ſo ready to make warre on the french king, as he was importunat in cõtinual demaũdes of mony of Lodovvyk: yea, cõtrary to his many promiſes, he prolõged the truſſe for the whole moneth of Auguſt next, taking frõ him at one time the hope that he had that his ſuccors would ſtand him in more ſtead, then had don his councell to diuert the warre: Maxymylian alſo, being vnited with the league of Svveaden, began warre vppon the Svvyſſers declared rebels of the Empire for many controuerſies betwene them: which warre cõtinuing on both ſides in great fury, with ſundry accidents and fortunes on both partes: Lodovvyk began to aſſure himſelfe, that in no neceſſitie, he could hope for ſuccours from Maxymylian, vntill that warre againſt the Svvyſſers, tooke ende eyther by victorie, or compoſicion: And yet Maxymylian, promiſing him that he would neuer accord with the french king or with the Svvyſſers, without comprehẽding him in it, Lodovvyk was ſtil cõſtrained to refurniſh thexpẽſes of that warre, & to enterteine Themperors prodigalities with new ſupplies of money. This occaſion was not vnknowen to the new king of Fraunce, who, cõſidering how much it imported him, to haue the Pope & the Venetians for him, eſteemed litle the perſuaſions of many of his councell, that in regard he was newly aſcended to the Crowne, and his treaſures very ill furniſhed, hee might put of the warre till the yeare folowing: But the king framing his hopes according to the importunities of his deſire, imagined a poſſibilitie to obteine the victory in fewe monethes: And therefore caſting in his coniecture that in ſuche a ſhortnes of tyme, the ſeruice coulde not ſuffer great neceſſities of money, entered into open preparacion for the

warre alwayes furniſhing the Svvyſſers affore hande with ſome proporcion of money,to thende to keepe Maximilian in buſines:for which cauſe the Duke of Myllan, diſcerning ſuch manifeſt tokens of the warre, laboured with a wonderfull diligence and care not to bee alone in ſo great daungers: wherein hauing an abſolute diſtruſt in all poſſibilities and meanes of accord or reconciliacion with the Venetians,& fynding in the king of Spaine an inclinacion ſuſpicious, & (notwithſtanding his many ſolicitacions) a careleſſe remembrance of his perils: he turned his eyes to the contemplacion of other helpes, and ſounding in one inſtant the willes almoſt of all other Potentates, he ſent Galeas Viſcomte to Maxymylian and the Svvyſſers to negociat an agreement betwene them: And as aduerſitie is mightie to make men ſearch thoperacion of all councels: So,Lodovvyk knowing, that according to the Popes deſire,the mariage of Charlotta with his ſonne Cæſar Vorgia, could not well ſucceed, for that the young Lady eyther mooued with the loue and authoritie of her houſe and parents,or els gouerned by the perſuaſions of the french king (in whom notwithſtanding were expreſſed many faire apparances to the contrary) refuſed with great conſtancy & reſolucion of mynd,to make him her husband, if with all he put not an end to the affaires of Federyk her father, who offred to the french king yearely tribute with very large condicions: Lodovvyk labouring vppon theſe occaſions, had hope, to alyen and eſtrange him from the fauours he bare to thenterpriſes of Fraunce, ſoliciting him with many importunities to draw him into cõfederaciõ with him,wherin he promiſed thaſſociacion of king Federyk and the Florentyns,with many faire offers that aſwell he as the confederates, would contribute with him in a common ſuccour againſt the Viccaires of the church, & indue him beſides with a great quantitie of money to purchaſe ſome honorable eſtate for his ſonne: Theſe offers, as the Pope at the firſt mocion ſeemed to heare them with a diſſembled eare, ſo,in the ende he was content to giue them leaue to vaniſhe and become mearely vaine: for, hoping to receiue by the ſocietie and fauours of the french king, benefittes and farre greater liberalities, then thoſe which hee looked to obteyne if Italy were not filled full of the forreine armies of Fraunce: he conſented that his ſonne excluded alreadie from the maryage of Charlotte, ſhould take one of the doughters of the Lorde Albrett, who, for his affinitie with the bloud royall,and for the greatnes of his eſtates and liuinges, was one of the greateſt in all the kingdome of Fraunce: But Lodovvyk to whom appeared dayly more tokens and teſtimonies of the euill inclinacion of the Venetians, ceaſſed not by expreſſe ſolicitors (but in ſecret manner, king Federyk concurring in the ſame action)to ſtir vp againſt them the Prince of the Turkes,hoping that being aſſailed and vexed by him,they would haue no oportunitie to moleſt the ſtate of Myllan:And being with al wel aduertiſed of the preparacions which the Florentyns made to haue Piſa,he labored, vnder offers of all ſorts of ſuccors to them,to bynd them to his defẽce with three hũdred men at armes & two thouſand footmen after they had recouered Piſa:On the other ſide, the frẽch king required importunatly their promiſe to refurniſhe him for one yeare with fyue hundred men at armes:And for recompence he offred to binde himſelf,aſſone as he had accompliſhed the cõqueſt of Myllã,to miniſter to them for one whole yeare the ſuccors of a thouſand Launces, for thaduancemẽt of their enterpriſes,with promiſe that he would make no accorde with Lodovvyk,if not at the ſame time they were not repoſſeſſed of Piſa,& their other places withholdẽ beſides,he wold brĩg to paſſe that the Pope and the Venetians ſhould ioyne to their protection,if(affore the conqueſt of Myllan)they fel into any neceſſitie of defẽce:for which demaunds ſo cõtrary & full of

varietie, the Florentyns ſtood wauering in their reſolucion,no leſſe for the difficultie of the matter then for their deuiſion of myndes: for,Lodovvyk requiring their ayde (but in caſe that they recouered Piſa,) the ſuccours that he promiſed were far more preſent and certeyne,then the helpes promiſed by the french king, in whom they iudged litle oportunitie of action to the ayde of Piſa,for that, being abandoned of euery one,they determined to haue it that ſommer: Beſides,many were moued with the memorie that the Venetians were confederat with the french king againſt Lodovvyk,for that he had miniſtred to them in their perils:But much more moued them the feare of diſpite,leaſt in refuſing to gratifie his demaunds, he wold not hinder thē to get Piſa,a thing which he might eaſely do: And of the cōtrarie,looking into their owne infirmities,and ſeeing no poſſibilitie of power to reſiſt the french king & the Venetians, it ſeemed a councel daungerous to make themſelues enemies with a king whoſe armies they exſpected within few monethes to runne ouer all Italy: And the memorie of the fauours receiued of Lodovvyk in the warre againſt the Venetians (to the which they referred the originall of all their daungers) was eaſely defaced by this conſideracion,that the rebellion of Piſa was firſt kindled by his meanes : And that nouriſhing alwayes ambicious deſires to aſpire to the iuriſdiction of it, he had ſuſteined them,and for many monethes,ioyned the ſupportacion of others, conſpiring in thoſe tymes many other wrongs and iniuries againſt the Florentyns: So that, they referred more imputacion to his offences, then benefit by his fauours, which yet he did not communicat in liberalitie and franknes, but by the impacience & intolleratiō he had that the Venetians ſhould not take from him that which with hope and ambicion he had long ſince iudged to be duly apperteyning to him: they fell at laſt into this laſt doubt, that if they declared themſelues for Lodovvyk, the frenche king aduauncing the meanes and oportunities he had by the Pope and Venetians, might many wayes hinder them in the recouering of Piſa: In ſo muche, as conſerring the nature of the perils on both ſides,with their condicion preſent, they determined in the ende,not to ſtir either in the fauour of the french,or the Duke of Myllan,but to apply the tyme to thadvauncing of the enterpriſe of Piſa,wherein they reapposed nothing in fortune nor forreine aydes,but iudged their proper ſtrength hable & ſufficiēt,not forgetting for all that,to enterteyne Lodovvyk with ſhows & ſhadows & neare tokēs of hope,leaſt he ſhould take occaſiō to obiect impedimēts,dalying with him in thoſe deceites which to their hurts,they had oftētimes experienced in him: Therefore after they had for many dayes made delayes in aunſwearing,they diſpatched at laſt a ſecretorie publike to giue him vnderſtanding, that thintencion of the commō weale was cōformable to his deſires as touching theffect,but cōcerning the manner there was ſome difference: for that as they had made a full reſolucion,that aſſoone as Piſa was recouered,he ſhould not faile of the ſuccours hee had demaunded: ſo they deſired him to conſider how perillous it was to contract their promiſe vnder expreſſe couenant,for that in free cities,ſuch thinges being not to be diſpatched without the conſent of many,there was no poſſibilitie to holde them ſecret,and being diſcloſed,they would giue occaſion to the french king to drawe the Pope and the Venetians to readminiſter ſuccours to Piſa: by which it would come to paſſe that their promiſe would bring harme to themſelues, and prooue vnprofitable to him,for that Piſa being not taken,neither ſhould they be bounde to him, neyther were they hable to helpe him: for theſe reaſons they ſayde and eſteemed that fayth and promiſe might ſuffice giuen in wordes with the conſent of the chiefe citizens, vppon whoſe authoritie all their publyke deliberacions depended : That for other occaſion occasion they refused not to couenant with him by writing,but offred him for ende for better declaracion of their will and intencion, that if he knew any other meane whereby his desire might be satisfied,and so great domages auoyded, they would be as readie to execute it in deede as they required him to holde them assured in good will and affection towardes him: By which aunswere subtill and full of arte, and for that also they did not accept the offers of his succours,Lodovvyk sawe there was no hope left to haue bandes of souldiours from them,and lesse expectacion of succors from other partes: for that the comforts promised so continually by the king of Romains prooued very vncerteine,no lesse by his natural inconstancie,then for thimpediment of his warres with the Svviſſers: And for Federyk, where hee promised to sende him a strength of foure hundred men at armes and fiue thousande footemen vnder the leading of Prosper Collonne, he doubted not so much of his will (for the defence of the Duchie of Myllan turned to his profit) as of his disabilitie and delayes: And Hercules,his father in lawe (reproching almost the auncient iniuries done by him in the composicion of Polesina) aunswered him with excuses, & that it brought no small greefe to him to be restrained to succour his distresse,for that the landes of the Venetians ioyning so neare to the gates of Ferrara,he was constrained to be carefull ouer the suertie of his owne estate.

Lodovvyk thus made naked of all forreine hopes, and driuen altogether to reappose in his strength and comforts at home: beganne carefully to fortefie Auon, Nouare, and Alexandria de la Paille,townes standing in the mouth of the first perils and inuasions of the french: his resolucion was to send out against the fury of the french army,Galeas de.S.Seueryn with the greatest part of his strength,and to oppose the residue against the Venetians, vnder the gouernment of the Marquis of Mantua, notwithstanding a litle after,eyther by indiscression or by couetousnes, or for that there is no power to resist the councels of God, he became estraunged from the Marquis: for that falling into this vaine persuasiō,that the Venetians (against whom the Turke had opened the warre aswell by land as by sea with a wonderful preparacion) would haue no oportunitie to molest him,being constrained to defende their owne estates against so strong an enemy: And desiring withall to satisfie a particular humor in Galeas.S.Seueryn,whose ambicion could not brooke that the Marquis should enioy a title more honourable then he,he began to make difficulties, as refusing to pay him a certeine remeynder of olde payes,and required of him othes and cawtions not accustomed for thassurance of his faith: And also notwithstanding that, afterwardes being aduertised that the Venetians dispatched many bandes of men into Bresse,to be readie to enter into the warre at the same tyme that the french should begin it, hee sought by the meane of the Duke of Ferrara his father in lawe,to reconcile him to him,yet the difficulties could not so soone bee resolued, as the daungers appeared, growing daily both more great and terrible: for the Duke of Sauoy, being eftsoones conioyned with the king,set at libertie all oportunities and passages for his bandes to march continually thorow Piemont,and to be bestowed about the confines of Ast: And to the hopes of Lodovvyk appeared daily tokens of declinacion, for that king Federyk,either by disabilitie or by necligence,was slowe to minister to his perilles: And that small remeynder of hope which hee enterteined as his chiefest comfort, that the Florentyns hauing once gotten Pisa, would sende to his succours Pavvle Vitelly (whose valour held great reputacion in all the partes of Italy) was cut from him by the diligence of the frenche king, who, debating with their Embassadours with wordes sharpe and full of threatnings,wrought so much with their common weale that they made him ſecret promiſe by writing to miniſter no ayde at all to the Duke of Myllan,a promiſe,for the which they receiued in recompence no couenant or graunt of him: Lodovvyk, leauing the Count Caiazze on that ſide to the Venetians with a very ſmall companie not ſufficient to any great reſiſtance,ſent Galeas de.S.Seueryn beyond the Ryuer of Pavv,with an army of a thouſande ſixe hundred men at armes,a thouſande fyue hundred light horſmen, ten thouſande footemen Italians, and fyue hundred footemen Allemains, but more with intencion to defend his places,then to reſiſt in the plaine fielde: for that he eſteemed it moſt to his profit to enterteyne and holde thinges in delay,chiefly for that he had daily exſpectacion of the concluſion of an accorde ſolicited in his name by the Viſcount,betweene Maximilian,and the Svvyſſers: which if it were accompliſhed, he was ſedde with many promiſes of mightie ſuccours,which other wayes he could not only not hope for, but it was very harde for him to draw any proporcions of footmen from thoſe quarters, for that by the troubles that were thereabout, all the countrey was almoſt kept trauelled in that warre.

The french king diſcendeth into Italy.

Touching the warres of Myllan, there was performed neyther of the one nor other part, any exployt of warre, other then certeine light incurſions,vntill the regiments of the Lord de Ligny,Eberard,Aubigny,& Tryvulce, were paſſed the mountes: for that,albeit the king was come to Lyon,and the bruite ranne that he would paſſe into Italy in ſeaſon conuenient,yet he referred thinges to direction, appointing the marche of the army to be gouerned by his Capteines: The ſtrength of the frenche army was a thouſande ſix hundred Launces, fyue thouſande Svvyſſers, foure thouſande Gaſcoyns,and foure thouſande of other natures of ſouldiours in Fraunce: with whom,aſſoone as they were drawne into an army accompliſhed and beſtowed vnder their ſeuerall Guidens and leadors,the Capteines erected a Camp,and the thirtienth of Auguſt,planted it affore the Rocke Arazze, ſcituate vppon the ſhore of the Ryuer Tanare: And albeit, it was garded with a ſtrength of fyue hundred footemen,yet was it taken within a very ſhort tyme, the fury of the Artillerie being the cauſe,and no leſſe the cowardiſe of the Garriſon that were within: from thence they drew their Campp to Auon,a litle village along the high way to Aſt & Alexandria, vppon the bankes of Tanara and right ouer againſt Arazze: And being ſtrong by the propertie of his ſcituacion, the Duke of Myllan had eſtſoones fortefied it certeyne monethes before: And albeit Galeas.S.Seueryn who with his armie had taken the fielde neare Alexandria,was well aduertiſed of the loſſe of Arazze, and had determined to ſende to the ſuccours of the other bandes of footemen better reſolued, for that the ſeuen hundred beſtowed there firſt, were of the new leuies and not trayned to the warre: yet he could not put his deuiſe in execucion, for that the Frenchmen,to cut of all recourſe of ſuccours thether, had manned Stllizana which is betweene Alexandria and Auon,and that by the ſuffrance and conſent of the Marquis of Mont Ferat Lorde of the place: In ſo much,that they that were within Auon expreſſing in action and experience no better proofe of their vallours, then aunſweared thexſpectacion and opinion of moſt men,fell into the daunger of the french,who,after they had firſt battered the Suburbes, and afterwardes ſhaked the walles of the towne in foure ſeuerall quarters,they enforced it in two dayes and likewiſe the Caſtell, making ſlaughter of all the footemen that were thether withdrawne: The ſucceſſe of which enterpriſes whoſe furie vanquiſhed all reſiſtance, and the ſodeines ouercame all opinion and exſpectacion,brought ſuch aſtoniſhment to Galeas.S.Seneryn,that he retyred with all his army into Alexandria coollouring his feare with an excuſe,

The frenchmen take diuers peeces in the Duchie of Myllan.

excuſe, that both in his ſouldiours wanted vallour, and in the people was litle fayth towardes Lodovvyk: which tymerous reſolucion ſtaying not a litle the reputacion of a generall, gaue occaſion of greater courage to the french, who drew their Camp within foure myles of Alexandria, and at the ſame ſeaſon tooke Valence plentifully ſtored with Artillerie and ſouldiours, and that by the treaſon of Donat Raffaguin of Myllan, at that tyme Capteyne of the Caſtle corrupted by the promiſes of Tryvulce: This Capteyne let them into the towne by the Caſtle, beheilde with his eyes all the ſoldiors that were within eyther ſlaine or taken, & Octauyan baſtard brother to S. Seueryn made priſoner: ſo buiſie is the humor of treaſon that in whom it aboundeth, it rageth without reſpect to tyme, perſon, or the ſelfe partie in whom it worketh: for, this Capteyne twentie yeares before falſefying his faith to Madame Bonne and the young Duke Iohn Galeas, deliuered vp to Lodovvyk Sforce one of the Portes of Tortona, the ſelfe ſame day that he put the frenchmen into Valence: Thus fortune folowing the victors, and the victors applying to the fauour and oportunitie of the tyme, the frenchmen as a violent thunder running ouer the whole countrey Baſigniana, Voguera, Nevveaſtle, and Pont Corona, yelded to them without reſiſtance, as alſo the Caſtle and towne of Tortona, from whence, Anthonio Maria Paluoiſui gouerning the Garriſon there, retired beyond the Riuer of Pavv without tarying for any aſſalt: The aduertiſement of theſe accidents being come to Myllan, Lodovvyk Sforce, ſeeing afore his eyes nothing but a lamentable face of all extremities, & that his eſtate haſtned with a vyolent ſvviftnes to his ruine, became confuſed (as hapneth in ſuddeyne extremeties) both in councell and courage, and had recourſe to thoſe remedies, wherein (men being accuſtomed to runne to them when thinges bee ſo farre afflicted, that they bee almoſt brought to the laſt diſpaire) they declare to euery one rather the greatnes of the daunger wherein they are, then that they receiue profit or comfort by them: he cauſed to mooſter and enroll all the men of the towne of Myllan that were hable to beare armes, and cauſing to aſſemble the people, which hated him not a litle for the many exactions he had impoſed vppon them, he acquited thē of one parte of the tributes and impoſicions whereunto they were bound, vſing perſuacions accompanied with wordes and ieſtures pitifull, that if they thought he had at any tyme too heauely burdened them, that they would not aſcribe it to his diſpoſicion and nature, nor to any deſire to heape to himſelfe a particular treaſor, but rather to the eſtate of the tymes, and daungerous condicions of Italy, no leſſe for the greatnes of the Venetians, then for the diſcending of the late king Charles of Fraunce, matters for their importance very ielous, and for which, his particular intereſt conſtrained him to thoſe actions, to thende to bee the better hable to protect the peace and ſuertie of that ſtate againſt all oppreſſions and inuaſions, iudging that hee could not ſhow a greater affection to his countrey and his people, then to foreſee that they ſhould not be trauelled with warres: That the fruites which they had reaped made good teſtimony of thineſtimable profittes they had gathered by ſuch a pollecie and councell, ſeeing they had liued many yeares vnder him in great tranquillitie, and by that benefit their citie raiſed into a wonderfull eſtate and maieſtie of riches, reputacion, and glorie, as was well expreſſed in the aſpect of ſo many pompes, glories, and honors, with the multiplicacion almoſt of infinit ſciences and inhabitantes: benefits, wherein the towne & Duchie of Myllan, doth not only not giue place, but doth exceede all other Climats and regions of Italy: That they ſhould remember, that he had gouerned them without bloud and crueltie, and with what affabilitie and readines he had harde euery one, and that hee only (aboue all the Princes of his tyme)

Lodovvyk muſtereth all thinhabitants of Myllan, and laboureth to reconcile the hartes of the people.

without bearing reſpect to the paynes and trauels of his perſon, obſerued the dayes appointed for publike audiences, and alwayes had giuen to euery one a ready expedicion and vpright iuſtice: That they ſhould beare reſpect and remembrance to the merits and gracious behauiors of his father, who had gouerned them rather in an affection of children, then in the propertie and condicion of ſubiectes, and withall to ſet before their eyes how harde & greeuous it would be for them to beare the proud and inſolent yoke of the frenche, who, for the neighbourhead and nearenes of the realme of Fraunce (if they once came to commaund ouer theſtate of Myllan) would plant there their perpetuall dwelling, and chaſſe out the auncient inhabitantes, an impietie which heretofore they had exerciſed vppon all Lombardy: To theſe reaſons he added the conſideracion of the barbarous manners of the french nation, and to ioyne all together with myndes reſolute for the defence of their countrey and proper ſafetie, not doubting but if their reſiſtance vanquiſhed the firſt brunt of daungers (which lyke a ſtorme would bee vyolent and but ſhort) but the reſidue of the action wold be eaſie, for that this was a propertie infallible in the french nature, to be more furious to aſſaile, then conſtant to continue, and for that alſo he had in exſpectacion a ſpeedie and mightie ſuccour from the king of Romains, who, being alreadie compounded with the Swyſſers, prepared to reskue him in perſon, lyke as alſo the regimentes which the king of Naples ſent to him vnder the leading of Proſper Colonne, were on the way, and did march: Laſtly he made them beleeue that the Marquis of Mantua (all the controuerſies betweene them being now reſolued) was already armed, & with three hundred men at armes entred the countrey of Cremona: to which ſuccours and forces, if he might adioyne the readines and fayth of his people, hee made himſelfe aſſured againſt his enemies, yea if their army conteined all the power of Fraunce. Theſe perſuaſions were heard with more diligence then profit, & ſerued him to as litle purpoſe, as the forces which he oppoſed againſt the french: for feare of whom waighing lightly the preſent daunger of the Venetians, who had begun the warre in Guiaradadda, and taken the towne of Caranage with other peeces neare the Ryuer of Adda, he called backe the Count Caiazze with the moſt part of thoſe bands which he had ſent for the defence of that quarter, and cauſed him to marche to Pauya to ioyne with Galeas for the defence of Alexandria: But, as ſuch as haue their deſtruction determined, are ſeene to decline by degrees, ſo his ruyne was aduaunced on all ſides: for, the Count Caiazze, was a litle before at a ſecret accord with the frenche king, being more caried with diſdaine that Galeas his brother, younger in yeares, and of leſſe exerciſe and experience in armes was preferred before him in the gouernment of the armie, and in all other honors and fauors then with the memorie of the innumerable benefits which he and his brethren had receiued of Lodovvyk: Some are of opinion, that Lodovvyk was aduertiſed of his reuolting certeine monethes before, and after many deepe cogitacions of the diſpoſicion of the man, he aunſwered at laſt with many ſighes to him that gaue him thaduertiſement, that as he could not be perſuaded of ſo great an ingratitude, ſo, if it were a thing true, it was an euil whoſe nature reſiſted all remedies, and for his part, he knew not in whom to reappoſe confidence, ſince in his fauorits, and familiars, & ſuch as had moſt communicated with his liberalities & benefits, were found diſpoſicios of treaſon: Affirming (with compaſſion bringing teares) that he eſteemed it not a calamitie leſſe hurtfull to depriue himſelfe by a vaine ſuſpicion of the ſeruice of perſonages faithful, then by too haſtie & light credulitie, to reappoſe his ſuertie in the faith of thoſe whoſe behauiors gaue occaſion to doubt them: But in the meane while, the Count Caiazze makes a bridge

ouer Po to ioyne with his brother,& interteining with cunning delayes thexecuciō, whileſt the bridge is in worke and labour he deferreth to paſſe,notwithſtanding the frenche armie was two dayes affore, entred into Alexandria which they did batter: And Galeas whoſe ſtrength was a thouſande and two hundred men at armes,a thouſand and two hundred light horſmen,with three thouſande footemen, in the night of the third day without the priuitie of any the Capteines except Luke Maluezze, fleeth ſecretly out of Alexandria with a parte of the light horſmen, giuing the whole world to know to his great diſhonor,and no leſſe reproche to the wiſdome of Lodovvyk,howe great difference was betweene the ſport to manage a Courſer, & runne at tilt and torney with huge Launces(exerciſes wherein he exceeded moſt Italians) and the office to be a Capteine of an armie: And how much thoſe princes beguile themſelues to their harmes,who, in the election of men to manage and commaund ouer affaires of daungerous importance,beare more regarde to the fauour of ſuche whom they chooſe,then to their vertue and habilitie: Aſſoone as it was knowne in Alexandria that Galeas was fledde,ſuche as remeined in the armie (example doing much in caſes of aduerſitie) began in general tumult,to ſhow diſorder,diſobedience and all the other euilles that inflict an armie abandoned: ſome fled,ſome hid themſelues,& ſome wandred at auenture without all hope of fortune: by occaſion wherof,the french armie (running with thoportunitie) entred the towne at the breake of day,and not only ſtripped all the ſouldiours that were there,but with an vnbridled libertie of warre,put the whole citie to ſacke: There ranne a bruite, that Galeas was commaunded by ſecret letters ſubſigned with the name of Lodovvyk Sforce, that for a certeine mutinie then ryſen at Myllan,he ſhould retire thether immediatly with all his bandes: But ſome were of opinion that the letters were falſly made and forged by the Count Caiazze,as by that meane to make more eaſie the victorie of the french: The letters Galeas was wont to ſhow afterwardes for his iuſtification, as though he had bene charged by the ſame,to abandon raſhelie his armie,and not to leade it ſafe into places where he knew he could leaue it in ſecuritie: But to what inuencion ſo euer the letters were referred,or to what intencions ſo euer they were interpreted, his excuſes are not ſo credible,as it is holden moſt certeyne with all men, that if in Galeas had bene founde any reputacion of a generall,any councell of a Capteine,or any courage of a man reſolute,he might haue made eaſie the defence of Alexandria, and all the reſidue beyond Po, with the ſtrength he had: wherein happelie fortune would haue honored his vallour with good ſucceſſe,for that one parte of the french armie,being paſſed the Ryuer of Bornia a fewe dayes before, and by reaſon of the ſodeine raines falling,albeit they were incloſed betweene the Ryuers of Bornia & Tanaro, yet Galeas had not the hart to ſet vppon them, notwithſtanding hee was tolde that certeine of his light horſmen, iſſued out of Alexandria by the bridge vppon Tanaro which ioyneth the ſuburbes to the Citie, had charged them, and almoſt put to the chaſe the firſt battell.

The loſſe of Alexandria brought no litle aſtoniſhment to all the reſidue of the Duchie of Myllan, not onlie afflicted more and more with freſhe calamities, but alſo ſo much the more neare his perill and ruyne,by how muche the french men hauing paſſed their armie ouer the Ryuer of Po, were gone to beſeege Mortaro, which made them of Pauya put themſelues into accord with them: And the Venetians, hauing taken the Rocke of Caranage & paſſed the Ryuer of Adda vppon a bridge made for preſent ſeruice,commaunded almoſt all the countrey euen to Loddy, the whole reſidue of the places being for the moſt parte drawne into rebellion: And as, when aduerſities come they thunder all at once, ſo euen at Myllan there was no leſſe confuſion and feare, then in the other places, for that the multitude, being now weary of their long exſpectacion of chaunge, and the perticular factions of citizens drawing to Monopolies and priuat councels, the whole citie conſpired and tooke armes, and that with ſo ſlender reuerence to their Lorde, that his treaſorer generall comming from the Caſtle from ſoliciting affaires with him, was ſlaine at noone dayes in the ſtreetes, (perticular hatreds working no leſſe in the conſpiracie, then the councelles of ſuch as deſired innouacion and new thinges: by reaſon of which accident, no leſſe inſolent in the manner, then bloudie in the matter, Lodouvyk entring into a great feare of his perſon, and ſtanding naked of all hopes and poſſibilitie, determined to auoyde the preſent daunger, not by his vertue to reſiſt, but by his pollicie: & deuiſing to leaue the Caſtle of Myllan in good garde, he found no better remedie for his ſafetie, then to flee into Iermany with his children, where carying with him in his perſon the true aſpect of his calamities, he ſayde he would ſolicit Maxymylian to come to his ayde and ſuccours, hauing alreadie concluded, or at leaſt helde for reſolued, the peace with the Swyſſers: following this reſolucion, hee ſent away his children accompanied with the Cardinall Aſcanius (come from Rome not many dayes before to ſuccour aſwell as he could the affaires of his brother) and with Cardinall. S. Seueryn, with whom alſo hee ſent his treaſor, very much diminiſhed from his auncient proporcion: for, it is credibly knowne to many that not eight yeares paſſed, Lodouvyk, to make a glorious bragge of his power, ſhowed to many Embaſſadours and others of reſpect, the eſtate and ſubſtance of his treaſor which at that tyme, aſwel in money, as in plate of golde and ſiluer, (beſides Iewels & wealth of other natures in no ſmall number) amounted to a Myllion and an halfe of Duckats: but at his departure, according to thopinion of men, it conteyned not a reckoning of two hundred thouſand: Aſſoone as his children were departed, he appointed (notwithſtanding many of his friendes labored to turne him) for the garde of the Caſtle Barnardin de Corto borne at Pauya, whom he had nouriſhed and brought vp of long, and being at that tyme Capteine of the Caſtle, he preferred the faith of him, affore all opinion & truſt in his brother Askanius offring to take vppon him that charge: he left for that defence three thouſande footemen vnder the authoritie of Capteines in whom he reappoſed moſt, with proporcions of vitels, munitions, and money, ſufficient for many monethes: Touching Genes and the affaires there, he determined to recommend them to the honour and confidence of Auguſtyn Adorne (gouernor preſent) and to his brother Iohn, to whom (the better to aſſure his faith) he had ioyned in mariage one of the ſiſters of the. S. Seuerins, and ſent them foorthwith the aſſignation of the Caſtle: To the Baromoyes, gentlemen of Myllan he reſtored Augniara, Arona & other landes vppon the lake Maior which he had taken from them: And to Iſabell of Aragon the wydowe of Duke Iohn Galeas, hee gaue by reaſon of her dowrie, the Duchie of Bary and the principallitie of Roſſano for thirtie thouſande Duckats, notwithſtanding ſhe denied to truſt him with the ſonne of Iohn Galeas, whom he deſired to ſende with his children into Iermany.

Lodouvyk abandoneth Myllan.

After he had eſtabliſhed this forme of direction, and in his owne ſeeming had ſet downe aſmuch as might ſuffice for the ſuertie of things, leauing the towne to the gouernment of it ſelfe, he departed the ſecond of September with his eyes ful of teares, accompanied with the Cardinall of Eſte, and Galeas. S. Seueryn, and for his ſafetie by the way, he had Luke Maluezze with a good trowpe of men at armes and footemen: And as he was iſſuing out of the Caſtle (decay of fortune traynes with it all ſortes of diſcom-diſcomfort) The Count Caiazze, ſeeking to ſhadowe his diſloyaltie with ſome cooller, met him and ſayde that, ſeeing he abandoned his eſtate, he helde himſelfe acquited of the othe of warre which he had made to him, and from thence forwarde to bee in full power to profeſſe what ſeruice hee would: And at thinſtant the Count diſcloſed to him the titles, names, & enſeignes of the army of the frenche king, into whoſe paie he entred immediatly with the ſelf ſame regiment which he had leauied with the treaſors of Lodovvyk: who from Coma where he left the Caſtle in the power of the people, wēt along the riuer, to Belleaſia & from thence (being ſet on lande) he paſſed by Bormy & all thoſe places, where at other times when he was in glory & felicitie he had receiued Maximilian paſſing then into Italy, rather as a Capteine to him & the Venetians, then with a maieſtie & eſtate of a king of Romains: Betweene Coma & Bormy, he was purſued with bands of the french & the companies of the Count Caiazzo: frō which places, leauing garriſon within the Caſtle of Tyran occupied not many daies after by the Griſons, he tooke his way towardes Spruch, where he vnderſtood was the perſon of Themprour: After the ſeedes of aduerſitie be ſowen, there is no long exſpectatiō for the fruites, which draw to their effects with a ſwift courſe, euen as whē the cloude is gathered to his thicknes, there is an apparāce of raine with a diſpoſition ready to diſperſe the ſtorme that lōg hath ben in breeding: for Lodovvyk was no ſooner departed, thē the inhabitāts of Myllā, diſpatching Embaſſadors to the frēch Capteines (approched with the whole army within ſix miles of the citie) conſented with ready & frāke wils to receiue thē, reſeruing the cōdiciōs & capitulaciōs till the kings cōming, in whō they had many hopes to finde great fauours & graces (regard to particular profit preuailing more in thē, thē any cōſideraciō or cōſcience of obedience to their Lord:) Moſt of the other places of the duchie of Myllan made their example a ſufficiēt occaſiō to reuolt: The citie of Cremona which was beſet with bands of the Venetiās (whoſe yoke the inhabitants abhorred) wold alſo haue don the like, if the frēch king, that yet would not breake the cōtract made with the Venetians, had not cōpelled the towne to be rēdred to thē: And as in calamities, general exāples induce wonderfully, ſo the citie of Genes, folowed this vniuerſall reuolt, (the people, & the famuly of the Adorneys with Iohn Levvys de Fieſque, ſtriuing who ſhold giue vp the citie vnto the king): And to thend that with ſo great & ſodein ruines againſt Lodovvyk (loſing in eight daies ſo mightie an eſtate) the world might alſo diſcerne the exāples of ingratitude: the Capteine of the Caſtle of Myllā, choſē aboue al others for the reputaciō of his faith & vertue, not abiding ſo much as one boollet or any forme of aſſalt, deliuered to the frēch king within twelue daies after the departure of Lodovvyk, the Caſtle which was ſuppoſed to be impregnable: And receiued in recōpēce of ſo great diſloialtie a great proporciō of mony, a company of an hūdred Laūces, a perpetual pēſion, with many other priuileges & graces: But with ſuch infamy & hate euē amōgſt the frēch, that being eſchued & reiected of euery one, & perſecuted with ſkornes & reproches, he died of thought within few daies after, tormēted belike with ſhame & the ſpirit of his cōſciēce which are two mighty & moſt aſſured skourges to vex traitors & faithbreakers: The Capteines aſſigned to him for the ſeruice of the caſtle, did cōmunicate in that infamy, but chiefly Philippin de Fieſque, who, trained vp & aduaūced by the Duke, & left there for the credit & opiniō of his faith, ioined him ſelf to the cōſēt of the caſtle keper to betray their charge (being both made blind with one pouder of corrupt promiſes): The king receiuing at Lyō the newes of ſo great a victory ſucceded with a ſpeed ſwifter thē his exſpectaciō, made way with great diligence to Millā, where, being receiued with a ioye of the people, equal to the fortune of his victorie, he agreed to the depoſing of diuers tributes and impoſicions, which as it is an action firſt requiſite in Princes newly poſſeſſed of conqueſt, and a fauour moſt plawſible to people altered, So yet they of Myllan, rayſing their deſires aboue reaſon or order, were not fully ſatiſfied for the opinion they had that the kinges liberalitie would make them free from all exemptions: hee diſtributed honourable giftes of reuenues to many Gentlemen of Myllan, and amongſt other thinges gaue Vigeneua to Iohn Iacques Tryvulce in recompence of his merits.

The taking of Caſsina. In the ſelfe ſame ſeaſons that the french king runne this fortune againſt the Duke of Myllan, Pavvle Vitelly, hauing now reaſſembled the bandes and prouiſions of the Florentins to cary with more eaſe, the victory of Piſa, planted his Camp affore the towne of Caſcina, which, notwithſtanding it was ſufficiently manned and vittelled, with a wonderfull ſtrength of trenches and Rampiers, was taken, after the ſommonce of the artillerie, within leſſe then ſix and twentie houres: for that, the defendants, beginning now to feare the great ruyne which the artillerie had made of their walles being of no ſtrength, ioyning with the forreine ſouldiours that were within, rendred the place, and compounded only for their lyues and goods, leauing the Commiſſioners and ſouldiours of the Piſans wholly in the arbitracion of the Victors: Immediatly after this, (one euill following an other,) the Towre builded to guarde the mouth of the Ryuer of Arne, and the Baſtilion of the poole, being abandoned of the Piſans, yelded at the ſommonce of one only Trumpet: (The malice of fortune confounding the vallour and vertues of men) So that the Piſans helde no other peeces within the whole countrey then the Caſtle of Verrucole and the little Towre Askanius, which ſuffred no vexacion of thenemies, both for thincommoditie of the Ryuer of Arne which hindred all actions of inuaſions or aſſalt, and alſo being ſo neare Piſa, it ſtoode poſſible to ſpeedie and readie ſuccours, thimportance alſo of thenterpriſe required not the loſſe of ſo much tyme: In ſo much as there remeyned now no more to get but Piſa, which was an enterpriſe very hard (according to the diſcourſe of ſuche as ſounded thinges with diſcreſſion) aſwell for the fortreſſe of the towne, as for the numbers, vertue, and reſolucion of the men that were within it: For, albeit there were within Piſa no forreine ſouldiours other then Gurlyn de Rauenna with ſome very ſmall troupes, who comming at firſt in the paye of the Venetians, remeyned ſtill poſſeſſed of that ſeruice after their regiment was withdrawne: yet there were no ſmall numbers of Citizens and Paiſantes well woorthie of accompt, both for that by a continuall experience of fyue yeares, they were made ſeruiceable and fitte for the warre, and alſo they nouriſhed ſuch an immoueable reſolucion of minde not to returne eftſoones vnder the power of the Florentyns, that they held for nothing all other aduerſities how greeuous ſo euer they were: And albeit there were no ditches nor trenches before the walles of the citie, yet were they very thicke & of auncient building with ſtones ſo wel couched by the facultie of the lyme and ſande proper to that countrey, that their reſiſtaunce was more mightie againſt thartillerie then is in the common ſort of walles, and by that benefit, affore they were beaten flat with the earth, the defendantes had good time and leaſure to reenforce and reedefie their Rampiers: But theſe defences, conſidered with all the other ſtrengthes of the Citie, coulde not ſtaye the diſpoſicion of the Florentyns, who, being determined to aſſalte it, were ſtyrred to it the rather by Pavvle Vitelly, and Rinucce de Martiano, who gaue no ſmall hopes to take it within fyfteene dayes: And hauing muſtred together a ſtrength of tenne thouſande footemen, with many Guidons of horſemen, and drawne together together according to direction, many other great prouisions Pavvle planted his Camp there the last of Iuly, not (as many aduised him, and the Florentyns desired) on that side to Arne to intercept the succours that might come from Lucqua: but on the other side the Ryuer right ouer against the bastillion and Towre of Stampace: wherein he occupied this reason, that eyther in taking that fortresse he might the easelier cary the towne, or in respect of the great commoditie of vittels brought from the Boroughes about the hilles, or at least by some speciall foresight or coniecture that he had, that the Pisans not suspecting the seege to be planted on that side, had not begunne any Rampyer there as they had done on the other side: The battery conteining twentie peeces of great artillerie, beat vppon the Bastilion of Stampace and a great parte of the wall aswell on the right as left hande, namely from S. Anthony vntill Stampace, and from thence vntill the watergate, or gate towardes the sea built vppon the banke of Arne: And of the contrary, the Pisans (ioyning their labours to their daungers) trauelled day and night, and with them their wiues and other sortes of women no lesse resolute and well disposed then the men: In so muche that their vallour and labours were some resistance to the furie of the enemies, for that in very fewe dayes, they had made right against the wall that was battred, a Rampier of a great height and largenes, and a ditche of more then common depth, being nothing amazed to see many of their companies slaine directly with the Boollet, and many wounded with the reuerberacion of the same: The shot also so thundred vppon the souldiours in the Camp, together with the great artillerie from the towne, specially from a plot forme that was vppon the Towre of Sainct Marke, that the whole Camp was constrained eyther to remoue their tents to haue better couerture, or els to pitche their Cabinettes within the ditches: Many dayes paste in this forme of action, wherein albeit they had throwne to the ground a great quantitie of the wal from S. Anthony vntill Stampace, & had reduced that fortresse into suche tearmes, as the Generall hoped to obteine it without great difficultie, yet, to make the victorie more easie, hee continued the battery from Stampace till the gate to the sea, interteyning in the meane whyle many skyrmishes betweene the wall which they battered, and the Rampyer, so farre separate from the walles that Stampace remeyned whollie without the Rampier: In one of these skirmishes the Count Rinucce was hurt with a shot of a Harguebuze: The Generall determined that assoone as he had wonne Stampace, to plant there his artillerie and also vppon the wall which hee had battred, by which meanes, giuing (in the Flancke) vppon all that syde which the Pisans defended, he made his hope of the victorie almost certeyne: hee made at the same tyme fall towardes the Rampier (to thende the ditche being filled, the souldiours might enter with more ease) one parte of the ruyne of the wall which was betweene Stampace and the Rampier, which being alreadie shaked, was not now supported but with proppes and matter of wood: On the other syde, the Pisans, who, in defending were altogether directed by the councell of Gurlyn, had made towardes S. Anthony certeine murdering houses within the ditche, to thende that if the enemie discended, it should not bee filled vp by them: they had also bestowed vppon the Rampiers towardes S. Anthony, muche artillerie, and placed their footemen at the foote of the Rampier, to thende that thinges drawing to straytes and extremeties, they might bee opposed with their proper persones against their enemies: At laste, Pavvle Vitelly not willing to deferre any longer the taking of Stampace, the tenth day after he had planted his Camp there, gaue thassalt at the breake of day: And notwithstanding his ſouldiours were greeuouſly vexed with thartillerie of the olde Citadell, yet, their proper vertue preuailing aboue their preſent daunger, and the preſence of their generall aſſuring much the victorie, they tooke it, both with a fortune more ſpeedie, and an action more eaſie then was looked for, and with ſuch a terrible amaze to the Piſans, that abandoning their Rampiers, they fledde in all the quarters of the Citie, yea many, amongeſt whom was Peter Fambecourte a noble citizen with fortie Croſbow ſhot on horſebacke which hee had in charge, fledde out of Piſa: many did the lyke, without that the Maieſtrates made reſiſtance at the gates, in ſo much as if others of the Camp had followed the fortune of that mourning, they had caryed the towne to the great glorie of the Capteyne to whom had bene moſt happie the ſucceſſe of that day, which indeede was the beginning of his calamities: for that, not knowing (ſo he excuſed himſelfe) of thoccaſion that hapned without thinking of any ſuche, and being not determyned to giue thaſſalt with all the Camp, nor to other place then to that Towre, hee ſent not his men only to aſſalt the Rampier where they ſhould haue founde no reſiſtance, but alſo he made retyre moſt part of his footbandes, & they vnderſtanding that the fortreſſe of Stampace was wonne, deſiring to make a pillage & pray of the towne, run thether by heapes to enter: And in the meane while the Piſans (a bruite running thorow the Citie that the enemies folowed not the victorie) puſhed forwerd by the lamentable cryes of their wiues & women, who encouraged them rather to chuſe death, thē to liue vnder the yoke of the Florentyns, began to returne with a new valour to the gard of the Rampiers: Amongſt whom, Gurlyn remembring that from a part or Iawme of Stampace bending towardes the towne, there was a way that led to the gate of the ſea which they had before filled vp with earth & wood, & fortefied on that ſide to the Camp, but not on that part that looked to Stampace, he cauſed it to be rampierd & filled vp on that ſide, & caſting a plot forme of earth, he cut of the entrey on that part with the artilleries that were beſtowed in flanke: Aſſoone as Stampace was wonne Pavvle cauſed to be mounted there certeine Falcounets & port peeces, which ſhot thorow the towne of Piſa, but offended not the Rampiers, which albeit were much afflicted with the artillerie that was planted below, yet the Piſans redobling in corage by thimportunitie of their daūgers, abādoned them not at the ſame inſtant they battred the murdring houſe towardes. S. Anthony, & the water gate, & the defenſes, (Pavvle Vitelly not ceaſing to labour to fil vp the trenche with earth baſkettes, the more eaſelie to take the Rampier:) Againſt which oppreſſions the Piſans, riſing in courage in that they had receiued the night folowing from them of Lucqua a ſuccor of three hundred footmē, hurled into the trenche many ſortes of wildefyers: And laboring with a wonderfull reſolucion of minde and diligence to cōſtraine the Camp to abandon the Towre of Stampace, they turned directly thether a very great Port peece called Bufole, by whoſe furie the Camp was compelled to diſmount the artillerie which they had mounted aboue: And albeit Pavvle cauſed to be braked againſt it certeine Port peeces of his, by the which the mouth of Bufole was choked and broken, yet, ſparing not for all that to ſhoote, they brought in certeine dayes the Towre to that reaſon that Pavvle was conſtrained, not only to remoue his artillerie, but alſo to abandon the place: Notwithſtanding all this, the Generall would not make himſelfe fruſtrat of the hope he had to cary in the ende the victorie, which, (according to his cuſtome) deſiring to haue with the moſt ſuertie, & the leaſt hurt to the army that could bee, albeit in many places there was more then fyue hundred yeardes of the wal vppon the earth: he labored cōtinually to encreaſe the battery, to fil vp the ditches with earth, earth, and to fortefie the Towre of Stampace, to replant new artilleries, and to beate in flanke the great rampiers which the Piſans had made, labouring with all his pollicie and induſtrie to winne alwayes ſome commoditie to giue with more ſuertie, the aſſalt generall & determined: which laſt exployt, (notwithſtanding he had brought thinges into that eſtate that as often as he would haue followed the aſſalt he might haue had great hope of the victorie) he prolonged willingly, to thende the harmes of the armie might not deface the honor and reputacion of the victorie: And albeit the aſſiſtantes of the Florentyns (to whom euery litle reſpit was troubleſome) and the continuall letters and meſſages from Florence, ceaſſed not to haſten him to the aſſalt, the better to preuent thoſe impediments that might happen: yet Paulo ſtood firme in his owne councel, which, albeit might happely be diſcreete & according to the experience & diſcipline of warre, yet, it had a cõtrary fortune: for that the countrey of Piſa, which is ful of lakes & mariſhes betwene the next ſea & the citie, being in that ſeaſon of the yeare ſubiect to ayres peſtilent, and ſpecially on that ſide towardes the Camp, there came vppon the army in two dayes many diſeaſes, which ſo waſted and weakned the bodie of the Camp, that when Paulo gaue order to prepare to the aſſalt the foure and twentith of Auguſt, he founde ſo many of his regimentes made vnprofitable and vnhable for ſeruice, that thoſe that remeined whole and diſpoſed, ſufficed not to meinteyne thaſſalt: which vnhappie accident, albeit the Florẽtins and he (who was alſo ſicke) labored to helpe by leauying new bandes of footemen, yet, the influence of the ayre contending againſt their induſtry, made thinfectiõ ſo vehement that euery day the diminucion was found greater then the ſupplie: In ſo much that their long hope of the victorie being now turned into an other habit both doutful & deſperat, & fearing harmes both more ſpeciall and importing, he determined to leauy & breake vp the Camp: A reſolucion much reſiſted by the Florẽtyns, who aduiſed him that leauing garriſon ſufficient within the fortreſſe of Stampace, he wold reapoſe with the armie about the confines of Piſa: But he, making this councell no direction to him, abandoned the Towre of Stampace, which he helde not tenable, for that it had bene firſt ſhaked with his artilleries and then battred with the great ſhot of the Piſans: And drawing the whole armie to the way of the ſea the fourth of September, and not hable to trayle his artilleries by lande to Caſcina, for that the wayes were drowned with waters, he embarked them in the mouth of the Ryuer of Arne to conuey them to Lyuorne: But fortune ſtriuing againſt him in this laſte action; many of thartilleries were ſunke in the waters, and a little after drawne vp againe by the Piſans, who at the ſame tyme recouered eftſoones the Towre that gardes the mouth of the Ryuer: By theſe occaſions (the ſeruices yea and faith of men, are interpreted by opinion) the ill diſpoſicion conceiued alreadie by the people of Florence, was ſo redoubled with the Maieſtrates, that within fewe dayes being called to Caſcina by the Commiſſioners, vnder cooller to conſult into what places they ſhould diſtribute the companies, hee was made priſoner by commaundement of the ſoueraigne Maieſtrate of the towne, and from thence ſent to Florence: where the ſame night he arryued, being painefully examyned by torments, hee was executed by the head the day following by ſentence of the Maieſtrate, his brother being almoſt taken in the ſame daunger and fortune: for that as the Commiſſioners ſent to apprehende him in the ſame inſtant: So, beyng ſicke of the diſeaſe hee had taken in the Camppe, hee made ſemblaunce to obey them: And ryſing out of his bedde, he conuerted the tyme that they gaue him to araie him, into deuiſes & directions to ſteale away: In ſo much as beguiling with diligence,the ſecuritie of the Florentyns, he was in one inſtant with the helpe of his ſeruantes,well mounted vppon a horſe of ſpeede, and fleeing to Piſa, he was receiued with generall gladnes of the whole inhabitantes. The principall pointes wherein they quarelled with the lyfe of Pavvle Vitelly,& condemned him,were theſe: That it proceeded of his will only that Piſa was not taken, hauing good meane and oportunitie thereunto the ſame day that the rocke of Stampaco was forced: That he only did deferre to giue the aſſalt: That hee had many tymes giuen audience to men comming to him from Piſa, and neuer communicated with the Florentyns: That he had leuyed the Camp againſt the publike commaundement, and with the like contempt had abandoned Stampace: That he had drawne diuers others of the Capteines to occupie with him,Caſcina,Vicopiſan,and the artileries,to thende that in payments and other condicions,they might manage the Florentyns as they thought beſt: That in the coũtrey Caſẽtyn,he had had ſecret intelligẽces with the Medicis, & at the ſame time treated and almoſt concluded with the Venetians,to ſerue them when the time, of his paie with the Florentyns ſhould be determined, which now was almoſt expired: That,in that reſpect he had giuen ſafeconduit to the Duke of Vrbyn and to Iulyan de Medicis: he was ſtraitlie examined vppon all theſe pointes, & albeit he confeſſed nothing particularlie,yet they cut of all further examinacions, & fearing leaſt the french king (now come to Myllan) would vrge his deliuerie, they proceeded to execute him ſpeedely: Not one of his ſeruantes which after his death were examyned at leaſure,would confeſſe any thing,ſauing that he was much diſcontented with the Florentyns,for that they had made the Count Rinucce concurrant with him in authoritie, and for the difficulties they vſed in thexpedicion of prouiſions which hee demaunded,and ſometymes in his affaires particular, not forbearing at Florence to ſpeake ordinarily to his diſhonor: by which teſtimonies and confeſſions of his ſeruantes, albeit ſome remeyned poſſeſſed of this opinion, that hee behaued himſelfe not loyallie in his charge, hauing a pretence to be Lord of Piſa,and to occupy ſome other parte of the demeyne of Florence, where he enterteyned many intelligences and amities: yet the moſt parte beleeued well of his innocencie,and were perſuaded that he nouriſhed a great deſire to take Piſa,for the reputacion & glorie that would redowne to him, the principall end and reſpect of euery great Capteine.

The french king being at Myllan compoundeth with the moſt parte of the Potentates of Italy.

The french king, being now aryued at Myllan, all the Potentates of Italy except king Federyk came to him, ſome in perſon, and ſome by Embaſſadors, ſome to congratulat his victorie,and ſome to iuſtefie themſelues of thimputacion to bee more inclined to Lodovvyk Sforce then to him,and ſome to ſeeke ſuertie of him hereafter of their proper eſtates: The king receiued them all graciouſly, and compounded with them all, but diuerſly according to the diuerſitie of condicions, and according to the greatnes of the profit which he might drawe: hee tooke the Marquis of Mantua into his protection,and indued him with a companie of an hundred Launces,with an honorable penſion and the order of S. Michaell: he receiued likewiſe into his protection the Duke of Ferrara (he and the Marquis were with his maieſtie in perſon) who pertaked not in that benefit without well paying for it, with other difficulties,for that euer ſince he rendred the Caſtle of Genes to Lodovvyk, he hath bene eſteemed to beare a mynde contrary to the french: he accepted alſo into his grace and protection (but vnder a great ſumme of money) Iohn Bentiuole who had ſent to him his ſonne: But of all the reſidue, the Florentyns compounded with him moſt hardly and chargably for that (their merits all forgotten,and the harmes they had ſo long tyme endured during the late king,in folowing the frendſhips of Frãce)

all the court almoſt was againſt them, thoſe reaſons were not accepted that, (not to ſtir vp Lodovvyk Sforce againſt them, for the matters of Piſa,) had conſtrained them to remeyne Newters: for that thimpreſſion which the frenchmen tooke when king Charles gaue libertie to the Piſans, remeyned yet firmly fixed in their affections, beſides that the men of warre of the Camp, iudged them (both by brute and experience) to be men of merit, valour, and reputacion for ſeruice, which drew not a litle their diſpoſicions to beare them fauour: Beſides, the authoritie of Tryvulce was no ſmall impediment to the purpoſes of the Florentyns, for that aſpiring ambiciouſly to the Lordſhip of Piſa, he fauored wholly their cauſe, who deſired to receiue for their Lorde eyther him or any other in whom was habilitie to defende them againſt the Florentyns: who were generally blamed by the mouthes of the whole Court for the death of Pavvle Vitelly, as to execute without occaſion, a Capteyne of ſo great merit, and to whom the Crowne of Fraunce owed much in honor and friendſhip, for that his brother was killed and he made priſoner in the frenche ſeruice during the warres of Naples vnder the late king Charles: But in the ende, the king incliming more to his proper profit thē to things vaine, entred into cōpoſicion, by the which his maieſtie receiuing them into his protectiō, bound himſelf to defend thē againſt all men with ſix hundred Laūces & foure thouſand footmen, as alſo the Florentins to defend his eſtates in Italy with foure hūdred mē at armes & three thouſād footmē: That the king at their requeſts, ſhould apply that ayde of Launces, & (if need were) a ſtrength of artillerie, for the recouering of Piſa & the places occupied by them of Syena and Lucqua, but not of thoſe peeces which the Genovvays helde: And that, if theſe companies were not demaunded of him before, he ſhould be bounde, when he ſent an armie to the enterpriſe of Naples, to conuert either the whole or part of it to this expedicion: That the Florentyns, if they recouered Piſa and not otherwayes, ſhould be bounde to miniſter to him for the conqueſt of Naples fyue hundred men at armes, and fiftie thouſand Duckats to defraie the payes of the Svvyſſers for three moneths, that they ſhould reſtore to him thirtie thouſand duckats which Lodovvyk Sforce had lent them, rebating (according to thaccompt which Iohn Iacques Tryvulce ſhoulde make) ſo much as they had paied or diſpended for him: Laſtly, that they ſhould take for Capteine generall of their men of warre, the Prefect of Rome, brother ro the Cardinall. S. P. ad Vincla, at whoſe inſtance it was demaunded: In ſo goodly an occaſion, the ambition of the Pope ſlept not, who, ſoliciting earneſtly to haue promiſe kept with him, the king gaue to the Duke Valentynois (comē with him out of Fraūce) three hundred Launces defraied vppon the treaſors of the king, and guided by Yues D'alegre & foure thouſad Svvyſſers vnder the charge of thē Bailiffe of Dyō, but paide of the Popes purſſe, which companies were for his ayde in the warre which he mēt to make vppon the Viccaires of Romagna.

The townes of Romagna, vexed with others that are ſubiect to the church with ſundry accidents, haue bene for many yeares gouerned with a iuriſdiction almoſt ſeperat from the demayne of the church: for that ſome of the Viccaires payed not their tributes as they ought in homage of ſuperioritie, others payed them but with difficultie and hardnes, and for the moſt parte out of ſeaſon: But they all indiffrently without licence of the Popes, put them ſelues in paie with other Princes: wherein much leſſe that they made exceptions not to ſerue them againſt the church, but of the contrarie, they bounde themſelues to protect them euen againſt the authoritie and armes of the Popes being ſo much the more plawſible to thoſe Princes, by how much they were conuenient for their ſeruice, both for thoportunitie of their eſtates

& forces,& withal to hinder that the power & pride of the Popes ſhold not ſwel and riſe aboue order: In that time the Venetiãs poſſeſſed in Romagna the cities of Rauenna & Ceruia, which they had (not many yeares before) takẽ from the familie of Polenta, a people who, of Citizens priuat of Rauenna, were become Tyrants ouer their coũtrey, & afterwardes had thinveſtiture of Viccaires: Faenza, Furly, Imola, & Rimini, were in the power of Viccaires perticular: Ceſena, that had ben long cõmaũded by the family of Malateſte was eftſones returned to the church Domynick, the laſt Viccaire of the ſame Citie, being dead without children certeine yeares before. Therefore the Pope (whoſe ambicion was greater then his doctrine) pretending that thoſe Cities for many reſpectes were diuolued to the ſea Apoſtolike, and that he would reeſtabliſhe and reduce them to their auncient iuriſdiction (but indeede had intencion to appropriat them to Ceſar his ſonne) had contracted with the french king, that when he had accompliſhed his conqueſt of the Duchie of Myllan, he ſhould contribute and communicate with him for the recouery only of thoſe townes which were poſſeſſed by the Viccaires, comprehending the Citie of Peſera, whereof was Viccaire John Sforce, aforetyme his ſonne in lawe: for, the greatnes of the Venetians did not ſuffer, that thoſe thoughtes ſhould ſtretch out againſt them, who did not aſpire at that tyme to thoſe litle townes, which confining vppon the Ryuer of Po, were holden by the Duke of Ferrara: In ſo much that the Duke Valentynois, aſſoone as he had obteyned of the king the bandes promiſed, and ioyned them to the regiments of the church, he entred into Romagna, where he tooke with a ſpeede and fortune aboue his exſpectacion, the Citie of Imola by accord, and that about the later end of the yeare a thouſand foure hundred nientie and niene, a yeare wherein Italy being afflicted with ſo many emotions, felt alſo a ſcourge by the Turkes armies: for, Baiazet Ottoman hauing aſſailed with a mightie armie by ſea, the peeces which the Venetians held in Greece, ſent by lande an armie of ſix thouſande horſmen to pray the countrey of Fryull, and finding it without garde, they ouerranne it making Pillage and burnings euen vntil Lyuence: And hauing taken an innumerable proporciõ of priſoners, when they came neare the Ryuer of Tagliamente (to returne with the more eaſe) they reſerued ſuch as they thought they might leade with them in ſafetie, and made cruell murders of the others: And as it is a cuſtome infallible with fortune, not to let happen one miſchiefe vnaccompanied, ſo in Greece, the affaires of the Venetians trayned no better ſucceſſe, for that Anthony Gryman Capteine generall of tharmie which the Venetians oppoſed againſt thenterpriſe of the Turkes, was accuſed to haue let ſlippe thoccaſion to vanquiſh the enemies that iſſued out of the port of Sapience, and an other tyme at the mouth of the Gulphe of Lepanto: And after he was depoſed and an other preferred to his place, they acyted him to Venice, recommending thinformacion of the cauſe to the councell of the Pregati, where that cauſe was debated many monethes with no ſmall exſpectation of thiſſue, (his authoritie and greatnes defending him on the one ſide and on the other parte, his accuſors purſuing him with many arguments and teſtimonies: At length, ſtanding in great likelehood to haue the vpper hande, eyther by his authoritie, or the great number of his parents, or laſtly for that in that councell compounded vppon many wiſemen, there ſhould not be ſo much regarde to the generall bruites and ſlaunders which were not well proued, as to a deſire to vnderſtande ripelie the truth of the fact: the knowledge of the cauſe was transferred ouer to the iudgement of the great councell, by the maieſtrate of the aduocates of the communaltie, where fauors ceaſſing, or rather the lightnes of the multitude carying more then the grauitie of the Senators, hee was in the ende paſſed into exile perpetuall in the Ile of Eſſera.

Such and ſo great matters were brought to paſſe in the yeare. 1499. But in the yeare. 1500. were accompliſhed things of no leſſe importance, nor leſſe worthie of memorie, ſpecially for the ful remiſſion of that vaine and ſuperſticious Iubile, which being inſtituted in the beginning by the Popes to bee celebrated the Iubiley from a hundred yeares to an hundred yeares, not for pleaſure and pomp as the Romains did in their ſportes and feaſtes ſecular, but for an opinion (vaine and erroneous) of the health of ſoules, for that in the ſame (according to the fantaſtyke beliefe of Chriſtian people) were aboliſhed whollie all the ſinnes of thoſe who, acknowledging with true repentance their faltes committed, made viſitacion to the churches of Rome dedicated to the Prince of Thapoſtles: It was afterwardes ordeined to bee celebrated from fiftie yeares to fiftie, and in the ende reduced to fyue and twentie: But for the more ſolemne memorie of his primitiue inſtitucion, the hundreth yeare was celebrated with a greater affluence of people then the others.

In the beginning of this yeare, the Duke Valentynois, obteined without reſiſtance the Citie of Furly, the Ladie of the place hauing ſent her children and riches moſt precious to Florence, and abandoned that which ſhee could not defende, did determine to hold only the Cytadel & Rocke of Furly refurniſhed with ſufficient ſtrength of men and Artilleries: She had a vallour aboue the propertie of that ſex, and a reſolucion more reſembling a man then a woman, wherewith entring the place, ſhee ſtudied to her great glorie howe to defende it: But the Duke Valentynoys, after hee had aſſaied in vaine to diſpoſe her to yelde, began to batter the wall of the Citadell with a great furie of artillerie, the ſame bringing downe to the ground a great quantitie of the wall, with the which the earth of the Rampier which was behinde being choked, filled almoſt the depth of the ditche or trenche, and made the entrey more eaſie to his ſouldiours: By meane whereof, the defendantes falling into feares and doubtes, gaue place to their perils and abandoned the place, ſeeking to retyre into the Rocke, whether the Ladie made alſo her retraite after ſhe had performed all that could be required in the office of a defendant: But, as when things are in aduerſitie, many occaſions concurre to aduaunce the ende, ſo, as ſhe entred the Rocke, feare raiſed a tumult and confuſion, and the Dukes ſouldiors comming faſt vppon them, almoſt all her companies were cut in peeces, and the Victors entring with the ſame furie into the Rocke, tooke it and made ſlaughter of all ſuch as were there for defēce, except certeine of the chiefeſt which were retired with the Ladie into a Towre, who were made priſoners, & ſhe alſo communicating in their fortune, whom the Duke, (hauing more regarde to her vallour, then to her kinde) ſent priſoner to Rome where ſhe was kept in the Caſtle of. S. Ange, being notwithſtanding deliuered a litle after at the requeſt of Yue D'alegre.

Duke Valentynois taketh Furly.

After the Duke had obteined Imola and Furly, he marched to thexecution of other townes, but new accidents hapning vnlooked for, hindred his expedicion: for, after the french king had eſtabliſhed the thinges he had gotten, with orders conuenient, and hauing prolonged the truſe with the king of Romains, (comprehending therein the Duchie of Myllan and all that he helde in Italy) vntil the moneth of May next enſuing, he returned into Fraunce, leading with him the litle ſonne of Iohn Galeas giuen to him indiſcreetly by the mother, he dedicated him to a monaſtical lyfe, and left Iohn Iacques Tryvulce gouerner generall of the Duchie of Myllan in whom he reapposed much aſwell for his vallour and merits, as for the great enuy he bare to Lodovvyk Sforce: But (the faith of men chaunging with the alteration of kingdoms)

The french king returneth into Fraunce hauing firſt ſet order in the Duchie of Myllan.

the peoples of that ſtate kept not fidelitie with the king: partly for that the cuſtomes & behauiors of the french were intollerable to many, & partly for that they had not found in the king that liberalitie in depoſing all their tributes, which vnwiſely they perſuaded themſelues to obteine: And laſtly it imported much and was very greeuous to all the Gebelyn faction which was mightie in the towne of Myllan and confines, that Tryvulce chiefe of the Guelffes ſhould bee preferred to the gouernment: This euil diſpoſicion was wonderfully augmented by him ſelfe, who, bearing a nature factious and a ſpirit hautie and buiſie, fauoured (vnder thauthoritie of Maieſtrate) much more then was conuenient, thoſe that were of his partie: Beſides, (he that is falling ſhall finde many ſtumbling blockes) he eſtraunged much from him the myndes of the communaltie, for that in the open market place, he ſlue with his own hande certeine Butchers, who, following the raſhnes of the other populars refuſing to paye tributes from the which they were not exempted, reſiſted with force, the miniſters deputed to gather the reuenues: for which tyrannous and bloudie reaſons, moſt parte of the nobilitie & communaltie, naturally deſirous of newe things, wiſhed the returne of Lodovvyk, and euen began to call vppon his name with words and voices plaine and to be vnderſtanded: But after many thoughtes and cares trauelling commonly myndes afflicted, and redobled with a lamentable remembrance of his happines paſte, Lodovvyk with his brother Aſkanius preſented himſelfe to Maxymylian, of whom they were receiued with an humanitie expreſſing both compaſſion and comfort, for that he did not only perſuade them to be reſolute in their fortune, but alſo ſhowed many tokens to be much diſcontented with their calamities: he nouriſhed them with continuall promiſes to diſcende in their ayde in perſon, and with a ſtrong armie to ioyne with them for the recouerie of their eſtates, hauing thereunto good oportunitie for that he was then at accorde with the Svvyſſers: But thoſe hopes, both for the variation of his nature, and for that his intencions ill grounded, were as eaſely confounded, appeared euery day to be more vaine, and that ſo much the rather, by how much being continually preſſed with his accuſtomed neceſſities, he made them weary with his importunate demaundes for money: In ſo much as Lodovvyk and Askanius, making no foundation of his ſuccours, & leſſe certeintie in his hopes & promiſes, determined to make thenterpriſe of themſelues, being continually ſolicited by many gentlemen of Myllan, & did leauy for their better ſtrength, eight thouſand Svvyſſers, and fyue hundred Burgonion men at armes: of which ſtrong preparation Tryvulce gathered many feares and doubtes, and therefore, the better to encounter ſo great a daunger, he ſent immediatly to the Senat of Venice to cauſe their companies to march along the Ryuer of Adda, ſignifying withall to Tues D'alegre that it were neceſſary to leaue for a tyme the ſeruice of the Duke Valentynois and returne with ſpeede to Myllan with the frenchmen at armes and the Svvyſſers: And as daungers haſtie and ſodeine can ſuffer no delayes of remedie, and where the fyre beginneth firſt to kindle, there let water bee ſpeedely applied to preuent his further violence: So ſuch was the pollicie of Tryvulce, that to reſiſt the firſt furie of the enemies, he ſent one parte of his ſouldiours to Coma, (the ielouſie he had of the people of Myllan not ſuffring him to turne thether all his forces) But the care and quicknes of Sforce and his brother preuayled aboue all diligence in others, for that not tarying for the whole armie they had leauied, but leauing order to marche after them with ſpeede according to the neceſſitie of their perill, they paſſed the mounteines, and with a diligence aboue all exſpectacion being embarked in thoſe veſſels which were in the lake of Coma they approched neare that towne which they

tooke without reſiſtance (the frenche being retyred for the knowledge they had of the ill diſpoſicion of thinhabitantes:) The bruite of the loſſe of Coma (fame flyeth with ſwifter winges in caſes of reuolt and chaunge then in any other matter) being come to Myllan, ſo altered the mindes of the people, and almoſt all the chiefeſt of the faction Gebelyn, that they began to drawe into manifeſt tumult, and riſe into ſuch inſolent diſpoſition, that Tryvulce ſeeing no other remedie to the kinges affaires, retired ſodeinly into the Caſtle, and the night following fledde to Nouarre together with the men at armes which were retired into the Parke ioyning to the Caſtle (the people in their retrait following them by heapes vntill the Ryuer of Theſin): And leauing within Nouarre foure hundred Launces, he with the reſidue of his ſtrength went to Mortaro, thinking (and the other Capteines alſo) that they ſhould more eaſely recouer the Duchie of Myllan with the new ſuccours that were to come out of Fraunce, then be hable to defende it being thus deuided: Such is the incerteintie of fortune, that ſhe tranſferreth to one that which ſhe takes from an other, not regarding the equitie of cauſes, nor the merits of perſons, but making her fancie the meaſure of her actions, ſhe takes delite to ſhowe variacion of power vppon the Princes of the earth: for, aſſoone as the french men were gone from Myllan, the Cardinall Askanius made his entrey firſt, & then Lodovvyk who recouering it in as ſhort tyme and litle difficultie as he loſt it (except the Caſtle) was alſo made glad at his returne with a more franke and generall ſhow of affection and ioy of the people of Myllan, then they expreſſed when hee departed: The lyke diſpoſicion was founde in other cities and communalties, as in Pauya & Parma declaring immediatly for Lodovvyk, whoſe example, Lody & Plaiſance had folowed, if the bandes of the Venetians, (marched affore towardes the Ryuer of Adda,) had not bene entred: Alexandria, and almoſt all the places beyond Po, being furtheſt from Myllan and neareſt to Aſt which was french, ſtirred not, determining to take aduiſe what they ſhould doe vppon the iſſue and traine of things: Lodovvyk being thus repoſſeſſed of Myllan, made ſpeedy leauies of as many Italian footmen and men at armes as he could, labouring, by petition, by offers, and all maner of hopes, all thoſe in whom he had any reaſon to exſpect ſuccours in ſo great neceſſitie: Therefore he aduertiſed Themprour by Galeas S.Seueryn of his happie beginning, beſeeching him to ſupplie him with men and artilleries: And becauſe it ſtood not with his fortune and alſo was farre from his deſire to haue the Senat of Venice his enemie, he gaue direction that the Cardinall Askanius ſhould ſpeedely ſende the Biſhop of Cremona to Venice to offer them the readie will and inclinacion of Lodovvyk to accept ſuche condicions as it pleaſed them to demaund: But the conſtancy of the Senat of Venice made vaine all that labour, for that they determined not to exchaunge their confederacion with the french king, for the vncerteine and newly reconciled frendſhips of Lodovvyk: The Genovvays notwithſtanding the importunate ſolicitacions of Lodovvyk, refuſed to returne vnder his obedience: And the Florentyns would not heare his requeſt touching the repayment of the money which he had lent them: Only the Marquis of Mantua ſent to him his brother with a certeine proporcion of men at armes: there came to him alſo the Lordes of Myrandola, of Carpy, and Corege, and the Siennoys releeued him with ſmall ſummes of money: ſuccours almoſt contemnible in ſo great daungers, as alſo did litle import the aydes of Phillipp Roſſe and of the Vemineſques, whoſe fathers albeit had bene diſpoiled by him of their auncient liuinges: yet, Phillip, leauing without leaue the paye of the Venetians, went thether to recouer his landes, and hauing obteyned them, ioyned himſelfe to the army of Lodovvyk: the famuly of Verma did the lyke, and they both to reenter into grace by that occaſion: Lodovvyk, ioyning diligence to his fortune, and not vſing the fauour of the tyme in vayne, after he had aſſembled a thouſande fiue hundred men at armes, beſides the Burgonion bandes of horſemen, and layed to the regiments of Svvyſſers, many Italian footmen, he left the Cardinall before the Caſtle, and paſſed ouer Theſin: And obteyning by accorde the towne and Caſtle of Vigeneua, he layde ſeege to Nouarre, chooſing that enterpriſe affore the expugnacion of Mortaro, either for that the frenche had made ſtrong fortifications at Mortaro, or els for that he eſteemed Nouaro (a towne renowmed and plentifull with all thinges) to import more for the reputation & ſubſtance of the warre, or perhappes he imagined, that the recouerie of that towne woulde breede want of vittels, and ſo conſtraine the french that were within Mortaro to abandon it: or at leaſt he caſt, that it would hinder Yue D'alegre from entring Nouaro, who was now marching from Romagna: for, aſſoone as he had receiued aduertiſements from Tryvulce (leauing the Duke Valentynois in the enterpriſe of Peſero) he departed ſpeedely with all the horſemen and the Svvyſſers: And vnderſtanding neare to Parma, the rebellion of Myllan, he accorded with thoſe of Parma and Plaiſance not to offende them, ſo that they would not hinder his paſſage: And being come neare Tortona he entred the towne, where, at thinſtigacion of the Guelffes of that Citie burning in deſire to be reuenged of the Gebelyns, who, (returned to the deuocion of Lodovvyk) had expulſed them, he put all to ſacke and ſpoile, (the Guelffes crying out in vaine of his faith, for that their loyaltie was no better reſpected, but being the kings faithful ſeruants, they were no otherwiſe vſed, then belonged to the deſeruings of his moſt traiterous enemies: from Tortona he marched into Alexandria, where he ſtaied, for that the Svvyſſers of his armie, either becauſe they were not paied, or for ſome other ſecret reaſō, left him, & wēt to the Duke of Myllās Camp, whoſe ſtrength being now greater then his enemies, he prepared ſpeedely to the battry of Nouaro, to thend to cary it, affore the frēch (exſpecting ſuccors from the king) were ſtrong enough to encounter him in the field: A matter which ſucceeded happely to him: For that the frēch bands that were within Nouaro, hauing no reaſon of hope or poſſibilitie to defende it, agreed to deliuer vp the towne, receiuing the promiſe of his faith to depart in ſuertie with all their goods, which he kept iuſtly with them protecting them with ſafeconduite to Verceyll: And albeit, he was perſuaded by many that the ouerthrowing of thoſe bandes was of great importance for his victorie, wherein they occupied theſe reaſons, that if it were lawfull, according to thauthoritie and examples of great men, to breake faith to conquer a Lordſhip of an other, that it was more lawfull to ſtraine both othe, faith, and all promiſes, to keepe that which was his owne: yet he abſtained from all violacion, hauing regarde to the eſtate of his perils, & fraile condicion of his fortune: After he had got Nouaro, he deuiſed how he might haue the Caſtle: But it was beleeued that if he had aduaunced to thenterpriſe of Mortaro, all the french bandes had fled affore him ouer Po, (Tryvulce and the Lorde of Ligny not agreeing well together.)

Whileſt Lodovvyk was in theſe expedicions, following the fortune that beſt led him to the reconquering of his eſtates, no leſſe care and diligence occupied the frenche king, who, vnderſtanding the rebellion of Myllan, diſgeſted it with no litle greeſe and diſcontentment: And therefore, (ſodeine miſchieſes requiring ſpeedie remedies) he diſpatched with a wonderfull ſpeede into Italy, M. Trymoylle with ſixe hundred Launces, and ſent to leauy a great regiment of Svvyſſers, (folowingan auncient and aſſured experience of warre to repreſſe with a ſtrong force a rebellion in an

an eſtate newly conquered) And laſtly, to thende there might be an exact diligence in all prouiſions, he created the Cardinall of Amboyſe, his Lieftenant for Italy, & diſpatched him immediatly to Aſt: In ſo much as all things prepared with a quick readines, there was muſtred in Italy for the king in the beginning of April, a ſtrength of fiftiene hũdred Laũces, ten thouſand Svvyſſers footmen, & ſix thouſand of the kings ſubiects, vnder the leading of Trymoylle, Tryvulce, & Ligny: Which companies being drawne into one Camp at Mortaro, marched to Nouarro, hauing no leſſe cõfidence in treaſon, then in their forces: For that the Svvyſſer Capteins which were with Lodovvyk, had ſecret intelligence & practiſe of cõſpiracie with them by the meanes of their countreymen which ſerued in the french armie (notwithſtanding in the action of Nouarro they ſhowed faith, vallour, & good ſtabilitie of affection) whereof Lodovvyk being iealous by many apparant cõiectures, laboured much (his neceſſities being violent) to ioyne to him the foure hundred horſmen & eight thouſand footmen which were leauied at Myllan: But as a ruine determined runnes to his end by a proporcion of degrees & partes meaſured & limited: So, at Nouaro the Svvyſſers, ſtirred vp by their Capteins, began to mutyn, taking their occaſion for that their paies were not performed at the iuſt daies that were promiſed: And albeit the Duke ran to the ſtirre in perſon, & beſides his pitiful requeſtes and praiers training with them great occaſion of compaſſion, gaue amongeſt them all his ſiluer plate & veſſell, deſiring to reſt contented but till the money came from Myllan: Yet the Svvyſſer Capteynes fearing that if the bandes which were leauied at Myllan ſhould bee ioyned to the Camp, their treaſon would ſuffer eyther imperfection or preuention, wrought ſo that the frenche Camp being all put into armes and readines, approched the walles of Nouarro, and enuyroning a great parte of the towne, they diſpatched certeyne horſmen to occupie the wayes betweene the Citie and the Ryuer of Theſin, to cut of from the Duke & all others, all means to flee to Myllan: But as neceſſitie is mightie to make men reſolute, ſo the Duke ſeeing more and more into his perils, & that almoſt the whole diſpoſicion of his Camp agreed with the ſtate of his daungers, ſought to iſſue out of Nouaro with his whole armie to feight with the enemie, hauing alreadie ſent out in order the light horſmen & the Burgonions to begin the skirmiſh: But he was apparantly reſiſted by the Svvyſſer Capteines, who tolde him they wold not come to blowes with their parentes, brethren, and countreymen, without the leaue of their Lordes, but made as though they would departe ſodeinly into their countrey: The Duke not hable eyther by praiers, with teares, or infinit promiſes to practiſe any whit their barbarous diſpoſicion, made electiõ of the beſt part of his aduerſitie & recommended himſelf wholly vnto them, at leaſt that they wold lead him to a place of ſuertie: A miſery ſo much the more lamentable, by how much the cõdicion of his affaires & perils, cõſtrained him to ſeeke for his ſafetie, where he ſawe nothing but apparant arguments of conſpiracie againſt his life: Wherin in this was he moſt miſerable and vnhappie, that being ſo neare the laſt action of recouerie of his eſtates, he was not only depriued of the glorie of his victorie, but alſo (fortune is infinit in malice) paſſed ouer to a deſolacion irreparable, and a ruyne whereunto remeyneth no other conſolacion, hope, or mercie, then ſuche as may be exſpected of an enemie ambicious, iniurious and reuengefull: But the Svvyſſers hauing contracted with the french Capteines to go their wayes, & not to lead him with thẽ, albeit their crueltie wold not ſuffer them to graunt to his ful demaũd, yet in cõpaſſiõ they conſented that he ſhould march away amongeſt them, taking the attyre and furniture of one of their footemen, and ſo, if he were not knowne, to ſaue himſelfe

by the helpe of his fortune: which condition he was driuen to accept for a laſt neceſſitie, but yet it was not ſufficient for his ſafetie: For that, they marching by direction thorow the midſt of the french armie, he was vnhappely knowne by the diligẽt eſpiall of ſuche as were aſſigned to that charge: Or (more likely) diſcloſed by ſome ſecret inſtruction of the Svvyſſers, as he marched in a Squadron on foote, attired and armed & diſguiſed in all pointes as a Svvyſſer, & haſting to his laſt calamitie, he was by that meane made priſoner: A ſpectacle ſo lamentable that it brought teares into the eyes of many yea euen of the verie enemies: Galeas S. Seuerin, Frecaſſa, and Anthony Maria, his brethren, communicated with his fortune, being betraied by the ſame diſloialtie of the Svvyſſers: After the Duke was takẽ, the army wẽt diſperſing, and no more reſiſtãce appearing, all things were ſeene ful of feare & cõfuſion, which made the Cardinal Askanius, who had already ſent towards the Camp thoſe bandes that were leauied at Myllan, to leaue the Caſtle, & ſeeke his ſuertie in ſome place of better truſt: Many of the nobilitie of the Gebelyns folowed him, who being too apparantly declared for Lodovvyk, diſpaired to finde pardõ with the frẽch: But as it was ſet down in deſtiny, that in the calamitie of the two brethren, treaſon ſhold be mingled with euil fortune: So he had determined to reappoſe himſelf ſomewhat the night after at Riuolta in the coũtrey of Plaisãce, which is a borough apperteining at that time to Conrard de Lande, a Gentleman of the Citie of Plaiſance & his kinſman and auncient friend: The ſame Conrard, chaunging wil with fortune, ſent preſently to Plaiſance for Charles Vrſin and Sonzin Benzon then in the paye of the Venetians, to whom he deliuered the ſayde Askanius and Hermes Sforce brother to the late Duke John Galeas, with one parte of the Gentlemen that came with him, the reſidue, being more happie or more wyſe, forbare their reſt that night, and paſſing further, preuented their perill: Askanius was immediatlye ledde priſoner to Venice, but the French King, iudging it neceſſarie for the ſuertie of the Duchie of Myllan to be poſſeſſed of him, ſent for him to Venice, where finding ſome difficultie to deliuer him, he required him with proteſtations and threates, alleaging that he apperteyned to him in due propertie and intereſt, for that he was taken in a countrey of his obedience: A requeſt which albeit ſeemed verie ſharpe and vnworthie of the name of the Venetian ſtate, yet, to auoyde the furie of his armies, it was graunted more by compulſion then conſcience, and not only the perſon of the Cardinall deliuered, but alſo all thoſe of Myllan that were taken with him: And withall, Baptiſta Viſcounte with other Nobles of Myllan which were withdrawne for the ſame occaſion into the townes of Guiaradadda vnder ſafeconduit to remeyne there in ſuertie with expreſſe mencion of the Frenche, were put into the Kinges handes for feare of the frenche armies, ſo muche did preuayle with the Senat of Venice the terror of the french forces, more then the regarde to the dignitie of their common weale: The Citie of Myllan, abandoned of all hope yelded to the generall calamitie, and ſent ſpeedie Embaſſadours to the Cardinal of Amboyſe to ſolicit for pardon: he receiued them into grace, and pardoned the rebellion in the name of the King, but vnder this bonde, to paye three hundred thouſand Duckattes, of the which the King acquited them afterwardes of a great parte: He pardoned alſo other Townes that had rebelled, which he taxed according to their qualitie, making the victorie profitable, and the tranſgreſſions of thoffendors an encreaſe of the Kings treaſor.

The Duke of Myllan made priſoner by the treaſon of the Swiſſers.

Cardinall Askanius leaueth Myllan abandoned.

Cardinall Askanius betraied and taken.

Cardinall Askanius deliuered ouer to the frenchmen.

The enterpriſe thus happely ſucceeding, and the regimentes of men of warre diſſolued and licenced, the footemen of the foure Cantons of Svvyſſers which bee more neare then the others to the Towne of Bellyzona ſcituated within the mountaines mountaines, tooke the Towne as they returned to theyr countrey : A place which the Frenche King might haue drawne from them in the beginning, for a verie ſmall porcion of money : But as he loſt oftentymes by the propertie of his nature, occaſions of great thinges, by ſparing ſmall proporcions of expences : So tymes and accidents came ſo about afterwardes, that many tymes, and by many ſolicitations, he would haue purchaſed it of them with a verie great price, for that it is a ſtraite verie conuenient to hinder the deſcending of the Swyſſers into the Duchie of Myllan : Lodowyk Sforce was caried to Lyon where the King was, and entring the towne at noonedayes, many multitudes of people flocked to ſee a Prince, who, from ſuch a greatnes and maieſtie, and for his felicitie enuied of many, was falne into ſo great a miſerie : And not hable to obteine leaue to be brought to the Kinges preſence, which he much deſired, he was conueyed within two dayes after to the Towre of Loches, wherein he remeyned priſoner ten yeares, euen to the ende of his life, being now incloſed in one ſtraite priſon the thoughtes and ambicion of him, which earſt could ſkarcely be conteined within the limits & tearmes of all Italie : A Prince, certeinly moſt excellent for his eloquence and induſtrie, and for many giftes of nature and ſpirit, a creature of verie rare perfection : And laſtly not vnworthie of the name of mylde and mercifull, if the death of his Nephew had not defiled him with bloudie infamie : But on the other ſide, he caryed a mynde vayne & full of thoughtes buiſie and ambicious, and nouriſhing alwayes intentions diſſembled, he kept no reckoning of his promiſes and faith : He alwayes preſumed ſo muche of himſelfe, that ſeeming to be diſcontented, when praiſes were giuen to the wiſedome and councels of others, he perſuaded him ſelfe to be hable by his Arte and induſtrie to alter and turne the conceptions of euerie one to what purpoſe he liſted : The Cardinall Askanius folowed him a litle after, but he was both receiued with more honor and humanitie, and graciouſly viſited by the Cardinall of Amboyſe, by whoſe interceſſion he was ſent to the great Tower of Bourges, a priſon more honorable, wherein the king that ſent him, had bene reſtrained two yeares in captiuitie : So variable and miſerable is the deſtinie of man, and ſo incerteine to euery one what wil be his cõdicion in time to come.

THE FYFT BOOKE OF THE hiſtorie and diſcourſe of Guicciardin.

SVCHE is the diſpoſition of myndes occupied with ambicion, that who are deſirous of glorie, are eaſelie ſtirred to doe thinges contrarie to reaſon, councell, and experience: Ambicion is an humor that carieth men into weenings farre aboue the poſſibilitie of their proper power, & ouerruleth their thoughtes without regard to the oportunitie of tymes, places, or occaſions: as is expreſſed in thinclinacion of the French King, in whom the abſolute & happie conqueſt of the Duchie of Myllan, had nouriſhed ſuche ſpirites of will and courage, that the ſelfe ſame ſommer he woulde haue proceeded to thenterpriſe of the kingdome of Naples, had not the feare which he had of the deſcending of the Alemans, reſtrayned his raſhenes, and made him wyſe agaynſt the propertie and working of his will: For, notwithſtanding he had (the yeare before) obteyned a contract of truce of Maxymylian Ceſar, wherein the Duchie of Myllan was comprehended: yet, Maxymylian debating with better conſideration, howe muche the maieſtie of the Empyre woulde bee diminiſhed by the alienation of ſo principall a Cheeff, and what diſhonour woulde followe him for ſuffring to be deueſted from it Lodovvyk Sforce, who not only had put him ſelfe vnder his protection, and reappoſed whollie in the hopes which hee gaue him: But alſo, had bound himſelfe to his ſuccours by receiuing his money at ſundrie tymes, & in great quãtities: He would no more heare Thembaſſadors of the French, & refuſed alſo all audience to the Agents of the Venetiãs, as vſurpers of certein places apperteining to Thempire: And laſtly, ioyning to the memory of aunciẽt ielouſies & iniuries don to him

him and his predeceſſours in diuers ſeaſons by the houſe of Fraunce, the inflamed compaſſion which he had of the miſerable calamities of the two brethren: he helde many generall diottes and aſſemblies, to ſtirre vp the electors and other Princes of Iermany to ioyne in the quarrell and reuenge of ſo high wrongs committed no leſſe againſt him thē the whole nation of Iermany, to whom thimperiall dignitie was proper: And to giue better operaciō to his purpoſe in the minds of the Iermain princes, he laide affore thē conſideratiōs of daungers that might happen, if the french king, preſuming more and more by ſo great a pacience of the Princes of Thempire, and riſing into pryde by ſo many fauours of victorie and fortune, woulde ſo farre aſpire as to ſet the Crowne imperiall vppon the heades of french kinges, and incorporate the ſoueraine eſtate in that forreine famulie as had bene done affore tymes: Whereunto the Pope would conſent eaſelie, partly by neceſſitie, (not hable to reſiſt his power) and partly for the reſpect of his ſonne, whom he ſtudied to make to excell in greatnes and dignitie, not remembring that thoſe authorities are vniuſt, whoſe meanes be vnlawfull, and that the vertuous man ſhoulde not obtrude into rule, but receiue it as if he were thereto compelled.

This was the cauſe why the king (not knowing to what ende the race and courſe of his plottes might runne, tooke truce with his enterpriſes, & deferred till an other tyme the execution of his thoughts touching the warre of Naples: By reaſon & meane wherof, his men of warre being not intangled with other enterpriſe, he was cōtēted to giue to the Florentyns thoſe bands & regiments which they did demaunde for the recouering of Piſa & Pietraſanta: And yet not without many doubts & difficulties, for that both the Piſans, the Genouuays, the Siennoys & they of Lucqua, made great inſtance to the cōtrary, offring to giue the king preſently an hūdred thouſand crownes vppon condition that Piſa, Pietraſanta, and Mont Pulcian might be protected from the harmes and ambicion of the Florentyns, & to make to him a perpetuall paiment of fiftie thouſand duckats yearely, if the Piſans by his meanes obteined the fortreſſes of the port of Lyuorna with all the region of Piſa: To theſe offers it ſeemed that the mynde of the king was much inclined, by a couetous deſire of the money: Notwithſtanding (as was his familiar cuſtome in things of importance), he referred the councell and deliberation of all thinges to the Cardinall of Amboyſe, who was then at Myllan: Affore whom, notwithſtanding the importunities & labours of the ſtates affore named, did negociat with great diligēce I. Iacques Tryvulce, & I. Louvys de Fieſque they both noriſhing an equall deſire to manage the iuriſdiction of Piſa, and in that reſpect offred to paie to the king for the graunt, a great proporcion of money, alleaging withall that (thoportunitie & occaſion concurring) it was an actiō meete for his ſuertie to holde vnder the Florentyns, and keepe in weaknes the other Potentates of Italie: But the Cardinall, preferring integritie affore perticular fauor, ioyned to the fayth and promiſe giuen by the king, the conſideracion of the late merites of the Florentyns, who, expreſſing a liberal and readie ayde to his enterpriſe and conqueſt of Myllan, conuerted at his requeſt into bandes and ſtrength of men, the paimentes of money which they were bounde to paie in that caſe: And therefore it was reſolued to refurniſhe the Florentyns for the recouerie of Piſa, (beſides the reſtitucion of Pietraſanta and Mutron) with a regiment of ſixe hundred Launces paied by the king, and fiue thouſande Suyſſers vnder the Bayliffe of Dyon with a proporcion of Gaſcoins at their owne charges, together with all ſuche ſortes of Artilleryes and Municions as ſhoulde bee neceſſarye for that enterpryſe: They had alſo agaynſte the Kynges will and theyr meanynges a ſtrengthe of two thousand Svvyſſers more (ſuche is the cuſtome of that nation) of all which companies Monſr Beaumont had the charge, for that the Florẽtyns, reteining a memorie of his auncient readines to render to them Lymorna, reappoſed more in him then in any other, and in that humor demaunded him for their Generall, not conſidering, that in matters of enterpriſe, authoritie and knowledge in thinges of warre, is no leſſe neceſſarie in a leader of an armie, then faith, for that in warre, neither the multitude of ſouldiours, nor the puiſſance vnskilfull, can ſo much auayle to the victorie, as knowledge, and exerciſe: The king with a more ſounde and better counſel, had determined to giue them M. D'alegre, a Capteine farre more experienced in warre, and to whom, for his noblenes of bloud, and reputacion of vertue the armye would haue giuen a more readie and willing obedience: But the troubles and difficulties which accompanied the ſuccours of the french, began euen now to appeare: for that the payment of the footmen beginning from the firſt day of May, they had ſpent all that moneth in Lombardie in the ſeruice of the king, who deſired by meane of that marching to draw money from the Marquis of Mantua, & the Lords of Carpy of Correge, and Myrandola, to puniſh them for that they had miniſtred ayde to Lodovvyk Sforce: In ſo much that albeit the Florentyns holding for ſuſpected their ſlowe proceeding, & that thintermiſſion and diſcõtinuance gaue oportunitie to the Piſans to prepare & prouide, were at a reſolutiõ to abãdõ thẽterpriſe: yet, looking better into the neceſſitie of their affaires, they held it leſſe hurtful to refurniſh a ſecond pay, & ſo make thẽ march on, thẽ to let mony ſuppreſſe ſo fayre an occaſiõ: At lẽgth, the L. of Carpy, of Myrandola, & of Correge (for whõ the Duke of Ferrara made interceſſiõ) cõpoũded for twẽty thousãd duckats, & the labour being vaine to ſtaie to force the Marquis of Mantua, who, on thoneſide fortefied himſelfe, and on the other ſide alleged his pouertie and want of money, and ſending withall his Embaſſadours to the king to ſolicit his pardon: the armie marched and eneamped at Montchiarucola, a village in the countrey of Parma apperteining to the famulie of the Torellys, who had ſuccoured Lodovvyk Sforce: Not ſo muche for any deſire the armie had to puniſhe them, as to threaten Iohn Bentyuolle by drawing vppon the limits of Bolognia, hauing (amongeſt the reſidue) borne fauors to the cauſe of Lodovvyk: The peril of his condicion, conſidered with the ill inclination of the time, made him to compound, paying the king fortie thouſand Duckattes, for the which, his maieſtie tooke him of new into his protection together with the Citie of Bolognia, but with this expreſſe limitacion, not to preiudice the prorogatiues or rightes which the church had there: After the contract of Bolognia, and Montchiarucola taken by force, the armie returned backe to paſſe ouer Thappenyn by the way of Pontremo: And as they entred the coũtrey of Lunigiana, following more their profites and appetites, then honour or equitie, they runne into many inſolences, and at the inſtance of the Fregoſes, tooke the borowe of Maſſa and other landes, from Aubry Maleſpina being vnder the protection of the Florentyns: Paſſing further in this courſe of behauiour, they of Lucque (notwithſtanding they were in great ſtrife for the matter, the communaltie muche impugning it) deliuered ouer Pietra Santa to Monſr Beaumont in the kinges name, who leauing Garriſõ in the Caſtle, tooke not away their officers of the town, for that the Cardinall of Amboyſe, in whom remeyned ſmall reckoning of the promiſes made to the Florentyns, for that he had receiued a certeyne proporcion of money of the Lucquoys, had receiued them into the protection of the king, with conuencion that his maieſtie ſhould holde Pietra Santa in deputation vntil he had declared to whom the right did apperteine: But in theſe ſeaſons, the Piſans ſeeing many intencions diſcloſed

ſed to their harmes and ruine, became the more reſolute & obſtinate in their defēce, and had by the helpe of Vitellozze, (with whom they were entred into great conjunction being alſo enemie to the Florentyns) certeine ingeniſts to dreſſe their fortifications, wherein might be diſcerned a wonderful trauell both of men & women in great concurſſe and emulation who ſhould labour moſt to ſet forwarde the workes: And yet (it is ordinarie with men in faction and enterpriſe to diſſemble) they forgot not to enterteine the french, ſubmitting with generall conſent, their whole towne to the king, and in that regard ſent inſtruments Autentike not only to Monſr Beaumōt, but alſo to Phyllypp Rabeſtyn gouernor for the king at Genes, who, with a ſinguler raſhnes accepted it in the kinges name: And M. Beaumont, ſending a Heralt to Piſa to demaunde the towne, they made anſwere with many humilities, that they deſired nothing with greater affection then to liue vnder the kinges obedience, & in that eſtate of loue and well meaning they were readie to giue them ſelues vp to his deuocion, ſo that his maieſtie would aſſure them vnder his honour and word of a Prince, that he would not put them vnder the power of the Florentyns: which proteſtation they followed with the teares and weepings of the Ladies, with all other ſortes of means wherein they thought was vertue to perſuade the Heralde, that their hartes, willes, and affections were wholly dedicated to the Crowne of Fraunce which had firſt put them in libertie: Theſe petitions were vaine to M. Beaumont, who looking further into their weakenes and neceſſities, then bearing any compaſſion to their calamities, denied to accept the offers of their Embaſſadors ſent to him, and encamped before the towne the laſt day ſauing one of Iune, betweene the gate of Plages, and the gate Caleeſana right ouer againſt the quarter called Barbagianni: he battered all that night with great furie, and continued the action the moſt parte of the day following, in which time, the artillerie, both good of it ſelfe, and planted to all conueniencie, had made euen with the earth, threeſcore Cubits of the wall: And aſſoone as the batterie ceaſſed to ſhoote, the horſmen and footemen entermedled together, runne without order or diſcipline to giue thaſſalte, not conſidering in what ſorte they might paſſe a deepe trenche which the Piſans had made betweene the wall that was battered, and the Rampier that was within: In ſo much as when they had diſcouered the greatnes of it, and wondred much at his deapth, they conſumed the reſidue of the day rather as beholders of the difficultie then diſpoſed to make good thaſſalt: The fortune of this day, ioyned to the conſideration of the impediments diſcloſed made diminiſhe more and more the hopes of the frenchmen to cary Piſa: partly for that they fainted in courage, aſwel for the qualitie of the Rampiers, as reſolucion of thoſe in the towne: and partly, for that the Piſans renuing the practiſes and meanes which they were wont to vſe, the auncient inclination of the french, began to take new lyfe and nouriſhe newe fauours towardes them: In ſo muche as the frenchmen, beginning to enterteine meetinges & familiarities with thoſe that were within the towne communicating together with a friendſhip and libertie not ſuſpected: and they for their partes recontinuing the ſame offers to reſigne themſelues wholly to the kings deuocion vppon condicion not to be eftſoones paſſed ouer to the oppreſſion of the Florentyns, The cauſe of the Piſans was fauored thorow the whole Camp, and oftentimes defended with ſuch declarations of good meaning euen affore the Captaines, that the greateſt part of the Camp, gaue thē corage to meinteine their defēce, wherin (beſides the incitation of the frenchmen) they were ſpecially incouraged by Fraūceſ Tryuulce Lieftenant of the regiment of Iohn Iacques, and by Galeas Palmoyſin, which ledde a band in the french Camp: By thoportunitie of theſe diſorders & ſufferance of the Camp, Tarlatyn (of the towne of Caſtello) entred into Piſa on that ſide towards the ſea, with certeine olde ſouldiours which Vitellozze ſent to the ſuccours of Piſa: A man at that tyme but darke and vnknowen, but aſpiring afterwardes to the place of Capteine, he continued and followed the defence of that Citie to the ende, to his great honour: To this common inclination, many bands of horſmen and footmen, added many other inſolencies, for that, deſiring that the ſeege might be leauied, they began to ſacke and ſpoile the vittels that were brought to the Camp: And ſo farre multiplied they in all diſorders (thauthoritie of the Generall being not ſufficient to reſtraine them) that the footbands of the Gaſcoines, abandoned the armie in manner of tumult, (their example breeding the lyke mutinie in all the reſidue): And at parting, certeine footbandes of the Svvyſſers which were come from Rome, according to the kinges direction, ſtaide as priſoner Luke D'albiſſe Commiſſarie for Florence: The occaſion (as they alleaged) was, for that their paies were deteined which were due for a ſeruice they had bene at affore tyme within Lyuorna: The Camp diſperſed by degrees, for that the regiment of Svvyſſers, and other footebandes, went awaye foorthwith: Only the men at armes ſtaied ſomewhat neare about Piſa, where they had not ſpent many dayes in reappoſing themſelues, but they returned into Lombardy without tarying till they knew the kinges wil and direction, leauing the affaires of the Florentyns in great diſorder, for that they had diſmiſſed all their footbandes, to be more hable to furniſhe the paies of the Svvyſſers: The Piſans turned theſe confuſions into an occaſion of exploit and enterpriſe, and with an expedicion agreeable to the conſent and oportunitie of the tyme, they went and planted a Camp affore Librafatta, which they tooke eaſely, noleſſe by thindiſcreſſion of thennemie, then by their proper ſtrength: The manner of that ſucceſſe was this: Whileſt the aſſalt was in charging all the footemen that were within, running to the breach, ſome of thoſe of the Camp by ſkaling Ladders entred by the higheſt Iawme of the Caſtle which was not garded: Which ſurpriſe both ſodeine and terrible, ſo aſtoniſhed the footemen, that they yelded themſelues: And linking ſtill their fortune with their victorie, they drue their Camp with a preſent ſpeede affore the Baſtillion Ventura, & whileſt thaſſalt was in action, the footemen yelded either by faintnes of courage, or by treaſon of the Capteine S. Brandano, Cunſtable of the Florentyns, of nation a Luckoys, and there remeining in Garriſon: But as the conqueſt of theſe places was verie profitable to the Piſans, for that it had opened to them a larger ſkoape on that ſide towardes the Lucquoys, and giuen elſwhere almoſt a generall libertie: So yet, ſuch ſucceſſe of the thinges of Piſa troubled not a litle the minde of the french king, who ſaw howe much it would diminiſh the reputation of his armie, beſides that he bare very impaciently that one perticular Citie, ſupported only by her inhabitantes, & wherin was not only one Capteine of name, ſhold reſiſt the armies of Fraunce, which had runne thorow all Italy to the generall terror & feare of euen the chiefeſt Potentates: wherein as men in thinges that be greeuous to them doe oftentimes beguile themſelues, he occupied in him ſelfe this perſuaſion, that the aduerſities of Piſa hapned by this defalt that the Florentyns had not made due prouiſions of vittelles, Pyonners, and Munitions as his people aſſured him for their diſcharge, beleeuing that all other thinges had rather failed in tharmie, then vallour, he complained alſo that fauouring too much thimportunities of the Florentyns, he yelded to commit ſo great an armie rather to M. Beaumont then to M. D'alegre, by which indiſcreſſion thoſe diſorders were hapned: And of the other parte, deſiring to recouer the reputacion loſt, he ſent to Florence M. de Corocu his Chamberlaine, not ſo muche to be informed if the reapportes of his Capteines were true, as to practise with the Florentyns, that not losing hope to haue hereafter a better succesſe, they would consent that his men at armes might returne to soiorne in the countrey of Pisa, the better to keepe that Citie for the winter following, in continuall feare & bridle, with intencion in the spring tyme, to recontinue the seege with an armie more reasonable, compounded of Capteines better experienced, and souldiours more obedient: This offer was refused of the Florentyns, as dispairing of any better issue by the ayde of the Frenche armies, a matter which made worse their condicions, for that, a bruite running in all places that the King had left them, the Genovvays, the Lucquoys, and the Sennoys, beganne to minister openly to the Pisans both men and money: And at Florence, the diuisions so increased amongest the Citizens, that they were not only in disabilitie to recouer the thinges lost, but also they prouided not in any sort for the disorders that were in their iurisdiction: For, some particular factions, falling into open armes and priuate force, there were done betweene them aswell in the towne as fieldes, many hostilities and burninges, proceeding sometymes with forreine ayde, euen as if it were a warre ordeined and set: To these insolent disorders, they applied no order, to the great reproche of their common weale.

In this tyme Cesar Borgia omitted no oportunitie to aduaunce his affaires: And albeit the King was much discontented with the Pope, for not ayding him to recouer his Duchie of Myllan, the same being the cause why his maiestie had deferred to sende him bandes of men to prosecute the enterprise begun against the Viccaires of Romagnia: Yet the desire he had to keepe amitie with him, made him chaunge opinion, for the feare he had of the descending of Thallemaines, hauing no meane to establishe an accord with Themperour: But much more was concurrant in that desire the authoritie of the Cardinal of Amboyse for thambicio he had to obtein the legacion for the realme of Fraunce: The Cardinall in this aspiring desire, had litle remembraunce to the councell of Sainct Gregorie, that he that seeketh authoritie, let him consider howe he commeth to it, and comming wel to it, howe he ought to liue well in it, and liuing well in it, howe he must gouerne, and gouerning wisely, he must ofte call to memorie his owne infirmitie: Ambicion is an humor vetie vnmeete for Churchmen, for that it hindreth to their humilitie and charitie, and generally altereth the whole vertue of their profession: It is hurtfull to raise a mynde ambicious into high authoritie, for that he that is desirous of glorie, is soone stirred to do things against equitie, and to him that seeketh to be aboue all men, it is harde to keepe alwayes equitie, which is the chiefe parte of iustice: The Pope eftsoones promised the King to ayde him with men and with the person of his sonne, when soeuer he would aduaunce the enterprise of Naples, & to indue the Cardinall of Amboyse with the legacion of the realme of Fraunce for eightiene monethes, which was esteemed a great matter, aswell for that it was new and rare, as for that it diminished muche the doinges and profites of the Court of Rome: The King for his parte, sent to him vnder the leading of Monsr D'alegre, three hundred Launces and two thousand footmen, making knowne to euerie one, that what soule so euer would oppose agaynst the enterprise of the Pope, he would take it to hart, as if the iniurie were done to his proper person: With which reputacion ioyned to his proper forces conteining six hundred men at armes and sixe thousand footemen, the Duke Valentynois entred alreadie into Romagna, tooke without resistance, the Cities of Pesera and Rimini whose Lordes and owners fledde: Afterwardes he turned his force to Faenza, which had no other defence then of the people of the place: For, not only John Bentyvolle, vncle

by the mother ſide to Aſtor a litle childe, was made contented, aſwell for feare to ſtir vp the armes of the Pope and his ſonne, as to obey a commaundement he had receiued from the King: (The Florentyns and Duke of Ferrara doing the lyke for the ſame occaſions): But alſo the Venetians, who were bound to defende him, ſignified to him (obſeruing the requeſt the King made to them) that they had renounced the protection of him, a thing which they had likewiſe done affore for the ſame occaſion to Pandolfe Malateſte Lord of Rimini: And which more is, to expreſſe with greater apparance that they fauoured the Pope, they created at the ſame tyme the Duke Valentynois Gentleman of their Towne, an action not accuſtomed to that common weale, but for recompence of benefites receiued, or in token of very deare & ſtraite amitie: The Duke Valentynois enterteined in his Paye Dennis de Nalda Natyffe of Briſiquolle a man of great opinion in the vale of Lamona: by his meanes hee tooke the Towne of Briſiquolle without daunger, and with the ſame fortune brought vnder his commaundement almoſt the whole Vally: He tooke the olde Citidell by force, and caryed the newe Caſtle by accord made with the keeper: He had alſo hope to enter into the Caſtle of Faenza by meane of a practiſe enterteyned by the ſayde Dennis by the Caſtle keeper who was of the ſame Vallye, & had long tyme gouerned theſtates of Aſtor: But thintelligence being diſcouered, he was made priſoner by the Faventyns, who making their fortune no feare to them, ſhowed no ſignes of faint courage for that they were abandoned of euerie one, and much leſſe ſtood diſcomforted for the loſſe of the Valley which was of great importance: But as people reſolued to vanquiſhe their aduerſities with their proper vertues, They determined to paſſe vnder all perilles to continue their ſubiection to the famuly of the Manfredis, vnder whoſe obediēce as they had liued in eaſie gouernment a long tyme, ſo doubting the worſt that might come by chaunge of Lordes, they ſtood reſolute in their faith and loyaltie, and carefully ſtrengthned their Citie againſt the preſent daungers: From which diſpoſition, the Duke of Valentynois being not hable to turne them neither by promiſes nor threatninges, he incamped neare the walles of their Citie betweene the Riuers of Lamona and Marſana, and planted his artillerie on that ſide that is towardes Furly, which albeit is incompaſſed with walles, yet commonly it is called the Subburbes, where the Fauentyns had erected a ſtrong Baſtillion: He battered it with great furie together with that lawme or corner that is betweene the Subburbes and the Towne, & the fift day he gaue the aſſalt: But finding the reſiſtance of the towne aboue his exſpectation, he ſownded the retraite, (his ſouldiours bringing away many woundes and maymes, and Honorius Sauella a principall man ſlaine in the action:) The Camp ſuffred litle reſt all the reſidue of the dayes it remeyned there, aſwell by a continuall affliction of the artillerie from the Towne, as alſo by the vallour of thinhabitantes, who, notwithſtanding they had a verie ſlender ſtrength by forreine ſouldiours, yet, they made many iſſues and ſallies, and ſkirmiſhed with no leſſe fortune then courage: But aboue all other perplexeties, (albeit the moneth of Nouember was not yet finiſhed) the tyme, which was more extreme then agreed with the cuſtome and nature of that ſeaſon, troubled him much, both for the Snowes that fell, and the froſts that were intollerable (greeuous impediments to the trauels of warre) and alſo for that his lodging was naked and open to the ayre, (the Fauentyns affore the Camp came neare their walles, hauing burned all their houſes, and cut downe all ſuch wood and trees as might giue ſuccours to their enemies: Theſe difficulties preſſed ſo much the Duke of Valentynois that he leauied his Camp the tenth day, and diſperſing his regiments to winter in places thereaboutes, he bare his fortune with manifeſt

manifeſt impacience, ſpecially for that beſides his french forces, he had an army flo-riſhing with Capteines and ſouldiours Italians, wherein were Iohn Paulo, and Iulio Vrſins, Vitellozze and Iohn Paulo Baillon with many men of choice: And hauing pro-miſed to him ſelfe in his ambicious conceites, that neither the ſeas nor the moun-teines had power to reſiſt him, he could not endure without perturbacion of minde, that the reputacion of his firſt exploites ſhould be darkned, by a people that had lõg liued in peace, and at that tyme, had no other commaunder then a litle childe: wher-in he gaue ſuch libertie to his Paſſion, that he ſware and that with many ſighes and vehement proteſtacions, that aſſoone as the ſeaſon of the yeare would giue leaue to his deſire, he would returne to the ſeege, and recontinue thenterprile with a reſolu-cion of a man determined either to carie the victorie or to dye in the action.

D Valentinois diſdaineth to be re-pulſed.

In which time his father the Pope, to thende their might be ſocietie in their do-ings hauing regard to one ende, created the ſame yeare to his great infamie twelue Cardinalles, not of ſuch as deſerued beſt, but of thoſe that offred moſt: And to omit no meanes to heape treaſors and money, he ſent out and fowed thorow all Italy, and ſtraunge prouinces, the Iubyle, which being celebrated at Rome with great concurſſe of people, was ſét with no leſſe deuocio beyõd the Mountes, giuing power that who could not come to Rome to obteine it, ſhould communicate in the grace and bene-diction for certeine ſummes of money, the which, together with all other treaſors he could drawe in what ſort ſo euer, aſwell of the ſpirituall fruites, as treaſors tempo-rall of the Church, he ſent to the Duke of Valentynois, who ſtaying at Furly, made ſtrong preparacion to recontinue the ſeege of Faunza, againſt whoſe intencions the Fauentyns prouided by fortifications and other remedies conuenient to reſiſt an ene-mie ſo apparantly profeſſed: Theſe thinges were done in the yeare 1500. But mat-ters of farre greater importance were ordeined by the french king for the yeare fo-lowing, and to haue the more libertie to execute them, he had ſought by continuall ſolicitacion to haue vnitie with the king of Romains, wherby obteining thinueſtiture of the Duchie of Myllan, he might haue ſuffrance to aſſaile the realme of Naples: To which endes he vſed the meane and inclinacion of Tharchduke his ſonne, who de-clared a readie diſpoſition to peace, for that his peoples, fearing thentercourſe of marchandiſe wold ceaſſe, brooked vnwillingly all perſuaſions to leauy warre againſt the french: But the thing that moſt ſupported this inclinacion, was that the french king hauing no iſſue Male, offred to giue in mariage his dougliter Madam Claude, to Charles ſonne of the Archduke, and to indue her with the Duchie of Myllan for a dowrie when they had habilitie to conſummate the mariage, for neither of them had not yet three yeares of age: By theſe offers, and his interceſſion, (for that many difficulties hapning in the practiſe and negociacion of the peace abſolute, could not ſo ſoone be reſolued) the french king obteyned in the yeare folowing of Maxymy-lian, a truce for many monethes, but not without the price of certeine proporcions of money: This truce was voyd of all mencion of the King of Naples, notwithſtãding that Maxymylian, in conſideracion of fortie thouſand Duckats, with bonde, to mi-niſter to him monethly fiftiene thouſande Duckats (his neceſſities ſo requiring,) he had promiſed to make no accord without comprehending him in it, and to vexe the Duchie of Myllan with inuaſions and warre when neede were: to turne away the powers of the french king: Thus the king dwelling aſſured that the Allemains would not ſtirre, and hoping in ſhort tyme to make the peace perfect and abſolute, and to obteine thinueſtiture of the Duchie of Myllan by meane of the ſame Archduke, tur-ned all his thoughtes to thenterpriſe of Naples, againſt the which, fearing leaſt the king of Spaine would make ſome obiection, and that both the Pope and Venetians (ielous ouer his greatnes) would ioyne with him: he renued eftſoones the practiſes that had ben begun in the time of king Charles for deuiding of the ſame realm, whervnto in deede Ferdinand king of Spaine pretended to haue right: For, albeit Alphonſo king of Aragon had conquered it with rightes and titles ſeparate from the Crowne of Aragon, and therfore had diſpoſed it to the perſon of Ferdinand his baſtard ſonne as his owne: yet, Iohn his brother which ſucceeded him in the kingdome of Aragon, and Ferdinand the ſonne of Iohn, had alwayes ſecretly quarelled that title as lawfully apperteining to the Crowne of Aragon, for that Alphonſo had conquered it with the armes and treaſors of the ſame realme: Which quarell Ferdinand had couered with a ſuttletie and pacience of a Spanyarde, forgetting nothing, not only of the dutie of a parent towardes Ferdinand king of Naples, and the others, but alſo more aſſuring and augmenting them with bondes of newe affinitie, for that he gaue to Ferdinand for wyfe, Iane his ſiſter, and conſented afterwardes that Iane the doughter of her, ſhould be maried to young Ferdinand, wherein yet he could not worke in ſuch cloudes, but the vaile of his couetouſnes was long tyme before made open to the kinges of Naples: In ſo much as the french king and Ferdinand concurring in one inclination, the one to remoue all impediments and difficulties, the other to obteyne parte of that he had lōg deſired, ſeeing there was no oportunitie to obtein the whole, they made an agreement to inuade at one tyme the kingdome of Naples, and to deuide it betweene them in this ſort: That the french king ſhould haue the Citie of Naples with all the lande of Lauoro, and the prouince of Abruzzes: And to Ferdinands part ſhould fall the prouinces of Powylla and Calabria: That either one ſhould conquere his owne parte by him ſelfe, the other not being bounde to helpe him, but only not to empeach or hinder him: But ſpecially it was agreed, that this contract ſhould bee holden very ſecret vntil the armie which the french king ſhould ſend to execute that enterpriſe, were arryued at Rome: At what tyme Thembaſſadors of them both, alleading this contract to be made for the benefite of Chriſtendome, and to inuade thinfidelles, ſhould require the Pope with a ioynt voice, to graunt thinueſtiture according to the deuiſion that had bene made betweene them, receiuing Ferdinand into faith and homage vnder the title of Duke of Powylla and Calabria, and the frenche king, no more king of Cicilia, but king of Ieruſalem and Naples: Which title of king of Ieruſalem, being once come to Themprour Federyk the ſeconde, who was king of Naples, by his wyfe which was doughter of Iohn king of Ieruſalem (but in name not in effect) was alwayes kept by the kinges folowing, notwithſtanding that at one tyme, the kinges of Cipres, being of the houſe of Luſignan, who likewyſe pretended to it, would appropriat it to them with a couetouſnes as apparant and great as the reſt:

But whileſt theſe practiſes were in working to their execution, the Duke of Valentynois, returning by night in the firſt dayes of the new yeare to the Subburbes of Faenza, and working by conſpiracie & intelligence, made an vſe of a number of ſkaling ling ladders: But that labor and trial reſoluing into ſmoke and vanitie, and reapoſing no more hope in treaſon, he tooke in fewe dayes after, Ruſſi with the other places of that countrey, & laſtly returned eftſones with his Camp to Faenza in the beginning of the ſpring: And incamping before the Caſtle, he battred the wal on that ſide, & followed thaſſalt Pellemelle with the french & Spaniſh that were in his paie, who going to the ſeruice in diſorder, retired without honor or profit: But three dayes after (obſtinacie noriſheth peril) he recharged it with an other aſſalt with the ſtrength of the whole Camp: The firſt charge fell to Vitellozze and the Vrſins, who, colling out the flower and choice men of their bandes, marched to the breach with a wonderful boldnes, and very well aſſured order, their vallours giuing great hope at that time to carie the victorie: But thoſe that were within fighting for their lyues and libertie, were no leſſe reſolute to defende, then the others were valiant to aſſaile: They had ſo intrenched and fortefied the place, that their induſtrie made amaſed their enemies, who finding affore them a great ditche for depth and largenes, and being beaten in the flanke with the furie of thartillerie, were conſtrayned to retyre, Ferdinand of Farneſa remeyning dead with many other men of marke, without reckoning the great numbers whoſe bodyes ſmarted in the woundes they receyued: The chaunces in warre are dyuers, and haue in them many hidden fortunes which neyther the wyſedome of the leadors can foreſee, nor the vertue of the ſouldiours reſiſt, nor any councell of man aſſure, but running gouerned by certeine ſwyft deſtinies, ſeeme to communicate in the qualitie of the wynde which no humaine wit can make ſetled, but is caried by incomprehenſible mocions frō one quarter to an other in a momēt: For notwithſtāding the reſoluciō of the Fauētyns to fight it out to the laſt mā, cōmitting their liues & liberties to one perill, yet hauing receiued great harmes by this aſſalt, they began to take ſuch coūcel of their preſēt condicion, that ſeeing on all ſides general apparāce of daūger, & no exſpectaciō of ſuccors in a ſtate ſo abādoned, their cōfidence begun to turne into feare: And as there was no poſſibilitie, that their proper vallours only without freſh ſuccors, could make long reſiſtance againſt ſo great an armie alwayes renued: So they ſawe that with increaſe of more harmes, & worſe condicions, they ſhould in the ende eyther be taken by force, or conſtrayned as a laſt neceſſitie to put them ſelues vnder the power of the victors: And therefore their fortune making theſe feares reaſonable in them, they yelded to the Duke vppon couenaunt to haue their goods and lyues ſaued, and that Aſtor theyr Lorde ſhould remeyne in his libertie and to enioye wholly the reuenue of his proper poſſeſſions: Theſe couenants the Duke kept faithfully on the behalf of the people of Faenza: But Aſtor, a yoūg man of xviij. yeares & of an excellēt beuty, his age & innocēcie yelding to the diſloialtie & crueltie of the victors was reteined by the Duke with very honorable demōſtraciōs, vnder cooler that he ſhold remein in his Court: But within few dayes after being ſent to Rome, after (ſo went the bruite) ſome had ſatiſfied their vile vnnatural luſt on him, he was ſecretly put to death together with his baſtard brother.

Faenza yelded to the Duke.

After the victorie of Faenza, the Duke marched towardes Bolonia, laying his plot not only to occupie that Citie, but alſo to moleſt the Florentyns which were nowe become muche vnderfoote, hauing added to the firſt diſcontentment of the frenche king, newe occaſions of diſliking: For, being weary of the huge expenſes which they had made, continuing ſtill for the furniſhing of the warre with Piſa, & hauing ſuſpiciō of the forces of the Pope & Duke Valentinois, they paied not to the king (notwithſtāding his great inſtāce) the reſidue of the moneys which had ben lēt thē by the Duke of Mylā, nor yet thoſe ſums which he pretēded to be due to him for the Svvyſſers whom he had ſent againſt Piſa: The Florentyns (contrary to their contract eſtabliſhed with the Cardinal of Amboyſe) refuſed to furniſh one paye for them to returne into their countrey, for that they departed, long affore the tearme of the ſeruice for the which they had receiued paye, was exſpired: But the king, to entertein alwayes that natiō in good friendſhip, made good their paie of his proper treaſor, which he redemaūded of the Florentyns with ſharpe words, not admitting thexcuſe of their inhability, which was made greater by the ciuil diſcords that tooke their beginning of the diſorders which were in the gouernmēt popular: Wherein no man hauing a ſoūd care of thaffaires, and many of the principal Citizens being ſuſpected either for friends to the Medicis, or as men deſiring an other forme of gouernment, things were ouerruled more with confuſion then with councell. By occaſiō of theſe troubles ciuil, they made no prouiſion to ſatisfie the demaunds of the king, but letting paſſe without effect, the reſpits & delaies which he had giuē thē, they had made him much diſcontented: And increaſing his anger by thoccaſion of their weaknes, he required them to prepare to contribute to him the moneys & other aides, which they promiſed, for thexpediciō of Naples: He ſaid that albeit they ought him none according to the couenants that were made betwene thē (vnles they had recouered Piſa) yet, as touching him, they ought to hold it for recouered, ſeeing it was through their own falt that their victorie agreed not with their exſpectaciō: Of this was the cauſe, either the deſire of money, which of his owne nature he loued much, or the diſcontentmēt that they had not obſerued the reſpits he had graunted them, or rather the opinion he had, that for the diſorders in their gouernment, & the great number of friends the Medicis had in Florence, he was hable to make no ſoundaciō in thoccurrance of affairs: And to bring thē by ſharpnes to that, which his authoritie could not lead thē vnto, he deliuered publiklie very angrie termes to their Embaſſador reſident about his perſon, whom he aſſured that he was no more bound to their protection, for that, they failing to accompliſh the capitulacion made at Myllan in not making him ſatisfied at the tyme appointed of the moneys promiſed in the ſame, he was at libertie from all right or lawes of obſeruacion: By meanes whereof, Iulian de Medicis, being gone to his Court with the priuitie and recommendacion of the Pope, to beſeech his maieſtie in his name, and in compaſſion of his brethren, to be reſtored to their countrey, promiſing him great quantities of moneys, he heard him willingly & deuiſed continually with him of the meanes for their returne: And on the other ſide the Duke Valētynois, vſing thoportunitie of theſe occaſiōs, & puſhed forward withal by Vitellozze and the Vrſins, then in his ſeruice & paie, and who were iuſt enemies to the Florentyns, the one for the death of his brother, & the other for the cōiunctiō he had with the Medicis: Had, for that cauſe ſent affore to the ſuccors of Piſa, Lymerot de Ferme with an hundred light horſmen, and ſince the conqueſt of Faenza ſtoode determined to moleſt them, notwithſtanding that neither his father nor he, had receiued of them no harmes, but rather pleaſures and commodities, ſeeing at theyr requeſtes, they had renounced the protection of them of Riara: Whereunto they were bound, and conſented to libertie and paſſage of vittels thorow their landes to his Camp: Being then departed out of Romania in this deliberacion, and ſince the conqueſt of Faenza, being declared by the Pope, with the iuſtification of the conſiſtorie, Duke of Romania, and enioying alſo thinueſtiture of the ſame, he entred with his armie into the territories of Bollognia, with great hope to occupie it: But the ſame day that he lodged in the borow of S. Peter ſtāding almoſt vppō the cōfines betweene Imola and Bollognia, he receiued commaundement from the french king

to proceed no further in the ſubduing of Bollognia, nor to chaſe out of it Iohn Bentyvolle for that he had takē aſwel him as the citie into his protectiō: His maieſtie alleaged that the expreſſe exceptiō which he had made not to preiudice the rights of the church, ought to be vnderſtāded of thoſe rights & preeminences which the church did then enioy, for that being conſtrued without diſtinction, & not according as the words ſoūded, as the Pope pretēded, it had ben a thing vain & of no moment for the Bellōnois & for the Bentyuoleis, to receyue thē into his protectiō: Therfore the Duke, leauing for that time, with no ſmal complaints of the Pope & the king, the ambicius hopes he had cōceiued, made a couenāt with Bētyuolle by the mean of Pavvle vrſin, which bare theſe articles: That they of Bollognia ſhold giue him libertie of paſſage & vittels: That he ſhold paie to him yearly niene thouſād duckats: That he ſhold ſerue him with a certein proporciō of men at armes & footmē for his expediciō into Tuſkane: And to leaue him Caſtelbollognia, a place betweene Imola & Faenza & of the iuriſdictiō of Bollognia, which he gaue to Pavvle Vrſin: Whē this accord was made, Bētyuolle, either for a fearful ſuſpiciō he had of himſelf, or for that Duke Valētynois (as the ſaying was) to make him more hateful in that Citie, had told him that the famuly of the Mariſcotties, (a faction puiſſant and of great fauours, and for that reaſon and for his inſolencie muche ſuſpected of him), had deſired him to make thenterpriſe of Bollognia: He cauſed preſent ſlaughter to be made of almoſt all that famuly that were within Bollognia, vſing for miniſters in that crueltie, together with his ſonne Hermes, many noble young Gentlemen, to thende that for the memory to haue defiled their handes in the bloud of that faction, and by that meanes become enemies to that famulie, they ſhould be the more aſſuredly bound to the preſeruacion of his eſtate: „ weake ſuertie whoſe foundacion is builded vppon the bloud of innocents, and a la- „ mentable example, to purge ſurmiſed ſuſpicion, by vnlawful ſlaughter. „

The french bandes folowed no further the Duke Valentynois, hauing aſſignement to ioyne with the armie of the king, which conteined a thouſand laūces & ten thouſād footmē marching vnder Monſr D'aubigny to thēterpriſe of Naples: But the Duke Valentynois tooke his way thorow the coūtrey of Bollognia, to the lands of the Florentyns, with an army of ſeuē hūdred men at armes & fiue thouſand footmē of choice, & with fiue hūdred men at armes & two thouſād footmē which Bētyuolle gaue him vnder the leading of his ſonne the pronotorie: He ſent to demaūd of the Florētyns paſſage & vittels through all their lands, & marching on without tarying their anſwere he enterteined with gracious words Thembaſſadors which they had ſēt to him, vntil he was paſt the Appenyn: But aſſoone as he was arriued at Barbaryna (his ſweet words turned into ſower meanings) he required that they wold make cōfederaciō with him: And that they wold take him into their paie with ſuch regimēts of men at armes & other cōdiciōs as agreed with the greatnes he held: And that chaūging the preſent gouernment, they wold eſtabliſh an other, ſuch one as he might reappoſe more in: The thing that gaue him this boldnes to demaund theſe things, was not ſo much his power or ſtrength (for he had no great armie or artilleries to batter walles) as the ill eſtate of the Florentyns, who had verie fewe men at armes, nor other footemen then they of the coūtrey whō they commaūded daily: He was alſo much furthered in this actiō by the feare, ſuſpiciō, & great diſagreemēts that were in Florēce, for that he had in his army Vitellozze and the Vrſins, and for that, by his direction, Peter de Medicis was abiding at Loiana in the countrey of Bollognia: And laſtly for that the people were full of ielouſies by an opinion they had conceyued, that the greateſt Citizens had procured his cōming, to thend to erect a gouernment according to their fācies:

Notwithſtanding the Duke Valentynoys had no great deſire to reeſtabliſh or ſet vp again Peter de Medicis, for that he eſteemed not the greatnes of the Vrſins & Vitellozze cõuenient for his enterpriſe, with whõ he knew that Peter had great affinitie, & being repoſſeſſed of his coũtrey, wold miniſter no ſmal ſtrength to them: Ioyntly to this, I haue vnderſtand by men worthy of faith & credit, that he kept fixed in his minde, the remembraunce of an auncient grudge againſt him, whẽ being Archbiſhop of Pampelnua, & his father not yet Pope, he ſtudied the cõmon lawes in the ſchooles of Piſa, for that he went to Florẽce to complain to him of a certein crime committed againſt him by one of his familiars, & wayting in vaine many houres to haue acceſſe to him (being occupied either in his affaires or pleaſures) he returned to Piſa not ſo muche as ſpeaking with him, eſteeming himſelf much diſgraced & iniured: And yet he made other ſemblance to the Vitelly & Vrſins, rather to entertein them in deuociõ, thẽ that his thoughts were ſimple, or his intencions not diſſembled: But much more to augment the mutinies & diſagreements of the Florentyns, by the which he hoped either to range them to better cõdiciõs, or to be hable to occupie ſome place of importãce in their iuriſdictiõ: But finding by many tokens apparant that the french king brooked not his entrey in that ſort into their countrey, when he came to Campy ſix miles from Florence, he accorded with them in this ſort: That betweene the commõ weale of Florence & him there ſhould be a cõfederacion indifferent for the defence of their eſtates, with prohibicion to ayde rebelles either of the one or other part, and chiefly that the Duke ſhould not ſuccor the Piſans: That the Florentyns ſhold pardõ to who ſo euer, all faltes cõmitted by his cõming, & ſhold not oppoſe thẽſelues againſt him for the defẽce of the lord of Plombyn, who was vnder their protectiõ: That they ſhold entertein him for three yeares with three hũdred mẽ at armes, & paye of ſix & thirtie thouſãd duckats for euery yeare, & he to ſend that ayde to them as oftẽ as they ſhold haue need, either for their own defence, or to offend an other: After this accord was ratified, he went to Signa, marching by eaſie iournes, & remeining certeine dayes in euery reappoſing place, did great harmes in the countrey by fire and robberies, no otherwayes thẽ if he had ben an enemy profeſſed: He demaũded beſides (according to the cuſtom in the paies of men at armes) the fourth part of the money due for one yeare, & that they ſhold prepare for him artilleries for thenterpriſe of Plombyn: The one of which demaundes the Florentyns denyed him flatly, as being not bound vnto it, the other they deferred, for that they had not takẽ councel to obſerue that, which he went about to make them promiſe by force: By thaduertiſements of their Embaſſador with the french king, they hoped to be deliuered from thoſe oppreſſiõs by his authority, a hope which they foũd not altogether vain, for that it nothing diſpleaſed the king that the Duke ſhould threaten them, but not aſſaile them: Aſwel for that the chaũge of the preſẽt gouernmẽt wold haue ben to his diſcõtẽtment, as alſo, albeit he could haue wiſhed an other form of gouernmẽt yet, it wold haue greatly diſpleaſed him, if it had ben introduced with other forces or other authoritie thẽ his: In which regard, aſſoone as he vnderſtood that the Duke was entred vppon the dominions of the Florentyns, he miniſtred to him a ſharpe direction to depart with ſpeed, & commaunded M. D'aubigny who was in Lombardy with tharmie, that in caſe of the Dukes diſobedience, he ſhould oppoſe againſt him the compulcion and force of the whole armie: This direction of the king brought the Duke into alteraciõ of intencion and purpoſe, and not tarying ſo much as for a quarters paye, nor any furniture of artillerie, he tooke his way towardes Plombyn, and gaue order that the Piſans, who by meane of Vitellozzo whom hee had ſent thether for artillerie, were incamped before before a borough of the Florentyns, ſhoulde withdrawe and leauy theyr ſeege:

Being entred into the territories of Plombyn he tooke Sugeretta, Scarlina, and the Iles of Elba and Pianoſa, and furniſhing euery peece with ſufficient garriſon, aſwel for the defēce of the places alreadie occupied, as to enterteine cōtinual vexācion vppō them of Plombyn, he returned to Rome with the reſidue of his regimentes, to followe the kings armie that marched to thenterpriſe of Naples: Whereof one parte led by M. D'aubigny was entred into Tuskane by the way of Caſtrocaro, & the other followed by the countrey Lunigiana: The whole armie aſſembled in one ſtrength, conteined a thouſand Launces, four thouſand Swyſſers, & ſix thouſand footmē of nation frēch and Gaſcoynes, to whom was ioyned (according to their maner) a great quātitie of artilleries: About the ſame time alſo, the armie by ſea departed out of Prouence for the ſame expedicion, vnder the leading of the Lord of Ranaſtyn gouernor of Genes, wherin were three Caracks of Genes, & ſixtiene other ſhippes, together with many other ſmal veſſels fraught with bands of footmē. Againſt theſe mouings & preparaciōs of warre, king Federyk (ignorant that the Spaniſh armies vnder ſhadow of friendſhyp were prepared againſt him) ſolicited Conſaluo (abiding in Sicilia with the regiments of Spanyardes, and making ſemblance to ſuccour him) to come to Caietta, after he had put into his handes certeyne places of Calabria which he demaunded, to thende to make more eaſie the conqueſt he intended, but vnder coollour that it was for the ſuertie of his people: King Federyk made his reckoning that Conſaluo being ioyned to tharmie, his ſtrength in particular would conteyne ſeuen hundred men at armes, ſix hundred light horſmen, and ſix thouſand footmen, compounded vppon bodies partly interteined already by him, and partly of ſuch as the Collonnois leauyed at Marina: A force which he ſuppoſed ſufficient to reſiſt the french men, without being conſtrained to incloſe him ſelf in towns, notwithſtanding he noriſhed no great hope in the ayde from the Prince of the Turkes, of whom he had required ſuccors with no ſmal inſtance, ſhowing him that he had more reaſon to feare peril by the victorie of the preſēt king, then of the late king his predeceſſor: And to make a cleare way to an actiō of ſo great importance (it is a chiefe ſuertie to Princes to cut of treaſons in the beginning) he apprehended & put in priſon, the Prince of Biſignan and the Count of Melotte accuſed affore him to haue had ſecret intelligence with the Count Caiezze who was in the french armie: With theſe hopes, (hauing alſo ſent Ferdinand his eldeſt ſonne being very young to Tarenta more for his ſuertie if thinges ſucceeded ill, then to defende the Citie) he incamped with his armie at S. Germein: Where, attending the ſuccours of Conſaluo and the bandes which the Collonnoys leauyed, he hoped to accompliſhe a more happie action in the defence of the entrey into the kingdom, thē Ferdinand his Nephew had don againſt the enterpriſe of king Charles.

The computacion of the french army.

In this eſtate & diſpoſicion of affaires, all the regiōs of Italy were repleniſhed with incredible doubtes & perplexeties, euery one iudging that this enterpriſe would be a beginning of moſt great calamities: For that as the preparacions of the french king ſeemed not ſo mightie, as to be hable to ſurmount the ioynt forces of king Federyk and Conſaluo, ſo wiſemen occupied this opinion that the ſpirittes of ſo mightie kings beginning once to waxe angry, both the one & other partie would cōtinue the warre with far greater forces, which wold ſtir vp eaſely thorow al Italy both great & daūgerous mociōs, for the diuers inclinations of the other Potentates: But aſſone as the french army was arryued at Rome, the world ſawe eaſely into the vanitie of thoſe diſcourſes: For that Thembaſſadors of Frāūce & Spaine, entring together into the cōſiſtorie, made publicatiō affore the Pope & Cardinals, of the league made betweene

The Pope giueth thinueſtiture of the kingdome of Naples to the French and Spanyard indifferently.

their kings, intẽding chiefly (as they ſaid) to an expediciõ to be made againſt thennemies to Chriſtiã religiõ: And demaũding thinueſtiture of the kingdom according to the tenor of the cõuenciõ made, it was agreed vnto by the Pope with the ſame ſpeed it was required, thinking it but reaſonable to performe that which he made no difficultie to graunt: In ſo much, as no man doubting now what would be the end of this warre, the feares of men were conuerted into admiracion, euery one wondring at the doings of the french king, who, by ſuffring the moietie of the realme to fall rather into the handes of the king of Spaine, did as it were leade by the hande into Italy (where before he only was the Arbitrator of all things) an other king, to whõ ſuch as might be diſcõtented with him, might haue recourſe, & was alſo ſtraitly allied to the king of Romains by many bonds of affinitie: Then to endure that king Federyk might remeine Lord of the whole, acknowledging to holde it of him, and yeld him tribute for it, as by ſundrie meanes he had ſought to obteine it: But the vniuerſall concepcions of men were no leſſe deuided touching thintegretie & faith of Ferdinand, who, by an ambicious luſt to occupie one part of the kingdome, had conſpired agaynſt a king of his bloud, and to drawe him the more eaſely to his ruine, he had alwayes enterteined him with falſe promiſes to ſuccor him: Wherein he had not only defaced the reputacion of the title of King Catholyk which he and Queene Elizabeth his wife had obteined certeine yeares before of the Pope: But alſo had ſtained that renowme and glorie which helde their names raiſed vp to the heauens, for driuing the Moores out of the realme of Granado, no leſſe for the zeale they bare to religion, then for regard of their proper intereſt: To theſe imputacions, or rather reproches impoſed vppon both the one and other king, there was anſwered no other thing for the french king, but that his power was ſufficient to remedie all thoſe diſorders in conuenient ſeaſon, not remembring that where thinges are deuided, the ſuertie is intricate, & where there be competitors to one thing, & they no leſſe equall in ſtrength, then all one in ambicion, their diſtruſtes are nouriſhed, and no part free from ſuſpicion, but all things intangled with confuſion: For Ferdinand, it was ſaide, that albeit king Federyk had giuen him iuſt occaſion to be moued againſt him, as knowing that he had long tyme before practiſed ſecretly with the french king to his preiudice: yet that had not ſtirred him, But the conſideracion of the kings pretence, determining in what ſort ſo euer it were, to performe an enterpriſe vppon the realme of Naples, brought him to this neceſſitie either to defend it, or abandõ it: In taking vppon him the defence, he ſhould kindle ſo great a fire, that it could not but ſende daungerous ſparkes ouer all the common weale of Chriſtendome, chiefly the Turkes armies being ſo ſtrong and mightie againſt the Venetians both by ſea & lande: And if he ſhold abandon it, he knewe his realme of Sicilia ſtoode in manifeſt peril, and beſides, it was a thing that wrought too much to his detriment, that the french king ſhould occupie the realme of Naples, which of right belonged to him, & might eaſſoones reuert to him by new rightes, if the lyne of Federyk ſhould faile: And therfore amyd ſo many difficulties he had choſen the way of deuiding, with hope that by the ill gouernment of the french, their moytie might alſo diſcend to him in tyme: And that in this caſe, as the regarde of publike vtilitie councelled him, which he had alwayes more highly eſteemed then his proper profit: So he might eyther keepe it in himſelfe, or reſtore it to Federyk, or rather leaue it to his iſſue and children, holding his name almoſt in horror, for that he knew, that affore the french king did any action vppon the Duchie of Myllan, he had practiſed with the Turkes: Theſe were the reaſons generall alleaged on the behalfe of both the kinges, ſupporting their actions more by ſtrained coulers, then equitie of title, and applying to thaduerſitie of the king of Naples, their vniuſt ambicion, they made litle care to keepe their particular moyties, that had no conſcience to euict the iuſt owner out of the whole.

The league of theſe two kinges brought ſuch aſtoniſhment to Federyk, that notwithſtanding Conſaluo, ſeeming to reiect that which was publiſhed at Rome, promiſed him with one conſtancie to come to his ſuccours: Yet, he chaunged his firſt councelles and retyred from S. Germain towardes Capua, where he exſpected the effect of his direction for the bandes leauied by the Collonnoys: Who, leauing Garriſon within Amyliã, abãdoned all the reſidue which they held in the territorie of Rome, for that the Pope by the conſent of the french king, had taken armes to occupie their eſtates: In which difficulties, Conſaluo, being well aduertiſed that the french army was paſſed Rome, diſcouered at laſt his commiſſions, and ſending to Naples ſixe Gallies to bring away the two olde Queenes, the one ſiſter and the other neece to his king: Proſper Colonne aduiſed king Federyk to reteyne the Gallies, and drawing all his power into one ſtrength, to make reſiſtance to thennemies in the fielde: For that in making a tryall of fortune, there would be ſome hope of victorie, the iſſues of battelles being farre more inceiteyne, then all other humayne actions: Otherwayes he ſaw nothing but manifeſt perill, two ſo mighty kings ioyning againſt him, & he nothing ſtrengthned from the forreyne, and leſſe aſſured amyd the treaſons of his owne people: He tolde him that in a daunger ſo preſent, celeritie was more neceſſarie then councell, and againſt enemyes ſo neare approching, his greateſt ſuertie ſtoode in thexpedicion of the battell, hauing no other meane to make head againſt two ſo mightie kings inuading him in diuers partes of his kingdom: But Federyk, whoſe mynde was wholly ouerruled with feares and doubtes, founde litle hope in this councell, and therefore determined to looke to the garde of his townes, remembring that leſſe in any other humaine action, then in the ſucceſſe of battell, the innocencie of the cauſe getteth the vpper hande: Therefore, Sainct Germyn with other peeces neare about it, being alreadie drawne into rebelliõ, yea euen before M. D'aubigny marched from Rome: He determined to make the firſt defence in the towne of Capua, wherin he beſtowed Fabricio Collonne with three hundred men at armes, certeine lyght horſmen, and three thouſand footmen, and ioyned with him Rinucce de Marciano, whom he had newly taken into his paye: He left Proſper Colonne for the garde of Naples, and himſelfe, with the reſidue of his companyes, entred Auerſo: But as open warre miniſtreth many occaſions to reuenge particular wronges: So Monſieur D'aubigny in his marching from Rome, burned Marina, and Caua, with certeine other peeces of the Colonnoys, being angry that Fabricio had put to executiõ in Rome, the meſſengers of certeyne Barons of the realme holding with the french, which were gon thether to cõtract with him: Afterwardes he tooke his way to Montfortyn, where he thought Iulio Colonne would make reſiſtance: But hauing left it abandoned with verie litle honour, Monſr D'aubigny paſſing further, commaunded all the places which be along the way to Capua vntill the Ryuer of Vulturno neare Capua, which being to deepe for the army to paſſe ouer without perill, the vertue of their Generall founde out a way to paſſe, by marching vp more high towardes the mounteyne, whereof Federyk being aduertiſed, retyred to Naples, and abandoned Auerſo, which with Nola and many other places gaue themſelues to the french, whoſe whole ſtrength was now brought into the confynes of Capua where they camped, ſome on thiſſyde and ſome beyonde the Ryuer, on the vpper ſide where the Ryuer beginneth to runne neare the towne: And putting force to their fortune, they battered it on all partes, and charged it afterwardes with a furious assalt, which albeit was not pleasant to them, but were cõstrained to retyre from the walles with their many harmes: Yet imparting no lesse terror and daunger to the defendantes, the myndes of the Capteynes and Souldiors began to incline to accord, the people of the Citie beginning to drawe into mutiny, together with the regiments of Peasants withdrawne thether in great numbers: But as in warres there be some insolencies which the Capteynes can not bridle, and many negligences which be fatall instruments and occasions of perill: So Fabricio Collonne the eight day after the Camp was planted, hauing begun to Parley with the Count Caezzo vppon a Bastillion, the negligent garde of those that were within (as often hapneth when men be neareſt accord) gaue occasion to thennemies to enter: And they, vsing the lawe of victors, tooke libertie to turne all things to the rewarde of their aduenture: In so much as what for the greedines of Pillage, and desire to reuenge the harmes receiued at the first assalt, they put the whole towne to sack, and made a wonderfull slaughter, reteyning only for prisoners, suche as remeyned free from theyr cruelue: The licentiousnes of the victors was such that their crueltie raged vppon all ages, sexes, and qualities of creatures, not sparing the virgins in religion, whose bodies were a miserable pray to the lust of the souldiours: And as many of them were solde afterwardes at Rome for a very small price, so some of them esteeming it agreeable to their vertue to feare death lesse then the losse of honour, threw them selues into welles, and offred vp in Ryuers an oblacion of their vndefiled bodies: It is sayde that besides other abhominacions worthie of prepetuall infamie, many of the women which had escaped the first furie, being withdrawne into a Tower vnder none other confidence then such as solow creatures in miserie: The Duke of Valentynois who solowed the armie as the kinges Lieftenant, went to take a view of them, accompanied only with the Gentlemen of his house & his guard: And after he had considered not of their estates, but of their beauties: The compassion he showed was that he reteyned for his owne vse fortie of the most faireſt of them: Fabricio Colonno, Dom Hugo of Cardona, and all the other Capteynes and men of condicion were made prisoners, amongst whom Rinucce Mariano, who at the assalt had receiued a wound with a Crosbow shot, being in the keeping of the soldiors of the Duke dyed within two dayes not without suspicion of poison: The losse of Capua cut of all hopes to king Federyk to be hable hense forward to defend any thing: Caietta yelded with a speed according to the felicitie of the victors: And M. D'aubygny being come with his armie to Auerse, & the Citie of Naples left abãdoned, which made composicio for three score thousãd duckats, Federik retired into the new castle & immediatly after (hauing only regard to his life in such extremity of fortune) made couenãt with Monsr D'aubygny to deliuer vp within six dayes all the townes and fortes which he helde apperteyning to that moyetie of the deuisiõ which shold discend to the french king: Reseruing only for six moneths the Ile of Tschia, during which tyme it should be lawfull for him to goe whether he would, except in the realme of Naples: And to send an hundred men at armes to Tarenta: That he might take out of the newe Castle and the egg Castle what he would except thartilleries of king Charles which remeyned there: That free pardon should be giuen to all faltes committed since the late king Charles conquered the realme of Naples, and that the Cardinalles Colonne and Aragon should still enioy those ecclesiasticall reuenues which they had in the kingdome. But within the rocke of Tschia might be seene drawne into one showe, a true resemblãce & figure of all the infelicities of the lyne of the old Ferdinãd (which was a spectacle verie pitifull): For that besides the aspect of Federyk newly deuested of

of ſo noble a realme, the conſideration of his litle children, ioyned to the lamentable condicion of Beatriſs his ſiſter, redoubled his ſorowes: To the calamitie of his ſiſter, this increaſe of miſerie hapned, that, after the death of her late husband Matthias that renowmed king of Hungary, ſhe receiuing promiſe of mariage of Launcelot king of Boemia inducing her to ayde him in the conqueſt of the ſame realme: She was refuſed by him with great ingratitude, after he had filled his delightes with the ſweete fruites of her bodie, and afterwardes maried an other by the diſpenſacion of Pope Alexander: To this infelicitie was alſo ioyned, Iſabell affore tyme honoured with the titles & dignities of Duches of Myllan, but now no leſſe wretched then the others, for that almoſt at one tyme, ſhe ſuffred priuacion of her huſbande, of her eſtate, & of her only ſonne. Amongeſt theſe tragicall accidents, I may not forget this notable example of thaffection of a ſonne to his father: A matter ſo much the more ſtraunge, by how much in thoſe tymes the loue of children was rare towardes their fathers: One of the ſonnes of the L. G. Montpenſier being gon to Pozzuolo to viſit the ſepulcher of his father, ſuffred him ſelfe to be ſo much ouerruled with paſſion, that after he had waſhed all partes of the monument with his lamentable teares, he fainted and fell downe dead vppon the ſepulcher of his father, who had as litle ſence of thoſe his lateſt ſorowes, as he had feeling of ſo great a fault to giue ſuch libertie to the rage of nature.

To men affliĉted, this is one cõſolacion, to know the vttermoſt of their miſhaps, and when the perils be paſt that nouriſhed their feares, they returne to a comofrte, not to conſider what they haue ſuffred, but to remember that no worſe can happen: Euen ſo king Federyk making the extremeſt reckoning of his aduerſities, was reſolued (bearing a ſetled hate to the king of Spaine) to recommit him ſelfe wholly to the honor and clemencie of the french king, to whom he ſent to demaund ſafeconduit, and hauing obteined it, he left all the reſidue in the rocke of Iſchia, where remeined alſo Proſper and Fabricio Colonne: And the Yle remeyning as it did before vnder the gouernment of the Marquis of Guaſt and the Counteſſe of Francqueuille, after he had ſent parte of his people to the defence of Tarenta, he went into Fraunce with fyue Gallies: A councel euil taken (ſauing that men in aduerſitie haue no libertie of election) for that if he had bene in a place of libertie, ſeeing to what tearmes the warres grew afterwardes, betweene thoſe two kinges he might happly haue bene holpen with many occaſions afterwardes to returne into his kingdom: But chooſing rather to ſit downe with the ſweete fruites of a quiet lyfe, then to followe the bitter trauels of a kingdome broken, his fortune brought him to this humilitie, to accept ſuche condicions as were offred him by the king, who gaue him, to thende he might remeyne in Fraunce, the Duchie of Aniovv with ſo liberall a penſion that it mounted euery yeare to thirtie thouſand Duckats: At his departure he ſent order to thoſe in whoſe confidence he had left the gouernment of Iſchia, that they ſhould deliuer it vp to the french king, and ſhowing no leſſe readines to render it then they were vnhable to keepe it, he tolde them that the way to deffye their fortune, was, not to giue her leaue to exerciſe her malice to their vttermoſt ruine.

Federyk in minde to commit him ſelfe to the honour and clemency of the french king.

Conſaluo was marched at the ſame time into Calabria, where albeit was a generall inclinacion and deſire to liue rather vnder the rule and Lordſhip of the french, yet their aduerſities ouerruling their diſpoſicions, he founde almoſt no reſiſtance, but with affections compelled, was receiued into euery towne, except Manfredonia and Tarenta: But the deſtinie of the countrey running with his fortune, after he had forced Manfredonia and the Caſtle, he incamped with his armie in the confines of Ta- renta, where albeit he found greateſt difficulties, yet in the ende he had it by accord, for that the Count Potenſo, to whoſe guarde the young Duke of Calabria had bene recommended by his father) and freare Leonard of Naples Knight of Rodes and gouernor of Tarenta, ſeeing no hope or poſſibilitie of further defence, compounded to giue vp the Citie and Caſtle, if within foure monethes they were not ſuccoured: In which compoſicion they receiued of him a ſolemne othe vppon the ſacrament, that he would leaue in libertie the Duke of Calabria, who had ſecret commaundement from his father to come to him into Fraunce when he could no more reſiſt his fortune: But neither the feare of God, nor regarde to his honor, had more force, then thintereſt of theſtate: For Conſaluo, iudging what a matter of importance it wold bee in tyme to come, if the perſon of the Duke were not in the power of the King of Spaine: Thinking it leſſe ſinne to diſpenſe with his othe, then to loſe that oportunitie, would not ſuffer him to depart, but aſſoone as he could, ſent him well accompanied into Spaine, where the king receiued him and reteyned him neare about him in high familiaritie and honors due to his greatnes.

Theldeſt ſonne of king Feder ſens into Spaine.

In theſe ſeaſons thaffaires of the Pope proceeded with a proſperitie accuſtomed, for that he had eaſely got all the eſtates which the Colonneys and Sauelles held in the confines of Rome, of the which he diſpoſed one part to the Vrſins: And the Duke Valentynois continuing his enterpriſe againſt Plombyn, ſent thether Vitellozze and Iohn Pavvle Baillon with new regiments: For whoſe comming, and the ill diſpoſicion of his buiſines, Iacques Appyan the naturall Lord, leauing the towne and Caſtle manned with Garriſons according to his fortune, went with ſpeede into Fraunce, to ſee if he might obteine of the king (who long affore had receiued him into his protection) that for the regard of his owne honor he would not ſuffer him to periſhe: The king, without couering his infamie by art, anſwered him roundly, that hauing promiſed the Pope not to oppoſe againſt him, he could not miniſter to his diſtreſſe without doing wrong to the league ſworne: But as nothing is more ſwift then aduerſitie, which keepes his courſe by the violent mocion that dryues him: So, whileſt the miſerable Lord of Plombyn was in vaine ſoliciting for ſuccours, Pandolfe Petrucci rendered the towne to the Duke of Valentynois, and within fewe dayes after, the Caſtle (his induſtrie no leſſe thē his fortune, turning all things to his diſcōfort): In this courſe of the Popes felicities, he maried his daughter Lucrecia (wyfe affore to three huſbands and now wydow by the death of Giſmon Prince of Viſelle baſtard ſonne to Alphonſo king of Naples, whom the Duke Valentynois had ſlaine) to Alphonſo eldeſt ſonne to Hercules D'eſtè, with a porcion of an hundred thouſande Duckattes in readie money and many other giftes of great value: To this mariage ſo vnwoorthie for the houſe of Eſte which was wont to ſeeke ſocietie with the famulies moſt noble, Hercules and Alphonſo conſented, partly for that the french king deſiring to ſatiſfie the Pope in all thinges, was an importunate procurer of it, but chiefly they thought by this meane (if againſt ſo great a diſloialtie there be any ſuertie ſufficient) to aſſure them ſelues of the armes and ambicion of the Duke Valentynois, who, bearing a great power by the treaſor and authoritie of the ſea Apoſtolike ioyned to the fauours which the french king bare him, was the only man that was feared throughout the greateſt parte of Italy, euery one knowing that his ambicion was infinit, and his couetouſnes without limit: The French king continued with great diligence the negociacion of peace with Maxymilian Cæſar, not only for the hopes he had to ſhake of by that meane, exſpences and ſuſpicions, and to obteine of him thinueſtiture of the Duchie of Myllan which he deſired much: But alſo to haue oportunitie to offend the Venetians, as being

ing perſuaded that his proſperities were greeuous to them, and with all nouriſhing this opinion, that they laboured ſecretly to breake the peace betweene Ceſar and him: But that which moſt ſtirred him to this inclinacion, was a couetous deſire (as well for him ſelfe as at the perſuacions of the Myllanois) to recouer Cremona & Guiaradadda, townes which him ſelf had accorded to them a litle before: And alſo to get again Breſſe Bergame, and Creme, auncient appurtenaunces of the Duchie of Myllan, and lately poſſeſſed by the Venetians in the warres which they had with Phillippe Maria Viſcounte: To debate theſe thinges to better effect, and to ordeine the prouiſions neceſſarie for thexpedicion of Naples, he had long tyme before ſent to Myllan, the Cardinal of Amboyſe, the tongue & authoritie of whom, were the proper tongue and authoritie of the king, and who had remeyned there many monethes, being not hable, for the ordinarie variacions of the king of Romains, to eſtabliſhe any thing with him: About this tyme, the Florentyns ſolicited by meane of the Cardinall to be receiued of new into the kinges protection: But they made a vaine labour of it, for that the king propounded harde condicions, and declared a great alienacion and eſtraunging of mynde from them: Wherein pretending to be no further bounde to the couenantes made at Myllan, he cauſed to be aſſigned ouer to the Lucquoys (receiued of new into his protection) Pietraſanta & Mutron as being auncient members of that Citie: But not without the ſumme of four & twentie thouſand Duckats, which he receiued of them as Lord of Genes, for that the Lucquoys auncient owners of Pietra Santa, had by reaſon of ſome neceſſities, engaged it for the lyke ſumme to the Genovvays, from whom it was diſcended afterwardes to the Florentyns by force of armes: Beſides, the Cardinall treated with them of Sienna, Lucqua, and Piſa, to knit them altogether for the reeſtabliſhing of Peter de Medicis in Florence: Wherein as the Cardinall caſt his plot that the king ſhoulde obteyne by this action a rounde ſumme of money of euery of them, ſo his intencion tooke ſuche proceeding, that they were almoſt at accord, and yet the deuiſe diſſolued without effect, for that there was no agreement amongeſt them to ſatisfie the proporcion of money that was demaunded.

At length the Cardinall, winning by litle and litle vppon the inclination of the king of Romains, had a more certeine hope then before to contract ſome accorde: And in that regard he went to Trent, to communicate with him, where they treated of many thinges concerning theſtabliſhment of the mariage of Madame Claude the kinges daughter with Charles theldeſt ſonne to Tharchduke, with cõceſſion of thinueſtiture of the Duchie of Myllan to both the one and other of them: They treated alſo to leauy warre againſt the Venetians, to recouer thoſe places which eyther of them pretended to be vſurped vppon them: And laſtly, they conſulted to call a general councell to reforme the Church, not only (as they proteſted) in her members, but alſo in her head: Which mocion the king of Romains ſeemed to enterteine with a ſemblance of conſent, to nouriſhe the hopes of the Cardinall of Amboyſe to obtein the Popedom, whereunto he aſpired with manifeſt ambicion, the king his maiſter being a ſpeciall furtherer of the action for the intereſt of his proper greatnes: Such a raging humor is ambicion, that it tempteth thoſe men to ſolicit high honors, who for their proper vertues, are vnworthie of them: It makes them blynde in their deſires, and impudent to hope to compaſſe euen thinges that are without their reach: On the behalfe of the french king, it was accorded in that contract, that what confederacion or aliance he had made, it ſhould be vnderſtanded with this clauſe, ſauing the rightes of Thempire, by meane whereof it ſhould be lawfull to Themprour to chalenge it aſwell for thoſe that ſhould be now named by the king, as for ſuch as he had affore taken into his protection: There reſted only the principall difficultie touching thinueſtiture, for that Caeſar refuſed to graunt it to thiſſue Males if the king ſhould haue any: They ſtoode alſo vppon tearmes for reſtitution of the exiles of the Duchie of Myllan, which being inſtantly demaunded by Caeſar, the king refuſed flatly to graunt, for that beſides they were many in number, there were alſo perſonages of importance and authoritie: At laſt by compulcion of the kinges importunities, he was content to giue libertie to Cardinall Askanius, and hope of the like grace to Lodovvyk Sforce with aſſignation of penſion of twentie thouſand Duckats by yeare to furniſhe his countenance in the realme of Fraunce: By reaſon of theſe difficulties, they fell not otherwayes to accord, then with hopes to be hable to introduce ſome conuenient forme, and therefore the truce being eftſoones prolonged, the Cardinall returned into Fraunce, holding almoſt for certeine, that the matters which they had debated, would with ſpeede diuolue to their perfection: Which opinion was augmented by this occaſion, that a litle after, the Archduke, before he went into Spaine to receiue in his perſon and the perſon of Iane his wyfe eldeſt daughter of the king there, the othe of fidelitie of the peoples, as ordeined to that ſucceſſion: He made his way by lande accompanied with his wyfe, and met at Bloys with the french king, who receiuing him with many honors, they reſted agreed touching the mariage of their children: In this yeare dyed Auguſtyn Barbaryn Duke of Venice, who managed his principalitie with ſuch happines and authoritie, that in many actions it ſeemed that he ouercame the degree of his predeceſſors: Therefore the power of his ſucceſſors being limited by new lawes, Leonard Loredan was elected in his place, the common weale feeling no chaunge in publyke thinges, neither by the death of the Prince, nor for the election of a new: So excellent was the forme of his gouernment.

In this yeare, the Florentyns & the Piſans (contrary to the cuſtomes of the yeares before) brought forth no great actions one againſt the other: for that the Florētyns, being no more vnder the protection of the French, and ſtanding in continuall ſuſpicion of the Pope & the Duke Valentynois, ſtudied more to keepe that was their owne, then to offend others: And the Piſans not hauing of them ſelues any power to vexe them, had leſſe poſſibilitie to doe it by the ayde of others, for that there were none that ſtirred otherwayes in their fauours, but only to ſuſteine them when they were in perill of ruine: But in the yeare 1502. might be ſeene a recontinuacion of their actions accuſtomed, for that the Florentyns, almoſt in the beginning of the yeare, contracted of new with the french king, after they had ouercome all difficulties more by the benefite of fortune then by the diſpoſicion of the king, or other occaſions: Seeing the king of Romains (ſince the Cardinall of Amboyſe departed) being poſſeſſed of new thoughtes and purpoſes, and refuſing to accompliſhe to the french king thinueſtiture of the Duchie, yea euen to his daughters maried, ſent as his Embaſſadours into Italy, Hermes Sforce whom the king had acquited of his impriſonment, & the prouoſt of Beſtna, to deale with the Pope and the other Potentates touching his diſcending into Italy to take the Crowne of the Empire: Theſe Embaſſadors, omitting no oportunitie wherin occaſion was giuen, as they ſoiorned certeine dayes in Florence, obteined promiſe of the ſame Citie to contribute to his ayde with a hundred men at armes and thirtie thouſande Duckats, aſſoone as he was entred into Italy: In which reſpect, the french king (Princes are iealous one ouer an other touching amities and forteine cõfidences) who feared leaſt the Florentyns diſpairing of his friendſhip, wold

turne their fauours to Maxymilian, was content to quallefie the immoderate demaundes he had made to them, and contract an accorde vnder conditions more tollerable, the generall partes whereof were theſe: That the king receiuing them into his protection, ſhould be bound for three yeares folowing, to defend them with armes at his proper exſpences, againſt who ſo euer would directly or indirectly moleſt them touching the ſtate and dominions which at that tyme they poſſeſſed: That the Florentyns ſhould paie to him within the ſaide three yeares, ſix ſcore thouſande Duckattes, euery yeare a third parte: That all other capitulations made betweene them, with all bondes and promiſes depending on the ſame, ſhould be made diſſolued and voyd: That it ſhould be lawful to the Florentyns to proceede with armes againſt the Piſans, and all others that occupie their landes. Accord betweene the french king and the Florentyns.

In regard of which confederation, the Florentyns recomforted and taking a newe hart, determined to giue the ſpoile to the cornes and graines of the countrey of Piſa, to thende that by tyme and famine, they might reduce the towne of Piſa to theyr obedience, ſeeing they had ſo vnluckely trauelled to force them by ſeege: This coũcell was propounded in the firſt yeare of theyr rebellion by a certeine well experienced Citizen, alleaging that by thoſe meanes, more certeine, but further of, they ſhould afflict and conſume the Piſans, with litle exſpences and leſſe daunger: He tolde them that in regarde of the preſent conditions of Italy muche troubled and moleſted, if they would make ſtore of their treaſors, they might make them ſerue their turnes in many occaſions: But if, with the waſt of their money, they woulde range them by force and compulſion, they ſhould finde thenterpriſe both doubtful and daungerous, for that the ſuertie of that Citie was great by the ſcituation and ſtrength of the walles, and full of inhabitantes well reſolute to defende it: Beſides alſo, as often as there ſhould bee perill to loſe it, it woulde bee reskued by all thoſe that to the enuy of our well doing, haue ioyned a ſetled diſpoſition to ſee it preſerued: In ſo muche as the exſpences being greater then the hopes, wee ſhoulde alwayes nouriſhe our proper daungers and cut out occaſions to ſtirre vp new trauels: All violent attemptes being ſet foorth without councell, at the beginning ſeeme mightie, but in continuance they are founde inſufficient, ſince in the fielde, armor and weapons are to ſmall purpoſe, if at home a ſounde councell ſet not downe a good direction: The councell of this graue Citizen being reiected in the beginning for hurtfull, after the courſe of many yeares, was founde profitable, but in a tyme wherein they had waſted huge exſpences and treaſors, and attempted the victorie with many intollerable daungers: After they had ouerrunne their corne, hoping that thauthoritie of the kinges protection, would defende all men from riſing in the ſuccours of the Piſans, they planted their ſeege before Vicopiſan, for that not many dayes before, the Piſans had taken it from them by treaſon of certeyne ſoldiours that were within: And the Capteine of the Caſtle not abiding for the ſuccors which ſhould haue arryued within few houres, did render it to them with great cowardiſe: They made no doubt to carie it, by the penurie of prouiſion and vittelles, which they knew could not ſuffice for fiftiene dayes, and they had good confidence to let that none ſhould enter, for that by the benefite of their Baſtillions, which they had builded ſeparate vppon the mounteynes, they commaunded all the paſſages: And in the ſame ſeaſon being aduertiſed, that Fracaſſe but pore and without paie, was going with a fewe horſemen to enter Piſa in the name and with letters of Maxymilian, they gaue direction that hee ſhoulde bee charged on the way, where his fortune being no leſſe enuious then his condition was poore, he was made priſoner ſeeking his ſafetie in a Church within the iuriſdiction of the Duke of Ferrara: Theſe accidentes fell in Tuskan, no man as yet perceiuyng what would happen by them contrary to the exſpectation of euery one.

The frenche and the Spanyardes do diſagree vppon the deuiding of Naples.

But farre more great and daungerous mocions, and of the which were to diſcend in tyme to come, effectes of right great importance, beganne to be diſcloſed in the kingdome of Naples by the diſcordes which hapned the yeare paſſed betweene the Frenche and Spaniſhe Capteines: They tooke their beginning, for that in the diuiſion made betweene both the kings, the countrey of Lauoro and Abruzzo being adiudged to the one, and to the other, Povvilla and Calabria, the cõfines & limits of the prouinces were not well expreſſed in the diuiſion: In ſo much as either one began to pretende that that parte which is called Capitinato did diſtinctly and particularly apperteine to him: To this controuerſie gaue a great occaſion, the alteration and chaunge made by Alphonſo of Aragon King of Naples firſt of that name touching the auncient denomination and diuiſion of the prouinces: He, looking to make eaſie the exactions of the reuenues diuided all the kingdome into theſe ſixe principall prouinces, Lauoro, Principato, Baſilicato, Calabria, Povvylla, and Abruzzo: Of theſe Povvylla was diſtinguiſhed into theſe three members, Ottranto, Bary, and Capitinato, which Capitinato adioyning to Abruzzo, and diuided from the reſidue of Povvylla by the Ryuer Lofanto aunciently called avvfido, the frenchmen, taking rather thaduauntage of thauncient diuiſion, then ruled by the late denomination, pretended, that eyther Capitinato was not comprehended vnder any one of the foure prouinces deuided, or els that it was rather parte of Abruzzo then of Povvylla: In this contention the importance of the countrey ledde them not ſo muche, as the conſideration of theſe two infirmities, the one, for that not poſſeſſing Capitinato, they had no parte in the reuenue which was drawne of the tribute of cattell, a reuenue of greateſt profite in all the realme of Naples: The other, for that Abruzzo and Lauoro being naked of graines and corne which came to Capitinato, thoſe prouinces in tymes of ſterrillitie might bee eaſely reduced into great extremeties, as often as the Spaniſhe woulde make reſtrainte that none ſhoulde bee fetched out of Povvylla and Sicilia: But it was alleaged on the contrary that Capitinato coulde not apperteyne to the frenche, for that Abruzzo which is ended in the high places, ſtretcheth not ſo farre as the plaines: And for that alſo in caſes of difference of the names and limits of prouinces, the vſage preſent is alwayes cõſidered: Notwithſtandyng theſe controuerſies ſuſpendyng, they were content for the yeare preſent to deuyde equally the reuenue of the cattell: But the yeare following, fallyng from that obſeruation, eyther partie tooke as muche as hee could gette, whereunto were added afterwardes newe quarrelles, nouriſhed tyll that tyme (as the bruit went) more by the willes of the Capteynes, then of the conſent of theyr Lordes and Kinges: For, the Spanyardes pretended that Principato and Baſilicato were included in Calabria, which is deuided into two partes, Calabria Cytra and Calabria Vltra, that is the one higher and the other lower: And alſo that the valley of Beneuent which the french helde, was parte of Povvilla, and therefore ſent officers to keepe Courtes of iuſtice at Tripaldo within two myles of Auelino, where were reſident the frenche maieſtrates: Theſe beginninges of open diſſention being troubleſome to the principall Barons of the realme, they interpoſed betweene Conſaluo, and Levvys D'arminack, Duke of Nemours, Viceroy for the french king, and by their interceſſion, Levvys being come to Melfe and Conſaluo to Atele a towne of the Prince of Melfe, after the trauel of certein moneths (in which time the two Capteynes ſpake together) findyng in them no conformitie to any forme of accorde, they brought them to agree to exſpect ſuche reſolucion as theyr kinges ſhoulde ſette downe of the controuerſie, and that in the meane tyme they ſhoulde forbeare to innouate any thing: But the Viceroy for the frenche preſuming much that hee was the mightier in power and force, within fewe dayes after, publiſhed an other declaration, proteſting to make warre vppon Conſaluo, if hee woulde not vppon the ſight, leaue Capitinato: And with a ſpeede as ſwift as his councell was raſhe, hee made his ſouldiours runne vp euen to Tripaldo, of which inuaſion the warre tooke his beginning, wherein the Frenche perſeuering with actions of hoſtilitie, they followed theyr purpoſe without regarde, to occupie by force in Capitinato and other quarters, the townes which the Spaniſhe helde: Which outrages were not only not redreſſed by the frenche king, but being aduertiſed that the Spaniſhe ment not to yelde him Capitinato, he conuerted him ſelfe wholly to the warre, and ſending by ſea for the ſtrength of his people, two thouſande Suyzzers hee kepte ſtill enterteyned in his paye the Princes of Salerno and Biſignian, and other of the principall Barons: Beſides, the kinges perſon came to Lyon, to thende in his owne preſence to furniſhe more conueniently the prouiſions neceſſarie for the conqueſt of the whole kingdome, whereunto (the places in queſtion were leſſe then to ſatisfie his ambicion) he aſpired manifeſtly, with intencion to paſſe into Italy if neede required: A voyage which he was conſtrained to performe with a ſpeede aboue his exſpectation, to ſuppreſſe the new tumultes hapned in Tuskane, to the which Vitellozzo gaue beginning with the priuitie and conſent of I. P. Baillon, and the Vrſins, but ſpecially by the councell and authoritie of Pandolfe Petrucci, who all ioyned in one deſire that Peter de Medicis might be reeſtabliſhed in theſtate of Florence.

The beginning of warres in Naples vnder K. Lewys the twelfth.

Of this begunne the mutinie: William Pazzi Agent for the Florentyns in Aretze, being aduertiſed that certeine of the Citizens had conſpired with Vitellozze to ſtirre the Citie to rebellion againſt the Florentyns, beleeued that in ſuche a communaltie of wiſe Citizens, the minde of euery one was not corrupted, nor remembring that to fauour the ſuſpicion, makes the treaſon more daungerous: And occupying with him ſelf this perſuaſion, that the authoritie of the name publike, would ſupplie the want of forces, he omitted to areare a ſufficient ſtrength to oppreſſe the conſpirators and ſuch as had power to reſiſt him, and only apprehended for priſoners, two of the acceſſories or competitors to the treaſon: A dealing too milde in ſo great peril, for that he gaue oportunitie to the reſidue of the cõſpirators, to raiſe the people, by whom (according to the ill affection they bare to the Florentyns) the priſoners were eaſely reskued, and the Agent apprehended, together with the reſidue of the officers, ſuffring this daunger more by theyr owne credulitie and negligence, then any prowes or vertue of theyr aduerſaries: The whole Citie forthwith publiſhed the name of libertie, and made manifeſt declaration of rebellion, the Citadell only remeyning in the deuotion of the Florentyns, to the which, in the beginning of the tumult, was retyred Coſmo Biſhop of the ſame place, and ſonne to the Agent, ſeeking his ſafetie where either his feare or fortune wold lead him: After this beginning, the men of Aretze ſent ſpeedely to Vitellozze, who was not well content that the matter was burſt out affore the tyme he had agreed with the conſpirators, for that it was to intercept him in his pollicie as hauing not yet ſet downe ſufficient direction for the prouiſions he ment to make to reſiſt the bandes of the Florentyns, if, (as was verie likely) they made any attempt to enter Aretze by the

Aretze rebelleth againſt the Flor. in fauour of Pe. de Medicis.

Cytadell: For feare whereof, and to ſatisfie with his preſence the myndes of the Citizens, hee went from Citta de Caſtello to Aretze accompanied with his men at armes and a choice ſtrength of footemen, and leauing order that they ſhould looke diligently to holde thoſe in the Citadell ſtraitly incloſed, to thende that through it there might bee no action againſt the Citie, he returned eftſoones to Citta de Caſtello promiſing to come againe with the ſame ſpeede, but with a greater ſtrength: In all humaine actions, there is nothing which with leſſe perill may not temporiſe and exſpect, then rebellion, in the oppreſſion whereof there is no greater vertue then expedicion of action: For that by howe much it is ſuffred, by ſo much it riſeth into degrees of worſe nature, euen as a ſoare that is lingred, breedeth a cure doubtfull: They of Florence to whom apperteined to prouyde for this miſchiefe, conſidered not well in the beginning, of what importance it was: For, the principall Citizens, by whoſe councell the waightie affaires of the Citie had wont to paſſe, giuing this direction that the regimentes which were incamped before Vicopiſan (a number ſo ſufficient, that marching with diligence they might haue vanquiſhed all reſiſtance) ſhoulde be conuerted to Aretze: Many others which occupied the greateſt romthes and offices, (their knowledge being leſſe then their authoritie, and their ignorance ſlaunderous to the places they occupied) meinteyned that it was a matter but of ſmall moment, and that they might redreſſe it with the forces of their other ſubiectes, neighbours to the ſame Citie: Their ignorance made them ſuſpect the ſoundnes of the other councell, and according to their wilful credulitie, they beleeued that thoſe good Citizens, bearing mindes eſtraunged from the preſent gouernment, made the daunger farre greater then it was, for a deſyre they had to hinder the action of Vicopiſan, and by that meane to take away the oportunitie to recouer Piſa: By which variacion and wandryng in councell, they deferred ſo long to ſende ſtrength thether, that Vitellozze takyng courage of theyr delayes, returned to Aretze with an increaſe of forces, drawyng thether after him with other bandes I. P. Baillon, and Fabio the ſonne of P. Vrſin, Peter de Medicis and the Cardinall: Who hauing receyued municions from Sienna, they beganne to batter the Citadell, wherein, (accordyng to the cuſtome of many which are more carefull to erect newe fortifications, then diligent to preſerue the fortes alreadie builded) was no leſſe want of vittelles, then of all other prouiſions neceſſarie to defence: And to adde the laſte diſcomforte to men in extremitie, they inuironned it ſo ſtraitly with trenches and mountes on the out ſyde to giue impediment to the ſuccours that might enter, that they made them naked of all comforte other then ſuche as men in miſerie may hope for. And therefore, waighing with theyr wantes within the Caſtle, the weakenes of the Florentyns to miniſter ſufficient ſuccours, and in due ſeaſon, (being come but to Quarate, and durſt not paſſe further) they rendred by neceſſitie that which they could not holde by their vertue, making only this agreement, that the reſidue remeining in libertie, the Biſhop with eight others which they of Aretze would chuſe, ſhold abyde priſoners, to exchaunge them for ſome of theyr Citizens which were priſoners at Florence: The commons of Aretze diſmantled the Citadell, and the armie of the Florentyns, fearing leaſte Vitellozze and John Paulle, who were farre ſtronger then they, woulde charge them, retyred to Montemarcho, leauyng to the diſcreſſion of thennemyes, all the places thereabout: It was beleeued that this enterpryſe was made without the priuitie or knowledge of the Pope and Duke Valentynois, in whom was no contentment that Peter de Medicis

dicis ſhoulde returne to Florence, for that hee was ſtraitly allyed with Vitellozze and the Vrſins, whom they had ſecretly determined to oppreſſe: And yet hauing alwayes giuen them hope of the contrary, they conſented that Vitellozze, Iohn Pavvlo, and Fabio, Mercinorie in theyr paye, ſhould proſecute thenterpryſe: Yea they did not diſſemble that they were very glad of the rebellion of Aretze, hoping, that by thoſe diſpleaſures done to the Florentyns, it might happen, that eyther they might get ſome parte of their dominion, or at leaſt conſtrayne them, for their profite, to ſome harde condicion: But the Florentyns not-beleeuing but that they were the authours of the whole miſchiefe, were ſo muche the more terryfied, and therefore reapposing little in the remedyes which of them ſelues they were hable to applie, for that, by the ill diſpoſicion of the Citie, they had in theyr paye but a verie ſmall proporcion of men at armes, and not hable to refurnyſhe theyr power ſo ſoone as the neceſſitie of theyr daunger requyred: They had ſpeedie recourſe to the frenche King: Laying affore him not only that which they coulde challenge by his honour, bynding him ſelfe ſo lately to their defence, but alſo the apparant daunger to the Duchie of Myllan, if the Pope and Duke Valentynois (againſt whom was no little ſuſpicion to bee the kyndlers of this commocion) became Lordes ouer Tuskane: They debated with him by lyuely reaſons, that the Pope and the Duke were mightie in armes, hauing an armie compownded vppon excellent Capteynes and Souldiours of choyce, and that by the declaracions they made, neyther Romania nor Tuskane woulde ſuffice theyr infinite ambicion, aſpiryng to matters more ample and immoderate: And laſtly ſeeing they had offended the honour of the king, by inuadyng ſuche as were in his protection, neceſſetie nowe conſtrayned them, to thynke no leſſe vppon theyr owne ſuertie, then to take from him the meane to bee reuenged of ſo great an iniurie.

The Florentyns haue recourſe to the french king.

Theſe reaſons moued not a litle the Kyng, who had alreadie begunne to miſlyke with the inſolencie and ambicion of the Pope and his ſonne: And conſideryng that the warre was begunne in the kyngdome of Naples betweene hym and the Spaniſhe, and the negociacion of accorde with Maxymilian broken, and laſtly that hee was not (for many reaſons) to truſt the Venetians, he began to doubt leaſte the inuaſion of Tuskane (ſupported by ſome ſecrete councell of others) turned not to his great diſaduauntage: In which opinion hee was confirmed greatly by certeyne aduertiſementes from Charles D'amboyſe the Cardinalles Nephew, and Lieftenaunt to the King in all the Duchie of Myllan, who ſuſpecting ſuche innouacions, perſwaded the King to prouyde carefully for his proper daunger: And therefore with a councell reſolued and direction equall to the importunitie of the buiſines, determining to make marche into Italy with all ſpeede his armie, and to ſuccour readily the Florentyns, hee gaue charge in the meane while to the ſaide Lorde Charles, to ſende foorthwith to theyr reskewes, foure hundred Launces, and diſpatched an Heralde in poſte to commaunde not only Vitellozze, Iohn Pavvle, Pandolphe, and the Vrſins, but alſo the Duke Valentynois, to forbeare to offende any more the Florentyns, wherein him ſelfe made great inſtance to the Popes Embaſſadour, and threatned with very ſharpe words Iulian de Medicis, and the Agentes of Pandolfe and Vitellozze which were in his Court.

But in this tyme, the Duke Valentynois, who ſince the accident of Aretze, was come out of Rome with his armie, makyng ſemblance to take Cameryn, whether he had ſent before the Duke of Grauino & Liuerot de Fernie with part of his bandes, to make ſpoile and hold it beſeeged, but in true meaning to ſurpriſe vnder that ſemblance, the Duchie of Vrbyn: After he had reſembled his armie vppon the confines of Perouſa, he demaunded of Guidobaldo Duke of Vrbyn, money and artillerie: Which was eaſily agreed to him, for that it was neither for his ſuertie to refuſe a Prince who had his ſtrength ſo neare, and alſo hauing a litle before compounded with the Pope touching the controuerſie of a tribute, he had no occaſion to feare: The Duke Valentynois, hauing by this meane made the other leſſe ſuffioient for his owne defence, departing ſodeinly from Nocero, & marching with a diligence ſo well diſpoſed as he would giue his men no leaſure to reappoſe or bayte, he arryued the ſame day at Cagly a towne of the Duchie: The ſodeinnes of whoſe comming, and againſt a people vnprouided, brought ſuch a generall amaze, that the Duke & Francis Maria Rouvvero prefect of Rome his Nephew, had ſkarce leaſure to finde ſafetie in

" fleeing, Suche a paſſion is ſodeine feare, that it makes men runne, not whether coun-
" cell directes them, but whether their fortune will leade them, not ſuffring them to
" conſider of their perill, but makes them oftentimes to throw away their weapons
" and refuſe the thing that ſhould be their ſafegarde: But the Duke Valentynois, putting diligence to the diſpoſicion of his fortune, obteined in very few houres, a victorie of all that ſtate, except the rocke of S. Leon, and Manniola, to the great diſpleaſure and feare of Pandolfe, Vitellozze, and the Vrſins, who nowe began to diſcerne theyr proper perils, by the harmes of an other.

After the conqueſt of the Duchie of Vrbyn, the Duke Valentynois, who iudged all aduẽtures inferior to his fortune, was raiſed into diuers thoughts: Somtymes he determined to make an end of the enterpriſe of Camerin, and ſometimes he reſolued to inuade openly the Florentyns, In which councell he had ſtand ſetled, if the commaũdement he receiued from the french king, had not brideled his ambicion, hauing aſſured knowledge, that notwithſtanding the Popes trauell to alter him, his maieſtie had ſent men at armes in fauor of the Florentyns, & was reſolutely determined to defende them, and in that inclinacion he prepared to paſſe in perſon into Italy: Theſe doubtes drawing diuers reaſons, with no leſſe variacion touching the end of things, ſo incombred his thoughtes, that he ſtaied within Vrbyn to conſider what he had to doe, and what would be the ſucceſſe of things: During which time the Pope and he ſolicited many matters with the Florentyns, hoping to bring them ſomewhat to condiſcend to their deſires: And on the other ſide, he ſuffred many of his ſoldiors to go continually to the Camp of Vitellozze: Who hauing aſſembled an armie of eight hundred horſmen and three thouſande footmen, and for the better reputacion of his doinges, calling his armie the Camp eccleſiaſticall: Had, ſince the rendring of the Citadell of Aretze, occupied Mount S. Souyn, Chaſtillon D'aretze, and the Citie of Cortono with all the other townes and borowes of Valdichiano: Of the which not one of them taried an aſſalt, both for that they ſawe the ſuccours of the Florentyns not in readines, and alſo, the tyme ſeruing then to gather the fruites, it ſtood not with their habilities to loſe the profit of their reuenues, alleaging that in that reſpect they were not rebels to the Florentyns, ſeeing Peter de Medicis was in the armie, for whoſe reſtoring it was ſaide that enterpriſe was made: And it is not to be doubted, that if Vitellozze, after the taking of Cortono, had ſodeinly entred the countrey Caſentyn, that it had not bene in his power to haue marched euen to the walles of Florence, both for that the french bandes were not yet come, and alſo the moſt parte of the Florentyne footemen were diſperſed, for that almoſt the townes being loſt, the occaſion of ſeruice uice ceaſſed, and they were returned to their houſes: But as it hapneth oftentymes that very ſmall impediments hinder the execution of many high enterpriſes, ſo the deſire he had to winne for him ſelfe the borow of S. Sepulcher (a place neare to Citta de Caſtello) hindred the better councell, notwithſtanding (to couer his couetouſnes) he alleaged that it was not ſure to leaue behinde his backe any place that was enemie: Therefore he turned towardes Anguiaro, which place, albeit it only had this conſtancie to abide till the artilleries were planted, being too weake to reſiſt ſo ſtrōg an enemie, yelded to diſcreſſion without excepting any thing: From thence he marched to the borow S. Sepulcher, which he tooke by accord, hauing no better habilitie of reſiſtance then the reſt, and ſo drawing towardes Caſentyn, and aryuing at the village of Raſina, he ſent to ſummon the towne of Poppy, of ſtrong ſcituacion, but wherein were very fewe ſouldiours: But the reputacion of the french armes ſupplied their weaknes & want of forces, for that two hundred Launces arryued alreadie neare Florence vnder Captein Imbault, & not daring for lack of foounē, to affrōt the enemie, were marched to S. Iohn D'arno, with intenciō to reaſſemble in that place all the bands: Which being knowne to Vitellozze, & fearing leaſt his abſēce wold be incōueniēt for thē of Aretze, he retired with diligēce frō Lauernia within two miles of Quaratta, & from thēce drawing on to declare that he feared not the enemie, & to aſſure Rhōdina with other places therabouts, he incamped in a ſtrōg place on that ſide to Rhondina hauing left certeine bandes of footmen for the guard of Ciuitella & Garguſe which were the portes or gates by the which the Florentyn bandes might enter into the countrey: Theſe companies (being alſo aryued two hundred Launces more vnder Capteine La Hire) aſſembled betweene Montenarche and Laterina, with intencion that aſſoone as they had gathered a ſtrength of three hundred footmen, to goe incamp neare Vitellozze vppon ſome high hil: A reſolucion againſt his fuertie, and therefore neither hable to keepe that place, nor leauy his Camp without great daunger, he retired neare to the walles of Aretze: But the frenche taking the helde with their whole army, and incamping right ouer againſt Quaratta, he was driuen to retire within Aretzo: Where albeit he had ſayde to many, that he would performe a notable defence in the ſame Citie, yet, new accidents hapning, he was conſtrained to turne to new thoughtes: For, Iohn Pavvle Baillon was come to Perouſe with his regiment, fearing by that that was done to the Duke of vrbyn, leaſt he ſhould fall into daunger of the lyke oppreſſion: By reaſon of which examples, and no leſſe for that which hapned in Camaryn, Vitellozze, Pandolfe, Petrucci, and the Vrſins, fell into great confuſion of mynde: For, in the very tyme that the Duke Valentynois commoned of accord with Iules de Varana Lorde of Cameryn, he ſurpriſed the Citie by ſuttle meanes, and hauing Iules in his power with two of his ſonnes, he cauſed them to be ſtrangled with the ſame inhumanitie which he vſed againſt others: But that which moſt amazed Vitellozze, was, that the french king, already come to Aſt, ſent Lovvys Trymouille into Tuskan with two hundred Launces, and great ſtrength of artilleries: Who marching to Parma, exſpected there three thouſand Svvyſſers, which the king ſent for the recouery of Aretze, at the charges of the Florentyns: The King being greatly kindled againſt the Pope, had an intencion to deſpoile the Duke Valentynois of Romania with other eſtates occupied by him, and for that effect, had ſent for all thoſe that either feared his power, or had bene offended by him, whom he aſſured that he would execute that intencion in perſon, and proteſted publikely with great affection, that it was an enterpriſe no leſſe full of pietie and deuocion then if the action were dreſſed againſt the Turkes: He laide alſo his plot at that tyme to chaſe out of Sienna Pandolfe Petrucci, for that he had ſent money to Lodouvvyk Sforce when he returned to Myllan, and alwayes had made open profeſſion to be imperiall: But the Pope and Duke Valentynois knowing that they were not hable to reſiſt ſo great a ſtorme and rage of anger of the french king, had recourſe to their ſuttleties and wel experienced craftes, with the which they forged excuſes, that the actions agaynſt Aretze were done by Vitellozze without their knowledge, and that there authoritie ſufficed not to reſtraine him, and much leſſe to keepe from ayding him, the Vrſins, and I. P. Baillon, who albeit were in his paie, yet they were ouerruled with the regard to their proper intereſts: And the better to bring the minde of the king to moderation, Duke Valentynois ſent to tell Vitellozze that if he reſtored not Aretze and the other places of the Florentyns, he would come with his whole armie, and compel him to render that, which he had vniuſtly gotten: Which ſommonce ioyned to the cõſideratiõ of the preſent eſtate of the affaires, bred no litle aſtoniſhment in the minde of Vitellozze, fearing leaſt (as hapneth for the moſt part) that the ſtrongeſt being reconciled, the indignation of the king would turne againſt him, which was the weaker in ſtrength, and farre inferior in all other meanes: And therefore to auoyde his perill ſo apparant, he called into Aretze the Capteine Imbault, (contrary notwithſtanding to the willes of the Florentyns, who deſired that the townes loſt might be redeliuered freely in the fielde) who compoũded that Vitellozze departing immediatly with al his cõpanies, ſhold cõſigne Aretze with al the other places to the frẽch Capteins to hold them in the kings name, vntil the Cardinal Vrſin, who went to the king, had ſpokẽ with his maieſtie: And that in the mean while, there ſhould not enter into Aretze other companies thẽ of the frẽch Captains with ſortie horſmen: For whoſe ſuertie, and no leſſe for obſeruacion of thartícles promiſed, he ſhold giue two of his Nephewes in Oſtage to Capteine Imbault: Aſſoone as the accord was paſſed, hee went with all his companies and artillerie from Aretze, leauing to the frenche men, the whole poſſeſſion of all the other places, which forthwith were deliuered ouer to the Florentyns by the kings commiſſion: Whileſt the Parley of thaccord continued, Capteine Imbault anſwered in skorne to the complaints, which the Florentyns made, that he could not diſcerne wherein conſiſted that great celebracion of ſpirite and wiſedome in the Florentyns, ſeeing they knew not, that the ſooner to aſſure the victorie without difficultie and exſpences, and to auoide perill of other diſorders, how to deſire that Aretze might fall into the handes of the king, who was not bounde to beare regarde (but in ſorte as he thought good) to the promiſes made by his Capteines to Vitellozze: But the Florentyns more by their fortune then their vertue, being deliuered with great facilitie, but not without huge exſpences, of ſo terrible and vnlooked for aſſalt, began to looke to the reordeining and redreſſing of the pollicie of their common weale, by the confuſion and diſorders of which, experience had made them finde out, yea euen to theſtate of the communaltie, that they were falne into ſo great and ſundrie daungers, for that by the often chaunge of maieſtrates, and for the name of a fewe that were ſuſpected to the people, there was not one whether he were publike or a priuate perſon, in whom reſted a perpetuall care of thaffaires: But for that tyrannie was abhorred almoſt of the whole Citie, and the authoritie of perſonages moſt honeſt was ſuſpected of the multitude, and for that by the precedent of tymes paſt, they helde it not poſſible to ordeine with common deliberacion, a perfect forme of gouernment, the ignorant ſort and incapable being not hable to be conuinced with reaſons only: It was determined to introduce for the tyme, this only new thing, that the Gonfalonnier of Iuſtice chiefe of the dominion, and whoſe

creation (together with it) was for the time of two monethes, ſhoulde bee choſen hereafter for his whole lyfe: So might he keepe a continuall ſtudie ouer the affaires publike, that through negligence they might not fall eftſoones into ſo great daungers: It was hoped that, with thauthoritie which the qualitie of his perſon woulde giue him, and for that he was to remeine perpetually in ſo great dignitie, he ſhould winne ſuche opinion of faith and credite with the people, that with tyme he might eaſely reeſtabliſh the other partes of the gouernment, and withall, placing Citizens of greateſt condicion in ſome degrees honorable, he might conſtitute a meane betweene him ſelfe and the communaltie, by the which the ignorance and libertie popular being tempered, and all ſuche bridled as ſhould ſucceede him in the ſame dignitie if they would aſpire or riſe to high, he might leaue eſtabliſhed a wiſe and honorable gouernment with many good circumſtances to contein the Citie in peace: After this deliberation was well debated and reſolued, there was choſen for Gonfalonnier, by the great councell with a concourſe & conſent of almoſt all the Citizens, Peter Soderin, a man for his age verie ripe in councell and experience, for his countenance, of verie great wealth and furniſhmens for his houſe, noble aboue moſt of the reſidue of Citizens, for his credite, mightie in opinion and affection with the people, and bearing a reputacion of integretie, continencie, and to haue alwayes noriſhed great cares of the publike buiſines: Laſtly, he was without children, a point not of the leaſt conſideration, for that they might breede occaſions to lift vp his thoughtes to ambicious purpoſes.

But to returne now to thaffaires common and generall: Aſſoone as the frenche king was come to Aſt, all the Princes and free Cities of Italy, according to their cuſtome runne to him: Some in perſon, and ſome by Embaſſadors: Amongeſt whom was Baptiſtin Vrſin Cardinall who went thether againſt the Popes will, to iuſtefie his brethren and Vitellozze touching the action of Aretze, and withall to ſtirre vp the king againſt the Pope and Duke Valentynois, againſt whom, by the conſideration of the vehemencie ſhowed affore by the king, all Italy exſpected with great deſire, that the french forces might be oppoſed: But experience declareth this to be true, that „ that which many deſire, ſucceedeth rarely, for that theffectes of humaine actions „ depending ordinarily of fewe, and thintencions and endes of them differing from „ the meaninges and endes of many, hardly can thinges ſucceede otherwayes then „ according to thintencion of thoſe that giue their firſt mocion: Euen ſo it hapned in „ this caſe, for that intereſts and endes perticular induced the king to make deliberations contrarie to the deſire vniuerſall: Wherin the thing that moued the king, was not ſo much the diligence of the Pope, who ceaſſed not by the negociation of men ſpeciall, to labour to appaiſe him, as the ſuttle councell of the Cardinal Amboyſe, noriſhing a perpetuall deſire to enter amitie betweene the Pope and the king, induced perhaps thereunto, (beſides the weale and vtilitie of his king) for his owne profite and purpoſe perticular: Both for that the Pope recontinued his legation ouer the realme of Fraunce for eightiene monethes, and alſo ſtudying carefully to laye foundacions to raiſe him to the Popedome, he ſought to be hable to obteine of him, the promocion of his parents and dependences whileſt he was in the Cardinallſhyp, and withall he iudged that to haue the name and reputacion to be a louer and protector of theſtate eccleſiaſtike, was a thing that might doe much to ſerue to his intencion: Touching theſe deuiſes, the conditions of the tyme preſent were very conuenient to draw the king to fauour his councels, for that as he was in ſuſpicion with Themperour, who could not be appeaſed, ſo hauing of newe ſent to Trente many bandes of horſmen with a certeine proporcion of footmen, he made alſo great offers to the Pope to aide him to paſſe into Italy to take the Crowne imperiall.

Amyd theſe doubtes, euery enterpriſe of Themprour fell into more great conſideration, for that the king knew that it ſtoode not with the liking of the Venetians that the Duchie of Myllan & realme of Naples, ſhould be ornaments of his Crowne: To theſe was added the controuerſie which he had with the foure Kantons Swyſſers, who required him to giue vp to them the rightes he had to Bellynzone, and with all to redeliuer to their poſſeſſion the Vale Voltolino, Schafonſe, with other things immoderate, threatning him that his deniall to theſe demaundes would driue them to enter confederation with Maxymilian: Difficulties which ſeemed to the king ſo much the more great and deſperate, by howe much he was out of all hope at that tyme to accord with the king of Spaine: For, albeit the french king had made mocions to haue Federyk reſtored to the kingdome of Naples, for which occaſion he offred to bring him with him into Italy, and that the negociation ſtill continued to eſtabliſhe a truce for a tyme, euery one reteining that he poſſeſſed: Yet both in the one and other practiſe, there concurred ſo many obiections and impediments that the french king with malencolly moodes & miſcontentmẽts tooke occaſion to diſmiſſe from his Court the Spaniſh Embaſſadors: The Pope ioyning him ſelf to theſe occaſions, and no leſſe he then the Duke Valentynois watching the aduauntages of tymes and accidents, had ſent eſtſoones to his maieſtie, one Troccio Chamberleyne to the Pope and of his ſecret credence, promiſing to ayde him with all their power in the warre of Naples: In which reſpectes, he determined to recontinue in the amitie of the Pope: And therefore vppon the returne of Troccio to Rome, the Duke Valentynois, following the anſwere he brought, went ſecretly in poſte to finde the king arryued then at Myllan, of whom, contrary to the common exſpectation, and no leſſe to the diſpleaſure of euery one in perticular, he was welcommed with honors and demonſtrations farre greater then was the kinges cuſtome: The king vppon reconcilement with the Duke, holding it now no more neceſſarie to keepe his armie in Tuskane, ſent a countermaund to haue them come into Lombardy, hauing affore receiued into his protection the Siennois, & Pandolfe Petrucci with condition to paie him fortie thouſande Duckats at dayes limited: After theſe chaunges and contracts of amities, the ſtirres of Maxymilian began to growe colde and diſſolue, inſomuch as the kings thoughtes had now no other exerciſe, then to deuiſe vppon the things of Naples, which, if till then ſeemed to haue ſucceeded happely to him, he noriſhed for tyme to come hopes of greater proſperitie: For, he was no ſooner comen into Italy, then he diſpatched thether by ſea two thouſand Swyſſers, and more then two thouſande Gaſcoins who, ioyning to the ſtrength of the Viceroy (occupying alreadie all Capitinat except Manfredonia and S. Ange) encamped before Canoſa which Peter of Nauarre kept with ſix hundred Spaniardes: Who, after he had made a valiant reſiſtance for many dayes, and receiuing direction from Conſalue not to abide thextremitie of daungers for feare to loſe ſo many well trained and reſolute bodies, rendred the towne to the french, their goods & liues ſaued: By reaſon of this accident, and the Spanyardes holding now no more place neither in Powylla, Calabria, nor Capitinat, except, beſides the peeces affore named, Barletta, Andria, Galipoli, Tarente, Coſenze, Quierace, Seminare, and a fewe others by the ſea, and being farre inferior in ſtrength and numbers: Conſalue retired with tharmie to Barletto, without money, with skarcetie of vittels, and with no leſſe want of munitions (aduerſities intollerable to an armie) But touching the laſt want, he was ſomewhat recomforted by a ſecret

Duke Valentynois with the french king.

Conſalue retireth to Barletto.

cret cõsent of the Venetians, who did not restraine him to buy at Venice a great quantitie of salpeter: The french king, making this suffrance an occasion of complaint against the Senat, was answered, that it was an action without their knowledge done only by certeine marchauntes perticular and that at Venice, which is a Citie free, it was neuer defended to any to exercise their negociation and traffyke for marchandise. When Canosa was take, the french Capteins (debating the present difficulties, but chiefly that for want of water the whole armie could not continue incamped about Barlette, an opinion meinteined against the councelles and protestations of Monsr D'aubigny) determined that one parte of their people, which they sayde were in number a thousande and two hundred Launces, and ten thousande footemen of all natures, should remeine still to continue a forme of a seege about the confines of Barlette, and the other part should be emploied to recouer the residue of the realme: A deliberation, (in the coniectures of wise men) which ioyned to the ordinary negligence of the frenche nation, brought great hurt to their enterprise: The Viceroy immediatly vppon this resolution, made him selfe Lorde of all Pouvylla, except Tarenta, Otrante, and Galipoly: After which successe he returned to the seege of Barlette: Monsr D'aubigny at the same tyme (communicating in the fortune of the others) entring into Calabria with the other parte of tharmie, sacked the Citie of Cosenze, the Rocke remeining still in the power of the Spanishe, Who, being all drawne into one strength that were in that prouince, and ioyning the other bandes that were comen from Cicilia, were afterwardes broken by M. D'aubigny in one encounter: These prosperities, being all hapned, or vppon the point to succeede whilest the french king was in Italy, made him not only negligent in the continuation of necessarie prouicions, (by the benefite whereof he might easely haue chased the enemies out of the whole kingdome) but also brought him into this opinion of securitie, that he had no doubt to returne into Fraunce, and that so much the more, by howe much he hoped to obteine (which hope was not in vaine) a long prorogation of truce with the king of Romains.

But at his departure out of Italy, men beganne to discerne to their great maruell, what had bene treated vppon with the Duke Valentynois whom (accepting his iustification touching the action of Aretze) he had not only receiued againe into grace, but also in recompense of the othe and promise made by the Pope and him, to ayde his maiestie in the warre of Naples when need should be: He had for his part, giuen them promise to support the Duke with three hundred Launces to conquer Bollonia in the name of the Church, and to oppresse Iohn Pavvle Baillon and Vitellozze: Hee was drawne to beare suche immoderate fauours to the greatnes of the Pope, either for the ill aduised opinion he had to make him his whole and true friend by so great benefites, which woulde bee a meane that not one durst offer to attempt any thing against him in Italy: Or els for that he did not so much assure him selfe of his friendship, as he feared his ill will: To these respects were adioyned, the perticular disdaine which he bare against Iohn Pavvle, Vitellozze, and the Vrsins, for that they made no reckoning of thauthoritie of his commaundements to forbeare to offende the Florentyns: And Vitellozze in perticular, had refused to restore the artilleries he tooke at Aretze, and also to come to the kinges presence, hauing obteined safeconduit for his safetie: Besides all these, the king helde it a thing not vnprofitable to the course of his affaires, to hold Thitalian Capteins oppressed, beginning to feare least they and the Vrsins (In mercenorie souldiours constancie is the least vertue) might in the ende embrase the faction of the Spanishe king, and enter into his pale: The

Duke Valentynois, hauing leaue of the king, returned with no litle contentment into Romania, notwithſtanding the king affore had giuen hopes to ſuch as feared his ambition, that for the common ſuertie, he would take him with him into Fraunce: His returning touched not only the mindes of thoſe againſt whom were kindled his former indignations, but alſo it diſordered the cogitations of many others, for that the ſame feare occupied Pandolfe Petrucci and the Vrſins, who were conioyned almoſt in one ſelfe cauſe with Vitellozze and Iohn Pavvle Baillon: The Duke of Ferrara, by how much more he helde for ſuſpected his infidelitie and thambition of his father, by ſo much leſſe made he reckoning of any aſſurance in regarde of parentage or other cauſe conducible: And touching the Florentyns, notwithſtanding they had recouered their places by the kings fauour, yet they had no leſſe feare then the others (being ill prouided of men at armes) for that the king, reappoſing not wholly in the Marquis of Mantua, for thintelligences he had with Themprour, at ſuch tyme as he had feare of his armes, and albeit at Myllan he receiued him to reconcilement and grace, yet would he neuer conſent that they ſhould enterteine him as their Captein generall: Knowing with all by many ſignes, that the Pope and Duke Valentynois continued in the ſame will and inclination which they had againſt them, and ſpecially, for that (to keepe them in perpetuall ſuſpition) they reaſſembled and gathered together all the exiles of Aretze and the other townes: And as feare bringes into the cogitation of the minde all thinges that may either be doubted or ſuſpected, ſo it increaſed ſo muche the more in theſe ſeuerall eſtates and men, by howe muche they conſidered how mightie were ſuch enemies, in armes, in money, and in authoritie, how much in all actions they had bene ſupported by the fauors of fortune, and laſtly, that notwithſtanding the glorie, riches, and greatnes they had gotten by theyr victories, yet their ambition was neuer the more ſatisfied, but their deſires the leſſe moderate, according to the propertie of a fire, whoſe rage becomes more infinit by the encreaſe of matter wherwith it is noriſhed and fedde: Beſides, it was feared leaſt they abuſing the reſpect the king bare them, would riſe into boldnes to attempt all thinges euen againſt his will, wherein both the father and the ſonne, forgot not to publiſhe with open mouth, that it repented them too much of the great regard and doubt they had vſed touching the action of Aretze, being aſſured that the king, according to the french nature, and by the many fauours and meanes they had in his court, would yelde tolleration to the things they ſhould doe, notwithſtanding they were to his diſliking: And to thoſe that were occupied with theſe feares, this was one increaſe of calamitie, that they were not aſſured vnder the warrātie of the kings protection, for that of verie late and freſhe memorie, notwithſtanding his word and promiſe of a Prince, he had ſuffred the Lorde Plombyn to be diſpoiled, and muche leſſe tooke to reuēge the outrage that was don to the Duke of Vrbyn, whō he had taken into his defence, with fiftie men at armes which he deliuered to his armie for his ſeruice in the warres againſt Naples: But thexample of Iohn Bentyvolle, beyng much more preſent, was ſo much more agreeable to their terrors and feares: For, notwithſtanding his maieſtie in the yeares before, had commaūded Valentynois not to moleſt thoſe of Bollonnia, alleaging that the bondes and couenants which he had with the Pope, were not to be vnderſtanded but touching the preeminence & authoritie which the Church had there at that time that the confederation was made betweene them: Yet in that verie ſeaſon, Bentyvolle hauing recourſe to his maieſtie for ſuccours, fearing the great preparations that were made againſt him, the king chaunged thinterpretatiō of the words, according to the diuerſitie of his endes and inten-

intentions, and making gloſes vppon the capitulations paſt rather lyke a Lawyer, then as a king: He aunſwered that the protection by the which he was bound to defende him, bindred not the Popes enterpriſe, but touching his perſon & goods perticular: For that notwithſtanding the wordes were general, yet they were expreſſed with this relation, not to preiudice the rightes of the Churche, to the which it could not bee denied that the Citie of Bollonia did not apperteyne: And for that alſo, in the confederation hee had made with the Pope, which was the firſt which he contracted in Italy, hee was bounde, that what couenantes ſo euer hee ſhould make with others, they ſhould be without conſtruction of preiudice to the rightes of the Church: He was ſo impudent in this deliberation, ſeduced only by the Cardinall Amboyſe, contrary to all the reſidue of his councell, that hee ſent an expreſſe meſſenger to ſignifie at Bollonia that that Citie apperteyning to the Church he could not nor would not deſiſt from fauouring thenterpryſe of the Pope: And that in vertue of his protection, it ſhould be ſuffred to the Bentyuolles to remeyne at Bollonia as perſonnes priuate, enioying their perticular goods in libertie and peace.

Suche licence is taken by Princes oftentymes to diſpenſe with theyr promyſes, expreſſing ſuertie in theyr wordes, and keeping theyr intentions diſſembled: An order muche derogating the reputation and maieſtie of a Prince, whoſe honour and conſcience are ſo muche the more guiltie and burdened, by how much their protections are but baytes to bryng priuate men into peril, and vnder a diſguiſed aſſuraunce of theyr faythe, to betraie thinnocencie of their friendes and ſubiectes euen to the extreame daunger of their life: But this full proſperitie of Valentynois, was not only ſuſpected to thoſe men, but euen the Venetians began to enter into iealouſie ouer his ambition, ioyning to theyr indignitie this occaſion, that not many monethes affore, hee had rauiſhed the wyfe of Iohn Baptiſta Caracciolle the Generall of theyr footemen, as ſhee paſſed thorowe Romania to ſeeke her husbande: Therefore, to induce occaſion to the Kyng to proceede more moderately in his fauour, ſhowing that the reſpect that ledde them, was the amitie they bare him, and the iealouſie of his honour, they put him in remembraunce by theyr Embaſſadours with wordes worthie of the grauitie of ſuche a common weale: That hee ought to conſider howe deepely hee was charged to fauour ſo greatly Valentynois, and howe ill it became the noblenes of the houſe of Fraunce and the glorious title of Chriſtian King, to ſupport ſuche a tyrant, ſeeking the ruyne of peoples and prouinces, and thirſting ſo ſtrongly after mans bloud, that he ſtood to all the worlde an example of moſt horrible crueltie and infidelitie, vnder whoſe faith as by a publyke theeſe, had bene ſlaughtered ſo many Lordes and Gentlemen: And not abſteyning from the bloud of his brethren and neareſt kynred, ſometymes by the ſworde, and ſometymes with poiſon, he had ſtretched forth his crueltie euen ouer ſuch ages & qualities of perſons, as would haue moued the moſt barbarous hartes of the Turkes to conſcience & compaſſion: To which words (thinterceſſion of the Venetians making him perhappes more firme in his opinion) the king aunſwered that he neither wold nor could reſtraine the Pope to diſpoſe according to his wil, of the places that apperteined to the church: In ſo much as where others abſteined in his regarde, to oppoſe againſt the armes of the Duke Valentynois, ſuch as were neareſt the daunger determined to prouide for them ſelues: Therefore the Vrſins, Vitellozze, Iohn Paulle Baillon, & Lyueros de Ferme, who albeit as ſoldiours of the Duke, had newly receiued money of him, yet they retired ſeuerally their cõpanies into places of ſuertie, with intẽtiõ to knit together for a cõmõ defẽce: To which deuiſe gaue a ſpeedie furtherance, the loſſe of the Caſtle S. Leo, which reuerted into the power of the Duke of Vrbyn by the meane of a peaſant hauing the gard of a certeyne wall: After which beginning, their naturall Duke being called home by all the voyces and peoples of that eſtate, he recouered with a ſwyft fortune all the Duchie except the fortreſſes: And to confederate more ſtrongly againſt Valentynois, the Cardinall Vrſin, Pavvle Vrſin, Vitellozze, Iohn Pavvle Baillon, Lyuerot de Ferme, Hermes the ſonne of Iohn Bentywolle, and in the name of the Siennois, Anthonie de Venafre, in whom Pand. Petrucci reapposed muche, drewe togeather and made an aſſemblie in the countrey of Perouſa, where, after they had diſcourſed of their generall daungers, and conſidered what oportunitie they had by the rebellion of the ſtate of Vrbyn, and laſtly, the weakenes of Valentynois (whom they had nowe abandoned) by his want of men: They made a confederation for their common defence, agaynſt Valentynoys, and for the ſuccours of the Duke of Vrbyn, binding them ſelues one to an other to put into the fielde ſeuen hundred men at armes and nine thouſande footemen, with couenaunt that Bentywolle ſhould make warre in the territorie of Ymola, and the others with a greater ſtrength ſhoulde drawe towardes Ryminy and towardes Peſero: In this league the confederates, hauyng great care, not to incenſe the mynde of the Frenche Kyng, and yet hopyng that it woulde not muche diſpleaſe him that Valentynois were vexed by the armes of others, they declared vnder an expreſſe article, that they both ment and woulde bee bounde to ryſe readely in theyr proper perſonnes and with theyr ioynt forces, to obey any commaundement or requeſt of his againſt all men: And for that occaſion, they did not admit into that vnion, the famuly of the Colonnoys, notwithſtandyng they were great enemyes of the Pope, who had alwayes tormented them: Beſydes all theſe, they ſought to haue the fauour of the Venetians and Florentyns, offring to Florence to procure reſtitution of Piſa, which they ſayde was in the habilitie and deuotion of Pand. Petrucci, for thauthoritie he had with thinhabitants: But the Venetians remeyned in ſuſpence, as awaiting what would bee firſt, thinclination of the Frenche Kyng: Which alſo the Florentyns did, both for the ſame occaſion, and alſo holding both the one and other partie as enemie, they feared the victorie of either of them: This accident vnlooked for hapned to the Duke of Valentynois in a tyme, wherein he being vppon the point to vſurpe the eſtates of others, he thought nothing leſſe then that others would make inuaſions vppon him: But yeldyng nothing to the greatnes of his perill, hee loſt neyther courage nor councell, and reapoſing muche for him ſelfe in his good fortune, he looked with great induſtrie and wiſedome into the remedies that were conuenient, as the good Phiſition that once ſynding out the humour that offendes, doeth eaſely apply the medecyne that may cure: And for that hee ſawe him ſelfe almoſt altogether diſarmed, he ſent to ſolicit ſuccours of the Frenche King, declaring to him how much it imported him in all aduentures, to ſerue his turne rather of the Pope and him, then of his enemyes, and howe fraile was the confidence of Vitellozze and Pandolfe, who, beſydes they were the chiefeſt councellours and inducers of the reſidue, had in tymes paſt, giuen many demonſtrations of an ill mynde to his maieſtie, as in miniſtring ayde to the Duke of Myllan, and interteyning intelligences with the King of Romains: And as he negociated in this ſort with the King, ſo he forgat not alſo to make leauyes of newe companies, & to ioyne with his father in the practiſe of their old ſutleties & ambuſhmēts: For the Pope for his part, ſomtimes excuſing excuſing things that were too apparant,and ſometymes denying ſuch as might bee doubted,laboured with great ſtudie,to appeaſe the mynde of Cardinall Vrſin by the trauel of his brother Iulius: And the Duke Valentynois with diſguiſed apparances and faire promiſes, ſought to interteine and ioyntly and ſeuerally aſſure them, aſwell to holde them negligent in making their prouiſions, as in hope that thoſe councelles and practiſes ſeparate, would in the ende breed betweene them ſome ſuſpition and diſagreement, keeping alwayes this reſolution, that muche leſſe that he would departe from Ymola, affore hee were furniſhed with a mightie armie, ſeeing (of the contrarie) he was reſolued to keepe it and the other places of Romagnia, without giuing ſuccours to the Duchie of Vrbyn: In which determination he gaue direction to Dom Hugues de Cardona, & Dom Michell, (who were for him in thoſe quarters with a hundred men at armes, two hundred light horſemen, and fyue hundred footemen) to retyre to Riminy, a commaundement which they refuſed to obey, folowing an other occaſion preſented to them to recouer and ſacke Pergola and Foßambrona, whereunto they were induced by the Caſtle keepers of thoſe places: But, as in matters of warre it is a daungerous error to tranſgreſſe direction, and hunting after fortune, to preferre a light occaſion, affore a councell well debated: So it was eaſely diſcerned by effect, howe muche better it had bene to them to haue folowed the deliberation of the Duke, for that as they marched towardes Cagly, they encountred neare Faßambrona Pavvle and the Duke of Grauina (both of the famuly of the Vrſins) and reapoſing muche in the vallour of their companies which were ſix hundred footemen of Vitellozze well trayned and reſolute, they gaue the charge, and fynding fortune to fauour their vertue, they brake and diſordered the troupes of the Duke Valentynois, of whom many remeyned ſlaine, as Barth Caprauiquo Capteyne of three ſcore and ten men at armes, and many were ledde away priſoners, as Dom Hugues de Cardona, both men of chiefe place about Valentynois: Dom Michell fledde to Fano, but by the commaundement of Valentynois, hee retyred eftſoones to Peſero, leauing Fano as a place moſt faithfull in the power of the people, for that his ſtrength was not ſufficient to miniſter defenſe to both the places: In the ſelfe ſame ſeaſons, the regimentes of the Bollonnoys which were incamped in the borow of S. Peter, made incurſions to Doccio neare to Ymola, and truely the affaires of Valentynois had bene brought into harde ſtraites and perilles, if the vertue and expedition of the confederates, had bene equall to the oportunities that were offred: But whileſt they ſtoode in exſpectation one of an other, eyther for that the regimentes of men agreed vppon at the dyot, were not yet readie, or els that the practiſes of accorde helde them in ſuſpence: Thoccaſion, which at the beginnyng ſhoane with a fauourable lyght towardes them, was vanyſhed and turned into a cloude: For that the Frenche King had giuen direction to Monſr Chaumont, to ſende foure hundred Launces to the Duke Valentynois, and to aduaunce beſides, all his other meanes to readreſſe and reduce his affaires to reputation: Which being knowne to the confederates,and they not a little confuſed and amazed with it, euery one beganne to looke to his proper buyſines: In which reſpect the Cardinall Vrſin continued the practiſes he had begunne with the Pope, and Anthony de Venafra, (ſent by Pand. Petrucci) went to Ymola to ſolicit with Valentynois: With whom lykewiſe treated John Bentyuolle, hauing at the ſame tyme ſent an Embaſſadour to the Pope, and made to bee reſtored the things that were robbed at Doccio: Theſe practiſes were noriſhed with a wonderfull art by the Duke Valentynois, who, iudging that Pavvle Vrſin would be a good meane to diſpoſe the reſidue, he made as though he reappoſed great confidence in him,in which affection, he ſent for him to come to Ymola, and for his ſuertie, the Cardinall Borgia went to the landes of the Vrſins: The Duke Valentynois vſed very gracious wordes of Court to Pavvle,wherin, to giue a better ſhadow to the treaſon he intended, he complained not ſo much of him and the reſidue,(who hauing ſerued him long with ſo great fidelitie, were of late eſtranged from him for ſome vain ſuſpitions) as of his owne indiſcreſſion,being him ſelfe the very occaſion of their iuſt iealouſies,and the only inſtrument of that diſtruſt that hath bene noriſhed betweene them: But he hoped that this cõtencion and alienation of affection, growing by no other occaſion, would turne it ſelfe into an other habyt, and in place of grudge and ill will, would breede betwene them and

« hath this propertie,to knit with greater ſuertie of faith & conſtancie,the hartes that « haue liued in ſeparatiõ: For him ſelf, as he referred them to cõſider how farre it was from their power to oppreſſe him,ſeeing the french king was ſo well determined to ſupport his greatnes: So,on thother ſide being made wiſer by thexperiẽce of harms paſt,he cõfeſſed franckly that all his felicities & reputaciõ proceeded of their councelles & vertue: And therfore deſiring much to return to that auncient communiõ of faith which had bene ſo familiar betweene them,he was readie for his parte,not only to aſſure them in what ſort they would, but alſo to make them Iudges (ſo that there were regard had to his dignitie) of the quarels that were betweene him & the Bullonnois: To theſe wordes apperteining generally to them all, he added perticular demonſtrations of the great confidence he had in Pavvle,whom he filled ſo full of hopes and peculiar promiſes, that his art and ſuttletie carying ſhowes of innocencie and true meaning, he betraied the ſimplicitie of Pavvle, who beleeued that wordes ſo vehemently pronounced, could not draw with them intentions diſſembled: A thing eaſie to the Duke by the propertie of his nature,and no leſſe familiar, by the quicknes and cuſtome of his wit, but moſt readie by the forwardnes of his paſſion, which nouriſhed nothing with more ſweete delight, then the deuiſe that might betray the lyues of them to whom hee offred his faith: But whileſt theſe thinges were in ſolicitation, the people of Cameryn called home againe, Iohn Maria de Varaua ſonne of the late Lorde of Camerin who was in Quilea: And Vitellozze, with the great complaint of Valentynois and Pavvle Vrſin, tooke the Rocke of Foſſambrona: In ſo muche as the Caſtle of Vrbyn being lykewiſe loſte with the fortreſſes of Cagly and Agobia, there remained no more to him in that ſtate, but Sainct Agatha, hauyng alſo loſte all the countrey of Fano: And yet notwithſtandyng, Pavvle continuing the practyſe begunne, after he had gone many times from Ymola to Bollonia, to eſtabliſhe ſome forme to the affaires of the Bentyuolies who were his parentes (for his daughter was maried to Hermes the ſonne of Iohn)he cõtracted with Valentynois in this ſort: But with this relation,that the contract ſhold bee approued by the Cardinall Vrſin, by whoſe aduiſe all the reſidue were gouerned: That all olde hates and grudges ſhoulde bee defaced, together with the memorie of all iniuries paſte: That the auncient payes ſhoulde bee confirmed to the confederates, with further obligation to goe as ſouldiours to Duke Valentynois to the recouering of the Duchie of Vrbyn, and other eſtates which were rebelled: But, for their ſuertie they ſhoulde not bee bounde to ſerue in perſon, otherwayes then one at a tyme, nor the Cardinall Vrſin to remeyne in the Court of Rome: That touchyng the matters of Bollonia, there ſhoulde bee made a compromiſe in the perſonnes of the Duke, Cardinall Vrſin, and Pandolfe Petrucci:

Capitulation betweene the Vrſins and D. Valens.

ti: With this concluſion, Pavvle Vrſin (aſſuring him ſelfe euery day more and more of the good intencion of Valentynois) went to finde the reſidue, to induce them to ratifie tharticles: But Bentyuole, holding it neither honorable, aſſured, nor reaſonable, that tharbitration of his affaires ſhould bee paſſed ouer to an other, ſent the Pronotarie his ſonne to Imola, and receiuing oſtages from Valentynois, he made an accord with him and the Pope, whereunto they condiſcended ſo muche the more eaſely, by how much they conſidered that the french king, comming better to conſider either what an infamie it would be to him, or how much it would import him that the Citie of Bolonia were in their deuotion, wold alter his firſt deliberation, and not ſuffer them to obteine it: Theſe were the conditions of thaccord: That there ſhould bee a perpetuall confederation betweene the Duke Valentynois on the one parte, and the Bentyuoles with the communaltie of Bollonia, on the other parte: That the Duke ſhould haue of the Bollonoys, appointment of an hundred men at armes for eight yeares, which ſhould bee conuerted into the paye of twelue thouſand duckats by yeare: That the Bollonois ſhould be bound to ſerue him with a hundred men at armes, and a hundred Crosbowſhot on horſebacke, only for the yeare to come: That the french king and the Florentyns, ſhould promiſe obſeruation for both the one and other parties: That for the better aſſurance of the peace, the Biſhops ſiſter of Luna (who was Nephew to the Pope) ſhould bee maried to the ſonne of Annyball Bentyuole.

But for all theſe, Valentynois ceaſſed not to ſolicit the comming of the frenche bandes, and the three thouſand Swyſſers which he had taken into his paye, vnder ſhadow that he would employ them, not for the confederates, but for the recouery of the Duchie of Vrbyn and Cameryn, for that the cõfederats were alreadie at a point to ratifie the accorde paſt: The Cardinall Vrſin being then in Sienna, was ouerruled by the perſuaſions of Pavvle, muche helping the reaſons and authoritie of P. Petrucci: And after long contradiction conſented alſo Vitellozze, and Ioh. P. Baillon, who (notwithſtanding) held the faith of Valentynois much ſuſpected: After the ratification of theſe men, the Pope hauing lykewiſe ratified: The Duke of Vrbyn, notwithſtanding thimportunities of his people (promiſing to die at his feete) not to goe from thence: Yet, hauing more feare of his enemies, then confidence in their popular voices, he returned to Venice, and gaue place to the furie of thenemies, hauing firſt diſmantled all the fortreſſes of that ſtate, except Leox Maiuola: The people (Antho. Sanſouyn who was afterwardes Cardinall, going thether with commiſſiõ and power from Valentynois to pardon them) agreed to return vnder his obedience: The Citie of Cameryn did the like, for that their Lord was fled to Naples, his feares being no leſſe then his aſtoniſhments, for that Vitellozze and the others, hauing ſent for their bands which were in the countrey of Fano, prepared to go againſt him as ſoldiours to Valentynois: In which times as the Pope made the Camp march to Palombaro, which the Sauelles had recouered together with Senzana and other places apperteining to them, and that by thoccaſiõ of tharmies leauied by the cõfederats. So, Duke Valentynois, who had no greater deſires thẽ to execute his moſt ſecret thoghts, wẽt frõ Imola to Ceſena, where he was no ſooner arriued, then the frenchmẽ at armes who were come thether a litle before, and eſtſoones rappealed by Monſr Chaumont, departed from thence with the ſame ſpeede they came: Not by commiſſion from the king, but (as was ſuppoſed) for a perticular indignation hapned betweene him & Valentynois, or perhaps at his requeſt, to thende he might be leſſe fearful to thoſe, whom he deſired greatly to aſſure: At Ceſena, hee looked to readreſſe his bandes, which were ſtronger then the reaport that went of them, for that expreſly he had made verie fewe great leauies of men, but well paide, and interteined continually many launce Knightes and perticular Gentlemen: A ſtrength though not mightie in numbers, yet well aſſured by the vertue of the perſons, who are ſo much the more worthie then men mercenarie, for that the one goe armed with honour and reputation, and the other haue no regard but to their paie: The one forward for his credit ſake, the other ſubiect alwayes to compulſion: The one following ſeruice with a voluble libertie of mynde, where the other hauing a courage no leſſe vile and abiect, then his intentions are corrupt, foloweth warres for rauyne and ſpoile, the baſeſt reſpect that can bee in the minde of a ſoldiour: At the ſame tyme Vitellozze and the Vrſins, being ſent by his direction to encamp affore Sini Galle, tooke the towne and Caſtle, from whence the widow of the prefect being ſiſter to the Duke of Vrbyn, fled when ſhe was left abandoned and deſolate, notwithſtanding her litle ſonne was vnder the protection of the frenche king, who excuſed him ſelfe for that ſhe was a competitor to the league made at Maiſons: After the taking of Sini Galle, Valentynois went to Fano, where after he had ſtaied certeine dayes, to reaſſemble all his companies together, he aduertiſed Vitellozze and the Vrſins, that the day folowing, he wold come to lodge at Sini Galle, and that in that regard they ſhould beſtow the ſoldiours that were with them within the towne, abrode in the plaines: Which was executed according to his direction, the footemen being lodged in the Subburbes of the towne, and the men at armes diſperſed ſeuerally in the countrey: The ſame day that the Duke appointed to bee at Sini Galle, there went to meete him Pavvle Vrſin, the Duke of Grauina, Vitellozze, and Lynerot de Ferme, who, being receiued by him with great honor and many graces of Court, accompanied him to the gate of the towne, affore the which all the bandes of Valentynois were beſtowed in order: A maner of dealing which albeit they could not but ſuſpect, ſpecially to behold a ſtrength greater then they looked for: Yet, offring to take their leaue to withdrawe to theyr lodgings which were without the towne, they were deſired to enter with him into the towne, ſeeming to haue need to communicate with them in ſome priuate matter: They were driuen to yelde to that willingly, which they were not hable to refuſe by any reſiſtance: And as in matters of perill, the minde hath a certeine ſence and coniecture of the ill that is to happen: So the tokens that appeared made them deuine rightly of the miſchiefe that was prepared, and yet as men without remedie in their fortunes, they folowed him by whom they ſawe their ruine intended: Whē he was come to his lodging, he withdrewe them with him alone into a chamber a parte, where, after he had left them vnder couller to goe ſhift his apparell, he ſent men armed into the chamber to apprehende them all priſoners, and at the ſame inſtant appointed other companies to ſtrip their ſoldiours: The day following being the laſt of December, to thende that that yeare might determine with this tragedie, he reteined the other priſoners, & made to be ſtrangled in a chamber, Vitellozze and Lynerot de Ferme, whereof the one had no power to eſcape the deſtinie of his houſe, to dye by violent death, as did all his other brethren after they had wonne great experience and reputation in armes, the miſchiefe hapning to one after an other according to the ſucceſſion and meaſure of their ages: But touching Lynerot no man could deny, that he had not an end worthie of his wickednes, being but iuſt and reaſonable that he ſhould dye by treaſon, who a little before had killed by treaſon (to make him ſelfe great in the Citie of Ferma), his owne Vncle, together with many of the principall Citizens, whom he had inuited to come banquet with him.

Vitellozze & the Vrſins made priſoners by treaſon.

1502 Vitellozze & Li. de Ferme Strangled.

That

That yeare brought foorth no other thing worthie of memorie, ſauing that Lodovvyk and Federyk Counts of Mirandola, who were of the famulie of the Pigues, being chaſed affore by Iohn Franciſquo their brother: And pretending (notwithſtanding his prerogatiue of yeares and age) that they had the ſame rightes that he had, expulſed him by force by the helpes of the Duke of Ferrara, and Iohn Iacques Tryvulce father in lawe to Lodovvyk: A matter not ſo much worthie of memorie for it ſelfe in perticular, as for that in tymes after, the quarrels of his brethren ingendred effectes of ſome conſequence.

The yeare folowing was farre more full of thinges notable and accidents daun- 1503 gerous, then any of the former yeares: To the which the diſloyaltie and impietie of the ſuppoſed Prince of Chriſtian religion, gaue an vnhappie beginning, not knowing what was to happen that yeare aſwell to his perſon as to his affaires: For the Duke Valentynois hauing aduertiſed his father (according to a priuate reſolution betweene them) howe well his ambuſhes had ſucceeded with him at Sini Gaſſe: The Pope for his parte, holding ſecret aſwell the conſpiracie, as the aduertiſement, called to the Pallaice of Vatican vnder cooller of ſpeciall occaſions, the Cardinall Vrſin, who, truſting in the ſuertie of the accorde, and no leſſe in the faith of him, who all the world knew neuer to keepe faith with any man, but muche more driuen by his deſtinie, then by reaſon, was a litle affore gone to Rome: He was no ſooner entred Cardinall Vrſin made priſoner. the Pallaice then he was made priſoner, feeling in his owne perſon, the very calamitie which his brother and friendes ſuffred: At the ſame tyme were alſo taken in their houſes, Re. Vrſin Archbiſhop of Florence, the Pronetorie Vrſin, the Abbot Ahuyano, and Iacques de Sainte Croix a Romaine Gentleman, one of the principalleſt of that faction: And after they were ledde to the Caſtle S. Ange, the Pope ſent his ſonne the Prince of Squillace to take poſſeſſion of the landes of Pavvle and the others, and with him went the Pronotery, and Iacques de S. Croix to make deliuery of them, who afterwardes were returned vnder the ſame guarde that kept them before: The Pope vaunting with a Spaniſhe ſuttletie at the traine which his ſonne had made, skoffed and ſayde, that Pavvle Vrſin and the others being the firſt that had falſefied theyr faith to him (for that they were bounde to goe to him but one at once, and came notwithſtanding altogether) it was no leſſe lawfull to him to breake his promiſe with them: A maner of dealing very ſlaunderous to the reuerence of his profeſſion, but not vnaccuſtomed to thoſe that haue ſit in his place, with whom nothing hath „ bene more familiar then conſpiracies, nor any thing leſſe eſteemed then to protect „ innocencie, hauing their hartes as full of crueltie, as their mouthes were ful of blaſ- „ phemie: It had bene a cryme ſufficient againſt his habit and conſcience, to proſti- „ tute his faith againſt the ruine of men, and not with a minde preiudiciall, to vaunt „ of the offence, ſeeing by the ſcripture, the ſinne is ſo muche the more accurſed, by „ how much it is agrauated with glorie and vaunting: The Cardinall remeyned priſoner about twentie dayes, the Pope alleaging that he had impriſoned a Cardinall ſo auncient in place, in age, and in authoritie, for many reaſons: But he did not expreſſe them, condemning him ſelfe by his proper ſilence, or at leaſt fearing his infamie would be the greater, if his reaſons were diſcloſed: But at length the bruite The death of Card. Vrſin. bearing that the Cardinall was ſicke, he died in the Pallaice, of poiſon as is aſſuredly beleeued: And the Pope, to take away thopinion, (but not thimputatiō of that) albeit it was his cuſtome not to care for infamies, cauſed the dead bodie to bee caried to his graue in the broad daye and all bare, accompanied with the kindred of his houſe, and all the other Cardinals: The other priſoners were deliuered a litle after, vppon ſuertie to bee eftſoones repreſented when they were called.

The Duke Valentynois, ſeeking to ioyne recompenſe to his wickednes, departed immediatly from Sini Galle, and addreſſed him ſelfe to the towne of Caſtello, where finding that ſuch as yet remeyned of the famuly of Vitelly, had abandoned the Citie, he continued his way to Perouſa, from whence Iohn Pavvle fledde, who was competitor in the miſerable deſtinies of the others, his puniſhmēt being greater, though the tyme and maner were ſlower, being by ſuſpicion, made wyſer then the reſidue touching his going to Sini Galle: The Duke left both the one and other Cities vnder the name of the Church, hauing reeſtabliſhed within Perouſa, Charles Baillon, the Oddies, and all the other enemies of Iohn Pavvle: And as it is one chiefe vertue in men of enterpriſe to embraſe occaſions, ſo, he forgat not to apply to his fortune, thoportunitie and fauour of the tyme, by the benefit whereof, his ambition made him aſſaie to make him ſelfe Lorde ouer Sienna, being folowed with certeine exiles of the ſame Citie: And drawing with the whole armie (wherin were newly arryued the aydes promiſed by Bentyuolle) towardes the borow of Piena, where knowing that the Cardinall Vrſin was priſoner, he made ſtrangle the Duke of Granina and Pavvle Vrſin, and ſent Embaſſadors to Sienna to warne them of the towne to chaſe out Pandolfe Petrucci, as his enemie in perticular, and the common troubler of the tranquilletie of Tuskan: He ioyned to the meſſage this condition and promiſe, that aſſoone as they had expulſed him, he would eftſoones returne to Rome with his armie, forbearing to doe any other oppreſſion to their frontyers: And on the other ſide, the Pope and hee, burning in one bloudie deſire, that as Pandolfe had bene a companion to the others in lyfe and actions, ſo alſo he might communicate with their laſt extreame fortune and death: They ſtudied to loll him a ſleepe with the ſame charme wherewith they had inchaunted the others to their deſtruction, writing to him billettes and letters full of office and humanitie, and ſoliciting him by meſſengers expreſſe, promiſing no leſſe aſſurance of faith, good meaning and affection: But the ſuſpicion that occupied the people of Sienna, that the Dukes intencion was to vſurpe that Citie, made his enterpriſe againſt Pandolfe more harde, for that albeit many of the Citizens were oftentimes ill contented with the gouernment of Pandolfe, yet, they helde it better to temporiſe vnder the tyrannie of one Citizen, then to fall into the ſeruitude of a ſtraunger: In ſo muche that as at the beginning, he could obteine no anſwer by the which might bee hoped the expulſion of Pandolfe: So for all that, continuing vnder the ſame ſemblance, that he deſired no other thing, he wonne daily on them, hauing paſſed Pienſa Chiuſa, with other places neare to Sienna, which yelded to him by compoſicion: By which aduauntages, wonne vppon them as it were by ſtealth and ſutletie, the feares increaſed ſo in Sienna, that not only the people, but alſo ſome euen of the chiefeſt, began to murmure that it was not reaſonable, that to ſupport one Citizen, the whole Citie ſhould ſuffer ſo great a daunger: Which made Pandolfe to determine to doe that with the good lyking and fauour of euerie one, which he feared to be conſtrained to doe in the ende with the vniuerſall hatred of the Citie, and his owne daunger: And therfore by his conſent it was ſignified to Valentynois, in the publyke name of the Citie, that they were content to gratifie his demaundes, ſo that he would retyre with his armie from their frontyers: This reſolution was accepted (notwithſtanding the Pope and he were fixed vppon an enterpriſe of greater importance) for that they knewe how harde a matter it woulde bee to take Syenna, both for the greatnes and ſtrong ſeate of the towne, and alſo for the vertue of Iohn Pavvle Baillon commaunding within it, who with with the ſouldiours and naturall people of the place, would ioyne in one ſtrength to reſiſt him, if they were once aſſured that his intencions were contrary to the publication of his promiſes: To this were added the feares of the Pope, who helde it neceſſarie, that for his proper ſuertie, his ſonne ſhould retyre his armie to Rome, where he was iealous of ſome conſpiracie, for that Iulio and others of the Vrſins with many horſmen were withdrawne into Petillano and Fabio, and Organtyn Vrſin into Ceruetro: Mutio Collonno alſo newly come from the realme of Naples, was entred Palombaro to ſuccour the Sauelleis, who were newly entred into alliance with the Vrſins, and had intelligence with them: But that which tooke from the one and the other, the hope to occupie Sienna, was, that it was now manifeſtly perceiued, that the enterpriſe was directly diſpleaſing to the french king: For albeit he could haue wiſhed (and it was for his good pollecie) that Vitellozze and the other confederates ſhould bee kept vnder, yet he ſawe that their whole ruine ioyned to the conqueſt of ſo great eſtates, made the Pope and Valentynois too mightie: And withall the Citie of Sienna, together with the lyfe and whole eſtate of Pandolfe, being vnder his protection, and no member of the Church, but an appurtenance of the Empire, he thought he might with good equitie and reaſon, oppoſe him ſelfe againſt the conqueſt: A conſideration neceſſary to the vertue of the french king, hauing by the mouth and word of a Prince, aſſured the protection of the Citie: But farre more agreeable to the pollicie of his affaires, which could not without perill, ſuffer ſuch an aſpiring ambition in the Pope and his ſonne: He began to ſee that the mynde which he ment ſhould clymbe no higher then his ſhoulders, had intentions to aſpire aboue the Crowne of his head, and therefore he helde it a leſſe tranſgreſſion of honour and promiſe to reſtraine his ſupportation from one whom his authoritie and countenance only had aduaunced, then to leaue to perill, ſuch as reappoſed altogether in his faith, honor, and reputation of his promiſes: The Pope and his ſonne had hope that the remouing of Pandolfe would cauſe ſome confuſion in the gouernment of that Citie, and that by that meane, tyme would breede occaſion to giue ſome cooller to their enterpriſe: But Pandolfe ſeeing more into their ſuttleties, then hable to turne away his owne calamities, departed ſo out of Sienna, as he left the ſame garde and the ſame authoritie to his friendes and dependantes, in ſo muche as it ſeemed that nothing was chaunged of the gouernment, and leſſe exſpectation of their enterpriſe by his expulſion: Valentynois (according to the direction of the Pope) tooke his way to Rome to make deſtructiō of the Vrſins, who, with the Sauellyes, had wonne the bridge Lamentano, and runne ouer the whole countrey: But they ſtaied from further action, by tharriuall of the Duke Valentynois, who expreſſed his firſt power and malice vpon the eſtates of Iohn Iordan, without any regarde that he was not declared againſt him, that he had the order of S. Michael, that he was in the protection of the french king, and at that tyme in the kingdome of Naples in his ſeruice: Which oppreſſion vniuſt and vnreaſonable, the Pope ſeeking to abuſe the king with his iuſtifications, alleaged that he was not moued by any deſire to diſpoile him of his eſtates, but only for that he could not accompt him his aſſured neighbour ſo neare, the great quarels and offences continuing betweene him and the famuly of the Vrſins, and that therefore in recompenſe and conſideration of his harmes, he was content to giue him the principallitie of Squillace with other landes of the ſame vallue and reuenue: But the french king, not taking theſe reaſons for paiment, reteined a ſpecial memorie of that inuaſion, not for that the regarde to his protection preuailed more with him then of cuſtome, but becauſe his affaires in the kingdom of Naples not drawing the ſame fortune and ſucceſſe they had wont to doe, he began to holde for ſuſpected, the pride and inſolencie of the Pope and his ſonne, ioyning to this coniecture the remembrance of their oppreſſions in the yeare paſt, both how they had aſſailed Tuskane, and afterwardes aſſaied to inuade Sienna, notwithſtanding he had promiſed to protect it: Wherein conſidering that by howe much they had alreadie obteined of him, and for tyme to come ſhould obteine: By ſo much more, was their ambicion growne greate, and hereafter their pride would bee redoubled, hee ſent to commaund Valentynois with a ſharpe meſſage to forbeare to moleſt the ſtate of Iohn Iordan, who was come to Bracchiano by wayes vnknowne, and not without his perill: Beſides this, he conſidering how neceſſary it were to be aſſured that there ſhold ryſe no commotion in Tuskane, ſpecially for that he vnderſtood that in Sienna there was ſome beginning of ciuill diſcordes: He ioyned him ſelfe to the councell of the Florentyns, to ſolicit that Pandolfe Petrucci (who was retyred to Piſa,) might returne eftſoones to Sienna: That betweene the Florentyns, Siennois, and Bolonies might be contracted an vnitie for their common defence, rendring Mont Pulcian to the Florentyns, to take away all occaſion of diſſention: And laſtly that euery one of them according to his power ſhould make prouiſion of men at armes for their common defence, the better to cut off from the Pope and his ſonne, all meanes to ſtretch further their iuriſdiction into Tuskane.

In this meane while the Duke Valentynois, with one parte of his armie, tooke Viconaro wherein were ſix hundred men for Iohn Iordan: But hauing receiued commaundement from the french king, he left (to the great diſpleaſing of the Pope and him) thenterpriſe of Bracciano, and went to incamp affore Ceri, where, with Iohn Vrſin Lorde of the place, were Raufe his ſonne, with Iulio and Frauncis of the ſame famuly: And to ioyne to the actions of the ſonne, the authoritie of the father, the Pope proceeded at the ſame tyme by way iudicial againſt all the houſe of Vrſins except Iohn Iordan, and the Count Petillano, againſt whom the Venetians would not endure any ſuch vniuſt violence. Cery is a towne very auncient and no leſſe notable for the ſtrong ſcituation, for that it is ſeated vppon a litle Rocke hewed out of one ſtone only, whether the auncient Romaines in their perils againſt the frenchmen, ſent all their virgins veſtalles, and the moſt ſecret & celebrate Images of their goddes with many other thinges ſacred and religious, as into a place of ſpeciall ſuertie: And for the ſame reaſon in the tymes folowing, it was free from violation in the rage of the Barbarians, at ſuch tyme as by the declination of the Romain Empire, they hauockt all Italy with wonderfull furies: By meane whereof, aſwell by his naturall ſtrength, as for that it was manned with companies reſolute, the enterpriſe ſeemed harde to Valentynois, who, to aduaunce his vertue aboue their ſtrength and power, forgat no diligence nor induſtrie to win it, vſing, beſides the ordinary engines of warre, certeine inſtrumentes of wood to ſurmount the height of the walles: But whileſt hee was buiſie in that action, Frauncis Nardy (ſent to Sienna by the french king), publiſhed his maieſties intention that Pandolfe ſhould eftſoones returne, hauing receiued his promiſe before to continue in his deuotion, and for his ſuertie, to ſend his eldeſt ſonne into Fraunce: To paie to him that which was due of the reſidue of the fortie thouſande Duckats which had bene accorded, and to reſtore Mont Pulcian to the Florentyns: A reſolucion plauſible to them of Sienna, who, becauſe there ſhould be no impediment to the comming of Pandolfe, ioyned to the reputation of the kinges name, the open fauours of the Florentyns, and the diſpoſicion of thoſe in the towne that were his friendes, who drawing into armes and ſtrength the night before hee

ſhould come, held ſuppreſſed or at leaſt kept in a compelled quietnes all ſuch as ſupported the contrary opinion: This hapned to the great diſpleaſure of the Pope, whoſe affaires in other places runne in a happie courſe, for that Palombaro with other peeces of the Sauelleis, were rendred to him: As alſo thoſe that were within Cery, ſuffring many and continuall afflictions of warre, after the fury of ſundry aſſaltes, offred reſtitution, with couenant that the Pope ſhould paie a certeine proporcion of money to Iohn who was Lorde of the place, and to leaue in libertie, ſuertie, and ſafetie of lyfe, all the reſidue within Petillane, which was ſincerely obſerued contrary to the cuſtome of the Pope, and exſpectation of euery one.

Fortune hath a free will to come and go when ſhe liſt, not regarding times, perſons or cauſes, but making her prerogatiue abſolute, ſhe takes authoritie to make her will a lawe ouer the Princes of the earth: And as in no humaine thing, ſhe is either certeine or reſolute, ſo chiefly in the action of warre ſhe ſhoweth moſt mutabilitie and variation, not giuing ſucceſſe to ſuch as deſerue beſt, but to thoſe that ſhe fauoureth moſt, her iuſtice not regarding the vertues and merites of men, but guiding thinges to their ſucceſſe according to thinclination of her fauor & lyking: For, thaffairs of the frēchmē which folowed the ſeruice of Naples, proceeded not in ſuch ful felicitie, being incōbred with many difficulties euē frō the beginning of the yere: For, the Coūt de Millete being incāped at Villeneufue with the regiments of the Princes of Falerno & Biſignian: Dō Hugues de Cardona, paſſing frō Meſſina into Calabria, with eight hūdred footmē Spaniſh, an hundred horſmē, with eight hūdred other footmē aſwell Calabrians as Sicilians, marched towardes Villeneufue to reskue it: Which aſſoone as the Count Millete vnderſtoode, he leauied his ſeege from before Villeneufue, and went to meete him: The Spanyardes drewe all along a plaine ſtraite and narrow betweene the mounteine and a ryuer, where was not much water, but is ioyned to the way with a litle riſing: And the frenche men who were the greater number, marched right to them beneath the ryuer, deſiring to drawe them into a large place: But ſeeing how they marched cloſe & in firme order, and fearing that if they cut not of their way, they would get in ſafetie into Villeneufue, they paſſed ouer to the other ſyde of the ryuer to charge them: In which encounter they were broken the vallour of the Spaniſh footemen no leſſe then the aduauntage of the place, helping indifferently to the victorie: Soone after, arriued by ſea out of Spaine at Meſſina, two hundred men at armes, two hundred horſmen mounted vppon Iennettes, and two thouſand footemen, all ledde by Manuel de Benauide, with whom came into Italy at that tyme, Anthony de Leua, who, of a meane ſoldiour, riſing by all degrees of warre, to the ſtate of a Capteine Generall, made his vertue norable in Italy by the reputation of many goodly victories: Theſe companies paſſed from Meſſina to Regge in Calabria, which the Spaniſh had taken before, (Monſr D'aubigny being then in the other parte of Calabria) and from thence incamped at Loſarina within fiue miles of Calimere: Into which place Abricourt was entred two dayes before, with thirtie Launces, and the Count de Millete with a thouſand footemen, and preſenting them ſelues the morning folowing before the walles of the towne, wherein were no gates but barres only, they forced it at the ſeconde aſſalt, the vertue and reſolution of the defendantes, being leſſe then the fortune & felicitie of the aſſailantes: Capteine Eſpis remeined dead, & Abricourt made priſoner: But the Count de Millete in fleeing to the Rocke, founde ſafetie of life and honour, (the victors retiring forthwith to Villeneufue for feare of Monſr D'aubigny, who came on marching with three hundred Launces, three thouſand footemen ſtraungers, and two thouſand of the countrey: After which accident, Monſr D'aubigny encamping at Polliſtrina within two miles of them, and their perill increaſing by neceſſitie of vittels, they diſcamped ſecretly to goe to Quiercy: And albeit they made thoportunitie of the night proper for their ſafetie, yet their fortune vanquiſhing all cloakes of ſhadowe and darknes, they were chaſed by bandes of Monſr D'aubigny vntill the riſing of a crabbed mounteine, where they loſt threeſcore men at armes and many footemen: And of the french (opinion and raſhnes carying them beyond diſcreſſion and experience) was ſlaine Captein Gruyny, whom they eſteemed much, leading the regiment that was to Count Caiezze who dyed by naturall death a litle affore the taking of Capua: At the ſame time came out of Spaine into Cicilie theſe new bandes, two hundred men at armes, two hundred light horſemen, and two thouſande footemen gouerned by Capteine Porto Carrera, who dying at Regge as he paſſed with his regiment, the charge remeined to Ferrand D'audriado his Lieftenant: For the arriuall of theſe ſupplies, the Spanyardes (lately retired to Quiercy) tooke new courage and comfort, & returned to Villeneuſue, where they fortified in that part of the towne which they held ioyning to the Caſtle, which was thentrey of a valley whereunto is conioyned the reſidue of the towne: A fortification not in vaine, for the feare they had of Monſr D'aubigny, who being comen from Poleſtrina with a diligence farre aboue their exſpectatiõ, was incamped in that parte which was not holden by the Spaniſh, euery one planting barres and fortificatiõs requiſit for their proper ſafetie: But as in Monſieur D'aubigny no vertue was more familiar then circumſpection which he vſed alwayes to reſiſt ſodain perils, ſo aſſone as he vnderſtood that the Spaniſh regimẽts that were diſcẽded to Regge, drew neare to make one ſtrẽgth with the other bãds, he altered purpoſe with the neceſſity of the occaſiõ, & retiring to Loſaro, thenemies folowing the cõmoditie of vittels, put them ſelues altogether within Semynaro: Whileſt things wẽt in this courſe in Calabria, the Viceroy for the frẽch returning towards Barletto, encamped at Matero, & diſperſing his bãds in ſeueral places thereabouts, he laye to giue impedimẽts that no vittell nor ſuccours ſhold enter, hoping that what by the plague, whoſe fury begã to breed fear, and skarcetie of vittels which was vniuerſall in Barletto, the Spaniſh could not by any reaſon or poſſibilitie remeine there long, & much leſſe reskue them ſelues within Trany, where raged the ſame difficulties: Neuertheles amid ſo many incommodities and daungers their reſolution and conſtancie was wonderfull, confirmed alſo by the vertue and diligence of Conſaluo, who ſometimes giuing them hopes of a readie arriuall of two thouſand Almaine footemen which he had ſent Octauian Colonno to leauie, and ſometimes promiſing preſent ſuccours by other meanes, & laſtly cauſing a bruite to bee publiſhed that he would goe to Tarento by ſea: He interteined them in their courage and vertue, but much more with his owne example ſuffring in his perſon all their perplexeties and trauels, ioyned to the want of vittelles, and miſerable skarcetie of all thinges neceſſarie: Occaſion doeth muche to induce the mindes of ſouldiours, but example is it that confirmeth their vertue, making them

" oftentimes reſolute aboue their naturall inclination.

" The warre ſuffring this alteration, and being falne as you ſee into this eſtate of " fortune and chaunge, thoſe that till that daie had bene inferiours, and as it were kept
" ſuppreſſed, began now by the negligent and inſolent dealing of the french to make " their light ſhine and become ſuperiours: For, the men of Caſtellanetto (a place neare
" to Barletto) diſpairing, for the oppreſſions and wronges which fiftie men at armes
" of the French and garriſoned there, did them, drewe into armes by common aſſent,

and

and ſtripped them: And not many dayes after, Conſaluo being aduertiſed by eſpyall that Monſr de la Paliſſa remeyning with a hundred Launces and three hundred footemen in the towne of Rubos twelue myles from Barletto, ſtoode negligently vpon his guarde, marched one night to Rubos, and drawing with him with a wonderfull diligence and facilitie of the way beyng playne and harde certeyne peeces of great artillerie: Hee aſſalted the towne with ſuche a furie, that the Frenche (to whom all other daungers had bene more tollerable) beyng ſo muche more confuſed in theyr perill, by howe muche the aſſalt was ſodeyne, made a certeine weake reſiſtance, and in the end rendred the place, Paliſſa with the reſidue remeyning priſoners: The ſame daie Conſaluo returned to Barletto, without daunger to receyue in retyring any domage of Monſr de Nemours, who a litle before was come to Canoſa: His ſafetie happlie was by this occaſion, that the French companies beeing diſpoſed into ſeuerall places to keepe Barletto beſeeged on many ſides, could not bee reaſſembled in ſufficient tyme, beſides that fiftie French Launces ſent to make praie of certeyne money caryed from Trany to Barletto, were ouerthrowne by ſuch as Conſaluo had ſent for the ſuertie of the treaſure: To theſe alſo myght bee adioyned an other accident which diminiſhed greatly the vallour of the frenche men, and which was the proper worke and effect of vallour, and not to bee attributed to the iniquitie of fortune: For, a Trumpet going to Barletto to ſolicit the raunſom of certeyne ſouldiours taken priſoners at Rubos, certeyne ſpeeches were vttered againſt the Frenche, by ſome of Thitalian men at armes, which beyng caryed by the Trumpet to the Frenche Camp, and aunſwere eftſoones returned to Thitalians, bredde ſuche enuie and inflamation of courage in both partes, that to iuſtefie the honour of their ſeuerall nations they agreed, that thirteene men at armes of the Frenche, and thirteene Italians ſhould fight in combatt to thuttrance within liſtes vntill the one were maiſters ouer the other: The place of the combatt to bee aſſigned in a Champion betweene Barletto, Andria, and Quadrato, where they ſhoulde bee accompanied with an equall number of aſſiſtantes to bee Iudges of their vallour: Neuertheles (to aſſure all ambuskados or ſuttle traines of conſpiracie) the Capteynes with the greateſt parte of both the armies, accompanied their Champions to the myd way, comfortyng them, that for that they were choſen out of the whole armie, they would with manifeſt action and courage make good thexſpectation that was on them, the ſame beyng ſuche, that in their handes and vallour was reappoſed by common conſent the honour of ſo noble nations: The Viceroy of the Frenche declared to his, that their aduerſaries were the ſelfe ſame Italians, who hauyng no courage to abyde the Frenche men had alwayes made them waie without expreſſing any tryall or experience of theyr vertue, euen ſince they had runne from the Alpes to the extreame bondes and limits of Italy: That they were not now puſhed forwarde eyther with a newe nature or newe reſolution of minde: But beyng marcenorie to the Spanyardes and ſubiect to theyr commaundementes, they had no libertie to reſiſt the will of thoſe men, whoſe cuſtome being to fight not with vertue but with ambuſhes, made them ſelues beholders and idle lookers on the daungers of others: And that therefore aſſoone as Thitalians were entred into the liſtes, & ſhould ſee before them the armes & furie of ſuche as had alwayes ouercome them, they would either returne to their accuſtomed feares, or at leaſt, if any ſeruile reſpect to the Spanyſh would puſhe them to the feight, that compulſion no leſſe then theyr naturall feares woulde make them an eaſie praye, the foundation layde vppon the vaine bragges and braueries of the Spaniſhe being a Target too ſlender to beare the blowes of the puiſſant Frenchmen: On the other ſide, Conſalue prepared the myndes of his Champions with perſuaſions agreeable to the nature of the action they had in hande: Hee reduced to theyr remembraunce the auncient honours of that nation, and the reputation and glorie of their armes, with the which they had earſt tamed the whole worlde: That it was nowe in the power of a fewe, to declare that they were not inferiour to the vertue of their elders: And though Italy whoſe vallour had vanquiſhed the moſt regions of the worlde, had bene of late yeares ouerunne by forreine armies, that it was by no other occaſion, then the indiſcreſſion of Princes, whoſe ambicion accompanied with ciuill diſcords had called in ſtraunge armies to roote out and ruinate one an other: That the french had neuer obteined victory in Italy by their own ſtrength or vertue, but by the aide & miniſtration of the armes of Thitaliãs, who had ſuffred them to paſſe ſo farre into the bowels of their countrey, not by the terror or agillitie of their armes, but by the fury of their artilleries, which were fearfull ſo long as they were newe and vnaccuſtomed: That they were now to fight with the force and vertue of their proper perſonnes, and that not only in the preſence of ſo great a nobilitie of their owne ſyde, but alſo in the ſpectacle and eye of the principall nations of Chriſtendome, who, aſwell of thone parte as of thother, had an honourable deſire of their victorie: That they had to remember that they were rayſed by the moſt famous Capteynes of Italy, and as by them they had had continual nouriſhment & trayning in armes, ſo for theyr ſeueral parts, they had in many perillous actions giuen an honorable experiẽce of their vertue: And that therfore eyther the honor to readdreſſe the name of Italy with that glorie wherin it had ben not only in yeares of their elders, but alſo in the ages & tymes of them ſelues, was by deſtinie appoynted to them: Or els (ſo great an honour not beyng wonne by theyr hands) there can bee no other exſpectation of the floriſhyng region of Italy, then to remeyne diſhonoured and in perpetuall ſeruitude and ſlaunder by the puſillanimitie of her proper children: With theſe perſuaſions ioyned to the comfortes of other Capteynes and ſouldiours perticular of both tharmies, the parties appointed for the combat, were ledde into the fielde: Where both partes deſirous by their proper vertue to bryng glorie to their nation, aſſoone as thaſſiſtantes were placed according to thorder of the fielde, and that the ſigne was giuen, they run furiouſly with their Launces: At which encounter, no aduauntage inclining to either parte, they ſhowed the ſame emulation of mynde in the action of their other weapons: Wherein as euerie one of the Champions ſhowed by his reſolucion and agillitie with what deſire of glorie he ſought to conquer his aduerſarie: So it was ſecretly confeſſed by all thoſe that were lookers on, that out of all the armies on both factions, coulde not bee choſen bodyes more woorthie to performe a proofe ſo honourable and glorious: But as in this heate of fightyng, they had ſpent a good ſpace of tyme, wherein the grounde was couered with tronchons and peeces of their armours, and ſomewhat dyed with the bloud that dropped from all partes, without that the aduauntage or better of the fight could bee iudged: And as they were beholden with a wonderfull ſilence by ſuche as were preſent, and almoſt in no leſſe trauell and paſſion of mynde, then if they had bene the immediate parties to the perill: It hapned that one of the Italians was ſtryken from his horſe by a Frenche man, who as hee furiouſlie purſued his fortune

to diſpatch him, an other Italian careſull of the daunger of his companion, killed with a wonderfull blowe the Frenchman: The Italians had boare ſpeares, with the which they made ſlaughter of many of the frenche horſes, by meane whereof the Champions of Fraunce, beginning to decline, could no longer cloke their weaknes, but their vertue yelding to the fortune of their aduerſaries, they became priſoners to Thitalians: Who returning with victorie to Conſaluo & their other companies, were receiued with thoſe honours that apperteined to their merits: And being cõgratulated as men whoſe vallours had reſtored Italy to her former glory & honor, they entred Barletto in triumph, their priſoners ledde affore them, the ayre ſounding with Drommes and Trumpettes, the artillerie ſhooting of, the people crying with praiſes of their vertue, and all other ſhowes and actions vſed that might ſet foorth the reputation of their victorie: It is incredible howe muche the fortune of this combat diminiſhed the courage of the french armie, and liſted vp the Spanyardes into fame and preſuming, euerie one conſtruing this experience of a fewe, to a prophecie of the abſolute iſſue of the whole warre.

Diſcending of the Swiſſers into the Duchie of Millã

About this time the french king was moleſted in Lombardie by the Svvyzzers, the matter being begun not by the whole nation, but by thoſe three Cantons which had occupied Belynzone: Who ſeeking to induce him to cõſent that that place might remeine to them in proper, aſſailed Luzarno and Murato, which being a wall of great length vppon the lake Maior neare to Luzarno, giues impediment to diſcende from the mountaines to the plaine, by no other way then through a gate which only is in that wall: And albeit they coulde not carie it in the beginning for the defence which the Frenche Garriſon made, (Monſr de Chaumont lying at Vareſo and Galero with eight hundred Launces, hoping well alſo of the habilitie and defence of the place): Yet the number of the Svvyzzers encreaſing afterwardes, and ſuccoured alſo by the Griſons, after they had giuen many aſſaltes in vaine, diuers regimentes of them clyming a great mountaine which commaunded the wall, they compelled ſuche as kept the gate to abandon it; And taking afterwardes the borowe of Luzarno, but not the Caſtle, their ſtrength increaſed dayly for that the other nine Cantons, notwithſtanding in the beginning they offred men to the king for thalliance they had with him, beganne afterwardes to giue ſuccours to the three other Cantons, alleaging that for the reſpect of fidelitie and ſocietie, they ought not to faile to miniſter to the neceſſitie of their companions, being thereunto bounde by their auncient leagues, which were to bee preferred affore all the obligations they had with others. Whileſt they had an armie of fiftiene thouſande about the Caſtle, the Frenche not hable to reskewe it for the ſtraightnes of the paſſages, and good garde that was made, they made pillage of the countrey there about: And making all thinges lawfull to their furie, becauſe the Caſtle keeper of Muſocquo (a place apperteyning to Iohn Iacques Tryvulce) refuſed to lende them artillerie to batter the Caſtle of Luzarno, they ſacked the towne of Muſocquo, forbearing to vexe the Caſtle for that it was inexpugnable.

On the other ſide the Frenchmen, whom this emotion did not a little import, aſſembling all their ſtrength which they had in Lombardy, and hauing obteyned ſuccours of Bolongnia, of Ferrara, and of Mantua, require the Venetians to furniſhe that proporcion of men which they were bounde vnto for the defence of the ſtate of Myllan: The companies were promiſed according to the Kinges deſire, but there was vſed ſo little expedition in the leauying of them, and ſo great intermiſſion to ſende them, as they ſerued to litle purpoſe: Monſr de Chaumont who had beſtowed good ſtrength and garriſon in the Caſtels that were in the mounteynes, kept his regimentes in the playne, hopyng that the Svvyzzers, hauyng neyther horſe nor artilleries, durſt not diſcende into places diſcouered, but in the ende woulde bee made wearie for the difficultie of vittelles, and for that they were without money and leſſe hope to doe any thing that was of importaunce: In which eſtate the Svvyzzers hauyng remeyned many dayes, and the want of vittelles increaſing (for the Frenche with their Nauie had ſuncke many Barkes which brought vittelles to the Svvyzzers Campp, and reſtrained the courſe of many other by the lake) the ſouldiours beganne to nouriſhe faction amongſt them ſelues, for that thenterpriſe apperteined not but to the Cantons which poſſeſt Velinzon, and the Capteynes being corrupted by the French moneyes, they were content in the ende to retyre them ſelues, reſtoring (except Muſocquo as not apperteyning to the King) all the places which they had taken in that expedition, obteyning promyſe of the King not to moleſt them of Belinzon vntill a certeyne tyme: The Frenche were ſo farre eſtraunged from any ill will to the Svvyzzers, that they were not aſhamed not only in that tyme, when they had warre with the Kyng of Spaine, and that they feared the Kyng of Romains, and had the Venetians for ſuſpected, but alſo in all other ſeaſons, to buy the friendſhip of that nation, induing them with yearely penſions both publyke and priuate, and to make contractes with them vnder vnworthie conditions: In this action perhappes the Frenche were moued, both by the ſmall aſſurance they had in the footemen of their owne nation, and alſo for that as men of warre, they knewe that that Prince makes warre to his great diſaduauntage, that vexeth a people that hath nothing to ioſe.

Phillip Archduke of Auſtrich in Fraunce.

The King deliuered thus from the emotions and warres of the Svvyzzers, had no leſſe hope in the ſame ſeaſon to ſee ſome iſſue of his warres in the kingdome of Naples: For that after many meanes and practiſes of peace without any profit, Phillip Archduke of Auſtrich and Prince of Flaunders, determined to make his voyage from Spaine to Flaunders by land, notwithſtanding the contrarie deſires of his father and mother in law, of whom he obteined free power and commiſſion to contract a peace with the french king which he had long ſolicited whileſt he was in Spaine: But they ſent him accompanied with two Embaſſadors with whom he was to communicat in all actiõs, & without whoſe coũcel he would not treat or cõclude any thing: It is incredible with what magnificence & honour he was receiued by the kings aſſignment through all the realme of Fraunce, not only that the king deſired to make him fauorable in the practiſe of the peace, but alſo to deſerue to make a perpetuall friende of that young Prince who was to become myghtie and great, being the nexte ſucceſſour to Thempire Romain, and immediate inheritour to the kingdomes of Spaine with all their dependances: All ſuche as had grace or authoritie about him were honoured with the ſame liberties, and receyued preſentes of great price and riches: To theſe demonſtrations was aunſwerable the magnanimitie and royall behauiour of Phillip: For that as the Frenche Kyng, beſides his worde and fayth giuen for his ſure paſſing through Fraunce, had ſent into Flaunders many of the nobles of his realme for the ſafetie of Phillip: So Phillip, aſſoone as hee was entred Fraunce, to declare that hee reapposed wholly in the kings faith, gaue order that the Oſtages ſhould be redeliuered: Theſe ſo great tokens and apparances of amitie, were not vnaccompanied (as muche as

was

was in them) with leſſe effectes: For aſſembling at Bloys, after they had ſpent certeine dayes in diſcourſe and diſputation of thinges, they concluded a peace in this ſort: That the kingdom of Naples ſhould be poſſeſſed according to the firſt diuiſion: But that there ſhould bee left in deputation to Phillip, the prouinces for the which they firſt fell to difference and armes: That from the preſent, Charles his ſonne and Madame Clavvda the Kinges daughter (betweene whom ſhoulde bee a confirmation of that mariage which had bene affore ſolicited) ſhould bee intituled kings of Naples, and Dukes of Povvilla and Calabria: That that parte which apperteined to the King of Spaine ſhoulde bee from thenceforward gouerned by Tharchduke, and the particion diſcending to the french king, to be ordred by the proper deputies of his maieſtie: But that the one and other parte ſhoulde bee holden vnder the name of the two children, to whom, at the tyme of conſummation of mariage, the King ſhoulde giue his parte for the dowrie of his daughter: This peace was ſolemnly publiſhed in the great Church of Bloys and ratified by othes of the King, and of Phillip as procurer of the Kyng and Queene of Spaine his parentes in lawe: A peace truely of ryght great conſequence, if it had brought an effect equall to thintention: For, not onlye armes ſurceaſſed betweene ſo myghtie Kynges, but alſo peace woulde haue followed betweene the Kyng of Romains and the Frenche Kyng: Which woulde not only haue bredde newe enterpriſes againſt the Venetians, but alſo the Pope being ſuſpected to them both, and in ill opinion with the vniuerſall ſortes of men, woulde not haue bene without his feares of councelles and other actions which myght haue brought diminution to his authoritie and greatnes: But the King and Tharchduke ſending with expedition to publiſh the peace in the realme of Naples, with direction to the Capteynes and commaunders of men, to forbeare to moleſt one an other attending the ratification of the Spaniſhe king, and in the meane while their poſſeſſion of thinges to continue: The ruler for the French offred to obey to his king: But the Spanyard (either for the hope he had of the victorie, or for that he would not bee contented with the only authoritie of Phillip) anſwered that he could not diſcontinue the warre vnles he had receiued expreſſe commaundement from his king: For the continuation whereof, he was ſo much the more encouraged, by how much the French king, gouerned by his hopes both in the practiſe & cõcluſion of peace, eſteeming for certein that which was yet vncerteine, had not only dallied in all other prouiſions of warre, but alſo had foreſlowed the leauying of thoſe regiments (that is three thouſand footmen & three hũdred launces) which ſhould haue bene embarked at Genes to be led to that enterpriſe vnder Monſr de Perſy: And of the contrary were aryued at Barletto the two thouſand Almain footemen, which being leauied with the fauour of the king of Romains, & embarqued at Trieſte, were paſſed in ſuertie by the golphe of Venice not without the great complaint of the French king: In which reſpect, the Duke of Nemours, not hable to aſſure a ſurceaſſing of armes, and leſſe likely to refurniſh his power being made weake by the oppreſſions he had receiued before: Yet, becauſe he would occupie his whole ſtrength, if either occaſion or neceſſitie compelled him to fight with his enemies, he ſent for all the French bandes that had bene diſperſed into diuers places, together with all the aides of the Barons of the realme, except thoſe Lordes and regiments which made warre vnder Monſr D'aubigny in Calabria: But in aſſembling them he founde a fortune contrarie to his exſpectation: For, the Duke of Atry, and Loys D'ars, one of thoſe French Capteines which had their companies beſtowed vppon the landes of Ottranto, determining to marche together to

ioyne with the Viceroy, for that they were aduertiſed that Peter of Nauarre with many Spaniſh footmen, was in place apt to diſtreſſe them if they went ſeparate & deuided: It hapned that Lewys D'ars taking his oportunitie to paſſe ſuerly, departed, without being carefull of the daunger of the Duke Atry, who left alone, marched alſo with his companies hauing eſpiall that Peter de Nauarre was gone to Matero to ioyne with Conſaluo: But the councels of men were not ſufficient to reſiſt fortune, for that the men of Rutyliano (a towne in the countrey of Bary) who in the ſame dayes were reuolted againſt the Frenchemen, callyng vppon the ſuccours of Peter de Nauarre, who in theyr regarde altered his way from Matero towardes Rutyliano, and encountred the Duke of Atry, to whom the ſodeines of his peril brought him into many doubtfull cogitations what to doe: But, as neceſſitie of daunger makes men reſolute, ſo, in the ende, ſeeing no ſuertie in his retraite, hee gaue his whole diſpoſition to the battell: And as when men are driuen to fight, their conſtructions and iudgementes doe often varie, ſometimes beguiling them ſelues with an ouerweening in their owne ſtrength, and ſometimes beleeuing leſſe of their enemie then his eſtate and power requires: So the Duke reappoſing much in the ſeruice of his horſmen, (though his footemen were inferiour in numbers to the Spaniſh) whom he vainely ſuppoſed to bee ouer wearied by the trauell they had made that night, vndertooke the battell, wherein euerie one expreſſing his vallour on both ſides, his people at laſt were broken, his Vncle beyng ſlaine, & him ſelfe taken priſoner: And as it ſeldō hapneth that one fortune goeth without an other, nor no aduerſitie vnaccompanied with an other calamitie, ſo foure French Gallies vnder the gouerning of Preian knight of the Rhodes, appeared in the hauē of Otrāto vnder licēce of the Venetian maieſtrate, promiſing to defend them from thinuaſions of the Spaniſh Nauie, which vnder the Capteine Villemarino waſted in creekes therabouts: But after Preian was entred a litle further in the hauē, his forces litle, & his fortune farre inferior to his enemies, he began to feare to be enuironed: And therefore to preuent that his domage and harmes ſhould not turne to the profite of his enemies, after he had deliuered the galiots and ſuncke his Gallies, he ſought his ſafetie by lande with his people, leauing his honour in ſuſpition by the greatnes of his daunger.

The ouerthrow of the Duke of Atry.

The French King gaue commaundement to his Capteines to ſtand only vppon their gardes, and not to ſeeke their enemies, aſſuring them that with ſpeede they ſhould either receiue the confirmation of the peace, or a competent proporcion of ſuccours: But the armies being ſo mightie and ſo neare one an other, it was very harde to bridle the furie of the Frenchmen, or to bring them to this pacience to drawe the warre longer: It ſeemed rather that deſteny began to aduaunce, & would no more deferre the whole and abſolute decyding of thoſe affaires whoſe beginning hapned in Calabria: For after the Spanyardes were ioyned in one ſtrength at Semynaro, Monſr D'aubigny hauing aſſembled all his companies and the power of the Barons that held the French faction, beſtowed his footmen within the towne of Gioia three miles from Seminaro, and ſent his horſmen to Loſarno three miles from Gioia: And fortefying him ſelfe with foure peeces of artillerie vppon the ſhoare of the ryuer, being the ſituation of Gioia, he ſtoode readie prepared to oppoſe againſt his enemies if they made enterpriſe to paſſe the riuer: But the intencions of the Spaniſh were other thē he ſuppoſed, for the daie they determined to paſſe, they cauſed their Vauntgard to march directly to the riuer, where Manuell de Benauide (who had the leading of them) being vppon the ſhoare, beganne to parley with Monſr D'aubigny, who had ledde all his armie to the banke contrarie or oppoſite: At the ſame inſtant, the

the reategarde of the Spaniſh being folowed with the battell, tooke an other way to paſſe the riuer a mile and an halte aboue Gioia: Which being diſcerned of Monſr D'aubigny, he went in great haſt without artillerie to affront them affore they had all paſſed: But they were more happie in celeritie then Monſr D'aubigny, for that affore his comming they were all paſſed ouer, and raunged (albeit without artillerie) in firme and ſet battell: And with that aduauntage marched foorth againſt the french men, who, by reaſon of their haſt, either keeping no order at all, or at leaſt by their ſmall numbers, not able to reſiſt ſo great a ſtrength, were there broken before the Vauntgard of the Spaniſh could paſſe the riuer: In which conflict Ambricourt was made priſoner with certeine other french Capteines, and the Duke of Somne with many Barons of the kingdom: And albeit Monſr D'aubigny tooke the rocke of Angitole for his ſafetie, yet hauing no meane to iſſue out, his perill compelled him to yelde him ſelfe priſoner, being ouerthrowne and taken euen in the ſelfe ſame places, where not many yeares before, he had with great glorie triumphed ouer King Ferdinand and Conſaluo, ſo inconſtant are the proſperities of fortune, and the doings of men ſo ſubiect to alteration and chaunge: In this conflict perhaps nothing was more hurtfull to Monſr D'aubigny (of a franke and noble ſpirit, and one of the moſt reſolute Capteines that the French King ledde into Italy) then that his own too forward and violent inclination caried him too farre into the hope of the victorie: A matter which likewiſe was hurtfull to the Viceroy in Powilla, ioyning the reapport of thaccident hapned in Calabria: For Conſaluo not hearing of the victorie of his people, and not able by thimportunitie of hunger and plague to remeine longer in Barletto, marched out of it, and leauing a very weake Garriſon, he tooke his waie to Ciriguole, a towne ten miles from thence, & almoſt in a triangle betweene Canoſa (where the Viceroy was) and Barletto: The Viceroy (when daungers appeare wiſe men fall into councell) debated with his Capteines, whether were better to follow or flee thoccaſion of the battell: Wherein many of his Capteines reaſoned, that, in regarde the Spanyardes were increaſed in numbers, and his bandes falne into great weakenes and diſorders, it was againſt pollicie to commit any thing to hazarde: But to retyre into Melfe or ſome other ſtrong towne wel prouided of thinges neceſſary, and there to exſpect either a new ſuccour out of Fraunce, or els the confirmation of the peace: A manner to temporiſe (which he was alſo bound to vſe by commaundement) which he had newly receiued from the King: A contrarie opinio was holden by other Capteines, to whom it ſeemed a thing daungerous to tarie till the armie alreadie victorious ouer Calabria, ſhould ioyne with Conſaluo, or at leaſt ſhould execute any enterpriſe of importance finding no man to reſiſt him: They brought in thexample of Monſr Montpenſier, chuſing rather to retyre into townes then to fight: That the memories of times paſt admoniſhed them howe farre they might hope for the long & vncerteine ſuccours of Fraunce: That their Camp was nothing inferior either in force or vertue to tharmie of thenemie, and that the diſorders that had hapned by negligence, ought not to be compared to thexperience which wold be ſhowed in plaine field with weapons and vallours of men, and not with ſleightes or ſutleties: That it was a more ſure and honourable way, to make at the leaſt with hope, an equall experience and triall of fortune, then eſchuing the battell, and conſuming them ſelues by degrees of temporiſing, to giue their enemies the victorie without bloud and without daunger: That touching the late meſſage of the king, it was to bee conſtrued rather as an aduertiſement, then in nature of a commaundement, in which degree, if Monſr D'anbigny had taken it, he had done well: But now

the ſtate of the warre being chaunged by ſuch a diſorder, it was neceſſarie likewyſe that their deliberations ſhould alter: This laſt opinion preuailed, and therefore hauing aduertiſement by their eſpials that the Spaniſh bandes either all or parte were iſſued out of Barletto: Monſr de Nemours in like ſort tooke his way towardes Ciriguole, a way verie inconuenient both for the one and other armie, for that the countrey was barreine of freſh waters, the ſommer and hoate ſeaſon being of greater rage for drought, then was wont to be in the beginning of May: The diſpoſition of the time brought many afflictions both to the one and other armie, for that the very day of remouing, many ſoldiours died of drought by the waies: And the diſcommodities of the waies by the which they paſſed, gaue no leſſe impediment to their marching, the French not knowing whether the whole or parte of the Spaniſhe armie were in the field, for that both Fabricius Colonne with his light horſmen, tooke away the certeine knowledge, and alſo the Launces of the men at armes holden vpright, and the ſtalkes of fennels growing high in that countrey, dimmed their ſight that they could not well diſcerne: The Spanyardes were the firſt that arriued at Ciriguole which the Frenchmen kept, and incamping betweene two vines, they enlarged (by thaduiſe of Proſper Colonno) a ditch or trench which was at the entrey of their Camp: Whileſt they were dreſſing their lodgings or Camp, the diligence of the french in marching had brought them to the place, but by the cõdition of the time drawing near night, they ſtoode doubtfull whether they ſhould ſo ſodeinly accept the battell or deferre it till the day folowing: Tues D'alegre and the Prince of Melfe, perſwaded that the fight might bee put ouer till the next day, a reſpit conuenient for the refreſhing of their owne men, and to no leſſe purpoſe to diſtreſſe the Spanyardes, who, they hoped, would bee conſtrained by neceſſitie of vittels, to remoue their Camp: To this reaſon was ioyned alſo a conſideration of warre, howe muche it would bee to their diſaduauntage, to ſet vppon them in their lodgings, ſpecially being ignorant of the diſpoſition of the place: But as euery calamitie is ledde to his effect by his proper meane, and mortall men in many thinges, are made thinſtruments of their owne harmes: So Monſr de Nemours caried more by his raſhe inclination, then by the ſafe councell of others, the Spanyardes were charged with great furie aſwell by the French as Svvyzzers: And the fyre hauing taken the powder of the Spanyardes either by chaunce or by other meane, Conſalue vſing thoccaſion of that accident, cryed with a courage well reſolued, the victorie is ours, God declares it by manifeſt tokens, ſpecially when we ſee we haue now no more neceſſitie of the ſeruice of artillerie: There be ſundrie opinions of the ſtate of this battell: The Frenche publiſhe that in the firſt encounter they brake the Spaniſh footemen, and offring to the artillerie, they had wonne it, and ſet the powder on fyre only by the darkenes of the night, their men at armes, by negligence & misknowledge, had charged their owne footemen, by which diſorder, the Spanyardes reaſſembled: But others reaſon, that for the difficultie to paſſe the ditche, the French men beginning to intricate and intangle them ſelues, fell to fleeing, no leſſe by their proper diſorder, then by the vertue of their enemies, being moſt of all amazed: For the death of Monſr de Nemours, who entring with the firſt into the furie of the fight, and as he was in the action of a noble Capteine to encourage his men to winne the trenche, was ſtriken dead with a boollet: There bee others, who diſcourſing more particularly, ſaie that Monſr de Nemours, diſpairing to be hable to paſſe the ditch, & labouring to turne his ſtrength towardes the flanke of the Camp to aduenture to enter on that ſide, cried that they ſhould giue backe: Which voice, to thoſe that knew not thoccaſion, gaue a ſigne

to flee, which ioyned to the chaunce of his death in the firſt ſquadron hapning alſo at the ſame tyme, cauſed all the armie to turne their backes and enter into a manifeſt fleeing: Some acquite the Viceroy for taking the battell againſt the councel of others, and do laye the blame vppon Yues D'alegre, who, contrary to thintention and deſire of the Viceroy to fight that daie, reprehending his fearefulnes, induced him to doe that whereunto he bare no diſpoſition: The battell was of very ſmall continuance, and albeit the Spaniſh paſſing ouer the ditch followed the chaſe of their enemies, yet as euen in calamities fortune is not without her fauours, ſo by the oportunitie of the night couering all thinges with darknes, there were fewe that fell into the perils that they feared moſt, I meane that were either taken or ſlaine, ſpecially of the horſmen, of whom Monſr Chanaion was one: The reſidue with loſſe of their cariage and artillerie, ſaued them ſelues by fleeing: The Capteines aſwell as the ſoldiours being diſperſed into many ſeparate places, not as their vertue wold, but whether their feare and fortune ledde them: This victorie hapned the eight daie after the ouerthrow of Monſr D'aubigny, being both on Friday, a day which the Spanyardes haue obſerued to bee happie vnto them: The French, after the feare of the chaſe was paſſed, reaſſembled againe aſwell as the violence of the tyme & their fortune would ſuffer, and as men whoſe greater perils were yet to come, debated many deuiſes: Sometymes they thought beſt to ioyne with the reſidue of the armie in ſome place conuenient, to take from the victors all meanes to goe to Naples, & eftſoones they iudged it moſt conuenient for their ſafetie, to ſticke to the defence of Naples: And yet, as it hapneth that to men in aduerſitie their feares growe dayly greater, and to ſuch as bee vanquiſhed is left nothing but conſideration of difficulties: So neither one of theſe deuiſes was ſuffred to bee put in execution: For that neither had they any election of places for their ſafe abiding, neither was their poſſibilitie to defende Naples for the skarcetie of vittelles: For the prouiſion and furniſhing whereof, the French had ſent affore to Rome to buy a great quantitie of corne, which they could not tranſport, either for the impediments that they of Rome gaue, ſeeking to haue their towne ſtande in good prouiſion, or rather by the ſecret perſuaſion of the Pope, which was not the leaſt credible.

The conſideration of theſe difficulties made Alegre the Prince of Salerne, & many other Barons to retyre betweene Caietto and Tracetto, where they reaſſembled vnder their names, the moſt parte of the reſidue of the armie: But Conſaluo to whoſe vertue this one thing was peculiar and proper, to know howe to follow his fortune aſwell as he was skilfull to get the victorie, after this good ſucceſſe, tooke his waie with the armie towardes the towne of Naples, and as he paſſed by Melfe, he made offer to the Prince to leaue him poſſeſſed of his whole eſtate, ſo that hee would remeine at the deuotion of the Spanyardes: But he rather chuſing to go his way with his wyfe and children, went to ioyne with Lewys D'ars lying at Venouſa: By whoſe departure Conſaluo taking Melfe, folowed his way directly to Naples, at whoſe comming thoſe Garriſons of the French which were in the towne, retired into the new Caſtle, and the Napolitans depriued of all hope but ſuch as is left to men abandoned, receiued Conſaluo the xiiij. daie of May, Capua and Auerſa doing the lyke in the ſame tyme.

THE SYXT BOOKE OF THE historie and discourse of Guicciardin.

"THAT man erreth lesse who promiseth to him self a chaunge
"of thaffaires of this world, then he that persuadeth that they "are alwaies firme and stable: And albeit the man wise and re-
"solute, is seldom displeased with things which ought to bee
"borne, for that what so euer might happen to an other, hee
"neuer complaineth if it chaunce to him: Yet, (so is the state "of man intangled with infirmities) there hapneth no muta-
"tion which in some sort shaketh not the resolution and con-
"stancie of the minde: An example verified in the person of the french king: Who, assoone as he harde the newes of so great a losse, and in a time wherein he had more exspectation of peace, then of warre: Entred into no litle alteration, concurring in that aduersitie, not only the depriuation of a kingdom so mightie and florishing, with the desolation and ruine of his armies compounded of his chiefest nobilities and men of race and vertue: But also he considered the perill wherein stood all the residue of that which he helde in Italy, which as he had alreadie made the rewardes of his glorie and victories, so he reserued to adioyne them (as perpetuall monuments) to the reputation of his Empire and greatnes: But the humor which most fedde this passion, proceeded chiefly of impacience against his fortune, esteeming his dishonour so much the greater, by howe much he was vanquished by the king of Spanyardes, whose power he iudged to bee farre inferiour to his, an errour familiar with Princes to esteeme lesse of their enemie then he is, and "more of their owne forces then they are in deede: And as in these cases the despite
"of the iniurie doth much to enforce a desire of reuenge, so the king debating deepe-
"ly the estate and nature of the wrong, which was, to be beguiled vnder hope & promise of peace, determined to runne vnto the remedie which commonly those men vse that holde them selues iniuried: That is, with all his forces and meanes to assaie to recouer the honour and kingdom he hath lost, and with armes to restore the reputation

putation that had bene ſtolne from him by deceite, holding it no iniuſtice to bee reuenged of him that did the firſt wrong: But affore he entred into the action of any enterpriſe, hee complained greeuouſly to Tharchduke not yet departed from Bloys, recommending to him the infamie of infidelitie, and howe much it imported him to redreſſe thabuſe, if he had any vertue to preſerue his faith and his honour: By which inſtigation, the Archduke (whoſe innocencie held him ſufficiently acquited) ſolicited greatly his father in lawe, to redreſſe the abuſe, complaining in vehement tearmes that thinges were ſo handled to his great ſlaunder, and that in the ſight and knowledge of all the worlde: It hath bene a cuſtome with the Princes of the world to enterteine one an other with vaine hopes and artificiall practiſes, eſteeming more thoccaſions which the tyme offreth, then the faith and promiſes which them ſelues doe make: For, the kinges of Spaine, with many excuſes, deferred to ſend the ratification of peace affore the victorie, alleaging ſometymes, that hauing a cuſtome to make their diſpatches ioyntly, they could neuer bee both together in one place as was neceſſarie: And ſometimes that they were ſo peſtred with the multitude of affaires, that all oportunities to that expedition, were preiudiciall: In which excuſes may bee manifeſtly diſcerned the ill diſpoſicion they had to embrace the peace, either for that their ſonne in lawe had exceeded their commiſſions, or els for that after he was departed out of Spaine, they were entred into a better hope of the iſſue & ſucceſſe of the warre: Or at leaſt for that it ſeemed ſtraunge to them, that he had appropriated to him ſelfe their parte of the realme, hauing no aſſurance (by the minoritie of the children) that the mariage of his ſonne ſhould take effect: And yet as they alwaies expreſſed inclinations to peace, and gaue continuall hopes to ratifie it: So, by deferring, they wonne aſmuch tyme as they could, to thend to take aduice according to the euent of thinges: And obſeruing ſtill the ſame ſleight to temporize and interteine, after they vnderſtood by true aduertiſement that their armie remeined victorious, albeit they were reſolued to holde no reckoning of the peace that was made, yet did they deferre to declare their intenciō to Tharchduke, to thende, that keeping by that meanes the french king in ſuſpence, he might haue the leſſe oportunitie to prepare for the reskuing of Caietta & the other places which yet remeined: At length, conſtrained by the importunities of their ſonne in lawe (who was determined that otherwaies he would not departe from Bloys) they ſent thether newe Embaſſadours, by whom was declared, after diſputation of certeine dayes, that it was not thintencion of their kings to ratifie that peace which had bene made in that ſort, which neither in matter, meaning, nor circumſtance, it caried either honour or ſuertie for them: And entring into controuerſie with Tharchduke, they tolde him, that it brought no litle maruell and diſcontentment to his father in lawe, that in the conditions of the peace, he had tranſgreſſed their will, and that albeit in regarde of his honour his commiſſion was free and large, yet hee ought to communicate with thinſtructions that were giuen him, which were limited & ſubiect to rule: Tharchduke anſwered that his inſtructions were no leſſe free and vniuerſall then his commiſſion, and that at his departure, his parentes in lawe aſſured him that they deſired the peace chiefly by his meanes, and did ſweare vppon the holy Goſpel and image of Ieſus Chriſt to obſerue what ſo euer he ſhould determyne: And yet for his owne parte, hee was contented to trauell in it as in the perſon of a man regulated, and forbearing to vſe the amplitude and authoritie of his commiſſion, he alwaies communicated with the two perſonages which they had ſent with him: Theſe newe Embaſſadours working all by art, propounded newe meanes of accorde, diſcloſing as it were that their kinges had deſire to render the realme to king Federyke: But thoſe deuiſes being diſcerned not only to bee vaine, but alſo full of skorne and deceipt, for that they tended to eſtraunge from the frenche king the ſpirite of Tharchduke, who looked to haue that kingdome for his ſonne: The king in publike audience anſwered them, that he would in no ſort treat or negociat with them, if firſt they ratified not the peace that was made, and declared that the diſorders hapned by it did much diſcontent them: He tolde them that it ſeemed to him a matter not only marueilous, but alſo deteſtable and abhominable, that thoſe kings who gloried ſo muche to haue gotten the title of Catholyques, would holde ſo baſe reckoning of their proper honour, their faith giuen, their othe ſworne, and of the religion they profeſſe, bearing no reſpect to the Archduke, a Prince ſo great, ſo noble, ſo vertuous, and their ſonne and heire: With this anſwer commaunding them the ſame day to departe his Court, he turned immediatly all his wittes to the preparations of the warre, wherein taking occaſion vppon the greatnes of the wrongs that had bene done, hee determined to aduaunce farre greater prouiſions both by land and ſea, then had bene done in any tymes affore by any of the kings of Fraunce:

« So importunate is the paſſion of reuenge in the mindes of mortall men, who not-
« them.

In ſo much as he determined to ſende two mightie armies to the realme of Naples, the one by ſea and the other by land: And leaſt in the meane while Caietto and the Caſtles of Naples were loſt, he prepared to ſuccour them with diligence by ſea, aſwell with new ſupplies of men of warre, as with all other neceſſarie thinges: And to giue impediment that there went no ſuccours out of Spaine (which had bene the cauſe of all the diſorders) he reſolued to inuade the kingdom of Spaine with two armies by lande, addreſſing one to the countrey of Roſsillion which adioyneth to the ſea Mediterraney, and the other to Fontearaby with the other places aſſiſting vppon the Occean ſea: And alſo at the ſame time, to aſſaile with an armie by ſea, the coaſtes of Catelognia and Valencia.

The Caſtles of Naples taken by the Spaniſhe.

But whileſt the French were diligent in preparing for theſe expedicions, Conſaluo deuiſing how he might haue the Caſtles of Naples, planted his artillerie againſt new Caſtle at the foote of the hill Saint Martyn: From thence on a place ſomewhat raiſed, he beat the wall of the Citadell, whoſe ſituation being towards the ſayd mounteine, was made ſtrong with auncient walles, their foundations being almoſt vnder the earth: At the ſame tyme alſo Peter of Nauarro caſt a myne to ouerthrowe the walles of the Citadell, battring alſo the new Caſtle walles, and the Towre of S. Vincent which Conſaluo had wonne a fewe daies before: Newcaſtle had a forme & building after an other faſhion then it is at this day, for that now the Citadell being taken away, there beginneth a newe circuit of walles, where were the walles of the ſame, and that ſtretcheth along the place of the Caſtle vntil the ſea: This circuit begun by Federyke & by him raiſed euen to the waſt, being made of verie ſtrong matter of walling, & wel foũded, is very hard to be vndermined, for that it is ſubiect to coũtermynes on all ſides, and alſo the water runneth almoſt vppõ the vppermoſt part of the ground: Conſaluo had a determinatiõ, that aſſoone as he had taken the Citadell, and comming neare the valte of the Caſtle wal, he would deſtroy it with new mines: But either by the naturall raſhnes, or by the ill fortune of the french men, a greater occaſion was offred to him, the aduerſities of the French making all thinges happie to their enemies: For, after Peter of Nauarro had put fyre to the myne which he had perfected, perfected, the furie of the powder blewe open the wall of the Citadell, and at the ſame inſtant the Spaniſh bandes of footemen ſtanding readie arenged in battell expecting thoperation of the fyerworke, made entryes on many ſides, partly by thoſe places of the wall that were broken, and partly vſing the ſeruice of eskaling ladders, they commaunded the wall in ſundrie other places not hurt by the myne, their fortune making thoſe things eaſie, which by experience & reaſon ſeemed not without manifeſt peril: On the other ſide, the french, iſſuing out of the Caſtle of intenciō not to ſuffer them to remeine within the Citadel, charged them, but with a ſucceſſe farre inferior to their vertue, for that being immediatly ouerlaied with multitudes of the Spaniſh, as they retyred towardes the Rampier, the Spanyards entred pellmell with them, and running with the ſame fortune euen vp to the way that goeth to the gate, they ſo redoubled the feares of the Frēch mē alredy appalled by the diſpaire of their own eſtate, that ſtanding in condition vtterly abandoned, in leſſe then half an houre they rendred the Caſtle with their goods & liues to diſcreſſiō, the Count of Montoire remeining priſoner with many other Lordes: This cōqueſt was ſo much the more agreeable to the Spanyards, & leſſe for the purpoſe of the frēch, by how much there arriued from Genes the daie folowing, for their ſuccours, an armie by ſea of ſix great ſhips, with many ſmaller veſſels fraighted with vittels, weapō, & munitiōs, & a regiment of two thouſand footmen: At the diſcouery of this Nauy, the Spaniſh army at ſea riding then in the port of Naples, retired into Tſchia, whether the French Nauie purſued them vnderſtāding the new Caſtle was loſt: But the Spaniſh Nauie hauing ſunke before them certeine Barkes, to thend they were not compelled to fight, after they had beſtowed certeine bollnes of ſhot one againſt an other more for pleaſure then preiudice, they brake of, the one going to Caietta, and the other being reaſſured by the departure of thenemie, retyred to the mole of Naples: Fortune doing more for their ſafetie then their owne vertue.

The newv Caſtle of Naples aſſaited.

After the taking of new Caſtle, Conſaluo fell to deuiſe by what meanes he might haue the reſidue of the realme, and therfore without tarying for tharmy that was in Calabria (which laie there to conquer the vale of Ariana to take away all impedimēts to paſſe further) he ſent Proſper Colonne into Abruzza: And leauing Peter of Nauarro affore the Egg Caſtle, he marched with the reſidue of tharmie towardes Caietta, in the taking wherof he ſuppoſed did conſiſt the ſumme of the warre, for that both the hopes and the diſpaires of the French men depended wholly vppon the defence or loſſe of that Citie, ſtrong by the oportunitie of the ſea, and by the conueniencie and greatnes of his port, verie fitte to receiue the armies that ſhould be ſent from Genes to Prouance: Touching the French men, they did not only hold Caietta, but alſo, beſides the places thereaboutes which were in their power, they commaunded in Abruzza, Aquilea, the rocke of Euandra, with many other places: Beſides, the Lord Leuvvs D'ars, hauing reaſſembled many trowpes of horſmen and footemē, & being fortefied with the Prince of Melfa within Venouſa, did great harmes to the countrie thereabout: Laſtly, Ronſſano, Matalona, with many other ſtrong peeces apperteining to the Barons of the faction of Aniovv, helde out conſtantly at the deuocion of the french king, their vallour notwithſtanding being inſufficiēt to reſiſt their aduerſities.

In this meane while Peter of Nauarro made certein cloaſe or couered Barks, with the which approching in more ſuertie the walles of the Egg Caſtle, he caſt a mine on that ſide which proſpects Pizifalcona, without the knowledge or priuitie of thē within, & aſſone as he had intāgled it with the fire, he blew into the aire in great fury one part of the wall together with the bodyes of men that ſtoode vppon it: With the which, both for the action terrible, and the newnes of the deuiſe, ſtraunge, the Caſtle was immediatly taken to the ſpeciall reputation of Peter of Nauaro, and generall wonder of all men, for that as newe inuentions to reuerſſe a ſtrong place are moſt fearfull, hauing as yet no deuiſe to encounter them, ſo it was incredible to what eſtate of opinion this new experience brought Peter of Nauarro, againſt whoſe mines " they thought that neither walles, fortreſſes, nor other working, could make reſiſtãce, " ſo readely is the nature of man raiſed into wonder when his mynd comprehẽds not " the reaſon of the things which the eye beholdeth performed in action: And ſure in thoſe daies it was a thing of great horrour that with the force of Canon pouder put into a Caue, or rather powred in the myne, men ſhould throwe downe to the earth, places & walles of greateſt ſtrength & moſt ſuttle foundatiõ: The firſt that vſed this experience of vndermining of walles in Italy, were the Genovvaies, amõgſt whõ according to the teſtimony of ſome, Peter of Nauarre exerciſed the art of warre in the perſon of a meane ſoldiour on foote: It was in the yeare. 1487. whẽ they laie incamped affore the rocke of Serazenella holdẽ then by the Florentyns, where, with a mine caſt in this maner, they opened a parte of the wall, miſſing notwithſtanding the taking of the rocke, for that the myne (by ſome errour or imperfection) had not pearced ſo deepe vnder the rocke, as was needefull, the ſame being thoccaſion that at that tyme the example of ſuch an experience was not folowed.

Conſaluo, drawing neare to Caietto, Monſr Dalegro, who had diſtributed foure hundred Launces and foure thouſand footmen of thoſe which remeined of the fortune of the battell, betweene Caietta, Fondi, Itrio, Tracetto, and the rocke Guillaumo, retyred them all eſtſoones within Caietta, wherein entred with him the Princes of Salerne & Biſignan the Duke of Tracetto with many other Barons of the realme ioyned affore with him: After the retraite of theſe companies Conſaluo entred vppon thoſe places which they had left abandoned, and alſo vppon the rocke of S. Germain, encamping afterwardes in the Subburbes of Caietta: And after he had planted his artillerie, he battred with an incredible furie that ſide towards the hauen, & the mounteine commonly called Mount Roland: A hill conioyned and hath commaundement ouer the Citie, and the which, the French men had then fortefied with Rampiers and Baſtillions of earth, being afterwards by him incloſed with wall: He aſſaied in vaine to enter with two aſſalts (but not ordered) and forbearing at laſt to giue the aſſalt general and diſpoſed that daie which he had determined to giue it, he ſaw it would be harde to haue it, aſwel for the numbers & vallours of thoſe within, as alſo when he cõſidered, that though his army ſhould enter by ſtrength into the mountein, yet he ſhould be but brought into greater peril, ſtanding open to the ſhot of thartillerie planted in the monaſtery & other high places vppõ the mounteine: He forbare not for all this to plaie with his artillerie & to moleſt the towne, which likewiſe was inuironed and beſeged on that ſide to the ſea, lying affore the hauẽ the xviij. Spaniſh Gallies which Dom Raymon de Cardona gouerned: But whileſt Cõſaluo was buiſie in theſe actiõs, there aryued for the French, a Nauie of ſix groſſe Carracks Genovvaies, ſix other ſhips, & ſeuen Gallies with good ſuccours of vittels & footmen: Their commaunder was the Marquis of Saluzzo, whõ by the death of Monſr de Nemours, the king had ſẽt thether for their newe Viceroy, the fortune of the warres notwithſtanding, nothing altring though the perſon of the General was chaunged: The king deſiring greatly to keepe Caietta, refurniſhed them eſtſoones within fewe daies, what vppon thoſe veſſels and what vppon others, with a thouſand footemen of Corſegna and three thouſand Gaſcoins: In ſo muche as by the comming of this newe Nauie, the Spaniſh Fleete was conſtrained conſtrained to retyre to Naples, and Conſaluo diſpairing to do any more good there, retyred his regiments within the moale of Caietta, and within Caſtellona, whereby he kept Caietta beſeeged with a ſeege (as it were) more large, after he had loſt many of his people, partly by skirmiſhing, and ſome in retyring, amongſt whom Dom Hugues de Cardona was ſlaine by a ſhot from the towne: But at the ſame tyme, all his other affaires of the kingdome trained a ſucceſſe more happie, for that Proſper Colonne had newely taken the rocke of Enandro and Aquilea, and reduced all the other peeces of Abruzza to the Spaniſh deuotion, almoſt all Calabria yelding the lyke obedience by the contract which the Count Capaccio had laſtly made with them: And there remeined no other place free from their iuriſdiction, but Roſſano and Saint Seuerin where the Prince of Roſſano was beſeeged, nothing reſiſting the felicitie of thoſe men, whom fortune went about to make victors.

The Florentyns in the countrey of Piſa.

Whileſt theſe alterations trauelled the kingdome of Naples, the other regions of Italy were not altogether voide of ſuſpicions and troubles: For, the Florentyns, affore the fortune of the French beganne ſo headlong to decline in the kingdome of Naples, fearing indifferently the ambuſcados of the Pope, & the ambition of the Duke Valentynois, forgat not to leauie prouiſiõs of warre equal to the greatnes of the perill that threatned, holding it eaſie to ſuffer a miſchief, whẽ they are ſure of the remedie: „ „ They enterteyned into theyr paie for the leadyng of theyr armie (and yet without title of generall) the Baily of Caen, with fiftie Frenche Launces: A Capteyne for his owne perticular well recommended for the ſeruice of warre, and for the reſpect of the Florentyns verie conuenient, for that being the kinges ſubiect, & had brought his charge of fiftie Launces by the kinges conſent, they had opinion that thoſe of whom they earſt doubted would now be better aduiſed what they would doe, the king expreſſing vnder that degree of fauour a diſpoſition to be readie to their aide in all neceſſities: Aſſoone as hee was come to their armie, they reaſſembled all their troupes, & for the ſeconde tyme, cut of the corne of the Piſans, but not through the whole countrey, for that to enter the vale of Sercle was not without daunger, hauing his ſituation betwene the mounteins & the waters, & in the myd way betweene Lucqua & Piſa: Immediatly after they had giuẽ this ſpoile to their corne, the Camp marched to Vicopiſan which was takẽ without difficultie, for that an hundred frẽch footmẽ being within it, the Baily of Caẽ threatning to puniſh thẽ as enemies to the king, & ſomtimes promiſing thẽ of liberalitie a moneths paie, they exchaũged their faith with feare & hope of profit, & iſſued out of the town, the ſame being thoccaſiõ that Vicopiſan was rendred to diſcreſſiõ: Verucola alſo wherin was but a ſlender guard, was forthwith enuironed, to thend no ſuccors ſhould enter into it: And thartillery being afterwardes trayled thether not without great difficulties, for that the mounteines thereaboutes, offred many troubleſome impedimentes, thoſe that were within, fearing more the thunder of the Cannõ, thẽ truſting to their proper vertue or fortune, yelded, their goods and lyues ſaued: The ſituation of Verucola being a litle fortreſſe raiſed vppon a hygh mounteyne during the warres in the countrey of Piſa, is of great importance: For that being within fiue miles of Piſa, it hath not only a naturall aptnes to diſtreſſe the countrey thereabout yea euen to the gates of the Citie, but alſo by his proſpect he diſcouereth all the bandes and trowpes that come out of Piſa whether they bee on foote or horſemen: Paovle Vitelli and many other experienced Capteyns made many tryals in vaine to carie it ſince the warre begun: And now the cõfidẽce that the Piſans had, that Vicopiſan would be defended, without taking the which, the Florẽtyns could not encamp before Verucola, was the cauſe that they had not made ſufficient prouiſion, wherein they helped forwarde the fortune of their enemies more by their proper negligence then by thothers vertue, opinion beguiling them againſt reaſon or experience: Greatly did amaze the Piſans the loſſe of Verucola, in whom notwithſtanding, neither the regarde of the harmes they had receiued, nor the conſideration of their other calamities, being miſerable by want of money and vittels, coulde worke no inclination to returne to the obedience of the Florentyns, languiſhing (by one common infirmitie) in diſpaire to obteine pardō for the conſcience of the great tranſgreſſions they had don: Which diſpoſition it was needful that ſuch as in the gouernment bare greateſt authoritie, ſhould enterteyne with a ſpeciall diligence, for that thoſe of the plaine countrey (without whom they were not able to cōtinue defence) bare no ſmall ſuſpection to run with the ſtreame, and to varie in minde as their common fortune declined: And therefore nouriſhing them with diuers hopes, together with thoſe eſtates of the common people that liued more by the benefites of peace, then troubles of warre, they publiſhed amongſt them ſundrie rumors vnder thauthoritie of fained letters, amuſing them with diuers inuentions: And confounding things falſe with thoſe that were true, if any accident hapned in Italy, they tooke thoportunitie & made it ſerue for their purpoſe, cōmunicating with the people that ſomtimes one Prince, ſomtimes an other, were readie to come to ſuccor thē: They made perſuaſiōs according to the propertie of the time, vſing their tonges in ſtead of force, to ſtaie thoſe men vpon whō depēded their owne ſafetie: But in al theſe extremities they were not without ſome aide & ſuccors of the Genouvaies & Lucquois auncient enemies of the Florentyns, & likewiſe of Pandolfe Petrucci, bearing litle remēbrance of the benefits receiued: And (which was of greateſt importāce) they were alſo noriſhed in ſecret with certein ſuccors, but with far greater hopes, by the Duke Valētynois: Ambition hath infinit operatiōs, & in this abuſeth

" thimaginatiōs of men, that it makes thē ſeeme able to hold thoſe things which they " can not gripe, & raiſeth their mynds to cōceiue matters aboue their power or poſſi-
" bilitie: For the Duke, in whō had long raged a deſire to make him ſelf Lord of that citie, & in other times had abſteined for feare of the kings diſpleaſure, tooke now thaduaūtage of the time, & preſuming much by the infelicitie of the frēch in the realme of Naples, he ioyned to him the cōſent of his father, & treated with the Piſan Embaſſadours whom they had ſent to Rome for that purpoſe, to accept the iuriſdiction aſpiring by that meane to occupie all Tuskane: A deuiſe which albeit brought the Florentyns and Sxennois into no ſmall ſuſpicion of him, yet thuniuerſall benefit being hindred by their perticularities, there was no proceeding to that vnitie which the french king propoūded betweene the Florentyns, the Bollonois, & the Siennois, for that they of Florence refuſed to accept it if they were not repoſſeſſed of Mont Pulcian as had bene ſolicited & promiſed from the beginning: And Pandolfe who bare a minde eſtraunged from it (albeit he made other ſhowe) alleaged that to reſtore it, would ſo ſtirre vp the hate of the people of Sienna againſt him, that he ſhould be conſtrained yet once againe to forſake the towne, and therefore he ſaide it was better (for the common benefite) to deferre it as yet, till time brought about a better occaſion, thē in reſtoring it preſently to further the Duke Valentynois with meanes to occupie Sienna: By theſe meanes, denying nothing he kept things in longnes and delaies ſeeking to leaue the Florentyns contented with hopes in ſtead of effects: Which excuſes by thē reiected were accepted & beleeued in the Court of Fraunce, by the meane of Frauncis de Naruy reſident at Sienna by the kings commaundement.

But it was not thintention of the Pope and Valentynois to put theſe enterpriſes

prises to executiō, otherwayes then the proceeding of tharmie which the king prepared, gaue them courage, and induced them by occasions to sticke more to the one king then to the other: Whereuppon in that tyme they stoode in suspencion & variation of thonghtes, deferting asmuche as they could the declaration of their intencion, which bare no fauour or inclination to the Frenche King further then there was feare to constraine them, for that thexperience of thinges passed in Bologna and Tuskane, tooke away all hope to attempt greater matters with his fauour: And for that reason, as they had begunne affore the victorie of the Spanyards to become more and more seperate from him in will: So after the victorie, rising in impudencie and weening, they respected no more (as they were wont to doe) neither his will nor his authoritie, his aduersities disclosing their corruptions, which in his prosperities he rather suspected then discerned: And albeit, immediatly after the ouerthrowes of the Frenche, they gaue assurance to embrace the kinges quarrels, making demonstration to enterteine men to send to the realme of Naples: Yet, what by the ambition of new conquests, and greedie eyes they cast vppon the riches of Tuskane, the king requiring that they would declare themselues openly for him, the Pope answered in suche miserie and doubt, that by howe much lesse they were innocent in wordes or meaning, by so muche more it was seasonable in the king to suspect them: Their simulation and dissimulation being so notable, that it was a prouerbe ordinarie in Rome, that the Pope neuer did that which he saide, and the Duke seldome spake that which hee ment: Besides the contention wherein they were with Iohn Iordan was not yet determined; For, albeit Valentynois fearing the kinges displeasure, abstained to molest him vppon his maiesties commaundement: Yet the Pope declaring howe muche that greeued him, ceassed not to solicit the king to suffer him either by armes to reconquer the estates of Iohn Iordan, or els by some other degree of compulsion to see that he had recompense for them: Giuing to vnderstande that that which moued him was not ambition, but a iust feare of his neighbourhead, proceeding vppon this suspition, that finding amongst the papers of Cardinall Vrsin a blanke signed with the proper hande of Iohn Iordan, it was an argumēt, that in those things which were negociated at Maisons, he had one self will and intelligēce against him with the Vrsins: In which thing the king more regarding profit thē honestie, had proceeded diuersly according to the diuersitie of times, somtimes expressing fauour to Iohn Iordan as before, and somtimes inclining to satisfie the Pope in some degree: And for that cause Iohn Iordan refusing to depose Braccia-no into the hands of the French Embassador resident at Rome, the king required that they should reappose vppō him the resolution of the differēce vnder cōdition, that Iohn Iordan should be cōueied into Fraūce within two moneths, & that things should remeine in that estate vntil he had determined: Wherunto as Iohn Iordan consented by necessitie, hoping through his owne merits & thexspectatiō he had of his father and him, to be fully deliuered from such vexations: So also in the Pope appeared no resistāce, more for feare then otherwise, for that the french king required such a matter in a time whē Tharchduke cōtracted the peace in the name of the kings of Spain: But the condition of things being chaunged by the victorie of the Spanyardes, and seeing with all that the french king had neede of him, he demaunded all the estates of Iohn Iordan, offring the recompence that should be declared by the king, who for the same occasiō induced Iohn Iordan to consent therunto, & to promise to deliuer in his sonne for the assurance of that which should bee determined: A matter which the king did greatly against his wil, for that he had no intentiō to deliuer vp those estates to the Pope, if at the ſame inſtant, he ioyned not with him openly in the warre of Naples, holding it as reaſonable for him as for the Pope, to take the aduantage of things, and to ſerue his turne of controuerſies: But they of Petillano where the ſonne of Iohn Iordan was, refuſing to deliuer him to the kinges Embaſſadour who was gone to Port Hercules to receiue him, Iohn Iordan him ſelfe being then returned, went to Thembaſſadour, and to fulfill the promiſe of his faith, offred him his proper perſon, which Thembaſſadour accepted with litle reputation, and with leſſe diſcretion beſtowed him in a ſhip; but aſſoone as the king knewe it, he cauſed him to bee ſet at libertie, eſteeming it an iniurie diſhonorable to doe iuſtice vppon him for the diſobedience of others.

The Fr. king prepares mightely againſt the K. of Spaine.

In this meane while, there was vſed a generall diligence to leauie the preparations which the french king ment to emploie both on thiſſide & beyond the mounts: For, the Lorde D'albert and the Mareſhall of Gie, were gone into Guien with foure hundred Launces, and fiue thouſande footemen aſwell Suyzzers as Gaſcoins, to make warre on the part of Fontarabye: And to ſtirre vp the Countie of Roſſillion, the Mareſhall of Rieux was ſent into Languedocke with eight hundred Launces and eighe thouſande footemen, parte Suyzzers and parte French: And at the ſame time the Nauie by ſea hoyſed ſayle to endomage the coaſtes of Catelogne and the realme of Valence: Beſides, the king had diſpatched for Italy with title of Capteine generall ouer his armie, the Lorde Trymouille (to whom was transferred by vniuerſall opinion the whole merit and reputation for matters of warre, within the realme of France) and ſent with the ſame expedition, the Baily of Dyon to diſpatche eight thouſande Suyzzers, the men at armes alſo and the footmen making haſt to marche notwithſtanding the armie was not ſo ſtrong as was determined in the beginning: Perhaps the king would haue it ſo, not for diſhabilitie, or for that he would ſpare, but for that he deſired that they might make the more expedition into the kingdome of Naples, & partly becauſe Monſr D'alegro aduertiſing the king of the ſtate of thaffaires there, aſſured him that the remeynder of the armie was ſtronger then it was in deede, both for that the townes and Barons remeined firme in his deuocion, and alſo he had demaunded ſuccours of all thoſe in Italy which fauoured his faction: By which meane and induſtrie, the Florentyns had graunted him the Baily of Caen with the fiftie Launces paied of their owne money, and an hundred and fiftie other men at armes: The Duke of Ferrara alſo and the Bollonoys, with the Marquis of Mantua (who for that the king ſent to him, went to him in perſon) did refurniſhe him euery one in perticular with an hundred men at armes, and they of Sienna with an other hundred: Which bandes, ioyned to the eight hundred Launces & fiue thouſand Gaſcoins which Trymouille brought into Italy, and to the eight thouſand Suyzzers which were exſpected, reckoning alſo thoſe that remeined within Caietta, made vp the number of a thouſand eight hundred Launces French and Italian, & more then eightiene thouſande footemen: Beſides theſe preparations for the warre by lande, the armie by ſea was departed, a Nauie ſtrong and glorious: In ſo muche as all men confeſſed that there was no memorie that any Frenche king had euer made ſo huge and mightie preparations (making diſtinction of the forces both by ſea and by land, gathered aſwell on thiſſide as beyond the mountes): But it was not thought good for the kings ſuertie, to ſuffer his armie to paſſe by Rome, if firſt his maieſtie were not well aſſured of the Pope and Duke Valentynois, for that he had iuſt occaſion to doubt of them for many reaſons and many demonſtrations, but ſpecially by the teſtimonie of certeine letters from Valentynois to Conſaluo newly ſurcepted, wherein was debated betweene them

them that if Conſalue tooke Caietto (in which caſe he ſhould ſtande well aſſured of all the matters of the kingdome) he ſhould paſſe further with his armie, and Valentynois ſhould take vppon him the iuriſdiction of Piſa, and ſo they both to ioyne in one ſtrength to aſſaile Tuskan: In which reſpect, the king, his armie being alreadie paſſed into Lumbardy, was very importunate that they ſhould at laſt, declare their vttermoſt intencion, holding it better to know them as they were, then to doubt them to bee more or leſſe then he ſhould finde them: And for their partes, albeit they liſtned to both partes, and treated with euerie one, yet, iudging that the tyme was conuenient to make traffike of the trauelles of an other, their deſires caried them moſt to ioyne with the Spanyſhe: But they were reſtrained againe with the conſideration of this manifeſt daunger, leaſt the frenche armie woulde begyn to inuade their eſtates, in which caſe they ſhould feele domage and diſpleaſure, where they hoped to reape rewardes and greatnes: In this eſtate of doubt and inceriteintie of inclination, they ſuffred both partes to leauie apparantly bandes of footemen within Rome, deferring as much as they could to declare them ſelues: But being at laſt in tearmes reſolute vged by the king, they offred that the Duke ſhould be ioyned to his armie with fiue hundred men at armes and two thouſand footemen, the king conſenting not only to the occupying of the lands of Iohn Iordan, but alſo to the conquering of Sienna: And yet when they were vppon the point of concluſion, they varied, introducing newe difficulties, as men, who (according to their cuſtome) to be at libertie to take counſell of the euent of things, had no deſire to declare them ſelues according to good meaning: And therefore there was propounded an other nature of practiſe, by the which the Pope ſeeming not to declare for any of the parties, but to remeine in the perſon of a common father, conſented to giue paſſage to the french armie through the dominions of the Church, with promiſe not to moleſt neither the Florentyns, the Siennois, nor the Bollonois during the warres in the realme of Naples: Which conditions had at length bene accepted by the king, to thende to giue expedition of paſſage to his armie to Naples, albeit he knew they were neither honorable for him ſelf, nor ſure for ſuche as depended on him in Italy, ſeeing he had no aſſurance that the Pope and Valentynois would not declare againſt him, if any misfortune hapned to him in the realme: Beſides there was this daunger leaſt aſſoone as his armie was out of the territories of Rome, they would not riſe contrary to their faith, to aſſaile Tuskan, which for the diſagreement of the people, and the numbers of men which hee had drained out of it, was become weake and almoſt diſarmed, being a thing not vnlikely that he would either ſet vppon that enterpriſe or ſome other, ſeeing they had ſo long tyme exſpected occaſions, thinking to draw out of them a wonderful profit.

But as the cogitations of men are vaine, and their thoughtes full of deceipt: So, when they ſtoode in the higheſt eſtate of their hopes, beholde the Pope who went to ſupper in a Vineyarde neare the Vatican to reioyce in the delight and pleaſure of the freſhe ayre, is ſodeinly caried for dead to the Biſhoppes Pallaice, his ſonne alſo communicating in the ſame accident but with better fortune: For the daie folowing which was the eightiene day of Auguſt, the dead corps of the Pope (according to cuſtome) was borne into the Church of S. Peter, blacke, ſwolne, and moſt difformed, moſt manifeſt ſignes of poiſon: But Valentynous what by the vigour & ſtrength of his youth, and readie helpe of ſtrong medecines and contrepoiſons, had his lyfe ſaued, remeining notwithſtanding oppreſſed with a long and greeuous ſicknes: It was aſſuredly beleeued that thaccident proceeded of poiſon, the diſcourſe whereof according to common reapport was in this ſort: The Duke Valentynois, who was to bee preſent at that ſupper, had determined to poiſon Adrian Cardinall of Cornette, reſeruing that tyme and place to execute his bloudie reſolution: For it is moſt certeine that in his father and him were naturall cuſtomes to vſe poiſon, not only to be reuenged of their enemies, or to bee aſſured of ſuſpitions, but alſo vppon a wicked couetouſnes to diſpoile rich men of their goods, whether they were Cardinalles or Courtiers, although they had neuer done them wrong, as hapned to the Cardinall Saint Ange who was verie riche: This maner of rage they would vſe alſo agaynſt their greateſt friendes and familiars, and ſuche as had bene their moſt faithfull ſeruantes, ſuch as were the Cardinalles of Capua and Modeno: A recompenſe vnworthie the merits of good men, and not diſagreeable to the diſpoſition of ſuch a father and ſonne, wherof the one made all things lawfull by vile diſpenſation, and with the other nothing was diſhoneſt wherin was oportunitie to his purpoſes: The Duke Valentynois ſent before certeine Flagons with wine infected with poiſon, which he gaue to a ſeruant that knew nothing of the matter, commaunding that no perſon ſhoulde touche them: A commaundement preiudiciall to his maiſter, as the ignorance of the ſeruant was thinſtrument in the euill that hapned both to the father and ſonne.

" Such is the ſuffrance of God, who in the execution of his iudgementes, raiſeth one " murderer to kill an other, & breaketh the brandes of the fyre vppon the head of him
" that firſt kindled it: For, the Pope comming by aduenture ſomewhat before ſupper, and ouercome with the drought & immoderate heat of the tyme, called for drinke: And becauſe his owne prouiſion was not yet brought from the Pallaice, he that had the infected wine in charge, thinking it to bee recommended to his keeping for a wine moſt excellent, gaue the Pope to drinke of the ſame wine which Valentynois had ſent: Who arriuing whileſt his father was drinking drunke alſo of the ſame wine, being but iuſt that they both ſhould taſte of the ſame cup which they had brued for the deſtruction of others: All the towne of Rome runne with great gladnes to Saint Peters about the dead bodie of the Pope, their eyes not being ſatisfied to ſee dead and deſtroied a Serpent, who with his immoderate ambition and poiſoned infidelitie, together with all the horrible examples of crueltie, luxurie, and monſtruous couetouſnes, ſelling without diſtinction both holie thinges and prophane thinges, had infected the whole world: And yet was accompanied with a moſt rare and almoſt perpetuall proſperitie euen from his young age to the ende of his lyfe, deſiring alwayes great things, and obteining moſt often that he deſired: An example of much importance to confound the arrogancie of thoſe men who preſuming to know and ſee perfectly with humain eyes the depth of Gods iudgements, do aſſure, that what hapneth either good or ill to mortall men, proceedeth either of their merites or faltes: As though we ſawe not daily many good men vniuſtly tormented, and many wicked perſons aboue their deſeruings liue in eaſe & honour: Wherein who makes an other interpretation, derogates the iuſtice and power of God, the greatnes of which being not to bee conteined within any ſcriptes or tearmes preſent, knoweth howe well and largely to diſcerne in an other tyme and place, the iuſt from the vniuſt and that with rewardes and eternall puniſhments.

The Duke Valentynois no leſſe ſorowfull for the death of his father, then languiſhing in his owne infirmitie, retyred all his bandes of men of warre about him, lying ſicke in the Pallaice: And hauing alwayes thought, partly by the feare of his armes, & partly through the fauour of the Spaniſh Cardinals which were eleué, to create a Pope at his pleaſure after the death of his father: He founde nowe impediments aboue his exſpectation, ſpecially in the matter of the election, & all his other

plottes and deuiſes to ſuffer imperfection and errour by reaſon of his diſeaſe which was verie daungerous: In which reſpect he complained greeuouſly, for that hauing oftentimes foreſeene all the accidents that might happen to him by the death of his father, and withall caſt all the remedies that the witte of man might comprehende, yet he could neuer imagine that at the ſame time he ſhould be reſtrained with a ſickneſs ſo daungerous: And therefore finding it neceſſarie to frame his councelles, not to the plottes he had layde before, but to the neceſſitie preſent: He ſawe he was not hable in one tyme to ſuſteine the hatred of the Colonnois and Vrſins, and fearing leaſt they ſhould ioyne in conſpiracie againſt him, he reſolued to reappoſe rather in thoſe whom he had offended only in their goods, then to truſt to the behauiour of ſuch as he had greeued both in their goods and perſons: And in that minde he procured readie reconcilement with the Colonnois and ſuch of the Vale as folowed that faction, he inuited them to returne eſtſoones to their eſtates, and made reſtitution of the Caſtles which Alexander with great expenſes had fortefied and enlarged, the alteration and feare of the tyme compelling him to doe more then any regarde to honour, equitie, conſcience, or religion: All which notwithſtanding, ſufficed not neither for his ſuertie, nor to keepe the towne of Rome in peace, wherein all thinges were full of ſuſpicions and tumultes, for that both Proſper Colonno was entred and all that faction had taken armes: And alſo Fabio Vrſin comming euen to the houſes of the famylie of Mont Iordan, had with a great multitude of his partakers ſet a fire certeine marchands ſhoppes and the houſes of many Spaniſh Courtiers, a nation generally enuyed by the memorie of thinſolencies which they had done during the Popedom of Alexander: Beſides, Fabio thirſting after the bloud of Valentynois, made great leauies of forreine ſouldiours, and ſolicited Bartlemevv Aluiano being then in the paie of the Venetians, to ioyne with him and his houſe in the reuenge of ſo many wrongs as he had don them, thinking it but iuſt to raiſe violence againſt him, whoſe furie had not ſpared to perſecute them and their friendes with all ſortes of oppreſſion and ruines: The ſubburbes and meadowes ſo ſwarmed with the men of warre of Valentynois, that the Cardinals ſeeing no reaſon of ſuertie to aſſemble at the Biſhops Pallaice, drewe together at the couent of the Church of Minerua, at which place (contrary to the auncient cuſtome) they began, but farre later thē they were wont, to doe the funerall of Alexander: The trouble and mutinie of the tymē preſent not only deferring the celebration of the obſequies, but alſo ſomewhat derogating the ceremonie, detecting in thoſe laſt actions the abhominable and infamous lyfe of him in whoſe regard they were done: It was much feared leaſt Conſaluo would come to Rome, ſpecially for that Proſper Colonno had left at Marina, a certeine number of Spaniſh ſoldiours, and for the reconciliation of Valentynois with the Colonnois, it was beleeued that he had an intention to folow the Spaniſh faction: But greater were the feares of the comming of the french armie, which had marched ſlowly till that day, for that in the publike councelles of the Svvyzzers (being not a litle amazed for the ill fortune of the French in the realme of Naples) it was doubted affore the contract, that the king could not make leauie of their men, and all the Capteynes and footemen choſen together had refuſed for the ſame occaſion, the ſame being the cauſe that they were not ſo readie, and that they made long aboade by the wayes: But in reſpect of the Popes death, the armie which was gouerned by the Marquis of Mantua with title of the kings Lieftenant, and by the Baily of Caen, & Monſr de Sandricourt, in whom except the name, remeyned as much power as in the General, for that Trimouille remeined ſicke at Parma: Was come without tarying for the Svvyz-

zers, to the territories of Sienna, with intencion to goe to Rome according to the direction of the king, who also had commaunded the Nauie which was at Caietta to make saile to Ostia, to giue impediment to Consaluo for going to Rome with his armie to compel the Cardinals to chuse a Pope at his deuotiō: Notwithstanding the frēch armie remeined certeyne dayes betweene Boncouent and Viterbe, for that the marchands making difficultie for the trobled tyme that was at Rome to accept the billes of exchaunge that were sent out of Fraunce, the Swyzzers now comē into the coūtrey of Sienna, refused to march further if they were not paied: In this tyme the tumultes were no lesse in the territorie of Rome, with many other places through the estate of the Church and the landes of Valentynois, for that the Vrsins and all the Romish Barons restored them selues to their estates: The familie of Vitelli were returned to Citta de Castello, & Iohn Pavvle Baillon vnder hope of a certeine intelligence, had assailed Perousa: In which action albeit he was put to the chase by his enemies and constrained to go his way, yet being refurnished with new bands and open succours of the Florentyns, he entred the towne in a braue and resolute assalt not without the slaughter of his enemies and some losse of his owne companie: The towne of Plombyn also tooke armes, which albeit they of Sienna laboured to vsurp and occupie, yet the auncient Lorde returned thether by the fauour of the Florentyns: The Duke of Vrbyn, the Lordes of Pesere, of Camerin, and Sini Gale, did the lyke in theyr estates: Only Romagnia (notwithstanding they were not without suspicion of the Venetians who leauyed great bandes of men at Rauenna) remeyned quiet and inclined to the deuotion of Valentynois, knowing by experience howe much it was more tollerable and better for the weale of the countrey to serue one only and mightie Lord, then to haue in euerie towne Lords perticular, who neither for their weaknes could defende them, nor for their pouertie, were able to doe them good, but rather when they founde their reuenues insufficient to enterteine them, they would be constrained to oppresse them: They considered also that, for the authoritie and greatnes of the Valentynous, and for the good iustice he ministred amongst them, their countrey was not vexed with so many mutinies and tumults of factions as it was wont to bee, bringing ordinarie slaughters to their friendes and cohabitants: Besides, they drew into consideration the benefites that he had done for many, together with the great friendshippes he had gotten, by enterteining and giuing paie to suche as had bene trained in armes, by distributing offices to men able and sufficient, and also by soliciting his father on the behalfe of Prelates and Church men touching the collation of benefices and spirituall dignities: Out of these respectes they tooke occasion of firmnes, that neither thexamples of others that reuolted, nor the memorie of their auncient Lordes, could not estraunge them from Valentynois: Who albeit he stood oppressed with many difficulties, & lesse expectation of habilitie in a state so pluckt and broken, yet was he laboured vnto both by the French and Spanish, & with many offers and promises importunatly solicited to bee on their side: For that besides the oportunitie of his forces and men of warre, they hoped by this meane to winne the voyces of the Spanish Cardinals in the election to bee made: But the Duke looking wisely into the state of his affaires, tooke councel of the inclination of the time, and refused to follow the fancies of men: And albeit for the reconcilement that was made with the Colonnois, it was beleeued that he would be declared for the Spanish, yet being induced to that reconcilement only by feare least they would ioyne with the Vrsins, he declared now that he would doe nothing contrarie to his fidelitie to the French, whom he determined to folow, for that, both within the towne of Rome

which the kings armie did nowe approach, and alſo in his other eſtates, they might doe him more good and harme then the Spaniſhe: In ſo muche as the firſt daie of September he made a conuention with the Cardinall S. Seuerin and Monſr de Trans the kings Embaſſadour, by the which he promiſed to aide him with his ſoldiours in thenterpriſe of Naples, and in all other expeditions againſt all perſons except the Church: And on the other parte, the kinges Agentes bounde the king to the protection aſwell of his perſon, as of all the eſtates he poſſeſſed, and to concurre alſo in the recouerie of thoſe which hee had loſt: Beſides theſe, the Duke gaue hopes to drawe the moſt parte of the Spaniſh Cardinals to giue their voyce to the Cardinall of Amboyſe, who puffed vp with a proude hope to obteine the Popedome with authoritie, with money, & with the armies of his king, went immediatly out of Fraũce after the Popes death to Rome, carying with him the Cardinall of Aragon & the Cardinall Aſcanius: Him he had deliuered two yeares before out of the Towre of Bourges, and giuen him honourable countenance in the Court, hoping that if the Pope ſhould dye, his auncient reputation might doe much to further his ambicion, together with the many friendes & fauourers which he had in the Court of Rome: Foundations verie weake to beare ſo high and waightie a purpoſe, for that neither Valentynois could wholy diſpoſe the Spaniſh Cardinals more inclined (according to the cuſtome of men) to their proper profite, then to reacknowledge the good turnes that his father and he had done to them, and withall, many amongſt them, hauing regarde not to offende the mynde of their king, would not haue bene ſo farre ouerſeene, as to chuſe for Pope, a French Cardinall: Neither yet Aſcanius, if he had had any power or place in thelection, would haue conſented to lift to the ſupreme ſeat the Cardinall of Amboyſe, for that it was to the perpetuall embaſing and cutting of of all the hopes that yet remeined aſwell to him as to thoſe of his houſe.

Cardinall of Amboiſe aſpireth to the Popedome.

They deferred yet thelection of the new Pope: Not only for that it was later then was wont, ere they beganne to celebrate the obſequies of the dead, till the ending of which (enduring for the moſt part nine dayes) the Cardinals haue no cuſtome to enter into the conclaue or houſe of election: But alſo, the better to cut of occaſions and daungers of a ſciſme in ſo great a confuſion of affaires, and important diuiſion of Princes, the Cardinalles that were preſent had agreed to giue aduertiſement to thoſe that were abſent to make their repaire: And when they were come, the Colledge neuertheleſſe was holden in ſuſpence ſuſpecting that thelection woulde not be free, aſwell for the bandes of Valentynois, as for that the French armie which at laſt was drawne betweene Nepi and the Ile with intention to come to Rome, refuſed to paſſe the ryuer of Tyber, if affore hande there were not choſen a newe Pope: They feared that either the contrary parte would ouerrule the Colledge in thelection, or els ſuche was the deuiſe of Cardinall Amboyſe, no leſſe for the ſuertie of his perſon, then hoping to bee the better fauoured: Theſe thinges, after many contencions (the Colledge refuſing otherwayes to enter into the conclaue) were at laſt reſolued and tooke forme, for that the Cardinall of Amboyſe gaue his faith to the whole Court of Cardinals, that the French armie ſhould not paſſe Nepi & the Yle, the Valentynois conſenting to goe to Nepi and afterwards to Ciuita Caſtellano, hauing ſent to the French Camp two hundred men at armes and three hundred light horſmen vnder the leading of Lodouvyk de la Mirandola and Alexander de Tryvulce: But the Colledge erected many bandes of footemen for the garde of Rome, and gaue power to three Prelates whom they had appointed for the garde of the Conclaue, to open it if they diſcerned ſedition or tumult, to thend that all the Cardinals being in libertie to go whither they will, euery one might be out of hope to force them. At laſt the Cardinals entred the Conclaue, beeing xxxviij. in number, where the diſagreement which in other times was wont to kepe things in delay, was the cauſe nowe that they entred roundly into thaction, and created in fewe daies a new Pope: And albeit in the election they had muche to do to agree vppon the perſon, aſwell for their generall couetouſneſſe, as for the contention betweene the Cardinals depending of the French king, and the Spaniſhe Cardinals embracing the faction of the king of Spayne. And albeit they were no leſſe amaſed with the preſent daunger wherein they ſtoode, all things in Rome beeing full of ſuſpition and tumult, then with the conſideration of thaccidents which in a time ſo troubled might happen by the vacation of the Sea: yet at laſt, euen by the conſent of the Cardinall of Amboyſe, in whom fayled euery day all hope to be elected, they created for Pope Fraunciſ Piccolomini Cardinall of Sienna, in whome was no expectation of long life, both for his extreme age, and preſent ſickneſſe: A Cardinall ſure of vnſpotted reapport, and for his other conditions, not vnworthy that degree, who, to renewe the memorie of Pius ſecundus his vncle, tooke vpon him the name of Pius the thirde.

Fraunciſ Piccolomini made pope.

Aſſoone as the Pope was created, the Frenche armie had no further occaſion to abide there, and falling ſpeedily into the way that had bene agreed vppon before, they paſſed ſodenly the riuer of Tyber: but neither for the creation of the Pope, nor for the diſcamping of the armie, the tumultes at Rome did not appeaſe, for that becauſe there was expectation for the comming of Aluiano and Iohn Paule Baylon, who conſpiring together, made leauies of men in Peruſa. Valentynois continuing as yet ſicke, and fearing their comming, was returned to Rome with an hundred and fiftie men at armes, the like numbers of light horſemen, and eyght hundred footemen, hauing obteined ſafconduit of the Pope, who hoped that he might the eaſelyer put ende to thoſe things by ſome compoſition. But the Valentynois beeing within one towne and walles, with the Vrſins, who luſted in a iuſt thirſt after his bloud, the Vrſins, by the oportunitie of newe bandes ariuing, notwithſtanding they demaunded of the Pope and College of Cardinals a ſhort and readie iuſtice, determined to be reuenged vpon him with armes, aſſoone as Iohn Paule Baillon and Aluiano were ariued: by reaſon of theſe conſpiring intentions, there was alſo ſome controuerſie betweene the towne and them of the ſuburbes where Valentynois was lodged: a contention which troubled not onely the people of Rome, and the court, but alſo was ſuppoſed to bring great preiudice to thaffayres of the Frenche, for that the Vrſins, aſſoone as they were once diſpatched of the quarrell agaynſt Valentynois, preparing to go to the pay eyther of the Frenche or Spaniſhe king, and iudging that their ſtrength was of no little importaunce to the victorie, they were ſought to by both partes with ample conditions. But bearing a naturall diſpoſition to the parte of the Frenche, the Cardinall of Amboyſe enterteyned in the kings name Iulio Vrſin, who contracted for all thoſe of his familie, except Aluiano, for whom was reſerued place, with honorable conditions: but his comming reuerſed all: for, albeit in the beginning he was almoſt agreed with the Cardinall of Amboyſe, yet, couetouſneſſe ouercomming his inclination, and beeing in one moment reſtrayned with the Spaniſh Embaſſadour, he entred paye with the king of Spayne with fyue hundred men at armes, and prouiſion of lx. thouſande duckets yerely, aſſuring him ſelfe of all thoſe of his familie, except Iohn Iordan: to which deliberation he was chiefly induced (as he frankly confeſſed) by deſpite that the Cardinall of Amboyſe, burning more and more in ambition to be Pope, fauoured Valentynois, hoping by his meane

to obteine the moſt parte of the voyces of the Spaniſh Cardinals: notwithſtanding that the Cardinall clearing him ſelfe of the fault by tranſferring it to an other, gaue out that he was perſuaded that the Venetians were authors of it, who, for the deſire they had that the French king ſhould not obteine the realme of Naples, had not only conſented that he ſhould leaue their paye, promiſing to reſerue for him the ſame place: but alſo to thende the firſt paymentes ſhould be more ready, they had lent to the Spaniſh Embaſſadours fifteene thouſand duckets: A matter, which though it be not in euery part certeine, yet it can not be denied that the Venetian Embaſſador did not manifeſtly intrude himſelfe into that practiſe. Some were of opinion that the conditions & large offers of the Spaniards, were the cauſe, for that they bound them ſelues to diſtribute eſtates in the kingdome aſwel to him as to al thoſe of his familie, and to indue his brother with reuenues eccleſiaſticall: And laſtly (which he eſtemed much) to ayde him when the warre was finiſhed, with two thouſande Spaniſh footmen, in thenterpriſe which he determined agaynſt the Florentins in the fauour of Peter de Medicis. It was beleued that Iohn Paule Bayllon comen now to Rome with Aluiano, and who folowing his example treated at one time with the French and with the Spaniſh, would alſo accompany him in the ſame deliberation: but the Cardinall d'Amboyſe, not a little amaſed that Thurſins had left the king, (a dealing whiche made doubtfull the hopes of the Frenche beeing afore almoſte certayne,) intertey-ned him immediatly into the kings ſeruice with an hundred and fiftie men at armes: he almoſt accorded whatſoeuer the other demaunded, but al vnder the name of the Florentins, for that Iohn Paule would it ſo, to thende to be more aſſured of his paies, which were to be rebated of the ſummes they ought to the king by vertue of their conuentions, he beeing more curious to prouide for the ſuretie of his paie, then carefull to keepe his fidelitie with the king for the ſeruice that was required: for, being returned to Perouſa to put his people in order, and receiuing xiiij. thouſand duckets, he was cõtented to gouerne himſelf more according to the ſucceſſe of the time & cõmon euent of things, and by his paſſions & perticuler intereſts, thẽ according to the reputation & faith of ſouldiours. In which reſpects deferring with many excuſes to go to the French armie, he would not depart frõ Perouſa: A matter which the cardinal Amboyſe ſuppoſed to procede vpõ this, that Iohn Paule imitating the incõſtancy of the captains of Italie of that time, had frõ the houre he was interteined, made promiſe to Barthelmevv Aluiano & the Spaniards to do ſo, as holding that moſt reſonable & indifferent for him to do, wherin was moſt ſurety for his pay & ſafety, A maner of dealing familiar with mẽ that be mercenarie, but far frõ thoſe that hold deare eyther honor or reputation. Aſſone as the Vrſins were entred into the pay of the Spaniſhe, peace proceded betwene thẽ & the Colonnois, reſolued & ſet down at the ſame inſtãt in the lodging of the Spaniſh embaſſadour: to whõ & to the Venetian agent they referred the reſolutiõ of al their differẽces. The agremẽt of thoſe houſes brought no litle feare to Valẽtynois, for that being determined to leaue Rome, & preparing to go to Bracciana, Iohn Iordan hauing giuẽ his fayth to the Cardinall of Amboyſe to leade him thither in ſuretie: Iohn Paule & the Vrſins were determined to aſſaile him, who hauing no meane to enter into the ſuburbs by the gate of the caſtle S. Angeo, they iſſued out of Rome, & fetching a lõg circuit to come to the gate Torrono, they found it ſhut, and burnt it, finding nothing to reſiſt the fury of their reuenge prouoked by ſo iuſt occaſions. Aſſone as they were entred the gate, they begon to skirmiſh with certein horſmen of Valentynois, to whoſe ſuccors albeit many of the french ſouldiers did run who were not yet departed out of Rome: yet what by the increaſing of the numbers of his enemies,& their rage redubling,& his own people(whoſe ſtrength was much diminiſhed afore) making ſignes to abandon him,the neceſſitie of his peril conſtrayned him together with the prince of Squillace & certayne Spaniſh Cardinals,to ſeke his ſafetie within the pallace of Vatican, frō whēce he retyred with a fearefull ſpede into the caſtle S. Angeo,hauing by the Popes conſent, receiued fayth of the captayne of the caſtell(who was the ſame that had that charge in the dayes of the dead Pope)to ſuffer him to go out when he would:al his people fled whither their feare or fortune would leade them.In this garboyle the baylife of Caen was lightly hurt,and the Cardinall of Amboyſe had no little feare: but the matter of quarrell being taken away by this accident,the tumults alſo were immediatly appeaſed within the towne of Rome. In ſo much as they began all in peace to prepare for the election of a newe Pope,for that Pius, not beguiling the hopes which the Cardinals conceyued of him at the time of his creation,the xxvj. day after his election, paſſed into a better life.

Valentynois diſtreſſed by the Vrſins.

Pope Pius the thirde dieth.

After the death of Pius,the Cardinalles deferring for certayne dayes to enter the Conclaue: (for, they thought good that Thurſins afore ſhould iſſue out of Rome, where they yet remayned to refurniſh the numbers which they ſhould leade to the Spaniſh armie) reſolued vpon the election out of the Conclaue. And the Cardinall S. Petri Ad vincla mighty in frends,reputatiō,& riches,had drawn to him the voices of ſo many Cardinals,that entring the conclaue,he was with an example all new & without ſhutting the conclaue,elected Pope the ſame night,(thoſe that were of the contrary opinion not daring to oppoſe againſt him.)He,either hauing regard to his firſt name of Iulio, or (as coniectures were made) to ſignifie the greatnes of his conceptions,or laſtly bicauſe he would not giue place to Alexander,no not in the excellencie of name,tooke vpon him the name of Iulio,the ſecond of that name. Amongſt all the Popes that had paſſed,it was wondred that by ſo great conſent,they had created for Pope,a Cardinall who was knowen to be of a diſpoſition rigorous & terrible, and in whom was no expectation of reſt and trāquilitie, hauing conſumed his youth in continuall trauels, offended many by neceſſitie, & exerciſed hatreds agaynſt many great perſonages, a man to whoſe wit nothing was more familiar, then thinuention of trouble,faction,and conſpiracie. But on the other ſide,the cauſes of his election to that degree, appeared clearly, and ſurmounted all other difficulties: for, he had bene of long time a Cardinall of great power and might,and with his magnificence,wherin he had always exceeded the reſidue,and with the greatnes of his ſpirit by the which he did great things,he had not only made himſelfe mightie in opinion and frendes,but by times & degrees had erected high his authoritie in the Court of Rome, bearing the name, title, and dignitie of the principall defender of the eccleſiaſtike libertie: But that which ſerued moſt in his aduauncement, was the promiſes immoderate and infinite whiche he made to the Cardinals,Princes,and Barons, and to all others whom he might make profitable to him in that action. Beſides he had the meane to diſtribute money,benefices, and ſpirituall dignities, aſwell ſuch as were his owne,as thoſe that were the rightes of others,for that ſuche was the bruite and renowne of his liberalitie, that many made willing offers to him to diſpoſe as he beſt liked of their treaſures, their names, their offices, and benefices. They conſidered not that his promiſes were farre to great then that beeing Pope, he was eyther hable or ought to obſerue, for that he had of ſo long continuaunce enioyed the name of iuſt and vpright, that Pope Alexander him ſelfe his greateſt enemie,ſpeaking ill on him,in al other things could not but cōfeſſe him to be true of his word: A praiſe which he made no care to defile & ſtaine,to thende to become Pope, Cardinall S. Petri Ad vincla made Pope.

knowing that no man more easily beguileth an other, then he that hath the custome and name neuer to deceiue any. The Cardinall of Amboyse cõsented to this election for that dispayring to obteine the Popedome for himselfe, he hoped, that in the new Pope would be recontinued in time to come those degrees and properties of amitie which he had alwayes borne to the king his maister: vsing this wisdome to seeme to beare that with liking and contentment, which he could not hinder by any deuise or power. The Cardinall Askanius gaue also his franke consent, beeing reconciled to him before, and treading vnder feete the memorie of all auncient contentions that had bene betweene them, at suche time as afore the Popedome of Alexander, they folowed the court of Rome in the persons of Cardinals: for, hauing better experience of his disposition then the Cardinall of Amboyse, thought, that beeing ascended to the Popedome, he should haue the same vnquietnes, or rather greater, then he had had in a meaner fortune, together with such cõceptions as might be able to opẽ to him a way to recouer the duchie of Millan. In like sort the Spanish Cardinals yelded their consent, notwithstanding in the beginning they shewed no inclination. But seing there was such a concurrance of others, and fearing not to be sufficient enough to let his election, they iudged it more conuenient for their suretie, to holde him appeased in consenting, then to stir him to anger in refusing, somewhat affying themselues in the great promises he made to them, and for the rest, induced by the persuacions and requests of Valentynois, whose condition stoode so enuironed with calamities, that he was constrayned to folow euery daungerous counsel. He was also no lesse abused then the others with the hopes that he gaue him: for that he promised him to make a mariage betweene his daughter & his nephew Frauncis Maria de la Rouere prefect of Rome, to confirme him captaine of the armies of the Churche. And which was of greatest importance, to ioyne to his ayde in the recouery of the townes of Romania. All which, except the Castels, were almost withdrawne from his obedience. The affayres of which prouince, full of innouations and chaunges, troubled with diuers thoughtes the spirite of the Pope, both for that he knewe he was not able at that time to bring it to his deuotion, and also he endured with murmure and grudge, that in it should be raysed the greatnes of the Venetians, enuy bearing this nature, not to make men so muche to complayne of their proper wantes, as to greeue in the wealth and well doing of others.

When it was vnderstande in Romania that Valentynois was fledde into the Castel S. Angeo, and the regiments of men that were about him dispersed and passed into their seuerall calamities, the Cities whiche had expected him before in great constancie, hauing now their hopes turned into feares, applied to the time, and began to take newe parties: suche for the most part is the wauering condition of communalties and multitudes, not measuring things by iustice and equitie of reason, but eyther by opinion, which cõmonly is partiall, or by cõmon report, which for the most part is ful of incerteinties & errors. Cesena returned to the auncient deuotion of the Church: Imola (the capteine of the castel beeing killed by meane of certayne the principall Citizens) stoode in doubt, one parte desiring to reuert to the Churche, and an other part to be reconciled to the Riarois their first Lordes: The Citie of Furly possessed by the Ordelaffy long tyme before it came to the Riares by the permission of Pope Sixtus, had reappealed Anthonie a remeynder of the same familie: who firste prouing to enter with the fauour of the Venetians, but afterwardes fearing that vnder hys name, they woulde reteyne the iurisdiction to them selues, had recourse to the Florentynes, and by their meanes was reinueſted in his patrimonie: Iohn Sforce returned to Peſero, and to Rimini Pandolfe Malateſte, the one and other beeing called by the people. But Denys of Nalda, an auncient ſouldiour to Valentynois, at the requeſt of the Caſtlekeeper of Rimini, went to their ſuccours: by whoſe helpe, in good time, Pandolffe beeing put to the chaſe, the Citie returned eftſones to the obedience of Valentynois. Faenza only perſeuered longeſt in his deuotion, but in the ende falling into a depriuation of hope for his returne, caſting their eyes vppon certayne remaynders of the familie of Manfreda, their auncient Lordes, they called home Aſtor, a young Gentleman of the ſame houſe, but a baſtarde, none remeyning of the race legitimate. But the Venetians aſpiring to the iuriſdiction of all Romania, immediatly after the death of Pope Alexander, had ſent to Rauenna many bandes of ſouldiours, with whome, as they made a charge one night vppon the ſodayne, and with great furie, vppon the Citie of Ceſena, ſo the people of the place ſtanding valiauntly to their defence, by their vertue vanquiſhed the conſpiracies of their enemies, the Venetians which went thither without artillerie, hoping more to ſurpriſe it then to force it, retyring to the countrey of Rauenna: where they conſidered diligently all things that might geue them any occaſion to make them ſelues great in that Prouince, whiche immediatly was preſented to them by the diſcordes that were betweene Denys of Nalde and the Fauentyns: for, it beeing ſomewhat intollerable to Denys, that the Fauentyns ſhoulde eftſones returne vnder the gouernment of the houſe of Manfreda, agaynſt whom he was drawne into rebellion at ſuch time as Valentynois aſſayled that citie: he called in the Venetians, and put into their hands the Caſtels of the vale of Lamona which he had in keeping. And the better to further their practiſes, the Venetians a litle after put a bande of three hundred footemen within the Caſtle of Faenza, being brought in by the caſtlekeper, whom they had ſeduced by their corruptions. They occupied in like ſort, & in the ſame time, the borough of Forlimpople, with many other boroughs of Romania, and ſent one part of their men of warre to take the citie of Faua, but the people held out conſtantly for the Church, holding it more honorable to abide perill, then corrupt their alleageance. They were alſo brought into Rimini by the conſent of the people, couenanting aforehand with Pandolffe Malateſte to giue him in recompẽce the towne of Citadella in the territories of Padua, and a yerely pention, with a perpetuall eſtate of a company of men at armes. They returned afterwards in great diligence to beſiege Faenza, for that the townesmen nothing amaſed with the loſſe of the caſtel for thincõmoditie of his ſeate & ſeparation frõ the citie by a depe trench, made valiant reſiſtance, both for the affectiõ they bare to the familie of Manfredi, and alſo for a grudge they had that thinhabitãts of the vale of Lamona, had promiſed to ſtrãgers the imperie of Faenza: they eſtemed litle their proper aduerſities, ſo that they might obſerue the full office of fidelitie to the familie of Manfredi their true & auncient Lord: But of themſelues being vnable to make defence ſufficient, for that Chriſtopher Moare cõmander of the Venetians had approched his artillerie to their towne, & occupied al the places of importãce in the countrey, they prayed ſuccours of the new Pope Iulio, to whom ſuch a maner of audacitie was not a little diſagreable. But beeing newely aſcended to that ſupreme ſeate without force, without money, and without hope to be ayded by eyther of the kings of Fraunce or Spayne, for that both they were traueled with thoughtes of farre greater importance, & alſo that he denied to be cõfederat with eyther of thẽ: he was without meane of comfort in this calamitie, but through thauthoritie of the name pontifical. And to proue what reuerence the Venetians bare to it, together with what

regarde they remembred the amities which long time before he had borne to that commonweale: he sent to Venice the Bishop of Tymoli, to complayne that Faenza beeing a citie immediatly apperteining to the Church, they would not forbeare to do so great a dishonour to a Pope, who afore he was raysed to that soueraigne creation, as he honoured their commonweale with a speciall affection, so now standing in a greater fortune, they might hope for right ample fruits of his friendship so auntiently borne. It may be there wanted not in the Senat those sortes of men whiche aforetime had dissuaded not to entangle their estate with the matters of Pysa, & that they should not receiue in pawne the portes of the realme of Naples, nor make partition with the French king of the Duchie of Myllan: it may be that in the wisedomes of these men appeared the consideration of euils that might happen, and howe, by making them selues dayly more and more suspected and hated, they might in this action adde to other hatreds the ill will of the Pope. But ambicious counsels hauing ben fauoured with so happie successe, and therefore all their sailes being hoysed in a winde so happie of fortune, the opinions of those that persuaded the contrarie were not heard. And therefore (almost with a generall consent) it was aunswered to the Popes Embassadour: that the state of Venice had alwayes greatly desired that the Cardinall S. Petri ad vincla should come to be Pope, and as he had now obteined it, not by corruption, but by his proper vertue and merites, so they hoped that the same inclination which in his meaner fortune induced him to embrace and loue them, would still go on working with confirmation of offices & amities, as for their partes, he should not doubt, that they would not followe him with better respectes being Pope, then they had done whileſt he was in the state and person of a Cardinall: But as touching the poynt of imputation, they knew not wherein they had offended his dignitie, embrasing thoccasion which was offred to them to haue Faenza: for that that Citie was not onely not possessed by the Churche, but also the Churche made a willing depriuation of all her rightes, in transferring so amply and in playne Consistorie the iurisdiction to the Duke Valentynois: That he would remember that afore that graunt, the Popes (within no memorie of man) had euer possessed Faenza, but from time to time had geuen it to newe Vicares, without acknowledging other superioritie then the tribute, which they offered to pay readily when it should be required. That the Fauentins had no desire to be the subiects of the Church, but abhorring such nomination, they had reuerenced the name of the Duke Valentynois, with all those offices & obseruances that were in them: And that now hauing no more hope in him, they were runne headlong to call in the bastards of the house of Manfredi: Lastly, they besought him, that being in the authoritie of Pope, he would hold them in the same estate of friendship, which he thought them worthy of, when he had but the person of a Cardinall, not suffering light occasions to remoue that gruae and setled liking which he had so long time had of thē, more by his proper inclination, then by any their deseruings. After the Pope was certified of the will of the Venetians, he had sent into Romania the Duke Valentynois, whom he had embraced with many demonstrations of honour assoone as he was Pope, and in token of amitie lodged him in the pallace Pontificall: fauing that he feared, least his going, in the beginning agreable enough to the people, should not be then very hatefull, seeing they were already al drawne into rebellion against him. Touching the condition of the Fauentins, there was no more remeining to thē, but to haue recourse to the Florētins, who discōtēted that a citie of so nere neighborhed should fal into the power of the Venetians, had sent to their succors in the beginning

200. footmen, enterteining them with hopes ſtill to refurniſh them to thend to hold them in courage till the Pope were at oportunitie to ſuccour them: But ſeeing by many apparances that the Pope had no diſpoſition to take armes, and that thauthoritie of the Frenche king (warning the Venetians in the beginning not to moleſt the eſtates of the Duke Valentynois) was not ſufficient to withdrawe them: And laſtely, eſteeming it no pollicie to enter alone into a warre with ſo mightie enemies, they forbare to releeue them with any further ſupply. By which alteration the Fauentyns beeing cut off from all hopes, and the Venetian armie (incamping at the Churche of the Obſeruauntes) hauing begonne to play with their artillerie agaynſt the walls of their Citie, beeing vnhappie alſo in this, that their intelligences were diſcouered, and certayne of them taken who had conſpired to put the Venetians into the towne: they yeelded vp their Citie into their hands, the Venetians agreeing to giue to Aſtor a certayne pention (albeit but little) for the releefe of his life. After the taking of Faenza, the Venetians might with the ſame facilitie and fortune haue commaũded Imola & Furly: but not to aggrauate the indignation of the Pope, who murmured not a litle, they ſent their mẽ into garriſon, determining for that time to paſſe no further, hauing occupied in Romania, beſides Faenza and Rimini with their countries, Monteſiora, Saint Archangeo, Verrucque, Gaterre, Sanignano, & Meldole the hauẽ of the countrey of Ceſena, and in the territorie of Imola, Toſtignana, Solarvola, and Montbataile. Valentynois held only in Romania the Caſtels of Furly, of Ceſena, of Forlimpople, and of Bertinoire. All which (albeit he had great deſire to go into Romania, to thend they were not vſurped by the Venetians) he had eaſily conſented to put into the Popes keeping, with bonde to receiue them of him agayne at ſuche time as they ſhould be aſſured, had it not bene that the Pope (his auncient integritie beeing not yet ouercome with deſire to beare rule) refuſed the offer, ſaying he would not willingly accept occaſions that might any way allure him to corrupt his fayth. At laſte to oppoſe in ſome ſort agaynſt the proceedings of the Venetians, with whom he was not a little diſcontented for the daunger of the eſtate eccleſiaſticke, hauing alſo a deſire that Valentynois ſhould depart from Rome, he accorded with Valentynois that he ſhould go to Spetia by ſea, and from thence by lande to Ferrara, and ſo to Imola, where ſhould be reſtored to him an hundred men at armes, and fiftie light horſmen which yet followed his enſignes, (interpoſing in this conuention not only the name of the Pope, but alſo the name of the college of Cardinals.) With this reſolutiõ Valentynois beeing gone to Oſtia to be embarked, the Pope was ſodenly repented that he had not accepted the Caſtels, and hauing nowe a ſpeciall deſire to haue them (not reſpecting the meanes) and to keepe them to him ſelfe: he ſent after the Cardinals of Volterre and Surrente to perſuade him, that to preuent that thoſe places ſhould not fall into the hands of the Venetians he would be content to deliuer them vp into the Popes keeping, vnder the ſame promiſe that had bene treated vpon at Rome: So ſoone do mens minds alter, when ambition hath once poſſeſt the ſpirites, and made way to greedie deſire, which in matters of profite holdes nothing reſpected: Valentynois taking aduauntage of the Popes incertentie, denied nowe to doe that which earſt he was well contented, and the Pope riſing with the occaſion into indignitie, cauſed him to be areſted in the gallies wherein he was embarked, and in decent ſort to be led to Magliana, from whence (all the Court and communaltie of Rome reioycing for thapprehenſion of his perſon) he was led to the Vatican, and honoured, but not without eſpeciall and good gardes: the reaſon was, that the Pope fearing leaſt the Caſtle kepers diſpairing of his ſafetie, would not ſell the Caſtells to the the Venetians, ſought to make him tractable by eaſie meanes, and ſo to haue them by his conſent and will. Thus the power of Duke Valentynois riſing (as it were) ſodenly to his ſoueraignte and height, tooke ende with a ruine more ſodeine: and as the meanes by the which he aſpired to his greatnes had more reſemblance with crueltie and deceites, then that the armes and power of the Church did aduaunce him: So, by a due ſentence of iuſtice he experienced in him ſelfe parte of the artes and trumperies wherewith his father and he had vexed many ſeuerall perſonages: he was like to the tree that groweth till he come to his height, and then is plucked vp from the roote in a moment. The heauie ſtone commonly ouerwhelmeth him- ſelfe with his owne weight: who doth couet the fruite, and not conſidereth the height of the tree whereon it groweth, let him take heede, that whileſt he laboreth to climbe to the toppe, he fall not with the bowes which he doth embrace: It is harde for men ambitious to holde faſt their fortune, for ſhe is ſlipper and can not be kept agaynſt her will: and therefore to men that ſtudie to followe the ſtreame, it is good to put a bridle to their felicitie, ſo ſhall they the better gouerne it: it is an office in wiſe men to conſider alwaies their owne eſtate, where the vayne ambitious man liueth for the moſt part in the remembraunce of thoſe things which make him to forget him ſelfe. The ſouldiours and ſolowers of the Duke had almoſt no better fortune, who beeing drawne into the countrey of Perouſa; with hope to obteine ſafeconduit of the Florentins and others, (beeing chaſed by the regiments of Vitelli) they were conſtrayned for their ſafetie to retyre vpon the landes of the Florentins: where, beeing diſperſed betweene Chaſtilion and Cortona, and reduced to foure hundred horſemen, with a very ſlender ſtrength of footemen, they were ſtripped by the appoyntment of the Florentins, and Dom Michaell their leader taken priſoner: him they deliuered afterwards to the Pope, who demaunded him with an importunitie well expreſſing the hates he bare to all the olde ſeruauntes of the late Pope Alexander. And albeit this man had bene a faythfull miniſter and executor of all the wickednes of Valentynois, yet after the Pope had ſpent ſome conference with him, he turned his crueltie into compaſſion, following his naturall inclination, which was to be eaſie to pardon thoſe vpon whom he had power to execute his anger. About this time the Cardinall d'Amboyſe departed from Rome to returne into Fraunce, hauing obteyned of the Pope, more for feare then for good will, a confirmation of the legation of that realme. But the Cardinall Askanius folowed him not, notwithſtanding at his comming out of Fraunce he promiſed the king by othe that he woulde returne: of which othe he had procured ſecret abſolution of the Pope afore, not remembring that amongſt men there can be no greater bond than an othe, and who loaſeth his fayth hath no more to loſe, ſeeing we acknowledge religion to conſiſt in fayth it ſelfe. But the example of the Cardinall Askanius ſkorning at the credulitie of the Cardinall Amboyſe, coulde not make the French Cardinall better aduiſed in the action with Pandolfe Petrucci, who receyuing the Cardinall at Sienna with many honours, and making inſinuation into his good fauours with deepe ſuttleties and counſels full of art, promiſing to cauſe Montpulcian to be rendred to the Florentins, ouercame him ſo muche, that at his returne into Fraunce he aſſured the king that he had not found in Italy a man of better ſpirit, and wrought that his Maieſtie gaue ſufferaunce to his ſonne to returne to Sienna, remayning at that time in the Court of Fraunce for thaſſuraunce of his fathers promiſes. Theſe were the mutations that hapned in Italy by the death of the Pope.

But in theſe times, the enterpriſes begonne with greater hopes on thother ſide the Exployctes of the Frenche armies beyonde the Mounts.

Mountes by the French king, were brought into many difficulties: for tharmie ſent vpon the frontier of Gaſcoigne, no leſſe for want of money then lacke of good gouernment in thoſe that had the charge, was broken with a ſpeede quicker then they could marche thither. The Galleis alſo which had runne all along the Spaniſh ſeas, were retyred to the port of Marſeilles: and the armie leauied for Parpignian, of the which the king promiſed muche beeing well furniſhed of all things neceſſarie, was incamped before Saulſes, which is a ſtrong place neare to Narbona, ſtanding at the foote of the hilles Pirennei in the countrey of Roſſillion. But beeing well defended, it made a wonderfull reſiſtaunce: and albeit it was furiouſly aſſaulted by the Frenchmen, vſing both the ſeruice of artilleries, and the arte of vnderminings, yet the vertue of the defendaunts kept it from ſpoyle and ruine. There aſſembled an armie of all the Spaniſhe Realmes at Parpignian, which the king did honor with the preſence of his perſon to thende to ſuccour it. And beeing ioyned to this armie (by reaſon the French were diſcamped) the regiments that had bene ſent to defende the frontiers of Fontarabie, and all theſe forces beeing drawen into one ſtrength, and marching to geue battayle to the Frenche armie: the Captaynes ſeeing no reaſon to contende agaynſt fortune, retyred with the Campe towards Narbona, after they had lyen afore Saulſes about fortie dayes. The Spaniards loaſing no benefite of the time and occaſion, made incurſions vpon the territories of the French king, where hauing taken certayne places of meane importance (the French making no reſiſtance for that they were withdrawne into Narbona) they eftſones returned vpon their owne frontiers by the commaundement of their king, who, hauing obteyned the true ende of him that is aſſayled, enterteyned but with ill will the warre on thother ſide the Mountes, ſeeing albeit his Realmes and Prouinces were ſufficient mightie to defende him from the French king, yet he helde them farre to weake to offende him. A conſideration of great importance to him that entreth into a warre, to foreſee with a better counſell howe he may defende him ſelfe then offende his enemie.

A truce betweene the kinges of Spayne and Fraunce.

A litle after (by the interpoſing of king Federik) they made a truce for fiue monthes, comprehending onely thoſe things that concerned thaffayres on the other ſide the Mountes: for that the Spaniſh king aſſuring Federyk that he would conſent that the Realme of Naples ſhould be reſtored to him, and Federik expecting no leſſe of the French king, the rather at the contẽplation of the Queene inclined to compaſſion, had introduced betweene them the practiſes of peace. In whiche negociation the Spaniſh Embaſſadours (the warre continuing ſtil in Italie) went into Fraunce, where they gouerned their doings with ſuche art, that Federyk vaynely perſuaded him ſelfe that the difficultie of his reſtitution, which the Barons of the faction of Aniovv impugned vehemently, would be principally on the French kings ſide.

Thus all the warres betweene both the kings beeing reduced only into the kingdome of Naples, the eyes and thoughtes of all men were turned thither: for that the French men hauing paſſed from Rome by the landes of Valmontano and the Colonnoys, (where they found an eaſie conſent to refreſhe them with vittayles) marched by the feeldes of the Churche towardes S. Germain, a place where Conſaluo (leauing garriſon in the Caſtell of Secqua and Monteaſin) was incamped, not with intention to hazarde fortune, but to be an impediment that they paſſed no further, which by the ſtrength and opportunitie of the place, he hoped to do eaſily. The Frenche men being ariued at Pontecorue, and at Ceperana, the Marquis of Soluſſe, with ſuche as were within Caietta, ioyned to them, hauing afore by thoccaſion of diſcamping of Conſaluo, recouered the Duchie of Tracetta, and the Countrey of Fonery, euen euen to the floud of Garillon. The firſt thing that the Frenche armie did, was to aſſaye to get the caſtle of Secqua, from the which (after they had in vayne giuen one aſſault) they brake of and leauied their ſiege. But for that action they brought vpon them ſelues ſo muche contempt and imputation, that it was publikely affirmed in the Spaniſhe armie, that that day the Realme of Naples was aſſured againſt the French men, who ioyning feare to their fortune, and diſtruſting for that reſpect to chaſe their enemie towards S. Germain, determined to returne by the coaſte ſide, holding that way ſuſpected in their retyring wherein they founde confidence and fauour in marching on. After they had reapoſed two dayes within Aquin, which they had taken, and left ſeuen hundren footemen within the Caſtle Guillaume, they returned by Pontecorue, and marched by the way of Fondy to lodge at a towne ſet vpon the way of the ryuer of Garillon, where antiquitie holdes that the auncient citie of Mynturno was buylded. A place not onely conuenient to caſte a bridge, and paſſe the ryuer, as was their intention, but alſo of great importunitie to encampe there if they ſhould haue bene conſtrayned: for they had Caietta and their nauie at ſea at their backes, and Tracetta, Itri, Fondy, with all the circuite of the countrey to the ryuer of Garillon ſtoode firme in their deuotion. It was thought that the French armie paſſing the ryuer, was a thing of great conſequence for the victorie: for that Conſaluo being ſo farre inferiour in forces that he durſt not appeare in playne fielde, the French might march without impediment euen to the walls of Naples, whither alſo their Nauie at ſea might haue approched, hauing nothing to let them, if their vertue had but aunſwered thoportunitie. And for that cauſe Conſaluo iſſuing out of S. Germain was come on thother parte of Garillon, to let with all his ſtrength the paſſing of the Frenche, affying muche in the diſaduauntage and difficulties whiche armies finde to paſſe ryuers that haue no foardes, ſpecially when thenemie is oppoſed againſt them. But it often hapneth that things in execution fall out otherwyſe then they appeared in the firſt imagination, and as often it chaunceth (practiſe beeing farre aboue thopinion of things) that that which at firſt was eſteemed harde, brought foorth an action moſt eaſie, as of the contrarie, moſte hardnes was often found in thoſe things wherein conieƈture & ſuppoſition made moſt facilitie. For, the French notwithſtãding the furious reſiſtãce & impedimẽts of the Spaniſh, after they had caſt the bridge, wonne the way of the ryuer by force of artilerie planted partly vpon the banke where they encamped which was ſomewhat higher then the banke on the other ſide, and partly vpon barkes which they had cauſed to be brought from the Nauie at ſea, and drawne vp againſt the ſtreame of the ryuer: But the day after as they began to make an enterpriſe to paſſe, the Spaniards oppoſed againſt them, and charging with an incredible reſolution vppon ſuche as were alreadie paſſed, they repulſed them euen to the middeſt of the bridge, and had folowed them further, if the furie of thartillerie had not compelled them to retyre. In this encounter dyed on the Frenche ſide the Lieutenant of the Bayliſe of Dyon, and of the Spaniards was ſlayne Fabio ſonne to Paule Vrſin, a young man amongſt Thytalians of great expectation. It is ſayd, that if when the French men began to paſſe, they had aduaunced forward with the ſame courage they entred into thenterpriſe, they had that day remayned maiſters of the fielde and the victorie: But whileſt they proceeded ſlowly, and with demonſtration of timerouſneſſe, they did not onely loaſe thoccaſion of the victorie of that day, but they diminiſhed greatly all hope in time to come, the fortune of the warre declining with the oportunitie whiche they had loſt: from that day all things tooke with them very ill ſucceſſe, for that amongſt the rulers of tharmie was rather confuſion then concorde, and (according to the cuſtome of the French ſouldiours with Thitalian captaines) very litle obedience to the Marquis of Mantua the kings lieutenant. In ſo much as, either for that occaſion, or in reſpect of his diſeaſe (being ſicke in deede) or for that by other experiences in that ſeruice, he had loſt al hope of the victorie, he wēt from tharmie, leauing an opinion to the French king, that his loyaltie was greater then his courage, and that his vertue was of other facultie then to gouerne an armie. After the Marquis had thus giuen vp his charge, the Marquis of Saluſſe, the baylife of Caen, & Monſr Sandricourt chiefe commaunders in the Frenche armie: hauing firſt rayſed at the head of the bridge beyonde the ryuer a rampier with cariages, erected a baſtion capable of manye men, by whoſe protection they were defended from their enemies in paſſing the bridge. But they were let to paſſe further by other difficulties, happning partly through their proper negligence, but more by the vertue and patience of their enemies, but moſte of all by the malice of their fortune, with whom nothing is more familiar then to deceiue the confidence and exſpectation of men: for, Conſaluo, who ſtudied to hinder them more with thoccaſion of the winter, and ſituation of the countrey, then with his armie and forces: was incamped at Cintura, a place ſeated on high and remoued from the ryuer ſomewhat more then a mile, about the whiche the bandes of footemen and horſemen were lodged with a great incommoditie, for that the place of his owne condition being ſolitarie and not muche releued with cottages or cabynets of heardſmen, they had almoſt no other couer then the skie, the grounde alſo aſwell for the lownes of the playne, as for that the ſeaſon and weather was raynie, being full of water and myre: a neceſſitie which driue thoſe ſouldiours that had no meane to encampe in places more firme and high, to planke and couer the place of the grounde where they laye with mattes and other things materiall to defende the moyſtnes of the earth. In regarde of theſe difficulties, and for that tharmie was ill payed, the French withall hauing wholly wonne the paſſage of the ryuer, certayne captaynes were of opinion to retyre the armie to Capua, both to thende to releeue the intollerable ſufferance of the ſouldiours, and to take them ſelues out of that continuall expectation of daunger, their numbers being farre inferiour to their enemies: It often hapneth that when extremities and perill be at hande, confidence is turned into feare, and when the counſels of men are not conſtant, they can not but wauer in reſolution, there vertue hauing taken an other habite by the conſideration of the dangers they ſee afore thē. But that puſillanimitie of the captaynes was reſolutely reiected of Conſaluo with this anſwere worthy the greatnes of his heart: In many caſes (ſayth he) vayne feares are farre more hurtfull then haſtie confidence or credulitie, a cōmon diſpoſition in the nature of man, making him to eſteme more then needeth thoſe dangers that be nearest at hand, & hold leſſe reckoning then he ought of perils furtheſt of and to come. But concerning the preſent caſe, as glorie ſprings not of dignitie nor of honour (for that they are the goods of fortune) but of vertue which is the riches of the mind & gift of the goodnes of God: So for my parte I deſire rather to be preſently buryed ten foote deepe in the grounde whereon we ſtand, then by giuing back one foote to prolong my life an hundred yeres: fortune oftentimes makes many men more apte to winne glory, then hable to keepe it, but occaſion and oportunitie ſeeme to offer vs that eſtate of perpetuall honour and reputation, which our owne vertue denieth vs to be worthy of. And ſo reſiſting all difficulties with an incredible conſtancie, and fortifying him ſelfe with a deepe trenche, and with baſtions which he cauſed to make make in the front of the campe, he prepared to defende him agaynſt the Frenche, ſtanding againſt him: who, notwithſtanding the protection of their baſtylion which they had buylded, remoued nothing at all, for that the countrey beeing all ouerflowen with the raynes and waters of the ryuer (this place is called by Lyuie for the neighborhed of Seſſa, aqua ſinueſſana, and perhaps they are the lakes of Myntuina, (wherein C. Marius hidde him ſelfe fleeing before Sylla) they coulde not paſſe further, but through a ſtraite which was all wateriſhe and full of a deepe quagmyre. And perhaps there was daunger to be charged in the flanke by the footebandes of the Spaniſh lightly armed, which lay encamped very neare that ſtraite, the wynter alſo by aduenture inclining to cold and ſharpneſſe, brought foorth more continual multitudes of ſnowes and raynes, then had vſed to fall in thoſe regions: Wherein it ſeemed that fortune and the elementes aboue had conſpired agaynſt the French, who ſtaying there, did not onely waſt the time vnprofitably, but alſo they receyued by that abode (by reaſon of their naturall diſpoſition) almoſt the like harmes which mens bodies receyue by a poyſon that worketh ſlowly: for, albeit they were lodged with leſſe diſcommodities then the Spaniſhe, and that by the meane of the reliques of an auncient Theater, wherevnto they had ioyned many other ſhroodes & couers, beſides the fauour of certayne olde houſes neare to them: and for that the circumference or ſkirtes of the tower ſomewhat higher then the playne of Seſſa, were leſſe offended with waters: and laſtly, that moſt part of their horſemen were lodged within Tracetta, and other places affronting: yet the bodies of the Frenchmen and Svvyzzers, not bearing ſo naturall reſiſtance agaynſt long trauels and perplexities, as do the bodies of the Spaniardes, they gaue manifeſt tokens of the diminution of their late valour and furie. Beſides, the couetouſnes of the officers and treaſorers, to whoſe office belong the paying of the ſouldiours, encreaſed muche thoſe difficulties: for that they preferring their particular profite afore the cõmon prouiſion of the whole, and forgetting no degrees of delay or illuſion, they ſuffred to diminiſh the numbers of the ſouldiours, and were negligent to furniſh the campe with vittayles as apperteyned: by reaſon whereof diſeaſes fell vppon tharmie, and many of Thitalian companies went away diſcontented. Theſe diſorders were made greater by the diſcorde of the Captaynes, through whoſe fault there was neyther order nor obedience, and in an armie there can be no expectation of thexerciſe of diſcipline, where is no certeintie of pay made. Thus the Frenchmen beeing reſtrayned by the ſharpnes of the winter, remayned ydle vpon the ſhoares of Garillan, no other thing beeing done eyther by thennemie or by them, but certayne light skirmiſhings which were of no importance, and yet the Spaniſh ſeemed always to carie the better fortune. About the ſame time alſo the footebandes whiche the Frenche left in garriſon within the Caſtle Guillaume, not able to endure the continuall braueries of the garriſons of the caſtle of Secqua, and other peces theraboutes cõmaunded by the Spaniſh, abandoned the places of their charge, and pretending to come to tharmie, were charged by the way and broken, wherin ſeeking to auoyde the danger they feared moſt, they light vpon the perill they diſtruſted leaſt, beeing onely abuſed in the opinion and intention of their ſafetie. But things hauing had continuance in this eſtate many dayes, Bart. Aluiano with certayne of the Vrſins and their regiments, arriued in the Spaniſhe armie, by whoſe comming Conſaluo thought him ſelfe ſo ſtrongly refurniſhed, hauing in his armie nyne hundred men at armes, a thouſande light horſemen, and nyne thouſande Spaniſhe footemen that he began to thinke that nowe he was no more to ſtudie to defende him ſelfe, but to offende his enemie,

Bart. Aluiano commeth to the ſuccours of Conſaluo.

wherevnto he was ſo muche the more encouraged, by howe muche he was well aduertiſed that the Frenche (ſtronger in horſmen then in footemen) were diſperſed in ſuche ſeparation and diſtaunce, that their lodgings helde little leſſe then ten myles of the countrey, in ſo muche as neare the towre of Garillan, there were onely the Marquis of Saluſſe Viceroy, and other principall captaynes, with the leſſer part of tharmy, which diminiſhed continually by thaggrauation of diſeaſes of the which many died, and amongſt others the baylife of Caen. For this cauſe, hauing determined to aſſay to paſſe ſecretly the ryuer, (in the good ſucceeding of which he doubted nothing of the victorie,) he recommended to Aluiano (the author as ſome thinke of that counſell) the charge to make ſecretly a bridge. By his direction there was made a bridge of barkes and veſſels within a Creeke neare to Seſſa, which they cauſed to be brought by night to Garillan, & to be caſt at the paſſage of Suya, foure myles aboue the bridge of the Frenchmen, where they made no garde. Aſſone as this bridge was caſt (being the xxvij. day of December in the night) all the armie paſſed together with the perſon of Conſaluo, who lodged the ſame night in the towne of Suya neare the ryuer whiche was occupied by thoſe that paſſed the firſt. The morning folowing whiche was on a fryday (a day happie for the Spaniards) Conſaluo hauing ordered that the rearegarde lodged betweene the caſtle of Montdragon and Cariuola, foure myles belowe the bridge of the French, ſhould go and charge their bridge, he prepared him ſelfe with the vauntgarde led by Aluiano, and with the battell which paſſed with him ſelfe, to followe the Frenchmen: who receiuing aduertiſement the ſame night that the Spaniards had caſt the bridge and began to paſſe, entred into a generall feare, which ſo much the more drew them into aſtoniſhment, by howmuch this accident and boldnes of thenemie had exceeded their expectation, and hauing them ſelues determined to attempt nothing till the time were more gracious and fauourable, they nouriſhed alſo a coniecture that thenemie ſtoode reteyned with the ſame negligence and ſlouthfulneſſe, conſtruing things by opinion onely, without reſpecting thopportunitie, which beeing ouerſlipt of them, proued fauourable to thenemie. Therefore albeit the Viceroy (to whom were reſorted many bandes both from Tracetto and the places about) puſhed forwarde more with feare then with ſetled counſell (as often hapneth in ſodayne aduentures) had ſent towards Suya to ſtoppe their paſſage, Monſr d'Alegre, with certayne regiments of footemen and horſemen: yet finding that their deuiſe was too long protracted, and that feare ouerruled all diſcourſes and conſiderations, they leauyed their campe ſodainly, and about midnight with a haſt contrarie to the valour of men reſolute, they brake vp from the towre of Garillan, leauing abandoned the moſt part of their munitions and nyne great peeces of artillerie, together with great numbers of their ſouldiours with bodies wounded
" and full of ſicknes. Suche a thing is feare, that it makes men forgetfull aboue ſhame
" and all other obſeruances, and when the calamitie is generall, it leaues euery one
" to his fortune, impreſſion for the moſt parte amazing more then the perill it ſelfe.
They tooke the way towards Caietta, whither they thought to retyre: But Conſaluo, who would omit no oportunitie wherein occaſion was offered, aſſone as he knewe they were diſcamped, folowed them with his armie, ſending afore Proſper Colonno with his light horſemen to vndertake the skirmiſhe, to thende their march might be more ſlowe. And notwithſtanding the feight was enterteyned by the horſemen, yet the Frenche forbare not ſtill to keepe on their way, beeing notwithſtanding compelled to ſtay oftentimes for feare to fall into diſorder at the bridges and harde paſſages, from whence, after they had ſupported the skirmiſh a certayne ſpace, they retyred

tyred ſtill, receyuing alwayes ſome hurte: The order they vſed was this, the artillerie marched afore, the footebandes followed after, and then the horſemen, of whom ſuch as were moſt behind, continued the feight with thenemie. The Frenchmen being in this ſorte aduaunced after certayne pawſes and light skirmiſhes, as farre as the bridge whiche is before Caietta, neceſſitie compelled the Viceroy, to cauſe to ſtaye there one parte of his men at armes to giue leaſure to thartilleries to paſſe before: But they beeing not hable to marche with that ſpeede whiche was neceſſarie to their ſafetie, the companies of thenemies beginning already to meddle with them, there was begonne in that place a greate and hoate skirmiſh, for that the reregarde of the Spaniardes came immediatly after, who hauing paſſed the ryuer without reſiſtaunce, euen with thoſe barkes of the bridge which had beene broken by the Frenchemen, went towardes Caietta by the right way, Conſaluo marching alwayes on the wing with the reſidue of tharmie: the feight was violent at the bridge of Mola for a certayne tyme, the Frenche meinteyning them ſelues principally by the aduauntage of the place, but with feares farre greater then their valoures: And the Spaniſhe ioyning furie to their fortune, fought with the ſame felicitie which followe thoſe men that ſuppoſe them ſelues to bee alreadie in the poſſeſſion of the victorie: At laſt the Frenchemen to whoſe diſhabilitie beganne to ſucceede a feare, leaſt part of the regiments which Conſaluo had ſent by the coaſt for that effecte, woulde cutte of their way, beganne to retyre in diſorder, and beeing continually followed by their enemies, when they came to the head of two wayes, the one leading to Ttry and the other to Caietta, they fell into generall and manyfeſt flying, many remayning ſlayne, as Barnardo Adorno lieftenant of fyftie launces: many were taken priſoners, and thartillaries abandoned with all the horſes appoynted for the ſeruice of the ſame: And touching the reſidue which fledde towardes Caietta, they were victoriouſly chaſed euen to the gates of the Citie. At the ſame time Fabricio Colonno, ſent by Conſaluo (after he had paſſed the ryuer with fyue hundred horſe and a thouſande footemen, neare to Pontecoruo) and beeing fauoured of moſte parte of the villages and countreymen, ſtripped the regiments of Lodouvyk de la Mirandola, and Alexander de Triuulco: Beſides, there were many of tharmie, who beeing lodged at Fondy, Ttry, and other places thereaboutes, and hearing that the Spaniſhe had caſt the bridge, went not to the armie at the towre of Garillan, but for their ſafetie diſperſed into diuers places, were taken and ſtripped by the countrey: But Peter de Medicis who alſo followed the French campe, with certayne other gentlemen, had a greater miſſortune: for when the armie brake vp from before Garillan, beeing mounted vppon a barke with foure peeces of artillerie, to go to Caietta, their barke ſonke, aſwell for that they had ouercharged her, as that the winds were contrarie to the mouth of the ryuer: They were all drowned: A deſtinie lamentable conſidering the qualitie of the perſons, with the maner of their dying. Wherein though many vaynely diſpute that fortune ledd them to ſo miſerable an accident, yet if wee will liſte vp our conſiderations to God, we ſhall finde that he hath reſerued ſuche a prerogatiue ouer all thinges whiche he hath created, that to him onely belongs the authoritie to diſpoſe all things by the ſame power wherewith he hath created them of nothing. The night following, Conſaluo with tharmie lodged at Caſtellona and Mola, and appearing the next day before Caietta, whither were retyred the Frenche Captaynes together with the Princes of Salerno and Biſignan, he occupied immediatly the ſuburbes & the Mount which the French had abandoned: And albeit Caietta was ſufficiently

manned with multitudes of ſouldiours, and no leſſe prouiſion of vittayles, beſides the conueniencie of the place to be ſuccored by tharmie at ſea: yet yeelding to the conſideration of their perils, which were more in impreſſion then in deede, they loſt courage, and inclined with manifeſt conſent to parley, being not diſpoſed to endure the perplexitie of expectation of ſuccors that were incertayne: They ſent out the Bayliſe of Dyon and S. Colombo with Theodor de triuulco, who in the mouth of all the reſidue accorded the firſt day of the yeere 1504. to giue vp to Conſaluo, Caietto with the caſtle, vnder condition of free power to go out of the realme of Naples with their goods either by lande or ſea, and that Monſr d'Aubigni and the other priſoners ſhould be redeliuered both of the one and other partie. But this capitulation was not ſo clearly ſet downe, that Conſaluo tooke not occaſion to diſpute, that by the vertue of the couenants, the Barons of the kingdome could chalenge no libertie or deliuery frō impriſonment. This was the chaſe that was giuen to the french army nere to the riuer of Garillan, being encamped vpon the ſhores or banks therof about fiftie dayes: An ouerthrow hapning to them no leſſe through their owne diſorders, then by the vertue of their enemies, and ſo much the more worthy of commemoration and memorie, by howmuch folowed (as it were by ſucceſſion of calamitie) the abſolute loſſe of ſo noble and mighty a kingdome, together with the confirmation of the empire of the Spaniſh: it noriſheth alſo matter more worthy of monument, for that the French entring with a farre greater ſtrength then thenemie, and no leſſe plentie of all prouiſions both by lande and ſea neceſſarie to the warre, they were vanquiſhed with a facilitie farre contrarie to the courſe of victories, and without bloud or danger of the conquerers: but the thing that was no leſſe lamentable in this accident then all the reſidue, was, that albeit there dyed very fewe of the Frenche by the ſworde of the enemie, yet the number was ſmall that was reſerued of ſo great an armie: for that of the regiments of footmen which eſcaped by fleing, and of thoſe alſo that came frō Caietto after thaccorde, there dyed many trowpes by the wayes, aſwell the ſharpe violence of the colde, as the rigour of ſickneſſe, ſeruing to the execution of thoſe miſerable bodies, whom fortune ſpared from the ſlaughters of the warres: And of ſuche whoſe ſtrength with great payne was hable to carrie them to Rome, parte came ſterued with the hardneſſe of the weather, and ſome through feeblenes languiſhed, lingring yet to abyde with greater paynes their latter tymes: of this ſorte many dyed in hoſpitals both of hunger and colde, the ſtreetes and highe wayes beeing lamentable teſtimonies of their calamities, and the diches and other places vyle and vnworthy ſeruing as ſepulchers to thoſe bodies whoſe myndes not long ſince ſuppoſed them inuinſible agaynſt all aduerſities of warre: And whether, in cōpariſon of cauſes & reaſons, we may referre the motions of theſe calamities eyther to deſtenie enuying the French, and no leſſe contrarie to the Nobilitie then to bodies of inferiour condition: or to the diſeaſes which fell vpon them by the diſcommodities they ſuffred about Garillan, many euen of thoſe who departing frō Caietta (where they left the moſt part of their horſes) embarked them ſelues to paſſe by ſea, and eyther periſhed by the wayes, or at leaſt beeing reſerued till they came into Fraunce, dyed in the ſight of their friends, of whom they thought to receiue conſolation: Amongſt theſe were the Marquis of Saluſſo, Sandricourt, & the baylie of the Mountains, with many other gentlemen of marke, in whom the maner of their death was no leſſe lamentable then their fortune: ouer & beſides that which by imputatiō may be impoſed vpō the French captains for their diſagrement & negligent gouerument, as alſo that that may be obiected to the iniury of the time, that neither

the French nor Svvizzers are not comparatiue with the Spaniards, either with reſolution of mind to temporiſe or expect, or with their bodies to ſuſtaine the trauels and incommodities that a warre draweth with it. There are principally conſidered two things whiche hindered the Frenche king that he remained not victorious: the one was, the long aboade that tharmie made vppon the territories of Rome for the Popes death, the ſame beeing the cauſe that wynter came vppon them, and that the Vrſins were practiſed withall by Conſaluo, afore they coulde enter into the kingdome: where, if they coulde haue made their entrie whileſt the tyme was tollerable, Conſaluo farre inferiour to them in forces, and not fauoured with thoportunitie and rigor of the time, had bene conſtrayned to abandon the greateſt part of the kingdome, & to ſeeke out the ſtrong places for his ſuccor, or els ſuffer the authoritie of an enemie farre more mightie then him ſelfe: The other conſideration was, the couetouſnes of the officers & treaſorers, who, beguyling the king in the payes of the ſouldiers, and leſſe truſtie in the prouiſion of vittayles, & furniments for the ſeruice, made their theſts and negligences the principall cauſe of the diminution of that armie, ſince the king had expreſſed ſuch a prouiſion and care for all things neceſſarie, that it is certayne by good credible teſtimonie, that at the vnhappie time when the frenchmen were ouerthrowen, there were within Rome by the kings direction, great quantities of ſiluer and other releeſes for warre: but ſo violent was the deſtinie that ranne to the deſolation and ruine of that armie, that albeit at the laſte, after many complayntes of the Captaynes and the whole multitude of ſouldiours, there was leauyed an abundant prouiſion of vittels, yet, they ſuffered ſuche a penurie and ſcarſity in the beginning, that that diſorder ioyned to the other diſcommodities, was the breeder of infinite diſeaſes, of the abſenting of many, of the murmuring of many, and that many, ſeeing their fidelitie could finde no refuge in the armie, ſought their ſafetie in places thereabout, matters which in the ende brought foorth the abſolute ruine of ſo braue an armie: for, as for the nouriſhing of the body, it is not ynough that the head be well diſpoſed, but it is alſo neceſſarie that the other members do their office: euen ſo it ſufficeth not that the Prince do his duetie, if withall, the diligence and vertue which ought to be in his miniſters haue not equall action, the one beeing neceſſarie to the other, as the direction of the head and brayne of man auayleth little without the execution of the other inferior members, to whom ſuche miniſtration is appoynted.

Peace betweene the Turke & the Venetians.

The ſelfe ſame yere, wherin ſo great mutations hapned in Italie, was made a peace betwene the Turke Baiazet Ottoman, and the Venetians, which both parties embraſed with great affection: for the Turke, in whom was expreſſed a ſpirit of mekenes and diſpoſed to learning and ſtudie of the Scriptures of his religion, had, by the working of his owne inclination, a nature farre eſtraunged from armes: by reaſon whereof, notwithſtanding he had begonne the warre with great preparations both by ſea and lande, and occupied in Morea the two former yeares Naupanto nowe called Lepanto, Modono, Corono, and Iunquo, yet he folowed not nor continued the warres with ſo great affection, beeing withdrawen eyther by the deſire he had to tranquilitie and reſt, or at leaſt by a ſuſpicion of hys proper daunger, leaſt for religion ſake the Princes of Chriſtendome ſhould drawe into conſpiracie agaynſt him: for, both Pope Alexander had ſent certayne galliots to the ſuccours of the Venetians, and with money had alſo ſtirred vp Launcelot king of Bohemia and Hungaria to make warre vpon the Turkes frontiers, the Frenche and Spaniſhe kinges ſending (but not at one tyme) their ſeuerall armies to ioyne with the power of the Venetians. But this peace was embraced by the ſtate of Venice with a greater deſire, for that by thiniquitie of the warres, and that to the common detriment of the Citie, and perticuler loſſe to euery one in priuate, the traffike of marchandiſe which they made in diuers regions of the Leuant, was diſcontinued: the Citie alſo of Venice, whiche euery yeere was wonte to haue from certayne prouinces of the Turkes, certayne quantities of corne, did ſuffer many neceſſities for the depriuation of that reliefe: And laſtly, where they had wont to amplifie their iuriſdiction by the warres which they haue managed with other princes, they feared nothing ſo muche as the power of the Turkes, of whom they had bene alwayes beaten as often as they had had warres together: for, Amurathus, grandfather to Baiazet, had occupied the towne of Theſſalonica (nowe called Salonica) parcell of the dominions of Venice: And after him Mahomet his father, mainteyning continuall warre agaynſt him for ſixteene yeres, tooke from them the yle of Negroponto, a great part of Peleponeſſo, now named Morea Scutaro, with many other towns in Macedonia & Albania: In ſo much as both for that they ſupported the war agaynſt the Turks with right great difficulties and expences, hauing no hope to breede any profite by them, and alſo, by howmuche they doubted at the ſame time to be diſtreſſed by inuaſion of other Chriſtian princes (the time beeing full of conſpiracies) by ſo muche was it reaſonable that they deſired to be at tranquilitie with the Turkiſhe regions: It was ſuffered to Baiazet by the conditions of the peace, to reteyne ſtill all that he had occupied, and the Venetians reſeruing onely the Ile of Ceſalonia, aunciently called Leucado, were compelled to yeelde to him the proprietie of Nerita nowe named S. Mavvra. But the warre of the Turkes brought not ſo many diſpleaſures to the Venetians, as they receyued harmes by the king of Portugall, who had taken from them and appropriated to him ſelfe, the traffike of ſpices, whiche the Marchantes and ſhippes bringing out of Alexandria, (a noble Citie in Egypt) to Venice, they ſent diſperſed with a wonderfull profite through all the prouinces in Chryſtendome. The whiche alteration beeing a thing of the moſt merite and memorie of all others that haue hapned in the worlde ſince many ages, and, for the harmes which the Citie of Venice receyued by it, hauing ſome affinitie with the matters of Italie, it can not much alter the eſtate of our hiſtorie to ſpeake ſomewhat of it at large.

Diſcourſe vpō the nauigations of the Spaniards.

Such men of ſpirite and ſcience as by depe ſpeculation and contemplation haue conſidered the wonderfull motions and diſpoſitions of the heauen, and haue left the knowledge thereof recommended to ſucceſſion and poſteritie: haue figured a line running through the round circle of the heauen, frō the weſt to the Eaſt: and bearing an equall diſtaunce in all his partes from the Pole Septentrionall and Pole Meridionall, they call it the lyne Equinoctiall: for that when the ſunne is vnder it, the day and night haue one equalitie. They haue deuided with imagination the longnes of this lyne into three hundred and three ſcore partes, which they call degrees, as the other circuit of the heauen, by the Poles is lykewiſe of three hundred and threeſcore degrees. After theſe men had giuen this rule, the Coſmographers meaſuring and diuiding the earth, haue figured in the earth a lyne Equinoctiall, which falles parpendicularly vnder the celeſtiall lyne figured by Thaſtrologians, deuiding likewiſe the ſame and the circuite of the earth with a lyne falling parpendicularly vnder the Poles in largneſſe of three hundred and threeſcore degrees: ſo as from our Pole, to the Pole Meridionall, they put a diſtaunce of an hundred and foureſcore degrees, and from euery one of the Poles to the line Equinoctiall, foureſcore & ten degrees: Theſe haue ben the generall opinions of the Coſmographers.

But touching the particular deſcription of the earth habitable, after they hadde made knowen that parte of the earth whiche is vnder our Hemiſphere, they had a perſwaſion that that parte of the earth lying vnder the Zona Torrida, figured in the heauen of Thaſtrologians, and wherein is conteyned the lyne Equinoctiall, was, (as beeing neareſt the ſunne) vnhabitable by reaſon of his heate: And that from our Hemiſphere there was no paſſage to the landes which are vnder the Zona Torrida, nor to thoſe regions, whiche beyonde it are towardes the Pole Meridionall, called by the confeſſion of Ptolomie, landes and ſeas vnknowen. By reaſon whereof both he and the others preſuppoſed, that who ſo euer would paſſe from our Hemiſphere to the Sino Arabico and Sino Perſico, or to the other partes of India, which firſt came to the knowledge of men by the victories of the great Alexander, ſhould be conſtrayned to go thither by lande, or els comming as neare to it as he coulde by the ſea Mediterrane, ſhould performe the reſidue of the way by lande. But the nauigations of the Portugalls haue made knowen in our tyme, that thoſe opinions and ſuppoſitions were falſe, for that the Marchauntes puſhed on with a deſire to gayne, hauing begon many yeres ſince to coaſt Affrica, and being guyded by little and little euen to the Iles of Cape Verde (which the Auncientes named the Iles of Eſperides) which are diſtant xiiij. degrees from the Equinox, drawing towardes the Pole Artike. And beeing comen ſithence, in making a long circuite towards the ſouth, to the cape de bonne Eſperance, which is a promonturie of Affryke, further diſtant then any other from the line Equinoctiall, for that his diſtaunce conteyneth xxxviij. degrees. And drawing from thence towardes the Eaſt, they haue ſayled by the Ocean, euen to the Sino Arabico and Sino Perſico. In which places the marchauntes of Alexandria are wont to buy the ſpices which grew there in part, but for the moſte part were brought thither from the Iles Molucque and other partes of India, and are afterwarde conueyed by land by a way long and full of incommodities, and with no leſſe charges, into Alexandria, where they were ſolde to the marchauntes Venetians, and they bringing them frō Venice, furniſhed all Chriſtendome to their great gaines and wealth: for that they only poſſeſſing the traffike of the ſpices, laide on them what rate or price they woulde, and caried into Alexandria many ſortes of marchaundiſe in the ſhippes wherein they brought embarked the ſpices, the ſame veſſels likewiſe wherein they conuayed that trade of ſpicerie into Fraunce, into Flaunders, Englande, and other places, returning fraughted with other marchandiſe. But the Portugalls going by ſea from Lyshbone the capitall Citie of the Realme, into regions farre remoued, and hauing confederation in the Indian ſea with the kings of Calicut & other regions neare, they pearſed by degrees further, and buylded with time fortreſſes in places conuenient, by whoſe oportunitie making them ſelues friendſhip with certayne cities of the countreis, & reducing others to obedience by their armes and oppreſſion, they haue appropriate to them ſelues the traffike of the ſpices which the marchauntes of Alexandria were wont to haue afore: and bringing them by ſea into Portugall, they diſtributed them alſo by ſea into the ſelfe ſame Realmes and countreys, where the Venetians at the firſte had cuſtome and vent for them. Sure this nauigation is right wonderfull, for that it conteynes a courſe of eyght thouſand french leagues, through ſeas altogether vnknowen, vnder other ſtarres, vnder other firmament, and with other inſtrumentes: for, the lyne Equinoctiall beeing paſſed, they are no more guided by the northſtar, & ſtand altogether depriued of the ſeruice and vſe of the Adamant ſtone, and for that they can not take harbour in ſo long a way, but in regions vnknowen, differing in language, in religion, in cuſtomes, and altogether barbarous and enemies to ſtraungers. And yet notwithſtanding ſo many difficulties, they haue in time made this nauigation ſo familiar, that where afore they had wont to conſume ten monthes in the voyage, they runne it nowe commonly in leſſe then ſixe, their daungers beeing leſſe, and all things in more ſecuritie. But farre more marueylous is the nauigation of the Spaniards, which was begonne by Chriſtopher Colombo a Genoeuay in the yeere a thouſande foure hundred foureſcore and ten: after he had many times ſayled by the Occean ſea, wherin making coniectures by the obſeruation of certayne windes of that which afterwards ſucceeded to him in deede, he obteyned certayne veſſels of the King and Queene of Spayne, with the which ſetting his courſe towards the weſt, he diſcouered at thirtie dayes ende in the vttermoſte extremities of our Hemiſphere, certayne Ilandes altogether vnknowen to men before: regions happie for the ſituation of the heauen, and for the fertilitie of the lande, and withall no leſſe bleſſed (ſauing that certayne people lyued vppon mans fleſhe) by the diſpoſition of thinhabitantes, whoſe maners were ſimple, and contented with that which the liberalitie of nature brought foorth for them: they were not diſquieted with paſſions of couetouſneſſe and ambition: but moſt vnhappie, in that the people hauing no certayne religion, no knowledge in learning, no ſcience in negociations or handycraftes, but wholly without experience of armes, without rule or art of warre, and without ſcience, vſe, or cuſtome in any thing, be as it were no other then tractable and tame creatures, and a pray moſt eaſie to whoſoeuer will aſſayle them. By meane whereof, the Spaniards being drawne with the facilitie of commaunding thoſe Ilands, and with the poſſibilitie of reuenue and profite, beeing plentifull of veynes for golde, many of them began to inhabite there, as in their proper countrey. Chriſtopher Colombo paſſing further, and after him Americo Veſpuccio Florentin, and ſucceſſiuely many others, haue diſcloſed other Ilandes and great countreys of firme lande, finding in certayne of them (albeit in the moſte parte the contrarie) aſwell in their buyldings both publike and priuate, as in the forme of their habites and conuerſation, a conformitie of maners and ciuile comelynes, but ſo farre ignoraunt in the knowledge of armes, that they were a ready pray to the firſt inuader: and yet the limits of theſe newe countreys are ſo farre ſtretched out, that they farre ſurmount the inhabitable circuit of the earth come firſt to the knowledge of man. In theſe regions the Spaniſh enlarging them ſelues with newe ſupplies of people, and with newe nauigations, and ſometimes labouring the mines of golde and ſiluer that are in many places, and alſo in the ſandes of the ryuers, ſometime buying it at eaſie prices of thinhabitantes, or at leaſt taking it from them by robberie and violence, they haue brought infinite quantities into Spayne, many ſayling thither at their proper charges and venture; but vnder licence of the king, to whom they retribute the fift part of all that they bring from thence: yea the Spaniardes haue taken ſuche courage in theſe courſes of nauigation, that certayn ſailes aduauncing three and fiftie degrees towards the Pole Antartike, alwayes along the coaſtes of the firme lande, and afterwardes falling into a ſtraite ſea, from thence ſailing towards the Eaſt by a very large ſea, and returning afterwardes by the nauigation which the Portugals make, they haue (as appeareth clearely) ſailed round about the earth. Which makes me ſay that the Portugalls and the Spaniards, but ſpecially Colombo the firſt finder out of this wonderfull and perillous nauigation, are worthy, whoſe knowledge, induſtrie, reſolutenes, ſtudie, and trauels, be celebrated with eternall memorie, for that by their vertues, our age and all poſterities are made capable of the knowledge of great things which afore laye hidde from the ſence and

vnderstanding of men: but farre greater had bene their merites, if in those paynes, in those perilles, and in those aduentures, they had not bene induced by the immoderate thirst after golde and riches, but caried by desire to disclose them for the benefite and enlarging of Christian faith: A matter neuertheles hapned consequently, for that thinhabitantes in many places haue suffered conuersion to the religion catholike. By these nauigations it is knowen that thancientes were beguyled in many things touching the knowledge of the earth: that there was passage beyonde the line Equinoctiall: that there was habitation vnder the Zona torrida: as also (contrary to their opinion) it is knowen by the nauigation of others, that the Zones next to the Poles were inhabited, vnder the which they assured (hauing regarde to the situation of the heauen so farre remoued from the course of the sunne) that there was no habilitie of dwelling for the ouermuche colde. Besides, it is knowen (which some of thauncientes beleeued, and some rebuked) that vnder our feete be other inhabitantes whom they named Antipodes.

Complaints of the Frenchemen.

But returning now to the matter of our narration of those things which hapned the yere a thousande fiue hundred and foure, after Caietta was rendred to the Spanish: The newes of the chase which was giuen to the Frenche neare Garillan, ioyned to so many disorders and aduersities that followed, made sorrowfull almoste the whole realme of Fraunce, no lesse for the genetall multitude of bodies that were slayne, then for the losse of so great a nobilitie: The Court accompanying their teares and weepings with habites of sorowe and mourning, filled all full of heauyneste and affliction, and throughout the realme nothing was harde with more compassion, then the lamentable complaynings of men and women accursing the day wherein the miserable humor of couetousnesse to conquer estates in Italie entred the heart of their kings, to whom, if any thing might satisfie the desires of men, the proprieties and possessions of so many of their owne countreys might haue sufficed. In these perplexities the king was not without his proper calamitie, and to him so muche the more intollerable, by howmuche in so great a diminution of his authoritie and reputation, he sawe also a depriuation of hope neuer to be able to recouer so noble a realme, his losses farre exceeding the remedies that remayned. He called to remembraunce the braue words which he had so often obiected agaynst the king of Spayne, and howe vaynely he had promised to him selfe a successe of those huge preparations whiche he made to inuade him on all sides. But that which made him ryse most of all into furie and complaynt, was the consideration of his plottes layde with so great wisedome and expences, that notwithstanding his importunities and diligence in the prouision of his warres so plentifully & liberally furnished, and marching withall with enemies most poore and needie of all things, yet the couetousnes and robberies of his owne people, had turned his glorie into infamie, and made his losses the more lamentable, by howmuche he was betrayed by their corruptions. In so muche as crying out agaynst heauen & earth, he protested with many othes, that since he was serued with so great a negligence and infidelitie of his owne seruauntes, he would from hencefoorth neuer leaue recommended to his captaynes any expedition of warre, and muche lesse reappose him selfe vpon their assuraunce, but that in his owne person he would be the fashioner and follower of all enterprises. To these vexations of minde was ioyned this last and chiefe perplexitie, that he saw how much his forces were weakened for the losse of suche an armie, for the death of so many braue captaynes, and diminution of so flourishing a Nobilitie. All which concurring in one fortune, heaped agaynst him suche an ad-uersitie, that if Maximilian had made any sturre in the duchie of Millan, or the Spanishe armie had past further then their victorie of Naples, he doubted muche to be hable to defende that estate, specially Askanius Sforce ioyning to the one of them, " whom the people desired with no little affection. So daungerous are the ylles that " are feared by a reuolution of estate, which for the most part drawes with it all those " miseries which may be figured in an vtter ruine or desolation. Touching the king of Romaines, no man maruelled that he was not wakened in so great oportunitie, for that it was his custome to delay, and to let passe for the most part tymes and occasions. But euery one helde a contrarie persuasion of Consalue, for that all the French faction in Italie had a wonderfull feare, least he, hoping that neither money, nor occasions would faile his victorious armie, would not ioyne him selfe to his fortune to followe the subuersion of the state of Myllan, and in his way, to chaunge the affaires of Tuskan: which if he had done, it was beleued assuredly that the French king, drained of money, and appalled in courage, had yelded to the storme without any resistaunce, specially his people hauing no desier to passe into Italie, and such as remained of the calamity of Caietta in passing the mounts, hauing despised the commaundements of their king presented at Genes: besides, it was clearely discerned that the king, hauing no inclination to armes, was whollie prepared to make peace with Maxymylian, and no lesse disposed to continue the negotiations and practises with the king of Spayne, for the solicitation wherof (not commoned vpon in the extreame heate of the warre) the spanish Embassadors, had bene and were at that time at the court: but Consalue, whom hereafter we will call for the most parte, The great Capteine, hauing confirmed with so many glorious victories the surname that before had bene giuen him by a spanish bragge, refused to embrace the benefit of so great an occasion: either for that, being altogether without money, and indetted to his armie for many paies, he saw it impossible to make his people marche eirher vnder hope of profit that was to be wonne with perill, or in promise of their payes which would be long in comming, his regiments crying either to be satisfied, or to be bestowed in garrison: or else, he was tyed to proceede according to the will of his king, whose direction it was not lawfull for him to transgresse: or at the least it seemed not to agree with his security, to draw his army out of the kingdom of Naples, till first he had purged it of all his enemies: for that Lovvys d'Ars one of the French capteines, who, since the iorney of Cirignoula had put himself within Venousa with such remeinders of Frenchmen as were not to be despised, & who, whilest the armies were vpon the shoares of Garillan, had occupied Troya, and S. Seuero, kept also in deuotion all Povvylla: certayne Barons also of the faction of Aniovv, which were retyred vpon their estates, stoode to their defence, embracing openly the parte of the Frenche king. There was lastly this impediment, that a little after the victorie the great Captayne fell into a daungerous sicknes, which staying his personall expedition, he sent Alviano with part of his armie to make warre vpon Lovvys d'ars: By which his necessitie, not hable for the present to follow his victorie out of the kingdome of Naples, the residue of Italie remained rather in suspition, then in trauell, things hanging more in expectation then in action: for, the Venetians, according to their custome, stoode doubtfull, expecting what woulde bee the issue of things: The Florentins thought they had wonne muche, if at a time when they wholly dispayred to be succoured by the Frenche king, they were not inuaded by the Great captayne: And the Pope, referring to another time his ambitious thoughts, studied to bring to passe that the duke Valentynois, who helde no more in Romania but the castels of Furly, of Cesena,

Ceſena, and of Bertinoire, (hauing loſt Forlimpople by corruption of the keper) might accorde to leaue them to him, taking the aduauntage of the time and his impriſonment. Valentynois condiſcended to giue to the Pope the aſſignement of the caſtle of Ceſena, and Dom Petro d'Ouiedo a Spaniarde beeing gone thither to receyue it in the Popes name, was hanged by the caſtlekeper, obiecting that it coulde bee no leſſe diſhonor to him to obey his lorde whyleſt he was a priſoner, then he that preſumed to impoſe that requeſt vpon him deſerued to be puniſhed. By this occaſion the Pope deſpayring to reioyce in his deſire without the deliuerie of Valentynois, he accorded with him (and of this conuention there was a bull diſpatched in the conſiſtorie for greater ſuretie) that he ſhoulde be ſet in the rocke of Oſtia, vnder the abſolute power of Bernardin Caruagiall a Spaniard Cardinall of S. Croce, and he to let him go when ſoeuer he had rendred to the Pope the caſtels of Ceſena and Bertinoire, and transferred to the Pope the aſſignation of the rocke of Furly, and appoynted in the towne of Rome, bankers to aunſwere fifteene thouſande duckets in recompence of the expences which the Caſtlekeeper alleaged he had ſuſtayned: But the Pope had an other intention, for that albeit he woulde not apparauntly defile and breake the fayth he had giuen, yet his meaning was to keepe his deliuerie in delay, eyther for feare leaſt he beeing at libertie, the caſtlekeeper of Furly would refuſe to render the Rocke, or els for the memorie of thiniuries he had receyued of his father and him, or at leaſt for the hate which euery one reaſonably bare him: ſo infallible is the lawe of iuſtice to take reuenge of wrõgs, not obſeruing the preſence of times wherin they are done, but transferring occaſions from one ſeaſon to another, calleth then the iniuries into reckoning, when the offendor hath leaſt memorie of them. Valentynois growing into ſome ſuſpition that the Pope woulde not holde fayth with him, required ſecretly the great Captayne to giue him ſafe conduite to come to Naples, and withall to ſende two Galleys to conuey him from Oſtia: whiche requeſt being condiſcended vntõ by Conſaluo, the Cardinall of S. Croce holding the ſame ſuſpicion with Valentynois, ſuffred him to depart without the Popes priuitie, beeing firſt aduertiſed that pledge was put in for the fifteene thouſande duckets with the redeliuerie vp of the caſtles of Ceſena and Bertenoire. The feare and daunger wherein Valentynois was, made him careles to attende the Gallies which the great captaine ſhoulde ſende him, and therefore beeing ſtill caried with thoſe impreſſions, he went ſecretly by lande to Nettuna, from thence he ſayled in a little barke to Montdragon, and ſo by lande went to Naples, where Conſaluo receyued him with great tokens of gladnes and ſhowes of honour: At Naples he communicated many times in ſecrete with Conſaluo, whom he ſolicited at laſt to giue him power to paſſe to Piſa, aſſuring him that if he might but once put foote into that citie, it would be muche to the profite and furtheraunce of his king. Conſaluo diſſembling his opinion, ſeemed to fauour the deuiſe, and offering him galleis to garde him in paſſing, he ſuffred him to leuie in the kingdome, ſuche regiments of footemen as he thought to carie with him: he enterteyned him in this hope till he had receyued aunſwere from his king conformable to that he had determined to do, alwayes conſulting with him of thaffayres of Tuskane, and Aluiano offering at the ſame time to inuade the Florentins, for the deſire he had to ſee the familie of Medicis reſtored. But as there is no poſſibilitie to auoyde that which the euerlaſting counſell of God hath determined, nor any reaſon to pull on the deſtinie of things till times be accompliſhed: So Valentynois rayſed into thoughtes of ſecuritie, ſtoode readie to his ruine, when he iudged his eſtate in moſt ſtabilitie, euen as a houſe whoſe foundation is not ſounde, falles eſtſones to the ground beeing but newly buylded: for, the gallies beeing now prepared, and his bandes of footemen in readynes to marche the day folowing, Valentynois, after he had deuiſed long the ſame night with Conſaluo, and taking his leaue with demonſtration of great affection embraſing one an other at parting, was by his commaundement, aſſone as he was out of the chamber, reteyned in the caſtell, ſending foorthwith into his lodging to ryfle the ſafeconduit that had bene ſent him before he departed from Oſtia: Conſaluo excuſed him ſelfe vpon thauthoritie of his king, who ſending warrant to apprehende him priſoner, his maieſties cõmaundement (he ſayd) was of more force then his ſafeconduit, for that thaſſuraunce that was giuen by the proper authoritie of a ſeruaunt, was not auaylable if the will of his Lorde conſented not. Beſides, he occupied with him theſe rounde tearmes, that it was neceſſarie to holde him reſtrayned, for that, not ſatisfied with ſo many ſiniſter dealings done in times paſt, he ſtudyed ſtill to chaunge the eſtates of others, he deuiſed to innouate things, he ſewe vniuſt ſlaunders, and caſt to kindle a fyre through all Italie: immediatly after he ſent him in a light galley priſoner into Spayne, leauing him of all his trayne but one page to ſerue him: There he was impriſoned within the caſtle of Medino de campo, hauing good oportunitie by the conſideration of his iuſt puniſhment to enter into cõſcience touching the harmes he had inflicted vpon diuers regions and men.

Valentynois priſoner by Conſaluo.

About this time truce was made both by ſea and lande, aſwell for Italie, as the nations beyonde the Mountes, betweene the Frenche king, and the king of Spayne: which, as the Frenche deſired by neceſſitie, ſo the Spaniſhe embraced it by iuſt reaſon, for that he thought it was better to confirme by that meane with greater ſuretie and reſt, that which he had conquered, then to referre all to hazarde by newe warres, which beeing full of perill and expences, bring forth oftentimes other iſſues then are hoped for: The conditions were that euery one ſhould reteyne that which he poſſeſſed: That it ſhould be ſuffred to the ſubiects of both parties to traffike through all their Realmes and eſtates, except in the kingdome of Naples, with the which exception the great Capteine obteyned indirectly that which was forbidden to him directly: for, in the frontiers of thoſe places which the French helde (which were onely Roſſano in Calabria, Oiro in the lande of Otranto, and in Povvylla, Venouſa, Conuerſan, and the Mount caſtle) Conſaluo beſtowed men to giue impediment that not one of the ſouldiours or men of thoſe townes ſhould vſe conuerſation with any peece poſſeſſed by the Spaniſhe: A deuiſe which brought them into ſuche neceſſitie, that Lovvys d'ars with the other Barons and ſouldiours of thoſe places, went their way, knowing that thinhabitantes not hable to endure ſo many diſcommodities, were determined to yeelde them ſelues to the Spaniards. So infinite is the malice of fortune, that whom ſhe hath reſolued to roote vp, ſhe will not ſpare to perſecute till his laſt deſolation be come. But for all this, the kingdome of Naples, notwithſtanding thenemies were all expulſed, enioyed not the fruites of the peace: for that the Spaniſh ſouldiours, to whom were due their paies for more then one yere, not contented that the great capteine (the better to conteine them till he had leuied prouiſions for money) had beſtowed them in ſundrie places where they liued vpon the people (which men of warre call to liue by diſcretion) breaking all bondes of diſcipline and obedience, had entred Capua and the ſeacaſtle, from whence they would not depart till they were ſatisfied of their paies: And becauſe the money could not be leauyed by conuenient meanes (the ſumme being great) without laying an exceſſiue taxation of the Realme, the conditions of men were found ſo much

the more miſerable, by howmuche the medicine was no leſſe greeuous then the diſeaſe they went about to cure: matters ſo muche the leſſe eaſie or tollerable, by how muche they were practiſes newe, and out of the examples paſſed: for, notwithſtanding that ſince the auncient times wherein the diſcipline of warre was exerciſed with ſeueritie, the ſouldiours were alwayes full of libertie, and troubleſome to the peoples, yet things beeing as yet not wholly diſordered, they lyued for the moſte parte of their paies, and their libertie was not altogether intollerable. But the Spaniards were the firſt that began in Italie to liue wholly vpon the ſubſtance of peoples, the diſhabilitie of their kings giuing them that occaſion, or happly their neceſſities muche enforcing, beeing yll payde: of which beginning, diſorders ryſing alwayes in increaſing (for thimitation of an yll is greater for the moſt parte then the example) euen the Spaniards themſelues and Thitalians alſo whether they were payed or not payed, haue euer ſince made ſuche cuſtome of that example, that to the great diſhonour of the diſcipline of warre at this day, the goods of good men and friends are no more aſſured from thinſolencie of ſouldiours, then ſuche as belong to wicked people and the very enemie, all things running in confuſion without regarde to obedience, conſcience, or honour, as the horſe when he hath broken his brydle forbeareth not in his libertie to ſpoyle the feeldes of his maſter, as if he were a ſtranger.

What by the taking of Valentynois, and this truce betweene the two kings, with opinion that the peace would ſucceede immediatly, Romania was put wholly in reſt: for Imola was diuolued afore by the willes of the chieftaines of the Citie into the power of the Pope, and not without the conſent of Cardinall S. George, whom the Pope enterteined with a vayne hope that he would render it eſtſones to his nephews. And about thoſe ſeaſons Lovvys his baſtard brother being entred into Furly by the death of Anthony d'Ordelaffy, that citie had falne into the hands of the Venetians, to whom Lovvys offred it (knowing he was not hable ynough to holde it) ſaying that the conditions of the preſent time made them feare to accept it, leaſt they ſhould further incenſe the Pope, who without any reſiſtance obteined the towne abandoned by Lovvys, and had likewiſe, paying fifteene thouſande duckets, the Citadell: A place which the keeper (a faythfull ſeruaunt to Valentynois) woulde neuer giue vp, till he was aſſured of his impriſonment by men which he ſent expreſly to Naples, holding it a iuſt office to reteyne to the laſt, thoſe things which his maiſter had recommended to his fidelitie.

Thus, beeing a ſurceaſſing of armes in all other partes of Italie, the Florentins only woulde not ceaſe in the beginning of ſommer to recontinue the warres vpon the Piſans according to their cuſtome: for, hauing newly receyued into their pay Iohn Paule Baillon, with other captaynes and men at armes of the Colonnois and Sauelles, and leauying withall farre greater forces then they were wont, they ſent an armie to giue the ſpoyle to the corne of the Piſans, wherein they proceeded with greater corage, for that they doubted no impediment by the Spaniarde, not ſo muche for that the king of Spayne had not named the Piſans in the truce (wherein both the kings had libertie to comprehende their freends and adherents) as for that the great Captaine, after his victorie vpon the Frenchmen, notwithſtanding from the beginning he had giuen great hopes to the Piſans, had exerciſed gracious and ſweete ſpeches with the Florentins, hoping at the leaſt by his cunning to ſeparate them from the French king: wherein albeit he founde himſelfe afterwardes diſappoynted, yet wiſely forbearing to incenſe them, as not to giue them occaſion to be more for the

Frenche king, he was entred by the meane of Prosper Colonno (but not otherwise then with wordes simplie) into this secrete intelligence with them, that if it hapned the Frenche king ettsones to renewe the warres of Naples, that they should not minister to him any ayde, as also for his parte he woulde not giue succours to the Pisans, but in case the Florentins should sende an armie with artilleries to take the Citie, which he wished they should not recouer so long as they folowed thamitie of the Frenche king. The Florentin armie prepared to spoyle not onely those partes of the countrey of Pisa which they had wasted in times past, but also to ouerrunne S. Rossoro and Barbaricino, and so to the vales of Serclo and Osolo, places ioyning to Pisa, wherevnto they could not go without daunger when their armie was lesse: Then they encamped before Librafrata, which beeing manned with a very slender garrison, was within few dayes constrained to yeelde to discression: And suche were the calamities of that yere, that the Pisans had beene compelled by famine to receyue the yoke of the Florentins, if they had not bene succored by their neighbours, but principally by the Genovvaies and Lucqueis (for P. Petructio no lesse ready to stirre vp others, then liberall in his owne promises to contribute to thexpences, was very long in effectes) with whose moneis Reniero of Sassetto, a souldiour of the Great capteine, with certaine other leaders hauing sufferaunce, led to Pisa by sea two hundred horsmen, and the Genovvaies sent thither a Prouost with a thousand footemen: ouer and besides which prouisions, Bardello de porto Venere a famous Roauer in the sea Tirreneum, and who beeing leauyed and payed by the sayde helpers, was called the captayne of the Pisans, reuitteled Pisa continually with a gallion and other Brigantines: for these considerations the Florentins, holding it necessarie, that besides the trauels they gaue them by lande, they should also take from them the vse of the sea, enterteined three light galleis of king Federyk whiche were in Prouence, with the which as their capteine Dom Rimas Ricaieuso approched Lyuorno, Bardello retyred, and yet sometimes taking thoccasion of the windes, he brought some barkes laden with vittayles to the mouth of Arno, from whence they fell easily into the towne of Pisa, which at the same time suffered many perplexities by lande: for, after the armie of Florence had taken Librofratto, deuiding them selues into many legions, they looked how to giue impediment to the tilling of the landes for the yeere folowing, and to restrayne the passage of vittels both by the way of Lucque and the sea: they gaue also in the ende of the sommer, a spoyle to all sortes of graynes, whereof that countrey brings foorth a great quantitie: Their furie left nothing vnproued agaynst the ruine of the Pisans: for neyther weeried with the great expences, nor holding impossible any thing that gaue them hope to accomplishe their purpose, they deuised to trouble the Pisans in a newe fashion, that is, by a new chanell to make fall the riuer of Arno which runneth by the towne of Pisa, from the towre of Fagiana fyue miles from Pisa, into the poole which is betweene Pisa and Liuorna: whiche if they had brought to passe, there coulde haue bene no more portage of things to Pisa by sea through the ryuer of Arno, and the rayne waters for that the countrey is lowe, not hable to be conueyed into the sea, the Citie had remained as it were in the middest of a marishe, as also for the difficultie to passe Arno, the Pisans coulde not haue ronne from thence forwarde along the hilles to hinder the traffike from Lyuorno to Florence: And lastly they should haue bene constrained to fortifie that part of Pisa by the which the ryuer entred and issued, least it should be open to thincursions of thenemie. But this enterprise as it was begonne with a very great hope, and folowed with farre greater expences, was in the ende made vayne: and as it often

hapneth that like enterprises, notwithstanding they be layde out by measure and line, are yet founde fallible by experience, which is the certayne proofe of the difference that is betweene the deuising and doing of things: so besides many difficulties, not considered before, and now caused by the course of the ryuer, which when they thought to restrayne, abated of him selfe fretting his channell: the bottome of the poole where they woulde haue it enter, contrarie to the reasons and opinions of many ingenistes and water workers, was founde to be higher then the channell of Arno: Besides, in so great a desire to obteine Pisa, fortune enuyed also the ambition of the Florentins, for that the galleys whiche they had enterteyned returning from Villefranche with a prise of the Pisans loaden with grayne, were so weather beaten neare to Rapallo, that they were constrayned to giue agaynst the grounde, the capteine with the residue hauing great payne to saue them selues. But the Florentins, whose desire of the victorie was without limit, sought to serue their turne of all the meanes whiche eyther the witte of man or oportunitie of the tyme coulde deuise: And therefore after they had proued in vayne to raunge the Pisans by armes and threatnings, they sought to reclayme them by affabilitie and sweetnes, making a newe lawe, by the which it was graunted that euery Citizen or other subiect of the countrey of Pisa that within a certeine tyme woulde eftsones withdrawe to his lyuing or dwelling place, should obteine pardon of all faultes committed, with full restitution of goods. Notwithstanding the fauor of this lawe, there were very fewe of hart and fayth resolute, which would depart out of Pisa, but they suffred all suche as were vnprofitable to the warre to take the benefite of thedict, and go their way: the same being the cause that both the dearth of vittels which raged afore was not now so great, and also that they receyued afterwards certayne commoditie of reuenues from others that secretly ayded them: whereby albeit the necessities of the Pisans were somewhat by these meanes diminished, yet they founde their estate greuously vexed with their great pouertie & wantes: And yet, hauing all things in lesse horror then the name of the Florentins, notwithstanding the minds of the Peisantes did oftentimes wauer, they determined to endure all extremities of miserie, rather then to returne to the deuotion of the Florentins: Therefore they offred to giue themselues vp to the Genovvayes, with whom they had so oftentimes fought for the iurisdiction and for their safetie, and by whom their power had bene of long antiquitie afflicted and embased: of this motion they of Lucquei and Pandolffe Petruccio were the causes, desiring (to auoyde in them selues the continuall expences and troubles) to binde the Genovvaies to the defence of Pisa: And for their more easie inducing to the matter, they offred to defray part of the expences for three yeres. Wherevpon the Genovvaies, hauing a deliberation to embrace the offer, notwithstanding Iohn Lovvu de Fiesque with many others, were agaynst it, made an instance to the French king to suffer them, without whose consent they had no power to execute any deliberation: They debated with the king howe daungerous it woulde be that the Pisans, excluded from this their last and almost only hope, should come to offer them selues to the king of Spayne, from whence would succeede to his great preiudice, that both Genes should be in continuall trauell and danger, and almost all Tuskane by compulsion, followe the Spanish faction. These reasons, albeit at the beginning had so much wrought with the king, that he was almost at a poynt to gratifie their demaundes, yet his counsell considering, that if the Genovvaies should beginne to accept warres of them selues, and for a desire of imperie, to haue confederation with other Potentates, it would be the cause, that comming afterwards to rayſe their thoughts to greater things, they would put their ſtate into abſolute libertie: he forbad them expreſly to accept the iuriſdiction of Piſa, but not that they ſhould forbeare to ayde or ſuccour them, notwithſtanding the Florentins had made great complaynts, perticular reſpectes bearing more force in theſe matters, then equitie, conſcience, or compaſſion.

About this time the peace was earneſtly laboured betweene the kings of Spayne and Fraunce, who offred diſſemblingly to render the realme of Naples to the king Federike, or to the duke of Calabria his ſonne: to whom the French king ſhould reſigne and giue vp all his clayme, ſo farre foorth as the mariage were accompliſhed betwene the duke and the queene widowe, Nece to the ſame king, hauing afore bene wife to yong Ferdinand of Aragon king of Naples. And it was without doubt that the French king had a mind ſo farre eſtranged from the affaires of the kingdome of Naples, that for his owne regarde, he had accepted all ſorts of peace, if it had not bin for theſe two difficulties that reſtrayned him: the one (of leſſe moment with him then the other) was the ſhame and reproches that would be thundred vpon him, to leaue abandoned the barons, who, for that they folowed his faction, had ſuffred priuation of their eſtates, and to whom were offred conditions hard & intollerable: the other (working ſomewhat more ſtrongly with him) was the doubt wherin he was, leaſt the king of Spayne hauing other intentions, offred according to his accuſtomed ſuttleties, this reſtitution for ſome ende, that though his maieſties conſenting, yet the effect ſhould not folow: and that iñ the meane while the archduke were not eſtranged frõ him, who deſiring to haue the kingdome of Naples for his ſonne, made inſtance that there ſhould be cõtinuation of the peace which he had begon before. Therfore he anſwered generally that he deſired the peace, but that he could not with honor giue vp to an Arragon, the rights which he had in the ſame realme: And on the other part, he continued the auncient practiſes with the king of Romaines, & tharchduke: wherin as he was almoſt certaine of the concluſion & effect, & to thend they ſhould not be cut of nor hindred by the incerteine practiſes of the king of Spayne, he let call before him the Spaniſh embaſſadors, making his colour for his greater honor, that the reſpects & intereſts of the barõs did chiefly moue him: and being ſet in the chaire royal in the aſpect & preſence of al the court with ſolẽne ceremonies far aboue the vſage of times before: he cõplained that their king expreſſed in words his deſire and diſpoſition to the peace, hauing his intẽtions diſſembled, in which regard, & alſo for that it was not a thing worthy the vertue and honor of a king to conſume the tyme in vayne practiſes, he tolde them it were their beſt to depart out of the Realme of Fraunce. After whoſe going away, thembaſſadours of Maximilian and tharchduke came to giue perfection to that which had bene negociated, In whiche action (becauſe there were plottes layed to greater purpoſes) was aſſiſtant the Biſhop of Sifteron the Popes ordinarie Nuncio in that Court, and the Marquis of Finalo whome the Pope ſent expreſly in thoſe affayres. This peace hauing bene many times afore throughly debated for the profite which appeared very great to all thoſe Princes, was finally ſet downe vnder theſe conditions: That the mariage of Lady Claude the French kings daughter, commoned vpon long time before, ſhould now grow to effect with Charles theldeſt ſonne to tharchduke: And for more firme confirmation of the ſame, there ſhoulde be ioyned to the othe and ſubſcription of the Frenche king, the ratification of Frauncis Counte of Angueſme, who (iſſue male fayling in the king was next heire to the crown) together with many of the principals of the kingdome: That all thinueſtitures of the ſtate of Millan allowed till that day, being razed and cancelled for iuſt and honeſt occaſions Maximilian ſhould transferre thinueſtiture thereof to the French king for him ſelfe and heires males, and for want of ſuche iſſue it ſhoulde be (in fauour of the mariage) conueyed to Madame Claude, and to Charles, and if Charles ſhoulde dye before the conſummation of the mariage, then it to diſcende to Lady Claude, and to the ſeconde ſonne of the Archduke if ſhe maried with him: That betweene the Pope, the king of Romains, the Frenche king, and Tharchduke, ſhould be made a confederation for their common defence, and to offende the Venetians, from whome they all determined to withdrawe thoſe places whiche they occupied of theirs: That the king of Romains ſhould paſſe in perſon into Italie agaynſt the Venetians, and afterwards go to Rome to take the crowne imperiall: That the Frenche king, aſſoone as the Charters ſhoulde be diſpatched, ſhoulde pay for thinueſtiture threeſcore thouſande florins of Rhein, and threeſcore thouſande others within ſix monthes, and euery yeere a payre of ſpurres of golde vppon the day of the natiuitie of our Lorde: That there ſhoulde be place left for the king of Spayne to enter into this confederation within foure monthes: But it was not expreſſed, that in caſe he did not enter, it ſhoulde bee ſuffred to the Frenche king to inuade the kingdome of Naples: That the Frenche king ſhoulde giue no more ayde nor ſuccours to the Counte Palatine, who ſtirred vp by him, and enterteyned with hope of his ſuccours, was in great warre with the king of Romains: That the Venetians ſhoulde be excluded out of this league, notwithſtanding that both the king had giuen willing eare to their Embaſſadours, and alſo the Cardinall of Amboiſe (to cleare them from all ſuſpition) had nouriſhed them with aſſured promiſes and othes, that the king would neuer go agaynſt that confederation which he had with them. Theſe matters were conteyned in letters which were ſolemnly paſſed: beſides the which it was moued that the king & Maximilian ſhould ſpeake together at an other time in ſome place conuenient: The king alſo promiſed at that time that he would deliuer out of priſon Lodouvyk Sforce, and indue him with conuenient meane to liue in the realme of Fraunce. The ſafetie of this man, the king of Romaines had ſhame not to procure, for that his conſcience put him in remembrance, that the promiſes he had made him, and the hopes he had vaynly reappoſed in him, had bene cauſes to haſten his ruine: In which conſiderations, hauing no power to do what he would, at leaſt he expreſſed inclination to do what he could, in ſo much as when the cardinall of Amboyſe went to him at Trent, he wrought ſo much as he ſhould no more be ſo ſtraightly kept as he had bin, making now importunate inſtance that he might remeine at libertie in the court of Fraunce, or in ſuche quarter of the realme as it pleaſed the king: The king promiſed alſo at his requeſt, that the exiles of the duchie of Myllan ſhould returne, whervpon were many difficulties in the negociation of Trent: it was beleeued that he would kepe this capitulation being ſo greatly to the aduantage of tharchduke and Maximilian, notwithſtãding his ordinarie variations, the Pope being cõprehended, and no leſſe agreable to the French king, not ſo much for the deſire he had at that time to make newe enterpriſes, as for an ambicious reſpect to obteine thinueſtiture of the duchie of Millan, and to be aſſured not to be moleſted neither by Ceſar nor his ſonne.

In theſe ſeaſons dyed king Federyk, beeing wholly depriued of hope to recouer by accorde the kingdome of Naples, notwithſtanding he was perſwaded afore (euery one naturally ſuffreth him ſelfe to be beguyled by deſire) that the king of Spayne had a better deuotion to it then the Frenche king: he conſidered not that in that tyme it was a thing vayne to hope for the reſtitution of ſo noble a Realme, The death of king Federike.

the examples being very rare in times farre more auncient and before, wherein men were more disposed to actes of vertue and nobilitie, then they were in the time running: he saw not also that it was a thing out of all likelyhood, that he which had vsed so many deceites to occupie the moyne of the kingdome, would nowe that he hath wonne all, deprive him selfe of the fruite & glory of his victorie: Besides in the common reason & discourse of affaires, he might haue perceiued, that the one made no lesse difficultie then the other: onely he had more reason to doubt that he that was already possessed, would not restore, then he which helde nothing in the kingdome, would not consent.

The death of Elizabeth Queene of Spayne.

In the end of this yere, Elizabeth queene of Spayne exchanged this life for a better: she was a Lady of most honest & honorable conditions, & won in the opinion of her subiects a right worthy name of magnanimity, modesty, & discretion: to her did properly apperteine the kingdome of Castillo, which is the greater part of Spayne, to the which she succeeded after the death of Henry her brother, but not without bloud & warre: for albeit it was beleeued for a long time that Henry by nature was vnhable to procreation, and for that reason Beltramise could not be his daughter which was brought foorth by his wife, and by him nourished many yeres as a frute of his owne seede: And albeit for that occasion Elizabeth daughter of Henry was acknowledged for Princesse of Castill, a title neareste to the succession: yet many barons of the realme rising after his death in fauor of Beltramise, & the king of Portugall ministring succors by armes in the right of a friend, alie and confederat, the factions cõming at last to battel, the cause of Elizabeth was approued most iust by the issue of the fielde, Ferdinand of Aragon her husband leading tharmy, who likewise was discẽded of the house of the kings of Castill, & conioyned to Elizabeth in the third degree of cõsanguinitie, and he afterwards succeding by the death of Iohn his father to the realme of Aragon, they both tooke vpõ them by one ioynt right the title of king & queene of Spayne: for that the kingdome of Valence being vnited to the crowne of Aragon, together with the countrie of Catalogna, they were Lords ouer al the prouince of Spayne, whiche is conteined betwene the Mounts Pirenei, the Occean sea, & the Middle earthsea: And vnder this title, for that that region hath bin occupied by many kings of the Mores, the title of many kingdomes is cõprehended, euery one of thẽ making a title separat by him selfe: except notwithstanding the kingdome of Granado, which being at that time possessed by the Mores, was afterwards by the vertue of this king & queene gloriously subdued to the empire of Castille, together with the title & kingdome of Portugall, & the realme of Nauarre much inferior, al which had kings particular: But the kingdome of Aragon, with Cicilia, Sardignia, and other Ilands apperteining by inheritance to Ferdinand, were gouerned by him only without interposing the name or authoritie of the queene, contrarie to the policie and course of gouernment in Castille: the reason was for that that kingdome belonging by lawe of succession to Elizabeth, and standing in a state endowed to Ferdinand, things were administred vnder their common name aswell in demonstrations as in effects, nothing beeing executed which was not debated, ordeined, & subscribed by them both: The title of the king of Spayne was common, their Embassadours dispatched in cõmon, their armies leauyed in common, their wars administred in cõmon, and neither of them in particular appropriating more then the other in authoritie, and gouernment of the kingdome. But by the death of Elizabeth without issue males, the succession of Castille, by the laws of that kingdome, which regarding more the proximitie then the sex, exclude not the woman, belonged to Iane the daughter of Ferdinand & her, and wife wife to tharchduke, their eldeſt daughter which had ben maried to Emanuell king of Portugal, together with her litle ſonne, being dead long time before: By reaſon wherof thadminiſtration of the realme dowager apperteining by the end of the mariage, no more to Ferdinand, he was eftſones to returne into his litle kingdome of Aragon: litle in cõpariſon of the realme of Caſtill, for the ſtraitnes of the countrey, & ſmalnes of the reuenues, and for that alſo the kings of Aragon, not hauing abſolute regall authoritie in all things, be in many poynts ſubiect to the conſtitutions and cuſtomes of the ſame prouinces, which limit much the power of their kings. But Elizabeth drawing towards hir lateſt time, ordeined by hir teſtament that Ferdinand, ſo long as he liued ſhould be gouernor of Caſtillo, aſwel for that ſhe deſired it might be kept in his firſt greatnes, for the amitie that had bene mutual betwene them, as alſo for that ſhe knewe it concerned the profite of hir ſubiects to be continued vnder the moderate gouernment of Ferdinand, and imported no leſſe the commoditie of hir ſonne in law and daughter, who, ſeeing in the ende they ſhould likewiſe ſucceede Ferdinand, had reaſon to eſteme it much to their behoof, that vntil Philip, borne & noriſhed in Flaũders where things were gouerned diuerſly, had attained a riper age, & taken a greater knowledge of the laws, cuſtomes, nature, & maners of Spayne, al their realmes might be preſerued for them vnder one peaceable & well ordred gouernment, the coũtreis of Caſtill & Aragon being meinteined in the meane while as one ſelfe body. But as in mortall actions the wit of man is inſufficient to ſet downe a firme ſtabilitie, for that all things vnder the higheſt circuite haue their proper reuolutions: ſo, litle helped the wiſe prouiſions of this Queene, to ſtay the alteration of things, for that after her death newe accidents hapning in Spayne, the ſtate tooke a newe forme of gouernment. But touching thaffayres of Italie, as we meane to expreſſe hereafter, they were better diſpoſed to a newe peace.

Teſtament of Queene Elizabeth.

The yere 1505. things continued in the ſame eſtate of tranquilitie wherin they had bene noriſhed the yere before, which was ſuch, that had not the quarell betwene the Florentins and Piſans brought ſome alteration, the actions of armes for that yeere had wholly ſurceaſed, one part of the potentates beeing deſirous of peace, and the other that were enclined to warre, holden reteyned for many reaſons: for, it ſuffiſed the king of Spayne (who continued ſtill the ſame title, and as yet traueled with the thoughtes of his dead wife) to keepe the kingdome of Naples by meane of the truce that had bene made. The Frenche king was entred into a great ſuſpicion, for that Ceſar following in this as in all other things, his wandring nature, had not ratified the peace: The Pope, albeit he was deſirous of innouation and newe things, yet he neyther durſt nor coulde ſtirre onleſſe he were accompanied with the armes of ſome mightie Prince: And the Venetians eſteemed it to no ſmall grace, if in ſo great conſulte and counſell of things agaynſt them, and in ſo yll a diſpoſition of the Pope, they ſtoode quiet and were not moleſted by others: wherein the better to appeaſe the Pope, they had offred many monthes before to leaue him Rimini and all that they had poſſeſſed in Romania ſince the death of Pope Alexander, to thende he did conſent that they might reteyne Faenza with his territories: This offer they made alſo for feare they had of the Frenche king, and for that Ceſar at the ſolicitation of the Pope, had ſent his Embaſſadours to Venice to ſommon them to make reſtitution of the landes of the Churche: But the Popes aunſwere was ſo reſolute, that they paſſed no further: he tolde them according to the conſtancie of his minde, and his free nature to expreſſe his conceytes, that he woulde not conſent to the reteyning onely of a little towre, but dyd hope to recouer before his death bothe Rauenna and Cernia, cities whiche they poſſeſſed no leſſe iniuſtly then they did Faenza: with whiche aunſwere they kepte ſuſpended their further ſutes till the beginning of the ſommer, when their feares beeing become greater, they offred by the meane of the Duke of Vrbin (a friende indifferent) to reſtore all that they had occupied which was not of thappurtenances of Faenza and Rimini, ſo that the Pope, who would not afore admit their Embaſſadours to tender their obedience, would nowe conſent to receyue them. This demaunde albeit the Pope ſhewed him ſelfe ſomewhat harde to accept, ſuppoſing he ſhould do wrong to his dignitie, as not conuenient to allowe it, remembring the great quarrels and threatnings he had made to them: yet hauing regarde to the perplexities that were endured by them of Furly, Ymola, and Ceſena, who depriued of the greateſt parte of their countreis, ſuffred many incommodities: And ſeeing withall no other meane to redreſſe things with ſpede, for that the affaires betweene Ceſar & the French king proceeded with ſo great a longnes of time and delay: at laſt he conſented to that which in effects was a gayne without loſſe, ſince neither by wordes nor writings he was bounde to any thing: So that after the townes were reſtored, eight embaſſadors of the principals of the Senate choſen ſince he was created Pope, were ſent to him, (The greateſt companie and moſt honorable ſhewe of Embaſſadors which that commonweale had euer ſent to any Pope, if he were not a Venetian:) But after they had tendred their obedience with the ceremonies accuſtomed, they brought not backe to Venice any ſigne by the which they coulde gather that the Pope was become more eaſie or tractable: ſo deepe were thimpreſſions of his miſliking agaynſt them: or els ſo cunningly coulde he diſſemble contrarie to his owne promiſes and their expectations. About this time the French king deſiring to put ende to that which had bene debated, ſent the Cardinall of Amboyſe to Haguenau a towne of baſe Almaine, where Ceſar & Tharchduke attended him, hauing newly taken that towne vpon the Counte Palatin: There were publiſhed & ſworne ſolemnly the conuentions that had bene made, the Cardinall paying the moytie of the money promiſed for thinueſture, with promiſe that Ceſar ſhould receyue thother moytie aſſoone as he ſhould paſſe into Italie: notwithſtanding, both at the preſent he gaue to vnderſtand, and a little after he declared, that he could not paſſe that yere for thimpedimentes which were in Germanie: the ſame making the ſuſpition of warre ſo much the leſſe, the French king being determined to enter into no new attempt without him. Only, the warre almoſt continuall betweene the Florentins and Piſans, remeined kindled in Italie, the which proceeding by eaſie degrees, and not purſued but when occaſions offred to the one or the other partie, who otherwiſe had no one ſetled enterpriſe: it hapned that Luke Sauelle iſſued out of Caſſina, in which lande the Florentins made their retraite of warre, and with him certeyne captaynes and conſtables of the Florentins, with foure hundred horſe and many bandes of footmen, their intention was to reuittell Librafatta, and by the ſame meane to leauie certayne heards of cattell of the Piſans feding on the other ſide the ryuer of Sercle vpon the grounds of the Lucquoys, not ſo muche for the benefite and pillage of the pray, as for the deſire they had to drawe the Piſans to the feight, hauing a confidence to ouerthrowe them for that they were the ſtronger in the fielde: And when they had conueyed vittels into Librafatta, & poſſeſſed the pray they pretended, they returned with leiſure by the ſame way, to thende to intiſe the Piſans with that oportunitie to come and charge them. Tarlatin chiefe commaunder ouer their men of warre, iſſued out of Piſa aſſone as he vnderſtoode thenemie droue away their cattell: And bicauſe the

chiefe poynt of the reskue reſted in expedition, he tooke no moe with him then fifteene men at armes, fortie light horſemen, and threeſcore footemen, leauing order that a greater ſtrength ſhould follow him: ſo neceſſarie is ſpeede in enterpriſes, that oftentimes they are wonne and loſt with a leſſe meaſure & diſtance of time, then is required to conſult vpon them: But the Piſan capteine vnderſtanding that certayne of the Florentin horſemen were runne vp euen to S. Iackes neare Piſa, he made towards them, and they retyring to their ſtrength which ſtayed at the bridge Capella vpon the ryuer of Oſolo, and three myles from Piſa, where they taried for the droues of cattell that were taken, and the Mulets with the which they had reuitteled Librafatta comming behinde, and as yet beyonde the bridge, which the firſt bandes of footmen had occupied, and manned the loopeholes and trenches: Tarlatin followed them euen to the bridge, not perceyuing that all tharmie of the Florentins were in that place, till he was ſo neare that he coulde not returne without manifeſt daunger: and therefore, as neceſſitie is mightie to make men reſolute, ſo he determined to make way by his valour, and to charge the bridge, declaring to his company that that wherevnto their perill conſtrayned them was not without great hope and poſſibilitie to ouercome, for that in a place ſo ſtraite where fewe men could fight, the great number of their enemies was more fearefull then hurtfull, the narrownes of the place hindring the vſage of the weapon wherewith they ſhould ſtrike them: In ſo muche that albeit they could not make their paſſage ouer the bridge, at the leaſt they ſhould eaſily mainteine their owne defence till the regiments of Piſa, which he had ſent for, were come to their ſuccours: But if they could winne the bridge, the victorie would be no leſſe eaſie then thattempt was glorious, for that the way beyond the bridge which runneth betwene the bridge & the moũtaine being ſtraite & narrow, the multitude of their enemies encombred with the mulets & beaſtes they had ſtolne, would of themſelues fall eaſily into diſorder, being drawen into a place ſo incõuenient either to fight or to flee: His words were iuſtified with dedes: for he being the formoſt, giuing with great valor the ſpurs to his horſe, charged the bridge, but being cõpelled to retire, an other did the like, and after him a thirde, whoſe horſe being hurt, the capteine returned with great furie to ſuccour him, & in that veyne of corage what with the force of his weapõ & furie of his horſe, he paſſed on the other ſide the bridge, the footemen that defended making him place: foure others of his cõpanie did the like by his example, all which whileſt they enterteined the skirmiſh on the other ſide the bridge with the footmen of thenemie in a ſtraite medowe, certeine footemen of the Piſans paſſed ouer the ryuer in water vp to the chinne, the horſmen likewiſe paſſing without impediment ouer the bridge whiche was nowe abandoned, beſides the ſuccours expected from Piſa, beginning to ariue without order: wherein the Florentin ſouldiours ſeeing their ſafetie turned into perill, and their bodies and weapons reduced into a place ſtraite and narrowe, fell into confuſion amongſt them ſelues, and as men whoſe confidence was turned into cowardnes, and nothing but feare appearing in their faces which had wont to expreſſe courage and reſolution, hauing no capteine of authoritie to reteine them in order, they turned their backes and fell to flying: in ſo much that they which were farre mightier in forces, and marched in order and obſeruance of warre, left the victorie to thoſe whoſe numbers were farre inferior, and came altogether disbanded, with intention rather to make ſhowe onely, then to fight in deede: many capteines of the Florentin footemen and other gentlemen of marke were the miſerable monuments of this ouerthrowe, for that many of them were ſlaine, mo taken, and moſte of all

dangerously hurt, and suche as sought safetie in flying fell into the discretion of the vplandishe people of Lucqua, who stripping them, sent them away naked to be beholden with greater greefe of their friends: so spitefull is fortune when she is disposed to oppresse suche as she holdes for hated, that suffring them to escape out of the daunger they feared moste, she leades them into those aduersities they doubted least, taking her pleasure in the afflictions of men. This calamitie of the Florentins brought a great disorder to their affayres in the countrey of Pisa, for that hauing weakened their legions of horsmen within Cassina, they were not hable to lette the Pisans (whom their late victorie had made insolent and proude) to ouerrunne and pill the whole countrey: And that which was of greater importance, Pandolfe Petruccio being entred into a hope by reason of this accident, that they might easily giue impediment to the Florentins for spoyling that sommer the corne of the Pisans, who maynteining defence with their accustomed difficulties, were (but in colde maner) ayded by the Genowaies and Lucquois, for the Siennois succored them rather with counsell, then with money or vittels: he wrought so much that Iohn Paule Baillon, in whom the Florentins reappoſed muche, for that they had bene the principall cause of his returne into Perousa, refused during the time of his seruice, to continue in their pay, alleaging that Marke Anthonie and Mutio Colonno, with Luke & Iacques Sauelles, hauing altogether a greater number of men then he, and being in the same pay, he coulde not remayne there without daunger for the diuersitie of factions: And to thende they should haue lesse time to prouide them selues, he temporised and taried as long as he could, to discloſe wholly that which he had in his thought, and to induce them to giue more fayth and credite to his excuse, he promised the Florentins not to take armes agaynst them: wherin to keepe them the more assured, he left as a gage, his sonne Maletesta a very yong man, in their pay with fifteene men at armes: and because him selfe would not remeine altogether without appoyntment, he tooke pay of the Siennois with threescore and ten men at armes: But because they of Sienna were not hable to support so great expences, the Lucquois who did communicate in that counsell, tooke into their paye with three score and ten men at armes, Troylus Sauellus, who afore was mercenary to the Siennois.

What for the sodayne and vnlooked for departing of Iohn Paule, and the harmes receiued at the bridge Capello, the Florentins looking into their own weaknes, would not that yere giue the spoyle to the lands of the Pisans, forbearing to attempt enterprises till their fortune were better reconciled: yea they saw how farre they were constrained to deuise how they might remedie greater dangers: for thauncient humor of affection being eftsones reuiued in Iohn Paule, and in Pandolfe, they debated secretly with the Cardinall of Medicis to trouble the state of the Florentins, making their principall foundation of Bartlemew Aluiano, who being in some disagreement with the great Capteine, was newly come to Rome, where he drew to him many souldiours with diuers hopes and promises: Wherein it was feared least those counsels would pearse into Cardinall Askanius, with deliberation (if things succeded not happily in Tuskane) to assaile the duchie of Millan, with the ioynt forces of the Florentins, and others consenting to this conspiracie: The reason was, that they had a hope, that assayling it there would easily rise some mutation, seing there was a slender strength of the men at armes of Fraunce, many of the nobilitie were abroade, the peoples much enclined to the name of Sforce, and the French king (on whom was falne a great maladie) languishing in so dangerous extremitie, that for many houres there was a generall dispaire of his health, and though he should somewhat reuiue,

yet his diſeaſe had made him ſo yll diſpoſed that there was no hope of lyfe, and leſſe expectation of action: And ſuch as looked into things with a deper counſell, doubted leaſt Askanius (with whom at that time the Venetian Embaſſadour had familiar conuerſation at Rome) interteined a ſecret intelligence not onely with the great Capteine, but alſo with the Venetians, who had bene of late more ready and more bold to offende the French then in times paſt, for that the French king, who newly was entred into ſuſpition and diſtruſt of the king of Romaines & his ſonne, ſeeing after the death of the Queene of Spayne, what would be the greatnes of the Archduke, forſooke apparantly their amitie, and ayded agaynſt Tharchduke the Duke of Gueldres his ſharpe enemie, and inclined to practiſe particular intelligence with the king of Spayne.

Death of Cardinall Askanius.

But as the thoughtes of men are deceitfull, and their hopes full of infirmitie and frayltie, ſo, whyleſt theſe things were in ſolicitation, the French king, whoſe recouerie was holden deſperate, went dayly growing into health, and Cardinall Askanius dyed ſodenly at Rome of the plague: By whoſe death albeit the dangers to the eſtate of Millan were cut of, yet the plottes layed to moleſt the Florentins were not altogether remoued: and therefore P. Petruccio, John Paule Baillon, and Bartlemevv Aluiano aſſembled together in the borowe of Pregai, vpon the confins of the Peruſins and Sienvois, not with hope to be ſtrong ynough to reſtore the Medicis into Florence, but with this intention that Aluiano entring into Piſa with the wills of the Piſans, ſhould inuade (for the ſuretie of that Citie) the frontier of the Florentins, with deuiſe to paſſe further as occaſion would preſent. Theſe preparations ſmothered hithervnto, beginning nowe to burſt out into light, the Florentins feared muche of the diſpoſition of the great Capteine, both for that they knewe that the time for the which Aluiano was interteined in the Spaniſh pay remeined yet till the next Nouember, and alſo for that they could not beleeue that P. Petruccio would enter into newe enterpriſes without his conſent, ſeeing the ſaid Petruccio, neuer ſatiſfying the French king of the ſummes of money which he promiſed, and hauing often times abuſed him in other properties, depended altogether of the king of Spayne: Beſides, the ſuſpition of the Florentins was augmented in this, that (fearing the Lorde of Plombin, which vas vnder the protection of the Spaniſhe king, to be aſſayled by the Genovvaies) Conſaluo had ſent to Plombin for his ſuretie a thouſand footemen, vnder the charge of Nugno de Campo, and to the riuer of Plombin three ſhips, two galleis, with certeine other veſſels: which forces brought into a place ſo neare the Florentins, gaue them great occaſion to feare that they were not come to ioyne with Aluiano, as he himſelfe aſſured that they were promiſed: But the truth was, that the king of Spayne, after the truce made with the French king, gaue direction (for diminution of thexpences) that aſwell the regiment of Aluiano, as the bands of others which had bene limited, ſhould be reduced to a hundred launces: Wherevpon he taking occaſion to be greeued, did not onely refuſe to binde him ſelfe eftſones with newe othe, but alſo meinteined that he was acquited of the firſt, both for that he was not ſatiſfied of his paies paſſed, and alſo the great Capteine would not holde his promiſe to giue him after the conqueſt of Naples, two thouſande footemen to ſerue his turne agaynſt the Florentins in fauor of the Medicis: Laſtly the minde of Aluiano was trauelling, naturally deſirous of new things, and altogether impacient of thanquilitie and reſt.

The Florentins, for their defence agaynſt ſo violent ſtormes, had recourſe to the French king, who was bounde by the capitulations of protection to defende them with foure hundred launces: they ſent to him to refurniſh them with two hundred,

but he, beeing more caried with couetousnes of money, then with regarde to the prayers of his friends, or compassion of his auncient confederates, aunswered, that he would giue them no succours, if first they made him not satisfied of the thirtie thousande duckets which were due to him by thobligation of protection: And albeit the Florentins made many humble requests and suites, that he would yet temporise and expect a litle, alleaging how muche they were aggreeued with intollerable expences necessarie for their defence: yet being more caried with couetousnes, then with reason or indifferencie, he persеuered obstinately in his deliberation, in so muche as he whom they most suspected, and had most offended, ministred more to their helpe and safetie, then he of whom they seemed to be best assured: & to whom they had done greatest pleasures, finding least safetie where they reapposed moste confidence, and greatest perill where they iustly expected their protection: for the great Capteine desiring that the tranquilitie of Italie should not be troubled, eyther becausе he would not should be broken the practises of peace begonne of newe betweene the two kings, or for that he nourished some deuise to appropriate to him selfe the kingdome of Naples, vsing thoccasion of the death of the Queene, and the sedes of future discord betwene the father in lawe & the sonne: he vsed all diligence to induce Aluiano to reenter into the pay, and commaunded him as a vassall & souldiour of his king to make no further proceeding (beeing nowe gone to Petillano to obey the Popes commaundement to dissolue his companies, or rather to go out of the Churche dominions) vpon payne of depriuation of thestates which he had in the kingdome of Naples, bearing a value in yerely reuenue of seuen thousande duckets: he signified to the Pisans, whom a litle before he had secretly receiued into the protection of his king, and also to the Lorde of Plombin, that they should not receiue him: And he caused to be tolde and offred to the Florentins, that he was content they should haue the seruice of his footemen that were within Plombin, whome he ordeined to be commaunded by M. Anthonio Colonno their capteine: he sent also to P. Petruccio, that he should in no wise support Aluiano, forbidding to followe him Lewys sonne of the Counte Petillano, Frauncis Vrsin, and Iohn de Cery, who were in his pay: But notwithstanding all these inhibitions, Aluiano with whō were Iohn Lewys Vitelli, Iohn Conrad Vrsin, three hundred men at armes, and fiue hundred footmen of good resolution, passed alwayes further though slowly, (they of Sienna furnishing him with vittels) he came at last by the coastes of Sienna into the playne of Searlina, a towne subiect to Plombin, and a little dayes iourney from the frontiers of the Florentins: here came to him a messenger expresly from the great Capteine, to cōmaund him eftsones that he go not to Pisa, nor offende the Florentins: To whom he answered, that he stoode in his libertie, and had election to doo what he list, for that the great Capteine had not holden promise with him. From thence he went to lodge neare to Campilla, a towne of the Florentins, where was occupied a light skirmish betweene him and the Florentin bandes that were assembled at Bibona: he came afterwards vpon the territorie of Cornia betweene the confines of the Florentins and Sugeret, but with plotts and hopes very vncertayne, finding euery day increase of greater difficulties, both for that there came no vittels to him from Plombin, and also Iohn Paule Baillon and the Vitelli, who were gouerned according to the trayne and issue of affayres, fayled to refurnishe him with suche bands of footemen as they had promised: he sawe in P. Petruccio a disposition wandring, and his fauors more doubtfull then before: neither was he assured that the Pisans, for feare to disobey the great Capteine, would receiue him: For which reasons, ioyned to the continuall solicitation

tion that was vſed to recouer him, wherein the hope was ſomuche the greater, by howmuche he refuſed no more to reſt contented with an hundred launces: he retyred to Vignalo, a towne apperteining to the L. of Plombin, giuing out a brute that he taried there to expect the laſt reſolution from Naples: But the Piſans hauing in the meane while condiſcended to receiue him into their towne, he iſſued out of Vignalo, where he had remayned ten dayes: and earely in the morning of the xvij. of Auguſt he appeared with his armie in battel aray, a mile beneath Campilla, hauing an intention to bidde battell to the Florentin armie, whiche was gone to incampe there the day before: But they hauing aduertiſement by well aſſured eſpials comming fugitiue from the campe of Aluiano, leauyed their campe the ſame night, and retyred vnder the walls of Campilla, where Aluiano ſeing an impoſſibilitie to aſſaile them but to his great diſaduantage, he turned to the way of Piſa by the tract that draweth to the tower of S. Vincent fiue myles from Campilla: And of the other part, the bands of the Florentins led by Hercules Bentiuolo, who (by the experience he had of the countrey) deſired nothing more then to fight in that place by reaſon of thopportunitie of his ſeate, tooke the way that goeth from Campilla to the ſayd tower of S. Vincent, holding it better to aduenture the battayle in a place ſo fauourable by many aduantages, then by temporiſing, to make his enemie ſtrong by his proper commodities. Here Hercules ſeuered the light horſemen into two bandes, the one folowed the armie of Aluiano, charging alwayes vpon his tayle & arearegarde, and the other went before to affront thenemie, holding the ſame way by the which the Florentin armie came after: they being comen to the tower before the bandes of Aluiano, and being taken vp in skirmiſhe with thoſe that came firſt, by whom they were eaſily repulſed, retyred toward their armie or maineſtrength, which was now comen within halfe a myle, where bringing tidings that the moſt part of thenemies had already paſſed the tower, Hercules marching lightly, arriued iuſtly vpon their tayle harde by the ruines of the tower of S. Vincent, where their men at armes and footemen had made head: and when he was in full and abſolute paſſage, he charged them reſolutely on the flanke with the moytie of his armie, making them bende after he had enterteyned the feight a good ſpace of time. In this firſt aſſault their footemen were ſo broken and chaſed euen to the ſea, that afterwards they neuer made head: But the horſemen which were withdrawen a bowſhut beyonde the diche of the towre of S. Vincent towards Bibbona, being reaſſembled, aduaunced eftſones their enſignes, and keping themſelues in a cloſe and ſtrong aray, charged with great valour the regiments of the Florentins, and with the ſame vertue repulſed them euen to the diche: by reaſon whereof Hercules cauſed to marche on the reſidue of his people, and drawing thither from all partes the whole body and ſtrength of tharmie, the feight became furious there for a good ſpace of time, the victorie as yet inclining to no part: Aluiano did in that action both the office of a ſouldiour and a capteine, bearing two eſtockados in his face, and laboured paynfully to driue his enemies from that place, which if he had wonne, he had ſtande in great poſſibilitie of the victorie, for that he had eyther turned to him thaduauntages that fauoured his enemies, or at leaſt made the place indifferent without reſpect of parcialitie, leauing things to the triall of vertue and fortune: But Hercules who many dayes afore had giuen him ſelfe aſſurance, that if the battell were performed in that place, the victorie would fal on him, with induſtrie cauſed to be planted vpon the brinke of the tower diche ſixe falconets which he brought with him, with the which he began to batter the campe, who not hable to ſuſteine the furie of thartillerie, began now to ſhake and fall to diſorder: In ſo much as practiſing thoccaſion with the which he had alwayes promiſed himſelfe the victorie, he ſet vpon them furiouſly in many places with the whole forces of his armie: his light horſemen skoured towardes the ſeacoaſtes, with his men at armes he occupied the high wayes, and his infanterie or footemen executed along the playne by the wood, euery one ioyning vertue to his fortune, and with a generall induſtrie made the ſucceſſe of that day happie, for that their furie running through the campe of thenemies, they put them eaſily to the chaſe, Aluiano ſauing himſelfe with muche a do with a very fewe of his lighteſt running horſes flying with him to Montrotondo in the countrey of Sienna: all the reſidue of his people were almoſt taken and ſtripped betweene the tower of S. Vincent and the ryuer of Cecina, hauing loſt all their enſignes: onely ſuch as eſcaped from the generall calamitie of this battell, were a fewe horſemen, who founde more ſaſetie in the ſwiftnes of their horſes, then in their proper vertue or fortune of the day. This was the ende of the commotion or ſtirre of Bartlemevv d'Aluiano, which expreſſed more apparances and greatnes by the practiſes that were made of long time, and by his braue behauiour full of furie and threatnings, then by his forces or any other ſtable fundation which his enterpriſe had: A ſucceſſe common to ſuche who commit their doings wholly to fortune, and do reape for the moſt parte the ſame iſſue that doth the mariner betaking his ſayles to the winde, which driueth his ſhippe not whither he woulde, but whither the winde ſhoueth her. Hercules Bentiuolo and Anthonio Iaconino campemaſter, riſing into courage with the felicitie of this victorie, ſignified to the Florentins both by vehement letters and meſſengers well inſtructed, that it were good to ioyne action to thopportunitie, and approche the walles of Piſa, beeing carefull afore to furniſh with diligence all thoſe things that might be neceſſarie to take it. They confirmed their deuiſe with all thoſe ſortes of hopes whiche men in good fortune do vainely weene, not remembring that in fortune there is nothing more certaine, then that in all things ſhe is vncertayne: They hoped, that for that the eſtate of the Piſans was enuironed on all ſides with great difficulties, being nowe more deſolate then before for the depriuation of the ſuccours of Aluiano, and ioyning withall that all things ought to giue place to the reputation of conquerers: they thought they ſhould eaſily carie it: interteyning withall a certeine intelligence with certeine of the townesmen in Piſa. But the magiſtrate of the ten, called il Magiſtrato de dieci, appoynted director of the matters of warre, calling a counſell with his other Citiſens communicantes by cuſtome in affayres of importance, that deliberation was with one conſent reproued by generall voyce: for that they conſidered that in the Piſans was ſtill recontinued their auncient reſolution and obſtinacie, and that being men of ſo long time experienced and trayned in warre, the name or reputation of the victorie which they had had againſt others, would not be ſufficient to vanquiſh them, their forces being no way diminiſhed by it: Rather it ſtoode them vpon according to thexamples of tymes paſt, to ſet vpon them with a reſolute force, which men of warre did onely feare. Beſides, their counſell was full of apparant difficulties, for that the citie of Piſa enuironed aſwell as any towne in Italie with moſt firme wals rampired and fortified, and withall defended with bodies actiue and reſolute, could not be forced but with a great and puiſſant armie compounded vppon ſouldiours not inferiour to the Piſans in valour, which yet would not be ſufficient to carie it by aſſault or ſhort ſiege: and therfore more neceſſarie to encampe in the places about it for many dayes, to thende to approche it with more ſuretie, ſearching out aduantages, and rather tyring and wearying them, then to ſuppreſſe them by force or violence:

lence: That the ſeaſon wherein they were was contrarie to thoſe things, not beeing hable ſodaynely to erect an armie of ſootemen, of other bodies then ſuche as ſhould be leauied in haſt: And much leſſe to approch it with any intention to make long aboade there, both for the inclemencie of the ayre corrupted with the windes of the ſea, whiche beeing become peſtiferous through the vapours of the pooles and mariſhes, were harmefull to armies, as was well experienced when Paule Vitelli encamped there: And alſo for that the countrey of Piſa beginneth from the moneth of September to be ſubiect to raynes, whiche, by reaſon of the baſeneſſe or lowneſſe of the place do ſo ouerdrowne it, that it takes away all oportunities for an armie to remayne there: That in ſuche an vniuerſall obſtinacie there coulde be no aſſured foundation reappoſed in practiſes or priuate intelligences, for that ſuche things beeing for the moſte parte eyther diſſembled or ſubborned, or at leaſt managed by perſons vnhable to execute that they promiſe, bring with them ſo many imperfections, that the fruite of thexpectation will not aunſwere the tyme that is taken to enterteine them: Beſides, notwithſtanding there had bene no publike fayth giuen to the great Capteine, yet Proſper Colonno (but of him ſelfe) almoſt vnder their ſecrete conſent had ſignified and promiſed, that for that yeare there ſhould be made no approche with artillerie to the walles of Piſa: In whiche regarde they ought to holde for certayne, that aſwell for that diſdayne, and for the promyſes he had many tymes made to the Piſans, as alſo for that this ſucceſſe of the Florentins was nothing profitable for his affayres, he woulde oppoſe himſelfe agaynſt this enterpriſe: A matter very eaſie for him to doo, for that he might in fewe howres put into Piſa the Spaniſhe bandes of footemen which were at Plombin, as he had oftentimes aſſured them to doo when ſoeuer there was preparation to beſiege them: That it were better to vſe thoccaſion of the victorie, there, where albeit the profite were leſſe, yet thinges without all compariſon ſhoulde bee founde of farre more eaſie action, and yet not without a notable profite: That there was not one that had more oppoſed, nor dyd more continually reſiſte their enterpriſes: not one that had more hindred the recouerie of Piſa, nor more procured to chaunge the preſent gouernment then Pandolffo Petruccio: That he had ſtirred vp the Duke Valentynois to enter in armes vppon their landes: That hee had beene the principall author and guyde of thenterpriſe of Vitellozze, and of the rebellion of Aretze: That by his counſell and ſolicitation, the Genowaies and Lucquois were ioyned with the eſtate of Sienna to ſupporte the Piſans: That it was he that had induced Conſaluo to take the protection of Plombin, to entermeddle with thaffayres of Piſa, and to make intruſion into the matters of Tuskane. To bee ſhorte, that there was none other that had beene author or fauourer of this burſting out of Aluiano: That it was agaynſt hym that they oughte to turne their armie, and to pyll and ouerrunne all the countrey of Sienna, where woulde bee no reſiſtaunce: That by the reputation of their armies, there might happen agaynſt hym ſome commotion in the Citie, wherein he had already manye enemyes: at the leaſte that they weare not to wante occaſion to occupie anye place of importaunce in that countrey, whiche they mighte holde in counterchaunge, or as a pawne to haue agayne Montpulcian: wherein they hoped by this reuenge to doo that which hitherto coulde not bee accompliſhed with benefites and pleaſures, that Pandolffo hereafter ſhoulde not bee ſo ready to offende them: That afterwardes in the ſame manner, they ſhoulde make incurſions into the countreys of Lucquois, beeing

very harmefull to leaue them ſo long expected: Laſtely, that by theſe meanes there was hope to drawe ſome honour and profite of the victorie gotten, where if they went to beſiege Piſa, there was to be reaped no other thing then expences and diſhonour. Theſe reaſons, albeit they were alleaged with common accorde, yet did they nothing abate the deſire of the people (which for the moſte parte runneth more guyded by will then by reaſon) crying to plant the campe afore Piſa, and beeing blinded with a ielous opinion they had taken of long tyme, that the recouering of Piſa was nowhit pleaſing to many of the principall Citizens for many ambicious reſpects. In this ſentence P. Soderein Gonſalonier beeing no leſſe colde then the reſidue, calling a great councell of the people, with whome they had not bene accuſtomed to communicate in matters of that nature, asked if they were of opinion that the campe ſhoulde go afore Piſa, wherevnto euery one aunſwering affirmatiuely, wiſedome was ſurmounted with raſhnes, the authoritie of the better ſort giuing place to the will of the greater parte. And therefore there were preſent directions to make prouiſions with a celeritie incredible, euery one hauing deſire to preuent no leſſe thexpected ſuccours of the great Capteine, then the daungers of the reynie ſeaſons, in ſo muche as the ſixt day of September the armie approched the walles of Piſa with ſix hundred men at armes, ſeuen thouſande footemen, and ſixteene Canons, with many other Artilleries of execution, the campe beeing pitched betwene Santa Croce and San Michele, in the ſelfe ſame place wherin the Frenchmen had encamped before. And as the artilleries were ſodenly planted in the night, ſo they battered the day folowing in great furie, all that was betweene the gate di Calci and the turret of S. Frauncis, where the walles make within, an angle: and hauing from the ſonne ryſing, (when thartillerie beganne to playe) tyll the xxj. howre brought to the earth more then thirtie fadomes of wall, there was enterteyned where the ruine was moſte, a hotte skirmiſhe, but to very little profite, for that there was not throwen downe ſo great a quantitie and ſpace of wall as had beene neceſſarie in a towne, where the men preſented them ſelues to the defence with their auncient valour and hardyneſſe: therefore the morning followng, to thende to make a greater opening of the wall, they beganne another batterie in a place a little remoued (that place of the wall which aforetymes had bene battred by the Frenche, remeining betweene the one and other battrie,) and after they had caſte downe ſo muche of the wall, as was thought ſufficient, Hercules ſought to aduance the footbands which were in battell to giue a rough aſſalt both to the one and other breach, where the Piſans trauelling according to their cuſtomes, the women no leſſe venterous then the men reſolute, had during the batterie drawne a rampier with a ditche afore. But there was not in Thitalian footebandes whiche had bene leauyed in haſte, neyther that action nor that ſpirite that was to force ſuche a reſiſtaunce: for that enſigne of footemen to whome by lotte apperteyned the firſte aſſalte, beginning to refuſe through cowardiſe to go to the walles, neyther thauthoritie of the Capteine, nor preſence of the ſuperintendent of Florence, neyther the regarde of their proper honour, nor the honour common of the men of ſeruice of Italie, were ſufficient to vanquiſſhe their feare, nor to ſhewe valour in an action ſo muche importing: thexample of whome, finding imitation and place in the reſidue that ſhoulde haue followed them, all the regimentes retyred to their lodginges, hauing done no other thing then (by leauing thinfanterie of Italie infamous through all Europe) defyled the felicitie of the victorie obteined agaynſt Almiano, and defaced the reputation of the Capteine and Campemaſter

ſter whiche was greate on the behalfe of the Florentins, if, content with the glory they had gotten, they coulde haue moderated their proper fortune. When the ſouldiours were once retyred to their lodgings, there was made no more doubt to leauie the campe, chiefly for that the ſame day ſix hundred Spaniſhe footemen of thoſe that were at Plombin were entred Piſa by direction from the great Capteine: So that the day following the Florentine armie retyred to Caſcina, drawing with them more diſhonour then eyther prayſe or profite, prouing in them ſelues that auncient tradition of the elders, that follie and raſhnes haue no ſocietie with wiſedome, nor fortune, or aduenture any communitie with good counſell, ſince all thoſe things are referred to a doubtfull iſſue, that are done by will and not by reaſon. Within fewe dayes after, there entred into Piſa fifteene hundred ſpaniſh footmen, who, becauſe the ſeruice had no neceſſitie of them, after they had in vayne giuen an aſſault to the towne of Bientina at the incitation of the Piſans, continued their nauigation into Spayne, whither they were ſent by the great Capteine, for that the peace was already eſtabliſhed betweene the Frenche king and Ferdinand king of Spayne, to the which (all difficulties that earſt hindred it, beeing nowe remoued, as both the regarde of the honour of the Frenche king, and the feare to make tharchduke his enemie) the death of the Queene of Spayne had giuen perfection: for that both the French king, enuying muche ſuche a greatneſſe of tharchduke, deſyred to diſappoynt his purpoſes. And alſo the king of Spayne, beeing aduertiſed that tharchduke diſdayning the laſt will of his mother in lawe, had determined to take from him the gouernment of the kingdome of Caſtilla, was conſtrayned to make his ſtay vppon newe alliaunces: for this cauſe the mariage was agreed vpon betweene him and Lady Germana de Foix ſiſters daughter to the French king, with condition that the king ſhoulde giue her in dowry that part of the kingdome of Naples that apperteined to him, the king of Spayne bynding him ſelfe to paye him within ten yeeres ſeuen hundred thouſande duckets in recompence of expences, and to indue the newe maried Lady with three hundred thouſande duckets. This mariage beeing ratified and accompanied with the peace, it was agreed that the barons of the faction of Anjovv, and all ſuche as had followed the Frenche parte, ſhould be reſtored without any payment into their libertie, countrie, eſtates, dignities and goods, and reeſtabliſhed in the ſame condition and degree that they were in the day that the warres beganne betweene the Frenche and Spaniſhe, whiche they accompt to be the day that the Frenchemen ranne to Tripaldo: That all confiſcations made by the king of Spayne, and by king Federik, ſhould be holden for cancelled and voyde: That the prince of Roſſana, the Marquis of Biſtonto and of Geſualdo, Alphonſo and Honorio of S. Seuerin, with all the other barons which were priſoners to the Spaniſh in the kingdome of Naples, ſhould be deliuered: That the French king ſhould no more intitle him ſelfe king of Ieruſalem and Naples: That the homages and fealties of the barons ſhould be made according to the conuentions aforeſayde, and that in the ſame maner thinueſtiture ſhould be demaunded of the Pope: That in caſe the Queene Germana ſhoulde dye in mariage without iſſue, her part of dowrie ſhoulde be transferred to Ferdinand, but if he dyed firſt, it ſhoulde reuert to the crowne of Fraunce: That king Ferdinand ſhould be bounde to ayde Gaſton Earle of Foix and brother to his newe wife, to conquere the kingdome of Nauarre, which he pretended to apperteyne to him, & which was poſſeſſed with a title royal by Katthern de Foix, & by Iohn her husband ſonne to Monſr d'Albert: That the French king ſhould conſtraine the widow of king Federik with her two children that were with him, to go into Spayne, where ſhould be aſſigned to her a competent portion to liue: And if ſhe refuſed to depart, then the king ſhould commaund her to iſſue out of his realme without making any further allowance to her or to her children by way of pention, or other meane to releeue them. That neyther one of the parties ſhould enterpriſe any thing, agaynſt thoſe whom any of them ſhould name: and they named ioyntly in Italie the Pope, and the French king apart named the Florentins: That for ſtrengthning of this peace, there was ment to be made betweene the two kings a perpetuall confederation for the defence of their eſtates, wherevnto the king ſhould be bounde with a thouſande launces, and ſix thouſande footemen: and Ferdinand with three hundred launces, two thouſande Iennytairs, and ſix thouſande footemen. After the peace was made and publiſhed, wherin the king of Englande promiſed obſeruation for both the parties, the Barons of Anioyv who were in Fraunce, hauing taken their leaue of the king, went almoſt all with the Queene Ieɼmana into Spayne, the king vſing towards them at their departure a very ſmall gratulation of their ſeruices paſt. Iſabell the widowe of Federike hauing her leaue, went to Ferrara, refuſing to put her children into the power of the Catholike king. In this towne of Ferrara (Alphonſo the ſonne of Hercules beeing nowe ſucceeded to the Dukedome) there hapned vpon the ende of the yere, a ſtraunge and tragicall accident: ſuche one as had ſome ſimilitude with the barbarous actions of thauncient Thebanes, but for farre more lighte occaſions, if thunbridled furie of loue be leſſe, then the burning ambition and deſire to reigne: The Cardinall Hypolito d'Eſte, louing feruently a young mayde his kinſwoman, who for her parte was no leſſe amarous of Don Iulio naturall brother to the Cardinall, and confeſſing her ſelfe to the Cardinall, that that which aboue all other things made ſo vehement her affection to his brother, was, the ſweete aſpect and beautie of his eyes: Loue is a Lorde of the worlde, and aboue all naturall impreſſions hath a tyrannicall ſubiection ouer the creatures whom he poſſeſſeth: for the Cardinall enuying the communitie of his brother, turned his loue into ielous furie, and ſetting eſpiall ouer Don Iulio when he ſhould go out of the towne on hunting, ſet vpon him in the fielde with a crewe of tormentors prepared to miſchiefe, whoſe violent handes the Cardinall in his owne preſence, ſuffred to thruſt out the eyes of his brother, for that they were the companions of his loue: An action no leſſe infamous to the Cardinall, then intollerable to all humanitie, and which afterwards trayned with it many occaſions of ſeditious and Ciuil quarrels betweene the brethren. Suche was the ende of the yere a thouſande fiue hundred and fiue.

THE SEVENTH BOOKE OF THE hiſtorie and diſcourſe of Guicciardin.

THESE were thaccidents of the yere a thouſande fiue hundred and fiue, whiche albeit left apparant hopes that the tranquilitie of Italie would recontinue (the warres for the quarrell of Naples being nowe quenched:) yet (ſuche is the mutabilitie of worldly affaires) there began to appeare in other places, ſeedes of newe innouations and chalenges tending to many ciuill calamities: for Philip, which nowe tooke vpon him the title of king of Caſtillo, and was no leſſe diſcontented that ſuche a kingdome was gouerned by his father in lawe, inclined to thincitation of many Barons, and prepared him ſelfe to paſſe into Spayne agaynſt his will, pretending, as the trueth was, that the late Queene had no power eyther to diſpoſe or to preſcribe lawes, or to bequeath the gouernment of the kingdome after her death. The king of Romains alſo taking ſtomack by the greatnes of his ſonne, ſolicited to paſſe into Italie. And laſtly the Frenche king, albeit the yere before he was muche diſcontented with the Pope, for that he had diſpoſed and inducted the benefices whiche were voyde by the death of Cardinall Askanius and others, in the duchie of Millan, without his participation: And for that alſo in the creation of other Cardinals, he had refuſed to call the biſhop of Achx nephewe to the Cardinall of Amboyſe, and the biſhop of Baieux nephewe to Monſr Trymouille, being earneſtly ſolicited by the king, who in thoſe regardes had cauſed to ſequeſter the frutes of the benefices which the Cardinall S.P.ad Vincla & others of the Popes amitie, poſſeſſed in theſtate of Millan: yet the king on the other ſide, holding both ſuſpected and feared the greatnes of Ceſar and his ſonne, iudged it neceſſarie not to nouriſh occaſions of reuenge, but to reenter into reconcilement with the Pope, to whom after he had releaced all the ſequeſtrations, he ſent in the beginning of this yere the biſhop of Siſteron thapoſtolicall Nuncio to negociate with him many plotts and offers agaynſt the Venetians, to whom he knewe the Pope could not but continue to beare an yll will with a hatred redoubled for the deſire he had to recouer the townes of Romania: An humor which the Pope did ſo muche the more diſſemble, by howmuch vntill that day he had proceded in al things ſo tractable & reſpectiue, that euery one tooke occaſion to maruell greatly, that he, who in his eſtate of Cardinall had bene alway full of immoderate and aſpiring thoughtes, and who in the time of Popes Sixtus, Innocent, and Alexander, had bene many times thinſtrument to trouble Italie, expreſſed now that he was become Pope (an eſtate for the moſt part adminiſtred with ambition and troubleſome imaginations) to be more eaſie and abated in courage, then did well beare thambicious profeſſion which he had alwayes made to the contrarie, not making any ſhowe or demonſtration to remember olde iniuries, or to ſeeme to be like to him ſelfe: So dangerous is diſſimulation in the perſons of great men, whoſe authoritie and place ſhadowing their diſpoſitions, defends all things from blame, though they haue nothing vnworthy of reprehenſion: for the intentions of the Pope were farre other wayes, then agreed with the propertie of his actions, for that hauing a determination to ſurmount the former opinion that was had of him, and to do more then was expected, turned all his wittes, deuiſes, and labours, (contrarie to the cuſtome of his auncient magnanimitie) to heape vp a wonderfull maſſe of treaſure, to thende that to the will he had to kindle the warre, might be ioyned alſo the meane and power to ſuſteine it. And finding in that time, that he was furniſhed with ſufficient treaſures and money, he beganne euen then to diſcouer his thoughtes aſpiring to right great things, ſuffring nothing to ſtay thexecution of that whiche he had pretended with ſo great ſtudie, ſecrecie, and hope. Therefore the Biſhop of Siſteron being receyued and hard with a gladnes agreable to the nature of his deſire, was diſpatched and ſent backe agayne with diligence, to ſolicite betweene them a new reunion and amitie: wherein the better to diſpoſe the minde of the king and the Cardinall d'Amboyſe, he promiſed by writte whiche the ſayde Nuncio caried with him, the dignitie of Cardinall to the Biſhoppes of Achx and Bayeux, forgetting nothing that he thought might further theffect of thoſe ambitions which he had nouriſhed with ſo great care and trauell of mynde. And yet notwithſtanding in ſo great a heate and vehemencie of forwardneſſe, he entred oftentimes into many doubtes and difficulties, for that eyther for a certayne hate he had conceyued agaynſt the Frenche king at ſuche time as he fledde into Fraunce, eſchewing thambuſhes of Pope Alexander, or for that it much diſcontented him to be drawen as it were by compulſion by the power and importunitie of the French king, to transferre to the Cardinal of Amboyſe, the legation of the kingdome of Fraunce: or laſtly, for that he ſuſpected leaſt the ſaid Cardinal (whoſe behauiours tended directly to the Popedome) not hauing patience to tarie for his death, would not ſeeke to aſpire to his place by wayes ſiniſter and extraordinarie: In regarde of which impreſſions (more troubleſome for the ſuttletie of the man, then that there was reaſon he ſhould feare ſo farre) made him oftentimes wander in diſpoſition, determining not wholly to ioyne with the Frenche king, and yet without his coniunction, he knew it was impoſſible that at that tyme any thing of conſequence ſhould ſucceede with him: For which reaſons he ſent (on the other ſide) to Piſa, Baltaſar Blaſquo a Genovvay, capteine of his galleis, with commiſſion to arme two lighte Gallets which Pope Alexander had cauſed to builde there: but it was thought that it was to this ende to be more ready to deliuer Genes from the gouernment of the Frenche, in caſe the king who yet remayned vexed with the reliques of his diſeaſe, ſhould happen to dye.

Diſſimulation very daungerous in the perſons of great men.

Thus matters hanging in ſuche an eſtate of ſuſpence, the firſt action of this yeare 1506. beganne by thembarking of king Philip to ſayle out of Flaunders into Spayne with a great armie by ſea: And to reduce his going to a more facilitie and ſafetie (for he feared leaſt his father in lawe by the ayde of the Frenche, woulde hinder hinder his passage) he practised the Spanishe subtelties, and agreed with him to leaue vnto him the managing and pollicie of the moste parte of affayres, and that they shoulde take in common the title of king of Spayne, according to the example in the Queenes tyme: and lastely, that the reuenues and tributes shoulde be deuided in an order certayne and indifferent. By reason of which accorde, his father in lawe, notwithstanding he was not assured of thobseruation, sent him into Flaunders many shippes to furnishe his voyage: with the which, hauing embarked his wyfe and Ferdinand his seconde sonne, he tooke his course into Spayne with forwarde windes, whiche, within two dayes turning cleane contrarie, after his nauie had runne a daungerous fortune, and made a wearie resistaunce agaynst the furie of the sea, his shippes were caste vpon sundrie coastes of Englande and Brittaine, his owne person with two or three shippes beeing dryuen with manyfest perill vppon Englande into the hauen of Southhampton: whereof Henry the seuenth then king of that Nation beeing aduertised, sent to him with speede many Barons to doo him honour, and desire him to come to his Court, then at London: A requeste whiche Philip coulde not denie, the king of Englands demaunde beeing no lesse honorable, then his owne estate full of necessitie and nakednesse. He remayned in the Court of Englande, vntill all his Nauie was reassembled and eftsoones rigged, making in the meane whyle betweene them newe capitulations: wherein albeit Philippe in all other things helde him selfe vsed as a king, yet in this one thing he complayned, that he was constrayned as a prysoner, to consent to redelyuer into king Henries handes the duke of Suffolke, whome he helde prisoner within the castell of Namur, and whome the king of Englande desyred muche to haue in his power, for that he quarreled the tytle of the Crowne, pretending the righte of the kingdome to apperteine to him: onely the king of Englande assured Philip by the fayth and worde of a king, that he woulde not put him to death, which he did as iustly perfourme as he had honorably promised, keeping him in prison so long as he lyued, and afterwardes was beheaded vnder the reigne and cōmaundement of his sonne. King Philip sayled afterwardes with a more happie nauigation into Spayne, where almost all the Barons flocked to him, bringing in their countenaunces apparaunt signes of gratulation and gladnes of his comming, and in their mindes assured resolution to aduaunce him: In so muche as his father in lawe, who was not strong ynough of him selfe to resist him, and lesse confidence that in the Frenche promises was any suretie of foundation, seeing him selfe almost abandoned of euery one, and the articles of the firste accorde disallowed, and finding withall a very harde and paynefull accesse to his sonne in lawe, was constrayned to agree to new conditions, such as were offred to him, nothing respecting the former; wherein notwithstanding they proceeded not rigorously for the good nature of Phillip, but muche more for the perswasions of those which had shewed themselues great enemies to Ferdinand: for that beeing in continuall doubt, that by his wisdome and authoritie, together with the facilitie of Philips disposition, he would not get better fauour, & in the end winne gouernment with his sonne, they solicited as much as they could his departing out of Castillo. It was accorded, that Ferdinand should giue ouer the gouernment which his wife had left to him by testamēt, together with al that he could pretend in that right, & that he should spedely depart out of Castillo, with promise to returne no more: That Ferdinand shoulde possesse the kingdome of Naples as his owne, notwithstanding there were that alleaged that it apperteined to Philip, for that it was conquered with the armes and power of the kingdome of Castillo: which was the same reason (& happly more iust) by the which Ferdinand was wont to pretende the sayde realme to apperteine to him, as being wonne by the treasures and forces of the state of Aragon. The tributes of the yles of India were reserued to him during his life, together with the three great mastershippes of S. Iames, Alcantara, and Calatrana: It was also agreed that he should take euery yere xxv. thousand duckets of the reuenues of the Realme of Castillo. Assone as this contract was resolued and passed to publication, Ferdinand, whom hereafter we will call eyther the king Catholike, or the king of Aragon, went foorthwith into Aragon, with intention to passe by sea to Naples with all the diligence he might, not so muche for the desire he had to see that kingdome, and to reestablish it, as to remoue the great Capteine, agaynst whom since the death of the Queene, he had conceyued many suspitions, eyther that he aspired to transferre to him selfe the kingdome, or at least that he had inclinations to giue it rather to Philip then to him: So ielouse is the condition of imperie and dignitie, that agaynst those for the most part is most possibilitie of suspition, whose vertue hath best deserued in confidence and fidelitie. But by so muche lesse had the king of Aragon occasion to reappose in him, by howmuche more he had founde him alwayes intractable to leaue Naples, from whence as he had often sommoned him in vayne to returne into Spayne (whiche he excused and delayed alleaging many impediments,) so he feared that if he went not thither in person, he should not easily remoue him from the gouernment, notwithstanding since the last contract, king Philip had charged him to transferre wholly hereafter all his obedience to the king of Aragon.

The condition of imperie & dignitie ielous.

In this time the French king, beginning to ryse somewhat into health, was trauelled with many, diuers and contrarie thoughts: for, both he was discontented with the Venetians, disdayning them since the times of the warre of Naples, for the desire he had to recouer that whiche was of thauncient appurtenances of the duchie of Millan, and for an opinion that through diuerse accidentes, their power and greatnes might sometimes hurt him, which, among other respects, had induced him to make confederation with the king of Romaines and Philip his sonne: And on the other part, the discending of the king of Romains into Italie was nothing agreable to him, knowing that he prepared to furnishe his iourney with very strong forces: A matter which he feared more then afore, for the power which he might put to king Philip (successour to suche a greames) specially beeing in doubt that whilest he was in Englande, he did not contract with the king there certayne newe and straite allyaunces: And for that also one of the principall occasions for the which he had entred confederation with them, was ceassed and cut off by the peace made with the king Catholike, by reason of the which he had dissolued & left there all his thoughts and impressions touching the kingdome of Naples. But whilest he stoode wauering in this varietie and incertentie of minde, thembassadours of themperour Maximilian came to signifie to him their maisters deliberation to passe into Italie, and to sommon him to giue order for the fiue hundred launces which he had promised to furnishe in his fauour, and to performe the residue of his worde touching the restoring of the banished men from the state of Millan, and to put him in remembrance lastly to aduaunce payment of the money which should be due to him within fewe monethes. To these demaundes albeit the French king had no great will to condiscende, yet he made semblant of the contrarie, neuertheless onely for the regarde of suche as for that time required but wordes, expressing howe muche he desired that tharticles of accorde should be executed, offering for his parte in due season a readie readie accompliſhment of all thinges he was bounde vnto: onely he refuſed with many excuſes to aduaunce the money. On the other parte, themperour reappoſing alſo as little in the will of the French king, as he did in his, and deſiring vehemently to paſſe to Rome, chiefly to take the crowne imperiall, and to chooſe afterwards his ſonne king of Romains, ſtudied in the ſame time by what other meanes he might atchieue theffect of his expectations. Therefore both he ſolicited the Svvyzzers to knit with him, who, after wany councels and diſputes among them ſelues, determined to obſerue thalliance which yet remayned two yeres, with the French king: And alſo he demaunded paſſage of the Venetians through their lands, who beeing loath for their own particular to graunt him paſſage with an armie ſo mightie, (the offers alſo of the French king inciting thē to ioyne with him to let his paſſage) tooke courage to aunſwere him in tearmes generall: and the French king, ſhowing himſelfe openly eſtraunged from the confederation made with him and with Phillip, gaue in mariage the Lady Claude his daughter, to Frauncis Lorde of Angouleſme, to whom belonged the ſucceſſion of the Crowne after his death without iſſue male: he made as though he had bene drawen to that action, by the importunities of his ſubiects, hauing aforehande ordeined for that effect, that all the courts of Parliament and principall townes of his kingdome, ſhould ſende Embaſſadours to beſeeche him as in a matter moſt profitable to the Realme, ſince the hope to haue iſſue male diminiſhed in him dayly more and more. This he ſignified with ſpeede to king Phillip by expreſſe Embaſſadours, excuſing him ſelfe that he had no power to reſiſt ſo great a deſire of his whole realme and communitie of his ſubiects. Beſides theſe, he had ſent bandes of men to the ſuccours of the duke of Gueldres, to turne Maximilian from paſſing into Italie, who of him ſelfe had left and giuen ouer thoſe cogitations: for that vnderſtanding that Launcelet king of Hungarie was very ſicke, he drewe neare the confines of that kingdome according to an auncient deſire of his father, to make him ſelfe king for the right which he pretended to it: for Launcelet, otherwiſe called Ladiſlao, king of Hungaria and of Boeme, ſonne of Albert, which was brother to themperour Federik, dying many yeres before without ſonnes, the peoples of Hungaria, who pretended that their king dying without heire maſculine, the ſucceſſion of the next in bloud could haue no place, had choſen for their king (hauing regarde to the merites and vertues of his father) Mathyas, he who afterwardes to the great reputation and glorie of ſo little a kingdome, vexed oftentimes the mightie empire of the Turkes: He, to auoyde in the beginning of his reigne, warre with Federike, agreed with him to take no wife, to thend that after his death the kingdome might diuolue to Federike, or to his children: which albeit he did not obſerue, yet he died without iſſue, and for all that Federike had not thaccompliſhment of his deſire, for that Thungarians choſe of newe for their king, Launcelet king of Polonia, by occaſion whereof, newe warres being eftſones rayſed agaynſt them by Federike and Maximilian, they agreed at laſt (the Barons of the kingdome taking a ſolemne othe) that whenſoeuer Launcelet ſhould dye without iſſue, they ſhoulde receiue Maximilian for their king. In ſo much as he then aſpiring to this ſucceſſion, after he was aduertiſed of thinfirmitie of Launcelet, he drewe neare to the borders of Hungaria, leauing behinde him for that time all his thoughts for Italie.

But whyleſt thoſe things were debated betweene the Princes of beyonde the Mountes with ſo great diuerſitie: the Pope, knowing that without the aydes of the French king, he could not moleſt the Venetians, and hauing leſſe patience that the yeres of his Pontificacie ſhould ſo paſſe away and conſume without profite or honour, prayed the French king to helpe him to recouer to the obedience of the Church the cities of Bolognia and Perouſa, which belonging of antiquitie to the Sea Apoſtolike, were nowe tiranniſed, the one by Iohn Paule Baillon, and the other by Iohn Bentiuolo, whoſe predeceſſors in the tymes of ciuill warres, riſing from priuate Citiſens to be chiefe of a faction, after they had chaſed or ſlayne al their aduerſaries, were not onely become abſolute Lordes of the Cities, but alſo ſtoode not reſtrayned by any other thing to take the title of lawfull Princes, then for the regard which they had to the Popes, who in the one and the other citie reteyned ſomewhat more then the ſimple name of Lordſhip, for that they tooke a certeyne part of the reuenues, albeit very little, and ordeined gouernours in the name of the Churche, who ſerued rather as ſhadowes and apparances, then to rule or commaunde (the power and deliberation of all things of importance reſting in the authoritie of others:) But the towne of Perouſa, either for his more nearenes to Rome, or for other occaſions, was longer time enterteined in thobedience of the Church, then Bolognia: for that citie did oftentimes chaunge in thaduerſities of Popes, ſometimes beeing gouerned in libertie, ſometimes oppreſſed by the Citizens, ſometimes ronning to thobedience of ſtrange Princes, ſometimes reduced to thabſolute ſubiection of Popes, and laſtly returning in the time of Pope Nicholas the fifte, vnder the rule of the Church, but with limitations certaine, and ſuch communion of authoritie betwene the Pope and them, that with tract of time the name and demonſtration of things remeining onely to the Popes, theffect and ſubſtance of the pollicie & gouernment reſted wholly in the power of the Bentyuoles: of whom, Iohn Bentyuole who commaunded for the preſent, hauing by litle and litle drawen all things to him, and embaſed thoſe mightie families which had bene contrarie to his elders and him in the firſt ſtabliſhing of his tyrannie: and being alſo greeuous for thinſolencies and intollerable expences which his foure ſonnes made, (an occaſion making him hatefull almoſt to euery one) ruled nowe more by crueltie and armes, then with clemencie and affabilitie, leauing very litle place to equitie and innocencie. But the Pope was moſt of all puſhed forwarde to this enterpriſe by a burning humor and deſire of glorie, wherein he had determined (albeit vnder the ſhadowe of pietie and zeale to religion) to reconquer to the ſea Apoſtolike, all thoſe places, of what nature ſoeuer, that had bene vſurped vpon the Church: And in this inclination to vſe the ſworde he had a particular motion to recouer Bolognia, for a hatred newely kindled agaynſt Iohn Bentyuole, for that in the times of his aduerſities when he durſt not remayne at Rome, and ſeeking ſafetie in Cento a towne of his Biſhoprike in Bolognia, he was driuen to ſteale away by night, hearing a brute publiſhed at randome, that there was a reſolution to apprehende him priſoner at the inſtance of Pope Alexander: So infinite is malice in her operations, that what heart ſhe hath once embraced, ſhe neuer ceaſſeth to ouercarie by degrees, tyll a reuenge be executed, and that for the moſte parte in a qualitie farre aboue the nature and merite of the offence. And (as was well expreſſed in the humours of this Pope) malice in wiſe men hath no ſodaine apparaunce, but riſing with their greatnes of place and calling, into more furie and rage, the blowe comes ſo muche the more redoubled, by howmuche the matter hath bene nouriſhed with tract of time, not fayling to execute aſſone as opportunitie doth offer. This requeſt of the Pope was to the good lyking of the king, who tooke it for an apte occaſion to keepe him in his amitie: for knowing howmuche it did preiudice his affayres, that the Pope had alliaunce with the Venetians, he beganne to growe into feares that he woulde ſodaynly reuolte, holding him alſo in ſuſpition to haue communitie in a certayne practiſe which Octauian Fregoſo had made to depriue him of the iuriſdiction of Genes. Beſides, he eſteemed Bentywole (albeit he was vnder his protection) more inclined to Ceſar then to him: To theſe doubtes he adioyned alſo the diſdayne which he had agaynſt Iohn Paule Baillon, for that he had refuſed (notwithſtanding he was poſſeſſed of the foureteene thouſande duckets) to go and ioyne with his armie beeing vpon the ryuer of Garillan, together with his deſire to offende Pandolffe Petruccio, vnder an occaſion to ſende men into Tuskane, for that he had both fayled to pay him the money he had promiſed, and alſo had wholly followed the fortune of the Spaniards. So that he made ready offers to the Pope to ayde him, and the Pope for his part, gaue him the writts of election to Cardinals for the biſhops of Achx & Bayeux, with power to diſpoſe of the benefices in the duchie of Millan in the ſame fulneſſe that Lodovvyke Sforce had vſed before. Theſe practiſes beeing reſolued and concluded by the ſolicitation of the Byſhop of Sitteron newly indued with the Archbiſhoprike of Achx the onely and immediate interpoſer betweene them, yet the execution was not ſo ready, for that as the Pope deferred for certayne monthes to put thenterpriſe to action, ſo it hapned in that meane while that Maximilian, who hauing begonne the warre agaynſt the king of Hungarie, had eſtraunged his thoughts from Italie, made nowe a newe peace with him, renewing thaccorde touching the ſucceſſion, and returned into Auſtria, making ſignes and preparations as though he would eftſones paſſe into Italie: And deſiring that the Venetians ſhould not oppoſe agaynſt his intention, he diſpatched foure Embaſſadours to aduertiſe that ſtate, that he was determined to go to Rome to take the Imperiall crowne, deſiring them to giue him libertie of paſſage together with his armie: he aſſured them to march through their regions without greeuing them or theirs in any ſort: And deſired, by proteſtation, to be vnited with that common weale, wherein the meane might eaſily be founde, not onely with ſuretye, but alſo with augmentation and exaltation of both the parties, couertly inducing vnder this perſwaſion that it woulde make for their common profite to conſpire together agaynſt the Frenche king. The Venetians, after they had long debated in counſell, returned a very gracious anſwere, expreſſing how muche their commonweale deſired to be conformable to his will, and to ſatiſfie his requeſtes in all things which they might without their proper preiudice, which in that caſe could not be neither greater nor more euident, for that the regions of Italie being made deſperate by ſo many calamities which they haue ſuffred, were drawen into an vniuerſall mutinie at the onely brute of his diſcending with ſo mightie an armie, ſtanding generally reſolued to take armes to cut off occaſions and oportunities of newe troubles, and that the Frenche king was to do the like for the ſuretie of theſtate of Millan: That by that meane, his comming into Italie with an armie diſplayed, was no other thing then to giue occaſion to the communalties of Italie to leauie armes to make mightie reſiſtaunce agaynſt him: An action of no little importance and daunger agaynſt them, for that if they ſhould conſent to his paſſing, all the potentates and powers of Italie, together with the French king, would iudge of them none otherwiſe, then of ſuche as had not eſteemed of the common benefite in reſpect of their proper intereſtes: That it would be more aſſured for all, and in the ende moſte honorable for him, comming to an act pacificable and agreable to euery one, to paſſe diſarmed into Italie, where thimperiall maieſtie showing himſelfe no leſſe gracious and affable, then mightie and terrible, ſhould finde an vniuerſall fauour with all regions, peoples, and communalties: That he ſhould (to his perpetuall glorie) beare

the honorable reputation to be the protector of the tranquilitie of Italie, proceding to his coronation in the same forme which his father and many his renowmed predeceſſors obſerued afore him, in which courſe they were and would vſe to him, all thoſe oblations, obſeruances, and offices which he could deſire.

Theſe apparances of armes and other things practiſed by Cæſar, were the cauſes that the Pope reſolued fully to execute the enterpriſe of Bolognia, and had ſent to ſommon the Frenche king to his promiſe, was friendly aduiſed by the king to haue regarde to the eſtate and diſpoſition of things, and conſidering well of the nature of times, to deferre the action of the enterpriſe to an other ſeaſon, leaſt the vntimely breaking out of ſuch an accident did not onely bring all Italie into commotion, but proue preiudiciall euen agaynſt his proper intentions: for that he feared leaſt in this action he ſhould kindle agaynſt him the minds of the Venetians, who had alreadie ſignified to him that they were reſolued to take armes for the defence of Bolognia, if the Pope would not firſt indue them with the graunt of thoſe patronages and rightes of Faenza which apperteined to the Church. But the Pope, who of nature was impacient and ſodayne, ſought out ſtill all the meanes he coulde, by the which (notwithſtanding all difficulties and impediments) he might aſpire to that he deſired: Wherein he proceeded with moodes furious and violent, calling together into the conſiſtorie all the Cardinalls, afore whome deducing in forme of a languiſhing complaynt, how iuſtly he was touched with deſire to deliuer from the handes of tyrantes the cities of Bolognia and Perouſa, members ſo muche importing the ſea Apoſtolike, he ſignified that he would aſſiſte the enterpriſe in perſon: he aſſured them, that beſides his owne forces, he ſhould be ayded by the Frenche king, by the Florentins, and many other potentates of Italie, and that God that was perpetually iuſt, would neuer leaue abandoned ſuche as with ſo holy intentions ſoughte to reeſtabliſhe and reſtore the Church. Aſſone as this deliberation was publiſhed in Fraunce, it ſeemed ſuch a matter to be laughed at to the king, that the Pope ſhould promiſe him ſelfe a ſuccor of his people without intelligence or communitie with him, that making it a ieſting talke at his table, and impoſing withall vpon the Pope his notorious dronkenneſſe, he ſayd it could not be but the Pope was well bewitched with wine: not diſcerning as yet that that ſodayne deliberation did conſtraine him, either to come to manifeſt controuerſie with him, or els to giue him of his men agaynſt his will. But the Pope, not expecting any other reſolution, iſſued out of Rome with fiue hundred men at armes, and ſending afore Anthony dal Monte to ſignifie his comming to the Bolognois, with direction to commaunde them to make prouiſion to receiue him, and to beſtowe in the countrey fiue hundred French launces. He marched ſlowly, hauing determined not to paſſe Perouſa, tyll he were well aſſured whether the French bandes woulde come to his ſuccours, foreſeing nowe thoſe inconueniences which the immoderation of his minde would not afore ſuffer him to diſcerne in his heate and furie. Iohn Paule Baillon occupied with no ſmall feares of his comming, by the counſell of the duke of Vrbin and other his friends, & vnder their aſſuraunce went to meete the Pope at Oruietto, who receyued him into grace and fauor, after he had wholly ſubmitted himſelfe to his diſcretion, with promiſe to folowe him in perſon with an hundred and fiftie men at armes, and alſo to render vp into his handes the fortreſſes of Perouſa and Perouſin, and the garde of the city, giuing for obſeruation his two ſonnes in oſtage to the duke of Vrbin: Vnder this cõpoſition the Pope entred without any ſtrẽgth into Perouſa, being in the ful power of Iohn P. Baillon to make him priſoner with all his court and trayne, if he woulde haue haue made ſounde throughout the world in a matter of ſuch greatnes and weight, that diſloyaltie, which had already made his name infamous in things more inferior and of farre meaner qualitie. At Perouſa the Pope gaue audience to the Cardinall of Narbona ſent to him from the French king, to perſwade him to put ouer and deferre the enterprice till another time, and to proteſt the kings excuſes, in that (contrary to his deſire) he could not ſend him men, for that, by the conſiderations for Caſar, & the great ſuſpitions he had of his doings, it was not cõuenient for him to leaue diſarmed the duchie of Millan. This embaſſage albeit it ſtirred vp in the Pope many ſhowes of perplexities and alterations, yet his wiſdome helde his affections ſuppreſſed, and making no apparance that he had any inclination or will to chaunge aduiſe, he began to leauie newe bandes of footemen, and reincreaſe all his prouiſions: And yet many beleued, that what by the difficulties that appeared, and the eaſynes of his nature to be appeaſed vpon yelding or ſubmiſſion, if Bentyuole who offred by his Embaſſadors to ſende in his foure ſonnes, had diſpoſed himſelfe to come to him in perſon according to the example of Iohn Paule, he had founde ſome tollerable forme for his affaires: But whileſt he ſpent time in temporiſing (the aſpect & eſtate of his buſines making him irreſolute) or, as ſome ſay, whilſt he was holden in ſuſpence by the cõtradiction of his wife, he had aduertiſement that Monſr de Chaumont had receiued direction from the French king to go to the ſuccors of the Pope in perſon with fiue hundred launces: An ayde which albeit the king (in the abſence of the cardinal Amboyſe) had no inclination to ſende him, yet the Cardinal returning to the Court, vſed perſwaſions to holde the king firme in his promiſe, hauing not only made voluntary offers in the beginning, but alſo by many degrees ſince, had as it were vrged the Pope to vſe the ſeruice of his men: The cardinal had power to make the king change aduiſe, whervnto he was ſo much the more eaſily induced, by howmuch the demõſtrations of Maximilian began now to waxe colde according to his cuſtome, & the Pope alſo (ſomewhat to leaue the king ſatisfied) was content to make promiſe, not by writing, but in the mouth of his holynes & honor, that he would not moleſt the Venetians for the townes of Romagnia: And yet notwithſtanding the pope, not able to abſteine from diſcloſing what a ſetled deſire he bare that way, going from Perouſa to Ceſena, he tooke the waye of the mountaine, for that if he had marched along the plaine, he ſhould haue bin conſtrayned to paſſe vpon the lands of Rimini, which the Venetians held. Aſſone as he was come to Ceſena, he admoniſhed Bentiuole to depart frõ Bologna vnder moſt greuous cenſures & paines ſpiritual & temporall, ſtretching thẽ out againſt al ſuch as ſhould holde any conuerſation or confederacie with him: And receiuing intelligence in this place, that Monſr de Chaumont marched with ſix hundred launces & three thouſand footemen, all payed of the Church treaſures, he tooke corage, & recõtinued his way without deferring. And turning from the waies & territories of Faenza for the ſame reſpects he refuſed Rimini, he tooke the way of the mountaine, notwithſtanding it was troubleſome & full of incõmodities: and ſo drawing along the townes which the Florentins poſſeſſed beyonde Thappenin, he went to Imola, where his armie aſſembled: wherin, beſides many bands of footemen which he had leauied, were foure hũdred men at armes in his pay, an hũdred & fifty led by Iohn Paule Baillon, an hundred lent by the Florentins vnder the guide of M. An. Colonno, an hundred lent by the duke of Ferrara, many bands of Eſtradiots leauied in the kingdome of Naples, & two hũdred light horſmẽ brought thither by the Marquis of Mantua, deputie lieftenant of tharmie. At Bologna on thother ſide, Bentyuole & his faction omitted no preparatiõ that might reſpect their ſuretie, nor forbare to arme

all thoſe bodies which they eſteemed to carie abilitie to their defence, hoping that if they were not defended, at the leaſt they ſhould not be offended by the French: for that the king beeing called vpon to ayde them according to the contract of protectiō, had anſwered, that albeit he could not with armes oppoſe againſt the enterpriſe of the Pope, yet he woulde forbeare to miniſter eyther men, or other nature of ayde agaynſt them: An aunſwere wherein they tooke great comforte and confidence to bee hable with eaſe to reſiſte the armie Eccleſiaſticke: But all their hope was turned into feare by the comming of Monſr de Chaumont, who, albeit as he marched, had made diuers aunſwers to their people, yet the ſame daye he arriued at Caſtelfranco vppon the territories of Bolognia, (beeing the ſame daye wherein the Marquis of Mantua with the Popes regimentes made him ſelfe Lorde ouer the Borough of Saint Peter) he ſente to ſignifie to Bentyuole, that the kyng foreſeeing not to fayle of that he was bounde vnto by the capitulations of protection, had an intention not onely to make ſafetie and preſeruation of his goodes, but alſo to procure him ſuche further grace and fauour, that reſigning to the Church the gouernment and pollicie of the Citie, he ſhoulde with ſuretie remeine in Bolognia with his children, ſo that within three dayes he ſubmitted him ſelfe wholly to

For, Bentyuole and his ſonnes, who with great threatnings afore had publiſhed to all the worlde their hableneſſe and diſpoſition to defende them ſelues, became nowe chaunged in reſolution and courage: and not remembring with what vpbraidings they had exclaimed agaynſt Peter de Medicis, for that without effuſion of blood he had forſaken Florence: made anſwere that they would referre themſelues to his arbitration, beſeching him to be a meane that at the leaſt they might obteine conditions tollerable. Therefore beeing now come to the bridge de Reue three myles from Bolognia, interpoſing with the Pope, he made an agreement that it ſhould be lawfull to Iohn Bentyuole and hys ſonnes, with Geneure Sforce his wife, ſafely to go out of Bolognia, and remeine in the duchie of Millan in any place at their beſt lyking and election: That it ſhoulde be lawfull for them eyther to ſell or carrie away from Bolognia, all their goodes moueable, and not to be moleſted for their immoueables which they poſſeſſed with iuſt title. By the benefite of which accorde ratified and confirmed, they departed with ſpede and ſecuritie out of Bolognia, hauing obteined of Monſr de Chaumont, to whom they gaue twelue thouſand duckets, a very large ſafeconduit, with promiſe ſubſcribed, not onely to ſee obſerued all that is conteined in the articles of protection, but alſo that he and his familie ſhould continue in ſurety in the duchie of Millan. Aſſone as the kinred of the Bentyuoleis were departed, the people of Bolognia addreſſed with diligence their Embaſſadors to the Pope, to put into his hands the abſolute iuriſdiction of their citie, to demaunde pardon and abſolution of the Cenſures, and to require order that the Frenche ſhoulde not enter into Bolognia: But they beeing of nature inſolent, coulde hardly beare to be regulated, ſpecially in a tyme when their owne ſtrength and common fortune of the armie fauoured their intentions, they made their approches to the walles wyth an vniuerſall diſpoſition to enter: but the ſtrong reſiſtaunce of the people, compounded of a reſolute valour to defende their libertie, kept them from executing vpon the walles, & compelled thē to encampe neare the bulwarks betwene the gates of Saint Felix and Saragoſſe vpon the the channel which drawing from the riuer of Rene passeth throw Bolognia, and from thence is nauigable to Ferrara: belike they were ignorant that it was in the power of thinhabitants of Bolognia by plucking vp a sluce of the channell that entreth the Citie, to drowne all the countrey about: their ignorance in a matter so needefull of consideration, brought sodaine incommodities vpon them, for that the people of Bolognia raising the sluse, the channell that afore was swelled with water, brake out and ouerflowed the lowe places where were encamped the French bands, who leauyng their artillerie in the water, and muche of their baggage, retyred in great tumult and disorder to the bridge of Rene, where they remeined till the Pope entred into Bolognia, which was on Saint Martins day, confirming his entrie with all pompe and ceremonies Pontificall. Thus fell into the power of the Church with a great felicitie of thinhabitants, the citie of Bolognia, which with good right beareth name & reputation amongst the most noble and flourishing cities of Italie, aswell for thinfinitie of the dwellers, as for the fertilitie of soyle and oportunitie of situation. And albeit the Pope did institute new magistrates by the example of antiquitie, leauing in many things great signes and apparances of libertie, yet, touching the effect, he brought it wholly to the obedience of the Church, expressing many honorable liberalities in releasing diuers exemptions, wherin he made himselfe mighty in thopinion of the people, and (vsing the like in al other cities) he labored to allure the multitude to an amitie and liking of the Church gouernment. He gaue to Monsr Chaumont, who returned immediatly to the duchie of Millan, eight thousand duckers, with ten thousand to be distributed in liberalities amongst his regiment, and he cõfirmed vnder Bul subsigned the promise he had made before to create Cardinal his brother the bishop of Alby, And yet (turning all his wittes & studies how he might annoy the Venetians) to leaue quicker motions in the French king & Cardinal Amboise to ayde him, he would not at that time publish Cardinalls the bishops of Achx & Bayeux, according to the solicitatiõs that were made, & writts which were already subscribed.

About this tyme the king of Aragon passed by sea into Italie, and embarking at Barcelonia there came to him a gentleman from the great Capteine, who offred him selfe prepared to receyue the king, and giue him all obedience: To whome in recompence of his fidelitie and merites, the king ratified not onely donation of the duchie of Saint Ange which king Federik had giuen him, but also al his other profites which he possessed in the kingdome of Naples, amounting to twentie thousand duckets in yerely reuenue, together with the office of great Constable of the kingdome, and promise to be great maister of Saint Iames, both subsigned vnder the kings owne hande. The king embarking at Barcelonia with no lesse contentment of the present, then better hope hereafter, was honorably receiued with his wife, in all the ports of Prouence, according to the French kings commandements, and with the same oblation and reuerence was welcomed into the hauen of Genes, where he was expected by the great Capteine, who was gone thither to mete him, not without thadmiration of many, for that not onely the popular sort, but euen the Pope him selfe nouriſhed an opinion, that aswell for his disobedience past, as for the present suspitions whiche the king had in him, he would passe into Spayne, fearing to stande in the presence of the king. The king of Aragon departing from Genes, remeined many dayes at Portofino, both for that the winde was contrarie, and also he helde it not conuenient to be farre from the shore with his light galleis: Whileſt he soiorned at Portofino, he was aduertised that king Phillip his sonne in lawe, young in yeeres, and well disposed in body, had chaunged this life for a better within the towne of Burgos:

his infirmitie was a feuer raging with violent motions, but of very fewe dayes continuance, hapning in the very ripenes and full reputation of his age, and in a ſeaſon wherin he was lifted to his greateſt felicitie, as oftentimes is wonderfully expreſſed in the variation of fortune: neuertheleſſe the king, in whom it was beleeued that for the deſire he had to recontinue in the gouernment of Caſtille, would eftſones turne ſayle to Barcelonia, kept on his firſt way, and entred the port of Caietta the ſame day that the Pope marching to Bolognia, made his entrie into Imola: from whence he was conueyed to Naples, and receyued into that Citie (which was wont to reioyce in kings of Aragon) with no leſſe magnificence, maieſtie, and honor of the Nobles, then vniuerſall deſire and expectation of the communaltie, for an opinion they had that vnder a king ſo glorious for the many victories he had obteyned aſwell againſt thinfidels as the Chriſtians, and no leſſe reuerenced for his high wiſdome and temperature of ſpirite, ioyned to the generall teapporte of his ſingular iuſtice, by the which he had guyded his Realmes in tranquilitie: he would alſo reſtore and releeue the kingdome of Naples of ſo many afflictions and oppreſſions, and reduce it into an eſtate peaſible and happie, with reſtitution of the portes which the Venetians helde there, to the great diſpleaſure of the whole kingdome. There came to him to Naples from all partes of Italie many Embaſſadors, not onely to congratulate and honor ſo great a prince, but alſo for many practiſes & occaſions, euery one beeing perſuaded that with his authoritie and wiſdome he would readdreſſe things, and giuing a new forme to affayres, he would be the eauen ballance and counterpeiſe for many matters: for that both the Pope, who helde himſelfe yll contented with him, for that he had hot honored him with legation and embaſſadors according to the cuſtome, ſtudied to kindle him agaynſt the Venetians, thinking that for the deſire to recouer the portes of Povvylla, he had reaſon to wiſhe their declination and embaſing. And the Venetians of the contrarie ſolicited for many good reſpects to be recontinued in his amitie: And alſo the Florentins, with the other peoples of Tuskane, negociated with him diuerſly for the regarde of Piſa, which this yere was leſſe moleſted then others with the incurſions of the Florentins (not hindring their harueſt) either for that they were weerie of the charges, or els that thexperience of the yere paſſed made them eſteme it a thing vayne and without fruite, knowing that the ſtates of Genes and Lucques had agreed together to ſupport that citie for one yere with a determinate and certaine charge, whervnto P. Petrucci had prepared them before, offring like portion of contribution on the behalfe of the Siennois: notwithſtanding on the other ſide (beeing a man diſſembled in all his intentions) he obteined of the Florentins, by diſcloſing theſtate of the negociation, and to thend to ſeperate himſelfe from the reſt, that the truce which yet continued betwene the Florentins and Siennois, ſhould haue prolongation for three yeres, with an expreſſe couenant that it ſhould not be lawfull to the Siennois, nor to Pandolffe, to miniſter any ayde to the Piſans: with whiche excuſe forbearing to leauie any expenſes for them, he refuſed not to fauour them with all the counſels and actions he could in all other ſortes.

A continuance of the hiſtorie of Iulio d'Eſte

About this yeere there hapned a newe and ſtraunge accident of the tragedie whiche had beene begonne before Ferrara: for Ferdinand brother to Duke Alphonſo and Iulio, whoſe eyes the Cardinall had violently cauſed to bee pluckte out (but by the readie helpe of Phiſitions were reſtored without loſſe of hys ſight:) conſpired together wyth the ſaide Iulio, the death of the Duke: Ferdinand, who was nexte in ſucceſſion after the Duke, was moued to thys conſpiracie by an aſpyring deſire to occupie that ſtate, the humour of dominion and rule rule carying him into diſpoſitions of bloud contrary to honor, nature, & humanitie: And Iulio embraced the treaſon with ſo muche the more affection, by howmuche he iudged that Alphonſo had not miniſtred ſufficient iuſtice to the wrong that was done him, being withall out of hope to be able otherwiſe to wreake his reuenge vpon the Cardinall. To theſe counſels they called as a partie, the Counte Albertin Boſchet a gentleman of Modona, with whom albeit they had wonne and corrupted certeine ſelowes of baſe cõdition gouerning much the perſon of Alphonſo, for that they were his fauorits in matters of ſport and delight, and had many times ſundrie oportunities to kill him: yet, being withholden by a certaine fatall timerouſnes, they let paſſe alwaies thoportunitie: In ſo much as (ſo it hapneth for the moſte parte when thexecution of conſpiracies is deferred) the treaſon being detected, Ferdinand with the other conſpirators were impriſoned, and Iulio, who was fled to his ſiſter at Mantua, was by the direction of the Marquis, ſent priſoner to Alphonſo, being aſſured by his promiſe and fidelitie, that he ſhould not be touched with death: But a little after the Counte Albertin being condemned iudicially, was quartered with the others that were founde guiltie, and the two brethren paſſed ouer to perpetuall priſon in the newe caſtell of Ferrara.

The death of duke Valentynois.

In this place of the hiſtorie it is not inconuenient to touch ſomewhat of thaudacitie and induſtrie of duke Valentynois, who being ſubtelly ſlyded downe by a corde out of the Rocke of Medina de Campo, fledde into the kingdome of Nauarre to king Iohn brother to his wife, where (to thende thiſtorie ceaſe to ſpeake any more of him) after he had remeined certaine yeres in baſe condition, the French king confiſking both the duchie of Valence, & the penſion of twenty thouſand franks which he gaue him in ſupply of reuenue, & alſo would not ſuffer him to go into Fraunce, bicauſe he would do nothing that might diſcontent the king of Aragon, he was at laſt ſlayne by the conſpiracie of an ambuſh, commaunding ouer the men of warre of the king of Nauarre in the campe at Viano, a litle place in the ſayde realme.

The citie of Genes rebelleth.

Vpon the ende of this yere, for that the yere folowing ſhould not begin without matter of new warres, the Genouvaies rebelled againſt the French king, hauing no other incitation then of them ſelues, the matter taking his fundation not of any deſire to rebel, but rather of the ciuil diſcords, which caried men further then their former counſels and deliberations, rebellion being of a condition to encreaſe in occaſions, as the fire is redoubled in heat by the freſh matter which it embraſeth. The citie of Genes, a citie ſeated in a place moſt apt to cõmaund the ſea, if ſo great an oportunitie were not hindred by the peſtiferous poiſon of ciuil diſſentions, is not as many other great townes in Italie, ſubiect to one particular diuiſion, but is deuided into many partyes and factions: both for the relikes of the ancient quarrels betwene the Guelffes and Gibelins yet remeining there: and alſo for the ſedes of diſſention ſtil growing betwene the gentlemen and populars, by the which the whole nation of Italie hath bene much afflicted, but ſpecially many cities in Tuskane haue bene bronght to extreme ruine: for, the communaltie not hable to beare the pride of the Nobles, bridled much their authoritie & power by many rigorous lawes: and amõgſt others, ſuffring them to cõmunicate with al other offices and honors, they excluded them particularly from the dignitie of Dukedome: a ſupreme eſtate whiche was giuen for life to any other that was choſen, notwithſtanding by thinconſtancie of that citie, fewe or none were ſuffred to continue in that place tyll they dyed, the ſeate of dominion beeing alwayes ielouſe, but moſte caſuall where it diuolueth by election, which by his proper ambition nouriſheth for the moſt parte a ſecrete ſub-

Rebellion increaſeth in occaſions.

iection to alteration and fall. No leſſe great is the diuiſion betweene the families of the Adorni and Fregoſi, who from baſe condition and popular houſes, being riſen to the dignitie of Capellaci (ſo do the Genouuaies call ſuche as are aſpired to any great potentacie) contende together for the dignitie of duke, which for many yeres hath continued for the moſt part in one of thoſe two families: for the gentlemen of the Guelffs and Gibelins, not able to aſcende to the place for the impediment of the lawes, ſought to make it fall to ſuch of the populars as were of their faction: And as the Gibelins fauoring the Adornes, and the Guelffes the houſe of Fregoſa, tyme hath made thoſe two families more noble and mightie, then thoſe of whome afore they folowed their name and authoritie: So neuertheleſſe all thoſe diuiſions are ſo confounded, that oftentimes they that be of one part agaynſt the partie oppoſite, are in them ſelues deuided into diuers partes, and of the contrarie conioyned in one with thoſe that followe an other faction. This yere began to kindle betweene the gentlemen and commons, a debate, which breeding at the firſt vpon the inſolencies of certayne of the Nobles, and working by litle and litle the moſt part of the mindes of both the one and other ſide ill diſpoſed, it chaunged qualitie ere it were long, and of priuate contentions, conuerted it ſelfe into the nature and habite of publike diſcordes, eaſie ynough to kindle in cities ſo abounding in riches as did Genes at that time. Theſe quarels roaſe encreaſing ſo farre, that the people poſſeſſed with furie, drewe into tumult, and made violent ſlaughter of one of the families of Oria, with certaine other gentlemen: wherein offering all things to ſpoyle and ruine, they obteined in that mutinie more by force then free will of the Citie, that the day after it might be ordeined in the publike councels (wherein were aſſiſtant very fewe of the Nobles) that of thoſe offices whiche afore were diuided equally betweene the Nobles and commons, there might be hereafter diſtribution made of two partes to the people, and one onely reſerued to the Nobles: to which deliberation Roccaber guyding the citie in the abſence of Phillip Rauaſtin then gouernour for the king, conſented for feare of greater perils: neuertheleſſe the populars not beeing quieted for all this, but ouercaried with their mutinous humors, ſtirred vp within fewe dayes after a newe tumult, and put the noblemens houſes to ſacke: an outrage that compelled moſt part of the Gentlemen to abandon the citie, finding no eſtate of ſuretie in their naturall regions. Theſe mutations being eftſones ſignified to the gouernour, cauſed him to returne with ſpeede out of Fraunce to Genes with a ſtrength of an hundred and fiftie horſe, and ſeuen hundred footemen: But neither with his authoritie, his perſwaſions, his preſence, nor with his forces, coulde he reduce things to a better eſtate: ſo irregulate is a communaltie or multitude once drawen into mutinie, and their barbarous furie inuincible agaynſt all reaſon, order, or good preſcription: No, oftentimes he was compelled to apply him ſelfe to the will of the people, & making his authoritie rather to be plauſible to the multitude then to puniſh their mutinies, he paſſed ouer things with ſufferance, and obeyed the neceſſitie of the time, commaunding to retyre and returne certayne other trowpes that were appoynted to come after him out of Fraunce. Theſe beginnings gaue courage to the Commons to become more inſolent, and (as it hapneth often in Cities declined to ſedition) the gouernment, contrarie to the will of many of the beſt ſort of the Commons, fell almoſte abſolutely into the power of the dregges of the people, who in their furie created to them ſelues a newe magiſtracie or office of eyght men of the populars with a great authoritie: And they, the rather to keepe the whole incenſed by the dignitie of their name, were called Tribunes of the people: Theſe, vnder this forme

of pollicie, or rather apparant mutinie, occupied with armes the towne of Spetie, with certayne other townes of the ryuer of Leuant, whereof Iohn Levvys de Fieſquo was gouernour for the king. This gouernour complayned to the king of thoſe inſolencies, both in the name of the whole nobilitie, and for his particular intereſt, wherin he recommended to his maieſtie the manifeſt danger to loaſe the iuriſdiction of Genes, ſeeing the inſolent libertie of the commons had caried them ſo farre, that beſides other oppreſſions and harmes, they aſpired (proceding directly agaynſt thauthoritie of the king) to manage the townes of the riuer: That vſing expedition, there might be rayſed remedies conuenient to repreſſe ſo great a furie, ſeing it was as yet but in the nature of a popular warre, without the protection of any greater prince: where if he ioyned negligence to thopportunitie, and became ſlowe in leauying the prouiſions that were neceſſarie, the euill would more and more reſolue, and take with tract of time more firme roote, for that both thimportance of Genes was ſuche by ſea and lande, that it would eaſily allure ſome forreine Prince to nouriſhe ſuch a diuiſion, ſo hurtfull for his eſtate: And alſo the commons comming to knowe that whiche at the beginning was perhaps but in the qualitie of ſedition, woulde in the ende chaunge habite and turne into rebellion, and ſo become a pray to any that would giue hope to defende it. But on the other parte, thembaſſadours ſent to the king from the Commons of Genes, labored to iuſtifie the action, and to make their cauſe be found good: They declared that no other thing had diſaltered the people, but the pride of the gentlemen, who, not contented with the dignities and honours conuenient to nobilitie, aſpired to higher degrees, ſeeking to be redowted as Lords and Princes: That the people had long borne the yoke of their inſolencies, but at laſt feeling outrages not onely in their goods and generall callings, but alſo in their perſons & eſtates moſt priuate, their patience was nowe ouercome with the weight and violence of their pride: And yet albeit by theſe compulſions, they were no longer hable to conteine them ſelues: they were not for all that proceded to any other actions, then ſuch as without the which their libertie could not be aſſured: for, ſeing the gentlemen communicated by equall part in the offices and iuriſdictions, there was no poſſibilitie by the meane of courts and iudgements, to reſiſt their tyrannie: And Iohn Levvys commaunding ouer the townes of the ryuers, without the traffike whereof Genes ſtoode at it were beſieged, there was no ſafetie for the commons to enterteine traffike and conuerſation there: That the people had bene alwayes moſt deuout and faythfull to the kings maieſtie, and that the mutations of Genes had in al tymes more proceeded of the ambition of the gentlemen, then infidelitie of the people: That they beſought the king to pardon thoſe offences, which during the heate of the contentions, certayne particulars had committed agaynſt thuniuerſall will and conſent, and that he would confirme the lawe made for the diſtribution of offices, and ſuffer the townes of the ryuers to be managed vnder the name publike: Laſtly, that by that meane, the Gentlemen enioying honorably their degrees and dignities, and the populars alſo poſſeſſing their libertie with ſuretie: and all things beeing reduced by his Maieſties authoritie into ſuche an eſtate of tranquilitie, they ſhoulde be bounde to honor perpetually the clemencie, goodnes, and iuſtice of the king. The king was muche troubled with theſe tumultes, eyther for that the licentious behauiours of the commons were ſuſpected to him, or perhaps for the honorable inclination which the French do commonly beare to the name of gentlemen: In ſo much that he could haue bene diſpoſed to haue puniſhed the authors of theſe inſolencies, and reduce all things to their firſt degree, ſauing that he feared leaſt if he ſhould vſe ſharpe remedies, the Genevvaies would haue recourſe to Ceſar, whoſe ſonne was not yet dead. For which cauſe, making conference of things, more according to the neceſſitie and conſideration of the time, then agreable to the eſtate and merite of their doings, he determined to proceede with clemencie and tolleration, and therefore called into pardon and forgiuenes all their offences they had cõmitted, and ratified their newe lawe for diſpoſing of offices, ſo farrefoorth as they would put into his hands the townes of the ryuers which they occupied: Wherein the better to incline and diſpoſe the people, he ſent to Genes doctor Michaell Riccio a baniſhed man, to perſwade the Commons, that they were better to vſe and embrace thoccaſion of the kings clemencie, then (adding to their faltes, contumacie and hardned obſtinacie) to driue him to proceede agaynſt them with ſeueritie: But diſcretion hauing no ſocietie with raſhnes, nor follie any cõmunitie with wiſdome, their minds ſeemed to ſtande blinded with immoderate ambition and couetouſnes: for the people and tribunes (notwithſtanding the lawfull Magiſtrates were of the contrarie opinion) would not onely not render the places they occupied (not accepting the ſofines and tractabilitie of the king) but riſing into thoughtes of worſe nature, they determined to aſſayle the borough of Monaco, whiche Lucian Grimault poſſeſſed, eyther in regarde of a common hatred borne againſt all gentlemen of Genes, or els for that the borowe is of great importance for the citie, hauing his ſituation vpon the ſea in a place of great conueniencie: or at leaſt for certaine particular hatreds, ſince he to whome falleth the power and gouernment of that place, abſteineth very hardly from pyracies and robbing by the ſea, the ſituation giuing fauour and oportunitie to ſuche actions: or laſtly, becauſe (as they ſuggeſted) that borough apperteined rightfully to the common weale. In whiche regardes, notwithſtanding the importunities of the gouernour to the contrarie, they ſent thither many bands both by ſea and lande to beſiege it: the ſame driuing Philip de Ranaſtin, who knewe that he taryed there vnprofitably, and, by thaccidents that might happen, not without ſuſpition of daunger, to departe, and to leaue in his place Roccabertin. The king for his parte, diſpayring that temperaunce was vnhable to range things to a better forme, and iudging withall that if he ſhould conſent that they continued in that eſtate, it might be preiudiciall to his dignitie and ſuretie, and laſtly, fearing that if he gaue longer ſufferance to things, the danger would be ſo much the greater: he began openly to make preparations both by ſea and land, to reduce the Genevvaies to his obedience: which deliberation was the cauſe, that matters which were negociated betwene the Pope and him agaynſt the Venetians, were diſſolued and broken: Enterpriſes muche deſired by the king, who for the death of king Phillip, founde him ſelfe well deliuered of the ſuſpitions which he had taken agaynſt Maximilian: But muche more wyſhed for by the Pope, by reaſon of the townes which they occupied in Romania, and did diſpoſe of the Biſhoprikes vacant in their iuriſdiction, without any reſpect to the ſea Apoſtolike, and laſtly did intrude them ſelues into many things apperteining to the lawful authoritie of the Church. By reaſon whereof bearing a ſetled inclination to enterteine amitie with the king, he ſolicited him to paſſe into Italie, and to haue conference together, whervnto the king conſented, the Pope hauing afore in gratification of the kings requeſts, conſecrated Cardinals the Biſhops of Bayeux and Achx. But (the affections of Princes ſuffer alterations according to times and occaſions) the Pope vnderſtanding afterwards how the king had determined to take armes agaynſt the commons of Genes in fauour of the gentlemen, tooke it to great diſcontentment, for that hauing of long time frowned vpon the gentlemen, he had alwayes borne fauor to the diſpoſitions of the people: wherein he made great inſtance to the king to be contented, without changing the ſtate popular, to haue that citie in his obedience, and perſuaded him as much as he could to abſteine from armes, alleaging many reaſons, but chiefly the danger, leaſt by that meane ſome great alteration kindling in Italie, the warres which they had determined agaynſt the Venetians, were not cut off or hindred. The king bearing no inclination to theſe demaundes, the Pope, eyther ouerruled with anger or ſorowe, or els for that the olde ſuſpition of the aſpiring minde of the Cardinall Amboyſe did eftſones ſtirre in him, either by the naturall operation of himſelfe, or by the ſubtill ſuggeſtion of others (whiche made him feare that he were not reteyned by the king when they ſhould meete in one place) and perhaps aſwell for the one as the other occaſion: he publiſhed vppon the ſodayne in the beginning of the yeere 1507. agaynſt the expectation of euery one, that he would eftſones returne to Rome, not for other reaſon then that the ayre of Bologna was contrarie to his health, and that his reuenues were much diminiſhed by his abſence from Rome. This alteration of counſell brought no little maruell to euery one, but ſpecially to the king, for that without occaſion he would leaue vnperfect the practiſes he had ſo much deſired to aduaunce, and breake of him ſelfe the enteriewe and conference which he had ſomuche required: and therefore calling into conſideration the eſtate and intricate diſpoſition of things, he labored what he coulde to draw him from that new counſell, and make him change opinion: wherein his paynes were more hurtfull to him then vayne, for that the Pope entring into a greater ſuſpition for the requeſt the king made, made eftſones an obſtinate confirmation of his firſt counſel, & departing from Bologna vpon the ende of February, he expreſſed how litle he could diſſemble the contempt he had conceiued agaynſt the king. Afore he iſſued out of the Citie, he ſet with vnfortunate ſignes the firſt ſtone of the caſtle which was made there by his commaundement, neare the gate which leades to Ferrara, in the ſelfeſame place where Phillip Maria Viſcounte duke of Millan had aforetime erected another with no leſſe yll fortune: And his newe anger agaynſt the Frenche king hauing in ſome ſort qualified his auncient hatred agaynſt the Venetians, and not minding to turne out of his right way, he determined to paſſe by the citie of Faenza, new controuerſies hapning from time to time betwene the French king and him, both for that he required that the familie of the Bentyuolois might be expulſed the duchie of Millan, notwithſtanding they were referred to that habitation by his conſent: and alſo for that he would not render to the pronoterie, the poſſeſſion of thoſe benefices which he had promiſed by his proper accorde and conſent (ſo often preuayled more in him the contention of his minde & his wilfull election, then eyther reaſon or equitie:) Which diſpoſition the king labored not to appeaſe with any art or diligence, but ſtanding aggreued for ſo great a variation, and entring withall into ſuſpicion, leaſt (as the trueth was) he gaue ſecrete encouragement to the people of Genes, he forbeare not to threaten him openly, and to obiect with iniurious words, his infamous place and birth, the Pope beeing diſcended of a very baſe place, and trayned for many yeres in very vile eſtate. And reſoluing more and more in his firſt deliberation touching the affayres of Genes, he prepared his armie with great diligence to go thither in perſon, hauing well experienced by his former ſucceſſes in the kingdome of Naples, what difference there is to adminiſter a warre in proper perſon, and to recommende it ouer to the doing of Capteines.

Theſe preparations amaſed nothing the Genovvaies being buſie to take Monaco, about the which they kept employed many veſſels and ſix thouſande men leauyed of the communalties and general multitudes of the countreis of Genes. Theſe bands were ledde and commaunded by Tarlatin a capteine of the Piſans, who, together with Peter Shortlegge and certaine vniuerſall ſouldiours, had bene ſent by them in fauor of the Genovvaies: And at Genes, as they perſeuered in their firſt offences, adding alwayes ſome newe tranſgreſſion, the capteine of the Caſtell, who till then had expreſſed no action, nor had not bene moleſted by the conſpirators, vpon the ſodain made many of the commons priſoners, and began to vexe the hauen and citie with his artilleries: This was eyther by the kings commaundement, or vpon his owne authoritie ioyned to a deſire to make pillage: by reaſon of which, Roccabertin conferring with the common danger of the towne, the priuate feare he had of his owne perſon, went his way, not whither he woulde (for extremitie leaues no libertie) but whither the neceſſitie of his fortune ſuffred him, the footebandes of the Frenche which were ſet to guarde the publike pallace, retyring into the Caſtell. A litle after, the ſiege which had remeined afore Monaco many monethes tooke ende and brake vp, the reaſon was, that ſuche as were encamped afore it, vnderſtanding that Yues d'Alegre and many gentlemen were at hande to ſuccor it with a ſtrength of three thouſande footemen of their owne pay, and certaine other bands which the duke of Sauoy had ſent, had leauyed the ſiege, hauing no corage to abide the armie that marched. Beſides, the brute ranne that the maine armie appoynted for the king, paſſed continually into Lumberdie: by reaſon whereof, thoſe men riſing into encreaſe of furie, who ought to haue bene the authors of better counſels, the commons that till that day had diſſembled with words the rebelliō which they had exerciſed in dedes, and neither forbearing to call vpon the name of the French king, nor once touching his Armes, nor remouing his enſignes nor banners out of the publike places, created Duke of Genes one Paule de Noue a ſilkedyer, a man for his vertues, of no merite, and for his birth and diſcending, of very baſe place and condition, declaring themſelues in this, manifeſt rebels, for that to the creation of Duke was ioyned a declaration that the citie of Genes, ſhould beare no ſubiection to any prince: The ſame ſo ſtirring the king to greater anger, together with the relation of the Nobles, that they had depoſed his Armories, and in their place had exalted the enſignes of Cæſar, that he redoubled the preparations which he had prouided afore: wherein he was alſo ſo muche the more kindled to reuenge and wrath, by howmuche Cæſar, at the perſwaſions of the Genovvaies, and haply by the Popes ſecrete ſetting on, had written to him that he ought not to moleſt Genes as a towne of the empire, offring ſo to labor that the people ſhould be ranged, and reduced to all thinges iuſt and reaſonable. The Duke and Tribunes were ſomewhat nouriſhed in their raſhe boldnes by certaine proſperous ſucceſſes they had had on the coaſt of Leuant: for, Ierome the ſonne of Lovvys de Fyeſquo, hauing reconquered Rapallo with two thouſande footemen and certayne horſe, as he went by night to ſurpriſe Rocqua, encountred the bandes that were ſent from Genes to ſuccour it: And whether it were by any diſaduauntage of the place, or for any other peculier reſpecte of feare or danger, he forbare to enterteine the skirmith, and without comming to ſhort weapons, he fell diſorderly to fleeing: Wherevpon Orlandin nephew to Iohn Lovvys, which was marched as farre as Recquo with an other regiment, did the like, hearing the noyſe of the chaſe. By this fortune the Duke and the Tribunes became more inſolent, and in thoſe glorying humors proceeded to beſiege Caſtellaccio, an ancient Caſtell which the auncient Lordes of Millan builded in the mountaynes aboue Genes, at ſuche

times as they were commaunders ouer that Citie, to ſerue as a helpe that thoſe companies which they ſhould ſende out of Lumbardie, might haue oportunitie to approche neare Genes, and ſuccour the caſtell, which conteining a very ſmall garriſon, they forced it and tooke it eaſily: for that the French bands that were there, yeelded vnder fayth to haue their goodes and life preſerued, whiche, according to the infidelitie of a commotion, was not obſerued, thoſe that were the executors of ſuche outrages returning to Genes with bloudy handes and great reioyſings, as tokens of their glorie and triumph. At the ſame time alſo they began to batter with their artilleries, the caſtell and the Church of Saint Frauncis ioyning to it, their fortune making them blinde agaynſt diſcretion and reaſon, as men more mightie in felicitie and chaunce, then in force or good experience. And albeit the king was already paſſed into Italie, and reenforced his armie continually to aſſaile Genes without delay: And the king catholike, notwithſtanding he wiſhed their conſeruation, would not ſhewe him ſelfe deuided from the French king, but furniſhed him with foure light galleys: And laſtly, albeit the Pope durſt not otherwyſe diſcloſe his intentions then in giuing them ſecret hopes, and that they were deſperately abandoned of all ſuccours, and had but onely three hundred footemen forreiners, not one Capteine or commaunder experienced in warre, and great lacke of munitions: yet were they reſolute and continued in their obſtinacie, reappoſing muche for themſelues in the ſtraites of their countrey, and that by the difficulties and ſharpnes of wayes and paſſages, they might eaſily lette thenemie for comming neare Genes: And as men eſteeming certeintie in the winde, they deſpiſed, in regarde of theſe vayne hopes, the admonitions of many, and ſpecially the counſels of the Cardinall of Finale, who accompanying the French armie, perſwaded them by many meſſengers and letters to offer vp themſelues to the kings will, giuing them hope to obteine pardon and conditions tollerable: But the armie marching by the way of the borough of Fornaro and Seraullo, the vanitie of thenterpriſes of the Genovvaies began to appeare, being not meaſured not layde out by men trayned in warre, but folowed with clamors and vayne braggings of a baſe and ignoraunt multitude: In ſo muche as the courages of men nothing anſwering in a preſent perill, to that whiche they had promiſed when they were without feare, ſix hundred of their footemen ſet to guarde their firſt ſtraites, being charged by the French men, fled cowardly, by whoſe example, the reſidue that kept the other paſſages, abandoned their places and retyred to Genes, leauing all the ſtraites open to the French, whoſe armie hauing paſſed ouer without impediment the toppe of the mountaynes, was now deſcended into the vale of Pozzeuero within ſeuen myles of Genes: A matter that did not a litle amaze and maruell the Genovvaies, for that contrarie to their vndiſcrete expectations, they ſawe their armie ſo hardie as to encampe in that valley frontyred with troubleſome mountains, and in the middeſt of the enemies countrey. At the ſame time alſo the kings nauie which conteyned eyght light galleis, eyght gallions, with many Fuſts and Brigantins, preſented themſelues before Genes, and from thence ſayled towards Portouenere and Speitia, purſuing the Genovvay nauie beeing ſeuen galleis and ſix barkes, which not daring to keepe the hauen of Genes, were withdrawen into thoſe places. From the valley of Pozzeuero the armie drew to the borowe of Riuarola two miles within Genes, and neare to the Churche of S. Peter d'Arena, which is ioyning to the ſea: And albeit as they marched, they mette in many places with diuers footebandes of the Genovvaies, yet they all being of one reſolution and poſſeſſed with one puſillanimitie of minde, fledde afore them, their feares being greater then their daungers. This day arriued in the armie the perſon of the king, and was lodged in the Abbey de Boshet right ouer agaynſt the borough of Rinarola: he was accompanied with the moſt part of the nobles of Fraunce, with many numbers of gentlemen of the duchie of Millan, and with the Marquis of Mantua, whom not many dayes before the king had declared chiefe of the order of S. Michaell, and giuen vnto him the ſtanderd, which had not bene giuen to any ſince the death of king Lovvys the eleuenth. In the Frenche armie were eyght hundred launces (the king conſidering the difficulties of the countrey, had left the others in Lomberdie) a thouſande eight hundred light horſemen, ſixe thouſande Svvizzers, and ſix thouſand footmen of other nations. It is to be vnderſtãded that the Genovvaies (becauſe they would not leaue free that way which leades by the mountaynes to Caſtellaccio, and ſo to Genes, a ſhorter way then by Saint Peter d'Arene, and ioyning to the ſea) had builded a baſtillion on the toppe of the Mountaine called the promontorie hill, betwene the borow of Rinarola and Saint Peter d'Arene, from which baſtillion the way lay from Caſtellaccio by the backſide of the rocke. The armie then that lay encamped at Rinarola, marched the ſame day to the ſayd baſtillion: and on the other part, there iſſued out of Genes eight thouſande footemen, guyded by Iacques Corſe lieftenant to Tarlatin: for Tarlatin and the ſouldiours of the Piſans which were encloſed in Ventimiglia when the campe was leauyed from before Monaco, albeit they were reuoked by the Genovvaies, who for their conduction ſent them the ſhippe of Demetrius Iuſtinian, could not returne to Genes by lande for thimpediment of the French, nor by ſeas for that the windes were contrarie. But the French beeing nowe to iſſue and aſcende, diſcouered the footetroopes of the Genovvaies, who being aſcended to the mountayne by that ſide of the valley that leades to the baſtilion, and afterwards the moſt parte of them beeing diſcended, had made head aboue a rocke which is the halfe way of the mountayne: agaynſt whom Monſr de Chaumont ſent many gentlemen with a good ſtrength of footemen: The Genovvaies, aſwell for their oddes in numbers as the aduauntage of the place, made a valiaunt defence, and that to the great domage of the French, who making a cõtempt of their enemies, for that they were bandes compounded vpon artificers and people vniuerſall, went gallantly to charge them, without conſidering the ſtrength and ſituation of the place: And as Monſr de Paliſſa was hurt in the throate, but with no perill of lyfe, Monſr Chaumont ſeeking to driue them from thence, cauſed to be mounted on high two Cannons, which beating them in flanke, conſtrayned them to retyre to the mountaine, where the reſidue of their ſtrength remeined: The French folowing them in good order of warre, thoſe that garded the baſtillion (albeit for his ſeate and fortification, they might with ſuretie abide the Cannon) fearing leaſt vpon them and ſuche as were vpon the mountaine, might fall ſome of the French bandes, they left it abandoned to their great infamie, by meane whereof ſuche as from the rocke had begon to retyre towards the baſtillion, ſeeing their way was cut off, returned eftſones to Genes by diches and cauſies, leauing the ordinarie pathes, and loaſing in the retraict about three hundred bodies. Theſe ſucceſſes brought an incredible feare ouer all the Citie, which depending wholly vpon the willes of the inferiour multitudes, neither directed by counſels of warre, nor ruled by ciuill wiſdome, ſent two Embaſſadors to tharmie to ſolicite to render them ſelues vnder couenantes conuenient: They could not haue audience nor acceſſe to the king, but were referred to bee heard by the Cardinall of Amboyſe, who made them anſwere that there was no diſpoſition in the king to accept them, if they did not make a free and generall offer of their liues and goods goods to the kings abſolute diſcretion,ſparing to intromit all motions of capitulations or couenants,they that in thoffence had not reſpected his maieſtie,nor their fidelitie: But during the parley with the Cardinal (it is hard to moderate a multitude giuen ouer to mutinie)one part of the commons not inclined to reconcilement and peace,going out of Genes by heapes, diſplayed their enſignes with many other footbands,vpon the rocks and ſide of the valley which leadeth from Caſtellaccio:they approched within a quarter of a myle of the Baſtillion,hoping to recouer it, and entreteining the skirmiſh for three houres with certen of the French bands that came againſt them,they retired at laſt to Caſtellaccio,neither reioycing in their fortune,nor leauing to their enemies any aduantage. Al which meane while,the king more fearfull of a greater ſtirre,then well aſſured of the conqueſt,remeined alwayes armed on horſeback in a plaine betwene the ryuer of Pozzeuero and the place where the army was encamped, his minde wauering, and his expectation not ſatisfied: Neuertheles the night folowing the Genouuaies,whoſe counſels were now deſperate,as the brute was common,that certain principals of the people had ſecretly conſpired and compounded with the king euen from the time he entred Aſt, And the commons ioyning to their declining condition,many complaints that they had bene abuſed:The Duke, with many of thoſe that knewe that no ſubmiſſion was worthy of place, nor their faultes meete to be diſpenſed withall, together with all the regimentes of Piſans,departed to go to Piſa,leauing the citie to diſcretion,as themſelues were driuen to folow their fortune: The morning following by the appearing of the day, the ſame Embaſſadors returned eftſones to the campe, and conſented to giue vp the towne to the kings diſcretion,not hauing ſuſteined the warre aboue eight dayes: A notable example of the ignorance and confuſion of multitudes and people, who grounding their doings vpon fallible hopes & vayne expectations,are furious when the danger is farre of,and very irreſolute when perill approcheth,not temperate in their counſels, irregulate in their actions,and for their common affections,moſte diſſolute and immoderate: The accord being made,the king with his armie approched neare Genes,the footmen being beſtowed in the ſuburbes,who became almoſt intractable,ſpecially the Swyzzers, whom there was much to do to reſtrayne from entring the towne, and to make pillage of the goodes: So ſweete a praye is the ſpoyle of a Citie, and ſo vnbridled is the mercenary ſouldiour that ſerueth but for his hyre, bearing for the moſte parte very negligent reſpectes to equitie, order, or conſcience. After this Monſr Chaumont entred into Genes with the moſte parte of the other regiments, hauing firſt furniſhed Caſtellaccio with garriſon: The Genouuaies deliuered vp to him all the armes aſwell publike as priuate, whiche were immediately beſtowed in the Caſtell, with three peeces of artillerie brought thither by the Piſans, and afterwardes reconueyed to Millan. The next daye beeing the xxix. of Aprill, the perſon of the king made his entrie into Genes, with all the companies of men at armes and archers of his guarde: And as he was alighted vnder a ſtarely arche, holding in his hande a naked ſworde, and himſelfe all attyred in whyte garmentes, there appeared afore him the familie of the Antyans accompanied with many honorable Citizens, who falling at his feete with teares, ſorrowe and ſubmiſſion, and all other argumentes of men offendours, the one of them in the name of the whole, after ſilence was graunted, beſought the king in this ſorte:

The rebels of Genes yeelde to the French king.

The Frenche king entreth as a conqueror into Genes.

We come not here vpon our knees(right merciful king)to debate the trāſgreſſions we haue done,but to offer our ſelues guiltie in as many faultes as it ſhall pleaſe you nature that pitieth, but farre more worthy the clemency that forgiueth, since to fall and erre is familiar to frailty & humanitie, but to pardon and dispence is a propertie inspired of the liuing God. These speaches were folowed with the loude voices of euery one, crying, Mercy, mercy. But the king passed on without giuing any aunswere, bidding them neuertheles to rise, & deliuering his naked sword which he held in his hand, he shewed some tokens of a mind more inclined to compassion then to crueltie: he ascended immediatly to the great Church, where infinit flockes of women & children of both kindes, fell prostrate at his feete, crying vpon his clemency and mercy with weping & wringing of hands, and other demonstrations of humilitie, expressed also in their vniuersall attyre of white. This was it that most moued the king, notwithstanding the others were not without their particular impressions, In so much that albeit he was determined to depriue the Citie of all gouernment and authoritie, and to confiske the reuenues which vnder the name of Saint George belonged to many persons priuate, and lastly taking from them all forme and image of libertie, to reduce them into the same state of subiection whiche he had done the townes of Millan, yet considering afterwards, that by this maner of proceeding, not only many innocents should be punished, but also the minds of the whole nobilitie estraunged, and that it would be more easie to him to goueme with remission and sweetnes, then with rigor & seueritie, he reconfirmed the auncient gouernment, and left it in the same forme wherin it was before the seditions. And yet, to temper his mercy with some iustice, & somewhat to accõpany his clemencie with seueritie, he condemned the cõmunaltie in a hundred thousande duckets for the penaltie of the offence, with aggrauatiõ of penalty of two hũdred thousand duckets more, payable within a certen time, both to defray the charges he had sustained, and also to edifie a Cytadell in the place where is the towre of Codisa not farre frõ Genes, and standing vpon the sea aboue that suburbe which leadeth to the valley of Pozzeuoro & S. Peter in Arena: which Citadell, for that it may commaunde the hauen and whole citie, is rightfully called the bridle: he ordeined also that they should furnish a greater garrison then they were wont, & kepe continually armed in the hauen for his seruice, three gallies, & fortifie the castel & Castellaccio, he brake all the capitulations & couenants that had bin made afore betwene the citie & him, graunting to them againe al the same things, but in forme of priuilege, & not in nature of couenant charter, to thend he might alwayes stand in power to depriue them: he defaced out of their monies and coynes their auncient stampes, causing them for afterwards to beare his standers and stamp in signe of absolute superioritie. To these actions was added the death of Demetrius Iustinian, who was beheaded, discloſing in his examination all the practises which the Pope had made, together with the hopes he had giuen thẽ: within fewe moneths after was beheaded Paule de Nouo lately made duke, who sayling from Pisa to Rome, was betrayed by a pirate that had bene his souldier, and solde to the Frenche men: A death not muche lamented of any, for that aspyring to his creation not by discent or merite, but by rashe election, there was left to him no power to exercise the humors of a Prince: And to him selfe so much the lesse greuous, by howmuche the short continuance of his imperie cut frõ him those delites which dominion do brede, loasing with litle sorow the thing which he had got with litle payne, and of the which his fortune gaue him no oportunitie to taste the very first and greene fruites. After the king had ordeyned these things, solemnly receyuing of the Genouvaies an othe of fidelitie, and giuing pardon to all, except to three score whom he committed to the disposition of the law, he went to Millan, disperſing immediatly after this conqueſt, his army, with the which continuing the courſe of victorie, he might eaſily haue oppreſſed in Italy whom he had liſted, all the potentates there ſtanding more in feare of his power, than any way prouided to reſiſt perils: But hauing regard to the ſtate of things, and promiſe he had made, he diſſolued his armie, the better to aſſure the Pope, the king of Romains, and the Venetians, who were not without feareful ſuſpitiõs, that his deſcending into Italie was for ſome other cauſe then to range the Rebels of Genes, & reduce the towne to a policie.

But nothing could appeaſe the fretting mind of the Pope, who taking al things in the worſt part, complained eftſones (not temperatly) of the king, as if it had bene by his meane, that Anniball Bentiuole with ſix hundred footemen leauied in the duchie of Millan, did aſſay in thoſe times to enter Bolognia, aſſuring that if he had preuailed in that action, the king would yet haue declared him ſelfe more againſt the ſtate eccleſiaſtick: Wherwith the Pope being wroth, notwithſtanding he had before with great difficultie publiſhed Cardinals the biſhops of Achx and Bayeux, he refuſed to raiſe to that dignity the biſhop of Alby, complaining chiefly that by Monſr de Chaumont his brother, the Bentyuoleis had ſuffrance to dwell in the duchie of Millan: yea (which was of greater conſequence) the Pope ouerruled indifferently with hate and ſuſpition (two violent paſſions in a minde placed in authoritie) when the king firſt publiſhed that he would reduce the Genouuaies to obedience by armes, ſignified by his Nuncioes & peculiar letters to the king of Romains & electors of thempire, that the French king prepared to paſſe into Italie with a moſt mighty armie, vnder cooller to reappeaſe the tumultes of Genes, which he might redreſſe with his authoritie, his intention being to oppreſſe the ſtate of the Church, and vſurpe the dignitie of the Empire. The Venetians alſo ioyned with him in this certificat, hauing the ſame feares of the cõming of the French into Italie with an armie ſo well addreſſed: which aduertiſements beeing cõmunicated with Maximilian, whoſe inclination embraſed naturally newe things, and being at thinſtant newly returned from Flanders, where he had practiſed in vayne to take the gouernment of his litle ſonne: he aſſembled in the towne of Conſtãce, the princes of Germany & the free townes (thoſe are called the free cities, which acknowledging by certen tributes & determinate payments thauthoritie of thempire, do gouerne thẽſelues notwithſtanding in al things by their own lawes, not ſeking to amplifie their territories, but to preſerue their libertie.) At this aſſembly appeared all the princes, barons, & cõmunalties of Germany, perhaps wyth more readynes & in greater numbers thẽ had bin ſene long time before in any dyet: for thither reſorted in perſon, al the electors & princes of Germany both eccleſiaſtike & ſecular, except ſuch as were reſtrayned by lawfull impediments, in whoſe places were ſent either their ſonnes, their brethren, or ſome very neare kinred to repreſent their perſonall preſence: All the free townes in like ſort ſent thither Embaſſadors, In which generall aſſemblie & aſpect of thuniuerſall body of Germany, Caſar cauſed to be publikely read the Popes writ with many other letters ſignificatorie from diuers places, ſome of them expreſſing that the French kings intention was to aduaunce the Cardinall of Amboyſe to the ſupreme ſea of Rome, and to receyue of him the imperiall crowne. Theſe aduertiſementes breeding no ſmall murmure in the minds of the audience, ronne throwe the princes and barons with great varietie of iudgement, ſome of thẽ fearing in dede thambition of the king, but the moſt ſort diſdayning much ſo great an indignitie againſt the maieſty & crowne imperial, wherin as euery particular began to prepare himſelf to make knowne with words & ſpeches his opinion & affection, Caſar cutting of that inclination by his authority, ſpake to them them in this sort: You see now (my Lords) what effects, the long patience we haue hithervnto vsed hath brought forth, what frutes are gathered of the final reckoning that hath bene made of my former complaints expressed in so many diots. And now your own eyes do behold that the French king, who heretofore durst not offer him self against any thing that apperteined to the sacred empire, but vpō occasiōs vrged and coollers very apparant, is now in preparation with an open force, not to protect our Rebels as he was wont, not to vsurpe any particuler place which reasonably apperteineth to the Empire, but, taking the oportunitie of the tyme, turning our patience into mockery, and forming an aduantage and occasion vpon our long setled negligence, he draweth his sworde to despoyle Germanie of thimperiall dignitie, so honorably gotten, and so long time continued by the vertue and vallor of our auncesters: he is not entred into this boldnes, by any coniecture or perswasion that eyther our forces are diminished, or his powers encreased, neither can he be ignorant by how much the region of Germanie is mightie aboue the nation of Fraunce, both in maiestie of imperie, in grauity of counsell, in agillitie of bodies, in multitude of Princes, in obedience of subiects, and generally without all comparison in valour of capteines, and resolution of souldiours, in moneys, in munitions, in disciplines and directions of warre with all other furnishmentes requisite to defende a violence and offende a proude enemie. But he is caried into this ambicious enterprise onely by a hope, that according to thexperience of things paste, we will still dwell in securitie and negligence, and that our proper dissentions and ciuill factions preuayle more with vs, then the prouocations of glorie, yea then the consideration of our particular safetie: he thinketh that the same respects for the which we haue suffred him to our common shame, to vsurpe the duchie of Millan, that he hath nourished in our owne bosomes our ciuill quarrels, and that he hath borne a defence and protection of our rebels of Thempire, feeding vs lastly with vanities and errors, as men gouerned by humours light and wandring: he hopeth that the same suffraunce, securitie, & solemne negligence, will likewise keepe vs lulled asleepe to endure that by him shoulde be rauished from vs the dignitie of thempire, and the glorie and felicitie of this Nation transported into Fraunce: it woulde be a thing lesse infamous to our common name, and to me in perticuler lesse greeuous and intollerable, if it were knowen to the world, that the power of Germanie were inferiour to the forces of Fraunce, or that in the Almaines were not continued the same vertue whiche in all ages, in all actions, and in all fortunes was founde to beare reputation aboue the valour of the Frenche: for the domage shoulde afflict me lesse then the infamie, since at the least, things shoulde not be imputed to our negligence and indiscretion, whiche might proceede eyther of the condition of tymes, or of the malice of fortune: What greater calamitie can happen? what miserie more, then to be reduced to these tearmes, eyther to wishe to be lesse mightie, or to make a willing election of a great domage, onely to auoyde (since otherwyse it can not be) the perpetuall infamie and dishonour of our name: the magnanimitie of euery one of you so many tymes experienced in matters particular, your resolute courage proper and naturall to this Nation: And lastely, the memorie of the auncient vertue and triumphes of our elders (the very terror heretofore of all other realmes & kingdomes) do giue me both hope and assurance, that in an action of so great importance, your inuincible mindes will be awaked and receyue new life and spirite: for here is nowe no question of the alienation of the duchie of Millan, nor of the reuolting of the Swvizzers, in which actiōs of so great cōsequence there was rent a protection: It is an intereſt that is wholly yours, ſeeing I haue ſufficiently acquited the duetie I owe, in making ſo readie aſſemblie of you, to lay afore you the common danger, vrging you with the example of my deliberation. The reſolution of corage ſhall not want in me to cõmunicate with you in all daungers, and leſſe ſhall you lacke the diſpoſition of my perſon, accuſtomed of long time to endure paine and trauell, neither is my counſell in conducting a warre ſo inſufficient, eyther by greatnes of age, or doubtfulneſſe of experience, as, in this enterpriſe you may haue want of a leader worthy of ſo great an honor. And by hownuche you ſhall honor and ſet foorth the greatnes of your king with fulnes of authoritie, by howmuch you ſhall enuiron him with an armie mightie and appoynted, with ſo muche the more facilitie and your perpetuall glory, ſhall you be protectors of the libertie of the Churche of Rome our common mother, and leaue exalted to heauen, together with the reputation of the Almaine name, the Imperiall dignitie common to you all in greatneſſe and amplitude, and particular onely to this nation in iuſte office of protection.

This ſpeache wrought marueilouſly in the mindes of thaſiſtantes, beeing nowe aſhamed that in the other dyots his complaintes founde no better paſſage and fauor: And as it is eaſie to ſet on fyre thoſe mindes that are alreadie kindled: ſo euery one hauing a vehement diſdayne, that by their negligence the maieſtie of Thempire ſhould be tranſlated into other nations: they began with a great vnity, to treate vpon articles neceſſarie, holding it conuenient to leauie a moſt mightie armie, and of ſuche a ſufficient appoyntment as (though the whole regions of Italie woulde oppoſe agaynſt them with the Frenche king) to be hable to renewe and recouer in Italie the auncient rightes of Thempire, which had bene vſurped eyther by the diſhabilitie, or other infirmitie of the Emperours paſt: for ſo required the glorie of the name of the Almains: ſuche a preparation worthy thaſſemblie of ſo many princes and free townes: And that at laſt it was neceſſarie to ſhowe to all the worlde that though in the willes of the Almains had remayned a long diuiſion, and their mindes not reconciled for many yeres, that yet the nation was not leſſe mightie, nor their ſpirites depriued of that magnanimitie which in other worldes had made their aunceſtors terrible to all eſtates and principallities of men: by the meane of whoſe vertue, both there was diuolued in general to the nation of Germains, a liberal glorie with the dignitie imperiall, & in part particular, many noble perſonages had aſpired to much greatnes and dominion, many of the beſt houſes in Italie hauing by long preſcription raigned in eſtates gotten by their valor. Theſe things were begon to be debated with ſo great forwardnes and inclination, that it is manyfeſt no dyot to haue aſſembled of long time, wherein was exſpectation of ſo great euentes, the multitudes perſwading them ſelues vniuerſally, that beſides the ſtrength of all the other reaſons, the Electors with the reſidue of the Princes, expreſſed a more quicke readines to thenterpriſe, for a hope they had, that (for the minoritie of the children of king Phillip) the Imperiall dignitie which had ſucceſſiuely continued in Albert, Federike, and Maximilian, all three of the houſe of Auſtriche, woulde at laſt be paſſed into an other familie.

By theſe reſolutions and agreementes, the Frenche king was induced to diſſolue his armie immediatly after the action of Genes, both to take away thoccaſion of ſo great a ſuſpition, and to leaue euery partie ſatisfied of thintegritie of his intention, yea his owne perſon had eftſones repaſſed ouer the Mountes, had it not bene for a deſire he had to ſpeake with the king of Aragon, who prepared to returne into Spaine altogether diſpoſed to reſume the gouernment of Caſtille, for that Iane his daughter was vnhable to ſo great an adminiſtration: not ſo muche for the imbecillitie of her ſex, as for that by a ſuperabundance of melancolie growen ſince the death of her husbande, ſhe was become ſomewhat eſtranged from her vnderſtanding, and alſo for the minoritie of the children common betwene king Phillip and her, wherof the eldeſt had not yet attayned ten yeres: Beſides, he was puſhed forwarde by the deſires of many, whiche called him to that gouernment by a remembraunce that they had bene iuſtly gouerned, and that thoſe kingdomes had floriſhed vnder him by a long continuaunce of peace, the diuiſions already begon amongs the great Barons, together with the manifeſt ſignes of troubles to come, muche encreaſing this deſire: But his comming was no leſſe deſired of his daughter, who, wandring in minde in all other actions, was neuertheleſſe conſtant in this, that ſhe deſired the returne of her father, refuſing obſtinately agaynſt the perſwaſions and importunities of many, to ſubſcribe with her owne hande to any expedition, without whiche ſubſcription, according to the cuſtome of thoſe realmes, the affayres occurrant had not their perfection. For theſe reaſons, the king of Aragon departed from Naples, where he remeyned but ſeuen monthes, leauing vnſatisfied the great expectation that was had on him: not ſo muche for the ſhortnes of tyme whiche ronnes in a voluble motion without reſpect, nor for that it is harde to anſwere the conceptions of men which for the moſt part are inconſiderate and not meaſured with due proportions: as for the many difficulties & impediments that oppoſed againſt him, by reaſon wherof he did nothing deſeruing memorie for thuniuerſall benefit of Italie, nor any thing worthy of monument for the particuler profit of the kingdome of Naples: for ſuche was his deſire to returne eftſones to the gouernment of Caſtillo (the principall piller of his greatnes) that he reſerued no oportunitie to thinke of the affayres of Italie: onely he turned all his ſtudies to deuiſe to keepe himſelfe in amitie with the king of Romains and the French king, to thende the one vnder cooller to be grandfather to the little children of the dead king, and the other with thopportunitie of his power giuing corage to who woulde oppoſe agaynſt him, ſhoulde giue no impediments to his returne: And the obligation wherein he was bounde by the treatie of peace made with the Frenche king to reſtore the eſtates that had bene taken from the Barons of Aniovv, and diſtributed eyther by couenant or by recompence to ſuche as had followed his faction, hindred him to redreſſe and gratifie the kingdome of Naples: for ſeeking not to eſtraunge from him, the mindes of his good ſeruauntes, he was conſtrayned to recompence thoſe of Aniovve either with eſtates of equall reuenue (whiche he muſt buy of others) or with readie money (wherevnto his Courtes of faculties and treaſures woulde not ſuffice) in which reſpects he was compelled not onely to raiſe improuementes vppon his reuenues, and to refuſe, according to the cuſtome of newe kings, to diſtribute grace and exemptions, and exerciſe any ſorte of liberalitie; but alſo with the incredible complaynt of euery one, to taxe his peoples, who expected to be diſcharged of their intollerable burdens: the complaintes made by the Barons of both the one and other parte, were nothing inferiour, for that to ſuch as were poſſeſſed, beſides that they reſigned their eſtates with yll will, neceſſitie made their recompences ſhort and limitted, and touching others there was reſtrayned as muche as was poſſible, the benefite of reſtitution in all things, wherein hapned any difference, for that howe muche leſſe was reſtored to thoſe, by ſo muche leſſe was the recompence of others. The great Capteine departed with him leauing behinde

him a good will incredible, and a renowne nothing inferiour, of whom beſides his merites & prayſes in other times, his preſent liberalities then were moſt notorious, promiſing and diſpoſing giftes of great vallour, for the which he ſolde a great part of his owne eſtates, caring leſſe to make him ſelfe poore, then to fayle in ſuche an action of honor. But the king of Naples departed very yll contented with the Pope, for that demaunding thinueſtiture of the kingdome, the pope refuſed to giue it him, but with thoſe taxations and tributes wherewith it had bene giuen afore times to the former kings: he made inſtance that there might be made to hym the ſame diminution which had bene made to Ferdinand his couſin, and to his ſonnes and nephewes, demaunding thinueſtiture of the whole realme in his owne name as ſucceſſor of tholde Alfonſo, in which forme whileſt he was at Naples, he had receyued othe and homage, notwithſtanding in the capitulations of peace made with the French king, it was diſpoſed that touching the lande of Lauora and Abruzza the name of the Queene ſhould be ioyntly acknowledged. It was thought that the refuſall which the Pope made of the inueſtiture, was the cauſe that Ferdinand woulde not ſpeake with the Pope, who remeyning at the ſame time in the rocke of Oſtia, it was ſayde he taryed there to expect his paſſage: But how ſoeuer the truth was, the king of Aragon tooke his courſe to Sauona, where it was agreed that he ſhould haue enterview and ſpeache with the Frenche king, who ſtaying for that cauſe in Italie, was come thither from Millan aſſone as he vnderſtoode he had taken paſſage from Naples.

The kings of Aragon and Fraunce haue enterview together.

In this enterview and conference, the demonſtrations on all ſides were manifeſt, free, and full of confidence, and ſuche, for the libertie thereof, as in no memorie had bene ſene in any meeting or communication of like princes: for that other potentates, betwene whom were either priuate enuies, or auncient quarrels, were wont to meete with ſuch order, that the one was not in the power of the other, where this ſuffred neither reſtraint of cõpanies nor exceptiõ of place: for when the ſhips of the king of Aragon were within the hauen of Sauona, the French king being in their ſeeming diſcended vpon the wal of the hauen, paſſed by a bridge of wood made for the nonce vpõ the poope in the galley of the king of Aragon, with a very ſmall trayne of Gentlemen, and without any gard at all: where, being receyued with a ioy agreable to the honor that was in him, and with a common gladnes of the king and Queene his neece, ſpending ſome time there in deuiſes of mirth and curteſie: they went out of the galley by the ſame bridge, and made their entrie on foote into the citie, hauing muche to doo to paſſe through the preſſe of ſo many multitudes of men and women as were drawen thither from the townes thereaboutes. The Queene went accompanied with her husbande on the right hande, and her vncle on the left, being precioully attyred in ſtones of pryce, and other ſumptuous aray: The Cardinall of Amboyſe and the great Capteine marched after the two kings: After them followed the yong Ladies and gentlemen of the Queenes court, all ſet forth with glorious ſhowes: And before and behinde were the courtes of the two kinges appoynted in an incredible pompe of riche and gorgeous ornamentes. With theſe companies the king and Queene of Aragon were conueyed by the French king to the Caſtell, which was appoynted for their lodging, hauing his proſpect vpon the ſea: that part or halfe of the towne which apperteyneth to it was appoynted for their trayne: And the French king was lodged in the byſhops houſes right agaynſt the Caſtell: A ſpectacle truely worthy of memorie, to ſee together two of the moſte mightieſt kings in Chriſtendome, not long afore cruel enemies, and now not onely reconciled and conioyned by parentage, but alſo ſetting aparte all ſignes of hatred, and memories of offences paſte, did euery one commit to the arbitriment of the other his proper life, with no leſſe aſſurance and confidence then if they had ben lineall brethren: A maner of behauiour which gaue occaſion to ſuch as were preſent to diſpute, whether of the two kings had ſhewed the greater confidence: Many referred muche to the fidelitie of the Frenche king, who was the firſt that put him ſelfe in the power of the other, hauing no other aſſuraunce then the bonde of fayth: And to the other was tranſferred a greater occaſion of ſhame, for that fayth was kept to him firſt, and it was a ſuſpition more likely that Ferdinand deſired to be aſſured of him, the better to eſtabliſhe him ſelfe in the kingdome of Naples: But the moſt ſorte gaue greater reputation to the confidence of Ferdinand, who exceeding the example of the French king, put him ſelfe in his power, not for a moment or fewe howres, but for many dayes and long tyme. And hauing diſpoyled him of ſo great a kingdome, with ſo many harmes and domages to his peoples, and ſo late a ſlaunder of his name, he had to feare that the Frenche kings hatred was no leſſe mortall, then his deſire of reuenge iuſte: beſides, it was alſo to be doubted in whom was greater the profite of the diſloyaltie: for, to make the French king priſoner, Ferdinand could reape no great commoditie by it, ſince the eſtate of Fraunce is managed vnder ſuche a policie of lawes and cuſtomes, that to kepe the king reſtrained, could not muche diminiſhe the forces and authoritie of the kingdome: But there hanged other perils vpon the perſon of Ferdinand, for that if he had bin made priſoner, it was not to be doubted, that both for the minoritie of his heires that then were very yong, and the realme of Naples being to him a newe kingdome, and alſo for that his other ſtates, and ſingulerly the realme of Caſtillo were through many accidents diſordred amongſt them ſelues, the French king ſhould not haue receiued of long time any impediment by the power and armes of Spayne. In this enterviewe and honorable ſpectacle of great Princes, the conſideration of the great Capteine miniſtred not the leaſt occaſions to debate and common vpon: vpon him were occupied the thoughtes and eyes of euery one, no leſſe for the renowne of his naturall valour, then for the memorie of his many victories: Conſiderations which ſo emiſed the mindes and affections of the French men, that notwithſtanding they had bene ſo often vanquiſhed by him, & were wont to holde his name in common hatred, yet his very aſpect and preſence confirming the opinion and image of his vertue, tooke an other habite in the mindes of the Frenche, for that they coulde not be ſatisfied to beholde and honor him, making diſcourſe to ſuche as had not yet bene in the kingdome of Naples, ſometimes with what incredible celeritie and ſhifte of warre he inuaded in Calabria the Barons encamped at Laine, ſometimes with what patience and reſolution of mynde he endured ſo many difficulties and aduerſities, when in the middeſt of peſtilence and hunger he was beſieged in Barletto: ſometymes with what diligence and efficacie he kept reteyned the mindes of men, and amid a penurie and want of money entertained long tyme his ſouldiours without pay: with what ſinguler valor he managed the battell at Sirignolo: and with what greatnes of courage, with what induſtrie of a ſouldier, and with what vnexperienced ſtratagemes amid ſo many difficulties, with an armie vnpayed, and farre inferior in forces, he kept his ground, and obteyned the victorie vpon the ryuer of Garillon: And laſtly, howe vigilant he had bene alwayes to embrace oportunities, and make his profite vpon the diſorders of his enemies: But that which drewe men into moſt wonder & admiration of him, was the excellent maieſtie of his preſence,

the ſtately repreſentation of his words and geſtures, full of grauitie, affabilitie, and mildnes, equall to thoſe effects and actions which had always flowed from his right worthy and excellent vertues: aboue all the reſt, the French king, who deſired that he might ſuppe at the ſame table with Ferdinand, the Queene, and him, and by commaundement was placed neare to Ferdinand, was as it were rauiſhed with contemplation and deuiſing with him, finding in the action of his countenance and ſpeach, a confirmation of thoſe ſingularities and merites which he had afore expreſſed in ſo many worthy examples of his naturall valour and vertue: In ſo muche that in the iudgement of euery one, that day was no leſſe glorious to the great Capteine, then when he entred with his victorious armie into the citie of Naples, honored with all thoſe ceremonies of triumph which are wont to be exerciſed vpon conquerers. But as tyme noritheth a lawe of diſſolution and forgetfulnes of things worldly and tranſitorie, ſo thoſe were the lateſt triumphant dayes of the great Capteine, for that departing no more out of the kingdome of Spayne, he had afterwards no meane to exerciſe his vertue, neither in warre, nor in things memorable for peace. The two kings had conuerſation together for the ſpace of two dayes, wherein were holden betwene them many diſcourſes both long and ſecrete, and Cardinall de S. Praſſida the Popes Legate not admitted to that conference, nor honored but generally: but by that that might be comprehended by generall coniecture, and alſo by the manyfeſtation of things afterwards, they paſſed a reciprocall promiſe the one to the other to enterteine together a ioynt and perpetuall amitie and intelligence, and that Ferdinand ſhould labor to reconcile Maximilian and the French king, to thende that being all reunited, they might declare and proteſt quarrell agaynſt the Venetians: wherin, to expreſſe that they were no leſſe carefull for things cõmon, then for ſuch as concerned them ſelues in proper and particuler, they publiſhed an intention to reforme the eſtate of the Church, and to that ende to call a Councell: Neuertheles Ferdinand proceeded not with ſincerite, but ſeeking to nouriſhe in that hope the Cardinall of Amboyſe, who thirſted muche to be Pope, he lulled him ſo muche by that abuſing meane, that (with no litle domage to thaffaires of his king) he perceyued too late, and that by many ſignes and demonſtrations, what difference were betwene the words and works of that Prince, and what ſuttleties and euaſions were in his counſels. They communed together touching the cauſe of the Piſans, wherein the Florentins had enterteined negociation both with the one and other of them during the whole yere: for when the Frenche king prepared his armie agaynſt the Genovvaies, beeing diſcontented that the Piſans bare fauor to the rebellions of that people, and foreſeeing how muche it would be for the commoditie of his affaires to haue the Florentins to recouer that Citie, he gaue them hope, that aſſone as he had repreſſed the mutinies of Genes, he would conuert his armie to the deuotion of their ſeruice, expreſſing in that promiſe, as alſo appeared in the generall inclination of the Court, that the auncient good will which had bene aforetime borne to the Piſans, was for this occaſion turned into hate: But as euen the counſels of princes haue their variations & imperfections, ſo in their promiſes oftentimes is found litle certentie, bearing more regarde to the trayne and euent of tymes, then to accompliſhe the wordes they ſpeake: for the Frenche king hauing performed his enterpriſe vpon the Genovvaies, chaunged his determination with the Florentins, both for the ſame reaſons whiche made him diſmiſſe his armie, and alſo for that he would not offende the minde of the king of Aragon, who aſſured him that he would ſo diſpoſe the Piſans, that they ſhould willingly returne to thobedience of the Florentins, from whom the Frenche king hoped by that meane to drawe no ſmall quantitie of money. To this the king of Aragon diſpoſed him ſelfe, but for many ſundry occaſions, and albeit it had bene more agreable to him that the Florentins ſhould not recouer Piſa, yet knowing that it coulde not be long kept without great expences and difficulties, and fearing withall leaſt they ſhould obteine it by the Frenche kings working, he hoped when he was at Naples, to haue bene able to induce the Piſans by his authoritie, to returne vnder honeſt conditions, to the obedience of the Florentins, who promiſed (ſo farreforth as the action were accompliſhed) to confederat with him, and to giue him within a certaine time, an hundred thouſande duckets: but not finding in the Piſans that conformitie and deuotion whiche he expected, to let that the gratification and recompence ſhould not remeine onely to the Frenche king, he then proteſted openly to the Florentin Embaſſadors, that if they ſhould attempt in any ſort to reconquer Piſa without his ayde, he would manifeſtly obiect his power agaynſt them, And the French king (to turne him from thoſe thoughtes which he had to manage that enterpriſe by armes) he enterteined cunningly with deuiſes full of varieties, ſometimes perſwading that he hoped to drawe them in the ende to ſome compoſition, and ſometimes he iuſtified that the Piſans were vnder his protection: A matter no leſſe falſe and contrarie, then his deuiſes were vayne and fabulous: for albeit the Piſans had made many ſolicitations to him, with offers to indue him with the abſolute iuriſdiction of their towne, yet enterteyning their requeſts with hopes, & keping his intentions diſſembled, he alwayes forbare to accept them, knowing what it was to take vpon him the protection of a warre populer and confuſed. But this matter being more particulerly debated in Sauona, they cõcluded that it were good & neceſſarie, the Piſans ſhould returne vnder the iuriſdiction of the Florentins, ſo farforth as either of thẽ might taſt of the profit: the ſame being the cauſe that the Florentins (fearing to ſtirre to much the minde of the king of Aragon) forbare to giue the ſpoyle that yere to the harueſt of the Piſans: an action wherein they had reappoſed a great hope, for that what by the want of vittels, and weaknes of forces in the towne, the Florentin ſouldiours ouerranne the whole coũtrey euen to their gates: And the peoples of the maine countrey, more mightie in numbers within the towne then the proper Citizens, greeuing muche to loaſe the fruite of their trauell for the whole yere, began to abate muche of their accuſtomed obſtinacie: Beſides, their generall cauſe was no more ſuccored by their neighbours as before, for that the Genovvaies ouergreeued with ſo many calamities, had no more the ſame thoughtes, Pandolffe Petrucci made wearie betweene importunitie and ſuſpition, founde alſo the charges intollerable, and they of Lucquois, albeit they miniſtred ſecretly to their wantes, yet their habilitie was no more ſufficient to beare out ſo great a burden, being for the préſent no leſſe heauie and intollerable, then in expectation, ielouſe and full of perill. The two kinges departed from Sauona the fourth day, with the ſame demonſtrations of concorde and amitie: the one tooke his courſe by ſea to Barcelonia, and the other returned by lande into Fraunce, leauing the other affaires of Italie in the ſame degree, but with a greater diſcontentment of the Pope, who taking of newe his occaſion vpon the ſtirre made by Annyball Bentyuole, had made inſtance by Cardinal de S. Praſſida to the king at Sauona, to deliuer vp to him as priſoners John Bentyuolo and Alexander his ſonne, whom he kept reteyned in the duchie of Millan: he alleaged that ſince they had broken the contract made in Bolognia by thinterpoſing of Monſr de Chaumont, the king was at libertie and no further bounde to keepe his fayth, offring withall that if his maieſtie would ſatiſfie

his desire, he would sende the Cardinall cappe to the Bishop of Alby. The king aunswered, that albeit he coulde discerne in them no sufficient apparance of fault or crime, yet for that he would somewhat bridle and restrayne their dispositions, he had kepte retayned many dayes in the Castell of Millan, Iohn Bentyuolo, but not finding good matter wherein they had offended, he ought to haue no lesse regarde to thinnocencie of the parties, then to his proper honour, vnder the which he stoode bounde to keepe his fayth: And yet to gratifie the Pope and leaue him satisfied of his inclination, he sayde he was disposed to suffer him to proceede agaynst them with curses and paynes, as agaynst the rebels of the Church, euen as he had endured without complaint that in Bolognia in the heate of that stirre, their Pallace was destroyed euen to the fundations.

The Dyot of Constance continued still with the same expectation of men wherewith it was begon, which Cæsar forgat not to nourish with diuerse sleightes and gallant wordes, publishing that he would passe into Italie so accompanied, that farre greater forces then the armies of Fraunce and all Italie ioyned together, shoulde not be hable to resiste him: And to geue greater value and authoritie to his cause (alwayes protesting that he had onely fixed in his intention the protection of the Churche) he aduertised the Pope and Colledge of Cardinalles, that he had declared the Frenche king rebell and enemie to the sacred Empire, for that he had descended into Italie to transferre into the person of the Cardinall of Amboyse the supreme dignitie pontificall, and to set vppon hys owne head the Crowne Imperiall, and lastly to dryue the whole Region of Italie into one seruile subiection: That he prepared to come to Rome onely to take the Crowne, and to establishe a common suretie and libertie: And lastely, that in regarde of hys Imperiall dignitie beeing protector of the Churche, and for hys proper pietie verye deuoute and desyrous to aduaunce the Sea Apostolike, it was not conuenient he shoulde tarie to be requyred or prayed, knowing well ynoughe that the Pope for feare of perill and harmes was fledde from Bolognia, and that the same feare kept restrayned both him and the religious Colledge from communicating their daungers, or sending to demaunde succours. Thus the matters whiche were treated in Germanie beeing by manye intelligences signified into Italie, and the brute that was spredde surpassing the truth of thinges, together with the generall preparations which the Frenche king made, beeing causes enforcing more credite and testimonie of the publike rumours, for that it was beleeued that he feared not without occasion: These thinges (I say) moued muche the myndes of euery one, some for desire of newe thinges, some for hope, some for feare, some for respectes generall, and some for their priuate and particuler interests. In so much as the Pope sente as Legate to Maximilian, the Cardinall of Saint Croisse, and the Venetians, the Florentins, with all other Potentates in Italie, (except the Marquis of Mantua) that were absolute and depended vppon them selues, addressed to hym messaungers speciall, eyther in the name of Embassadours, or vnder some other nature, euery one foreseeing for hys safetie according to the iealousie of the tyme. These thinges troubled muche the mynde of the Frenche king, being very doubtfull of the wyll of the Venetians, and more vncertayne of the disposition of the Pope, aswell for many reasons and experiences of things past, as especially that he had elected to this legatiō cardinal S. Croisse, in whom had remained an ancient and partiall inclination to further the greatnes of Maximilian. But touching the will of the Pope, muche lesse that it was manifest to others, seeing it was scarsly knowen to him ſelfe: for, hauing his minde full of diſcontentmentes and ſuſpitions agaynſt the French king, ſometimes (to be at libertie from thoſe humors wandring and troubleſome) he deſired the comming of Ceſar: and eftſones the memorie of auncient quarels betwene the Popes & Emperours, diſaltered and amazed him, the ſame occaſions remayning, and the ſame propertie of ſpirits working: In which incertentie and frailty of minde, he deferred to reſolue himſelfe, expecting firſt what would be determined in the Dyot: And therfore proceding in tearmes generall, he had inſtructed the Legate to perſwade Ceſar in his name to paſſe into Italy without an army, offring to him greater degrees and proportion of honors then euer had bin done by any Pope at the crowning of Emperors. But a litle after (the counſels of men obey occaſions & times) the expectations that were had of the reſolutions in the Dyot, began to diminiſh: for when it was credibly vnderſtand in Germanie, that the Frenche king had diſſolued his armie immediatly after the victorie of Genes, his perſon alſo returning with the ſame fidelitie and obſeruation of promiſe ouer the Mountes, the heate of the Princes and peoples began to abate, and their fiery inclinations to reſolue to ſmoke and fume, the feare beeing ceaſſed that he came not to vſurpe the Popedome and the Empire. Beſides (as it often hapneth) publike reſpects fell not ſo ſtrongly in conſideration, but they were ouercaried with intereſts priuate, for that, beſides all other reaſons, there was a generall and auncient deſire in all Germanie, that the greatnes of Emperours ſhould not be ſo abſolute, as the other eſtates ſhould be compelled to obey them: And the French king omitted no diligence that might giue aduauncement to his cauſe, for that he ſent to Conſtance, men expreſſe, who forbearing all publike practiſe, but working ſecretly, laboured by the hydden fauours of the Princes that were his friendes, to appeaſe the mindes of the reſidue, purging thinfamies that had bene impoſed by teſtification and euidence of theffectes, ſince aſſone as he had ranged Genes, he did not onely diſperſe his armie, but alſo returned in perſon into Fraunce, with that ſpeede that was agreable to a perſonage of his greatnes: they affirmed beſides that he had not onely abſtayned in example and action from offending the Empire of Rome, but alſo in all confederations, contractes, or bondes, he did alwayes proteſt and except that he would be bounde to nothing that was contrarie to the rights of the ſacred Empire: wherein neuertheles they reappoſed not ſo much in theſe iuſtificatiōs, but that they labored with great diligence and many liberalities to abate the fierce mindes of the Almains « with the engine of golde and ſiluer, wherof that nation is not a litle couetous: A bat-

« terie of no litle force to make breaches into the minds of moſt ſortes and properties
« of men, that beare more inclination to corruption then to vertue. The Dyot at laſt determined and brake vp the twentith day of Auguſt, in the which was agreed, after many diſputations, that there ſhould be deliuered to Ceſar to followe him into Italy, eight thouſand horſe, & xxij. thouſand footmen, payed for ſix moneths, and to furniſh the expences of thartilleries, with other charges extraordinary, ſix thouſand Florins of Rhein to be continued ſo long as the artillery was in ſeruice: the bands and regimentes to be in the fielde & aſſemble neare Conſtance about the middeſt of October. It was publiſhed at that tyme, that they would happly haue furniſhed hym with a greater proportion of men and money, if Maximilian had conſented that thenterpriſe (alwayes vnder his gouernment and counſel) had bin managed wholly in the name of theempire, and that thelection of Captaynes had paſſed by order from theempire, and diſtribution of the places that ſhoulde bee conquered to bee made according to the determination of the Dyot: But Maximilian reteyning ſtill a ſingler ambition in this iorney, would admit no companion or communitie of name or authoritie (albeit all went vnder a generall title of the name of the Empire) and muche leſſe ſuffer that the rewardes of the victorie ſhould apperteine to any other then to him and his: in ſo muche as ſtanding better contented with the aydes they deliuered to him in this ſort, then to go better accompanied, with an authoritie aſſiſtant, there was made no other reſolution. And yet albeit it anſwered not the expectation that men had conceiued afore, yet ceaſſed not for all that the feare that was in Italie of his diſcending: for it was conſidered that the ſouldiers which his ſubiects would giue him, with ſuche as he would leauie of himſelfe, beeing ioyned to thoſe bands that were erected in the Dyot, he would come appointed with a very mightie armie, compounded of bodies reſolute and trayned, and furniſhed with ſundrie natures of artilleries: A matter ſo muche the more to be feared, by howmuche Maximilian, for the diſpoſition of his nature, and long exerciſe in armes, was very hable and ſufficient in martiall diſcipline, and could well beare, with the labour of his body and facultie of his minde, all aduerſities and difficulties whatſoeuer: A ſufficiencie for the whiche he merited more, and caried away greater reputation then had bene giuen to any Emperours many ages before. He labored beſides, to leaue and bring into his pay ten thouſande Svvizzers, whervnto albeit the Bayliſe of Dion and others ſent by the French king, did oppoſe & obiect with great inſtance in the Dyots of that nation, reducing to memorie thalliance cõtinued for ſo many yeres with the crowne of Fraunce, and eſtſones lately confirmed by the king raigning, together with the many ſorts of profits which their peoples receiued by the conuerſation of Fraunce: And on the other ſide, they preferred their olde and ſetled quarels with the houſe of Auſtria, their greeuous warres they haue had with Maximilian, and laſtly what indifferent perill and preiudice the greatnes of thempire brought to them: yet all theſe notwithſtanding in the parliamentes & dyots of the Svvizzers, appeared a manifeſt inclination & deſire to ſatisfie the demaundes of Ceſar, or at the leaſt not to take armes agaynſt him, for that (as was ſuppoſed) they would not offend the generall name and ſtate of Germanie, which it ſeemed was intangled and ioyned to this action: For this reaſon many doubted that the Frenche king, if he were abandoned of the Svvizzers, or that the Venetians fayled to ioyne with him, being not furniſhed with a ſufficient ſtrẽgth of footmẽ to reſiſt the footbãds of thenemies, & hoping that the fury of Thalmains entring into Italy as a landflood, would vaniſh and diſſolue for want of money, would retire his army into townes, the likelihood wherof was alredy manifeſt in this, that with a wonderfull diligence he fortified the ſuburbes of Millan with many other places in the duchie of greateſt importance: In regarde of which alterations and preparations, the Venetians were trauelled in no leſſe perplexitie of minde then the other regions of Italy, and by howmuch their deliberations & counſels were of greateſt conſequence, by ſomuche more buſye, and greater were the paines and diligence that euery one tooke to haue them ioyne with him: for Ceſar from the beginning, had addreſſed to them three Embaſſadors of great authoritie, not only to ſolicite that he might haue free paſſage throw their dominions, but alſo to induce them to contract with him a ſtraiter alliance, wherein ſhould be agreed that they ſhould participate in the rewards of the victorie, proteſting to them on the contrarie, that it was in his power to accord to their preiudice with the Frẽch king, with the ſame conditions that ſo often had bin offred to him at diuers times. On the other ſide, both by his Embaſſadors, & the Orator of Venice that was reſident in his court, labored to perſwade thẽ to oppoſe with maine hand againſt the cõming of Ca-

far as a matter of equal preiudice both to the one and other, offering for his part the ſeruice of all his forces, and to remayne their perpetuall confederate: But in thoſe dayes the ſenate was not contented that the tranquillitie of Italie ſhoulde be troubled, neither were they caried into humors of newe tumults, by the hopes that were offred to enlarge their dominions: for they had proued by a ſmarting experience, that the benefite and fruite of the conqueſt of Cremona, did not counteruayle the ſuſpitions and daungers wherein they had bene continually holden, ſince they had the Frenche king ſo neare a neighbour: They coulde willingly haue bene contented to be newters, but beeing preſſed with thimportunities of Themperour, they ſtoode in a neceſſitie eyther to refuſe or graunt him paſſage: if they refuſed him, they feared to be the firſt that ſhoulde be vexed: and in gratifying his demaundes, they offended directly the Frenche king, beeing expreſly forbidden in their reciprocall confederation, to graunt paſſage to thenemies of the one or other: And they were not ignoraunt, that beginning once to offende him, it woulde be great indiſcretion after Maximilian were paſte, to be ydle beholders of the iſſue of the warre, and expect the actions of two princes, wherof the one would be an enemie to the name of the Venetian, and the other hauing receiued no other pleaſure then libertie of paſſage, had no great occaſion to be their friend: Reſpects which wrought much with the Senate, that it was neceſſarie to ſticke openly to the one or other parties, but to whether of them, their opinions, for thimportance of the matter, were very differet: And therfore, being no longer able to temporiſe in a cauſe ſo earneſtly laboured by thembaſſadors of both princes, they made it at laſt a councell matter in the Senate houſe of the Pregati, where Nicholas Foskarin vſed this forme of reaſoning:

The oration of Ni. Foſkarin.

If it were in our power to ſet downe a reſolution, by the which might be cõtinued the peace and tranquillitie of our commonweale amid ſo many conſpiring deliberations of theſe great princes: I am ſure there woulde be amongſt vs no varietie of opinion and counſell, and muche leſſe ſhould any hope or offers leade vs inclined to a warre of ſo greate expences and perill, as is lyke to be this whiche ſtandes nowe in preparation: But ſeeing in regarde of the reaſons and cauſes ſo often debated amongeſt vs in our late aſſemblies, there is no expectation to entertaine that common tranquillitie: The principall reaſon wherevppon wee are to eſtabliſhe our deliberation, is to conſider whether wee maye beleeue that betweene the Frenche king and king of Romains (diſpayring once of our amitie) maye bee contracted an vnion: or whether the hatreds betweene them bee ſo mightie and reſolute, as to lette them from ioyning together in one ſociable vnitie: for if wee were well aſſured of ſuche a daunger, it were to bee proued that wee oughte not to departe from the amitie of the Frenche king, bothe for that our forces beeing ioyned in good fayth and meaning with his for a common defence, wee ſhoulde eaſily protecte our eſtate, and alſo it woulde be more honorable to continue the confederation we haue with him, then by lighte euaſions to ſhyfte vs from it without euident occaſion: Beſides, wee ſhoulde enter with more recommendation and fauour of the world into a warre which ſhould beare the title and name of the protection of Italie, then to ioyne with thoſe armies and powers which we knowe manifeſtly to be leauied to ſtirre commotions and troubles. But if we ſet before our eyes the daunger of this vnion, I thinke it will not be denied that there is not great neceſſitie to preuent it, ſince it woulde bee more profitable aboue all compariſons to ioyne wyth the Emperour agaynſt the Frenche king, then to tarye tyll bothe the one and other bee vnited agaynſt vs. And albeit it is harde to iudge certaynely whiche of the two

two will happen, for that it is a thing that not onely dependeth of the wyll of o- » thers, but alſo is ſubiect to many accidentes & occaſions, which ſcarcely will leaue » this reſolution in the power of thoſe that ought to execute it: yet, for that thexpe- » rienoe of tymes paſte is a true inſtructor of thinges to come, and that matters that » are to ſucceede can not bee comprehended but by coniecture, wee maye diſcerne » that in this is more perill then profite, leſſe ſuretie then confidence, and an action » whereof we ought to haue great ſuſpition and feare: for, as touching the king of » Romains, it is not lyke that he ſhall finde anye greate impedimentes, conſidering » with what feruent deſire he aſpyreth to paſſe into Italie, whiche he can not doo » with any conueniencie or reaſon, vnleſſe he ioyne with the Frenche king or with » vs: And albeit he ſoliciteth muche our alliaunce, yet if we refuſe him, who doub- » teth but neceſſitie wyll driue hym to ſeeke confederation with the Frenche, hauing » no other meane to accompliſhe his purpoſes. Touching the Frenche king, it ſee- » meth there are farre greater difficulties for this vnion: but yet I holde them not » ſuche, as vnder them wee maye promiſe to our ſelues anye ſuretie: for that he » maye bee caryed to that deliberation by ſuſpition and ambition, two mightie mo- » tions in the myndes of greate Princes, eyther of them in hys ſingler nature, bee- » ing hable to dryue on thoſe thoughtes that are alreadie rayſed to dominion: he » marketh well the inſtance that Cæſar maketh to enter vnitie with vs, and meaſuring » (albeit with falſe weightes) our intention and deſire, he may doubt that the ſame » ſuſpition that we haue, not to bee preuented by him, induceth vs to preuent » hym, knowing alſo that wee haue good intelligence of thoſe thinges whyche ſo » long tyme they haue conſulted together agaynſt vs: Laſtely, he maye feare that » wee are allured by ambition, looking into the liberalities and offers that maye bee » made to vs, and from this feare there can be no meane ſufficient to aſſure him, ſee- »
ing there is nothing that naturally breedes more ſuſpition then matters of eſtate: »
And beſides ſuſpition, he maye be dryuen on by ambition, hauing a deſire as wee » knowe to the Citie of Cremona, wherevnto he ſhall be the more kindled by perſwa- » ſions of the Millanois, and no leſſe for a thirſte to occupie all the auncient eſtates of » the Viſcountes, whiche he pretendeth to be his inheritaunce aſwell as the Duchie of » Millan: to theſe he can not hope to aſpire, if he firſt ſeeke not confederacie with » the king of Romains, for that our common weale beeing mightie of it ſelfe, yf the » Frenche king aſſayle vs alone or of his proper forces, it will alwayes ſtande in our » power to ioyne with Maximilian: whiche thoughtes as they haue alwayes occu- » pied his mynde, ſo in this it is alſo approued that he neuer durſt lyfte vp his hande » to oppreſſe vs without that vnion, whiche beeing the dyrect lyne to leade hym to » the marke he ſhootes at, why ſhoulde we not feare that in the ende he wyll be diſ- » poſed to it? we are not aſſured from this feare by the conſideration that it woulde » bee a reſolution vnprofitable to hym, for the conquering of two or three Cities, » to bring into Italie the king of Romains hys naturall enemie, of whom in the ende » he ſhoulde bee alwayes moleſted, and with whome he ſhoulde neuer haue friend- » ſhippe but vncertayne, and yet ſuche as by this reaſon he ſhould be alwayes driuen » to buye and enterteine with great ſummes of money: for that if he feare that » wee will not ioyne with the king of Romains, he is to thinke that in preuenting vs, »
he ſhall not onely put him ſelfe out of daunger, but alſo ſhall ſtande in ſecuritie: »
And though he do not feare this vnion, yet he maye happly iudge it neceſſarie to » confederate wyth hym, to delyuer hym ſelfe from the troubles and daungers » whyche he maye ſuffer by hym, eyther by reaſon of the aydes of Germanie, or »

" by other alliances and occaſions: And albeit greater daungers maye happen to " him if the king of Romains begin once to ſet foote in Italie, yet it is the common
" nature of men to feare moſte the daungers that be neareſt at hande, to eſteeme
" more then is neceſſarie things preſent, and to holde leſſe reckning then they ought
" of ſuch as are farre of and to come, ſeeing that to the ſame are referred many hopes
" of remedies, aſwell by the fauor of times, as benefite of accidentes: But be it that it " were not profitable for the Frenche king to make this vnion, we are not aſſured for " all that, that he will not do it: the mindes of men are ſubiect to many mutations,
" ſometimes altred by feare, & ſometimes blinded by couetouſnes: we know that the " nature of Frenchmen is light, and ready to embrace any new enterpriſes, and whoſe
" hopes are neuer leſſe then their deſires: we are not ignorant, with what perſwaſions
" and offers (ſufficient to kindle any minde) the French king is ſtirred agaynſt vs by the " Millanois, the Pope, the Florentins, the duke of Ferrara, and by the Marquis of Man-
" tua. It is not giuen to all men to be wiſe and forſeeing, no it is a gyfte that rarely diſ" cendes, and that but to a few, but who will prognoſticate what will be the delibera" tions of an other, let him (if he will not deceiue him ſelfe) not ſo muche conſider
" thoſe things which by ſimilitude and likelyhoode would make a wiſe man, as what " is the ſpirite and nature of him that is to make the deliberation: And therefore if we " will iudge of that the Frenche king will do, we are not to regarde ſo much what be-
" longeth to the office of diſcretion and wiſdome, as to conſider the naturall humors
" of the Frenche, light, wandring, and oftentimes accuſtomed to proceede more with
" furie and raſhnes, then with counſell or foreſight: We muſt conſider that the na-
" tures and inclinations of great Princes are not like to ours, neither ſo moderate in " their affections, nor ſo eaſie to reſiſt their appetites as men priuate, for that by how-
" muche more they are accuſtomed to be honored in their kingdomes, & abſolutely " obeyed, by ſo muche more are they made not onely imperious and inſolent, but al-
" ſo rayſing their will aboue reaſon or lawe, they can not endure not to obteine that " which they holde for iuſt: and that ſeemes iuſt to them whiche they deſire, beeing " perſwaded that they haue power to make plaine with a word both hilles and moun-
" tayns, to remoue all impedimentes, and to ſurmount the nature of things: yea they
" holde it a ſhame to reſtrayne their inclinations for any difficulties, and meaſuring
" commonly great things with the ſame rules wherewith they are wont to proceede
" in actions more inferior, their councels haue leſſe communitie with diſcretion and
" reaſon, then with will and arrogancie: vices whiche aboue all other Princes, haue
" moſt ſocietie and participation with the French nation: the ſame being confirmed
" with the late example of the kingdome of Naples, where the Frenche king induced
" by ambicion and indiſcretion, conſented that the moytie of the kingdome ſhoulde " diuolue to the Spaniard, not ſeeing how muche he weakned his power (afore abſo-
" lute and ſupreme amongſt all the Italians) to bring into Italie another king equall
" to him ſelfe in authoritie, and nothing inferior in might. But why proceede we by " coniectures in things whereof we haue a certeintie: we are not ignoraunt of that " which the Cardinal of Amboyſe treated at Trent with Maximilian himſelfe touching
" the diuiſion of your eſtate: And we know wel ynough that to the ſame practiſe, they
" ioyned alſo a concluſion in the towne of Bloys, and the Cardinall going for the ſame
" cauſe into Germanie, brought backe the othe and ratification from Ceſar: And albeit
" I confeſſe theſe practiſes brought forth no effects in regarde of certaine difficulties
" that hapned, yet who can aſſure vs, that there will not be founde ſome meane to " range or remoue thoſe difficulties, which haue bene impedimentes to their common deſire: ſince their principall intention remayneth alwayes one. Theſe be the reaſons that make me conclude, what neceſſitie we haue to conſider with diligence, the imminent perils, the infinite charges, and perpetuall infamies, which on all ſides do offer to darken and deface the auncient reputation and wiſdome of this ſenate, if meaſuring vnaduiſedly the condition of the affayres preſent, we ſuffer that an other put vs in feare, and come to inuade vs with thoſe armes which be offred to vs for our ſuretie & augmentation of eſtate. Let vs conſider (for the benefite of our countrey) what is the difference betwene mouing a warre to an other, & to exſpect till an other inuade vs, to diſpute how to diuide the eſtate of an other, and to temporiſe tyll the ſame perill fall vpon vs, and to be accompanied agaynſt one onely, or to remaine alone agaynſt many: for, if theſe two kings knit and drawe to conſpiracie agaynſt vs, they are ſure to be followed with thaſſiſtance of the Pope, by reaſon of the townes in Romagnia, to haue many commodities from the king of Aragon, by reaſon of the portes of Naples, and to finde many friendſhippes through all Italie, ſome ſeeking to recouer, and ſome to be aſſured: Laſtly, beeing not ignorant howe mightily the French king hath conſpired agaynſt vs, and for ſo many yeres communicated with Cæſar to our preiudice: I thinke that if we arme our ſelues againſt him that hath ſought to ſurpriſe and beguyle vs, muche leſſe that we ſhall merite imputation, or be touched with the cryme of fayth breakers, but of the contrarie, the worlde will reſpect vs as fathers to our countrey, prouident, wiſe, and iuſt, and vpon his head ſhall be broken the brand of that perill and daunger, which euery one knoweth he kindled to haue conſumed vs:

To the contrarie of this opinion, Andrea Gritti a perſonage of great valour and vertue, roaſe vp and reaſoned in this ſorte:

The oration of Andrevv Griti.

If it were conuenient that in one ſelfe matter, the counſels and opinions of men might be referred to voyces doubtfull, I confeſſe my aduiſe ſhoulde haue no other reference, the preſent matter drawing on all ſides ſuche varietie of reaſons, that the nature and conſideration of them leades me into confuſion: But for that there is neceſſitie of reſolution, which can not be made vpon foundations and ſuggeſtions incertaine, it behoueth vs, payſing well the reaſons that impugne both the one and other, to embrace thoſe which drawe neareſt to a likeneſſe and ſimilitude of trueth, and carie moſte mightie coniectures: which when I diſtinguiſh and examine, I can not finde that the French king, neither for ſuſpition to be preuented of vs, nor for deſire of townes which earſt apperteined to the duchie of Millan, will agree to bring the king of Romains into Italie agaynſt vs: for the daungers and harmes whiche ſuch an enterpriſe draweth with it, are farre more manifeſt and great, then the perils that may happen by our vnitie with Cæſar, or the profites that he may hope for by that reſolution: ſeeing, beſides the other natures of iniuries and hatreds betwene them, there is concurrance of dignitie and eſtates, A matter hable to ſet diuiſion betwene the beſt eſtabliſhed freends among mortall men: In ſo muche as the Frenche king, calling into Italie the king of Romains, may be thought to do no other thing, then in place of a common weale peaſible, and remeyning alwayes in good deuotion and friendſhippe with him, to deſire rather the neighborhood of a king ambicious, iniurious, and nouriſhing a thouſande occaſions to quarrell with him, aſwell by reaſon of his authoritie and eſtate, as in regarde of diſdaine and reuenge: Let no man ſay, becauſe the king of Romains is poore, diſordered, and vnfortunate, that the French king feares not his neighborhood, ſeeing that for the memorie of the auncient factions and inclinations of Italie, which remayne yet kindled in many places,

" and eſpecially in the duchie of Millan, an Emperour of Rome can not haue ſo litle a
" neſt in Italie, which will not ſpread and multiplie to the great preiudice and daun-
" ger of others, but chiefly on the perſon of this man hangeth greateſt feares and ie-
" louſies, being a prince of high ſtomacke, of great conduit and experience in warre,
" and to whom may be ioyned thintereſt of the children of Lodowvik Sforce, a readie
" meane to ſtirre vp the mindes of many: He may alſo hope to drawe to him in any " action of warre agaynſt the French, the powers of the king Catholike, though for
" no other reſpect, yet at leaſt for that both their eſtates are to diſcende to one heire.
" The Frenche king is not ignoraunt, howe mightie is Germanie, nor howe eaſie it is " to vnite eyther the whole or parte when the waye ſhall be made open in Italie, and
" the hope of pray and ſpoyle layde afore them: And we haue well ſeene what feare
" he hath alwayes had of the diſcending of the Almains, and the king of Romains howe
" poore and diſordered ſoeuer he be, who if he were in Italie, it were not reaſonable to " thinke that he ſhould haue with him any other thing then a warre full of perils and " aduerſities, and a peace yll aſſured, and yet dearely bought. It maye be he thirſteth
" to recouer Cremona and happly all the other townes, but there is no conformitie or
" likelyhood, that he will embrace a great daunger, to get a thing whoſe value is leſſe
" then thaduenture: No, it is more credible that he will proceede in this caſe rather
" with diſcretion then raſhnes, ſeeing by the conſideration of the errors heretofore
" impoſed vpon that king, we ſhall finde that they proceeded of no other infirmitie
" then of his great deſire to make his enterpriſes with ſuretie: wherein I referre you
" to his examples in the actions of Naples and Cremona, being induced to make parti" tion of that kingdome, and to deliuer to vs the citie of Cremona for no other reaſon,
" then to make more eaſie the victorie of thoſe warres: ſo that it is more credible that
" euen at this preſent he will rather follow his cuſtome and wiſe counſels, then be ca-
" ried with aduiſes ſodayne and raſhe, ſeeing withall he remaineth not altogether de-
" priued of hope to accompliſhe his expectations with the fauor of an other tyme, in " more ſuretie, and with better occaſion, whiche is a thing whiche mortall men are " wont to promiſe to them ſelues eaſily, therror beeing leſſe to promiſe a chaunge
" and reuolution of worldly affayres, then to perſwade that they are alwayes firme
" and ſtable: neyther doth that much amaze me which is ſayde, thoſe two kings haue
" treated ſo often amongeſt them ſelues, for that it is a cuſtome with the Princes of " our time to entertaine one an other artificially with vayne hopes, and diſſembled
" practiſes: which, for that in ſo many yeeres they haue brought foorth no effect, it " can not be that they were other then fayre ſhowes, fictions, and ſhadowes of things,
" or els nouriſhed in themſelues ſuche difficulties as they coulde not be reſolued, the " very nature of thaffayres reſiſting to take away the diſtruſtes that are betwene them,
" without whiche fundation they haue no meane to come to that coniunction: So " that I can not feare that for the couetouſneſſe of our townes, the Frenche king wyll
" throwe himſelfe headlong into ſo indiſcrete a deliberation, and muche leſſe will he " attempt an action ſo caſuall for any ſuſpition he hath of vs, for that beſides the great
" knowledge and experience he hath of our intentions, hauing no want of perſwaſi-
" ons and occaſions to leaue his alliance, the ſame reaſons by the which we are aſſu-
" red of him, will enterchaungeably holde him aſſured of vs: for nothing can be more
" preiudiciall to vs, then the king of Romains to haue anye eſtate in Italie, no leſſe for
" thauthoritie of thempire, ouer whoſe amplification and greatnes we ought alwayes
" to ſtande fearefull and ielouſe, then for the ambition of the houſe of Auſtria, pre" tending intereſt to many of our townes, but moſte of all for the neighborhoode of

Germanie,

Germanie, whose innundations can not but be too perillous for vs and our dominion, we bearing withall a brute to haue all our counsells rype and measured, and to erre more in beeing too harde and slowe, then to proceede with too much rashnes and credulitie. I denie not but things maye fall out contrarie to thopinion of men, for that worldly actions oftentimes drawe with them effects straunge, and farre aboue thexpectations and wisdomes of mortall men, and therefore who coulde set downe any warrant or suretie, were not of the least merite or commendation: but since that can not be done without entring into moste huge daungers and difficulties, we muste consider that oftentimes vayne feares are no lesse hurtfull then too great confidence and credulitie: if we enter confederation with the king of Romains agaynst the Frenche king, the warre muste necessarily be begon and continued with our moneys, which we must also aduaunce to furnish all his prodigalities and disorders, otherwise he will eyther accorde with the enemie, or retyre into Germanie, leauing vpon our shoulders the whole burden and perill of the quarrell: we muste susteine a warre agaynst a moste mightie king of Fraunce, Duke of Millan, Lorde of Genes, a prince enuironed with many regimentes of men at armes, & no lesse mightie in artileries and prouisions, and at the brute of whose payes and money will draw to him from all nations infinite bands of footemen. Besides, what hope of good successe can be nourished in this enterprise, seeing we can not but feare, that in all those of Italie which eyther pretende agaynst vs, or that we holde any thing of theirs, or at least stande ielouse ouer our greatnes, will not be a disposition to drawe into conspiracie agaynst vs, but especially the Pope, to whom, besides his disdaynes towards vs, the power of the Emperour in Italie will neuer be acceptable, for a naturall hatred that hath alwayes bene betwene the Church and thempire, the same making the Popes to haue no lesse feare of themperours in things temporall, then they haue of the Turkes in matters spirituall. And this coniunction happly may be more dangerous to vs, then the vnion which we feare betweene the king of Romaines and the French king: for that where is societie of many princes, which pretend to be equall, there commonly do kindle suspitions and debates, by which oftentimes it hapneth that those enterprises which haue bene begon with no small reputation, slyde easily into many difficulties, and lastly into dissolution and ruine: neither ought wee to make this a last consideration, that albeit the French king haue enterteined certeine practises contrarie to thalliance which we haue with him, yet we haue seene no effectes, by the which we may say he hath delte vniustly with vs, and therefore to leauie warre agaynst him, would be no other thing then to merite imputation of infidelitie and faythbreaking, on the contrarie whereof this Senate ought to buylde his principall fundation aswell for the honor as profite of the affaires which we haue euery day to manage with other princes: Neither can it be profitable to vs to nourish and continually augment this opinion, to seeke to oppresse dayly all our neighbours, and to aspire to the whole monarchie of Italie. I woulde in God, we had in times past proceeded more considerately, for almoste all the suspitions that at this present are heaped agaynst vs, haue no other beginning then that heretofore we haue too muche offended them, and it will not be beleeued that feare draweth vs to a newe warre agaynst the French king our auncient confederate, but rather that we are caried with certayne ambicious and couetous inclinations (ioyning with vs the king of Romains) to winne vpon him one parte of the duchie of Millan, as we wonne vpon Lodovvike Sforce, being ioyned with him: In which time if we had gouerned our selues more moderately, and not feared to muche suspitions vayne and

« deſtie and grauitie, ſhould not nowe be conſtrayned to enter into warre eyther
« with this prince or that prince, more mightie then our ſelues: Into which nature of « neceſſitie, ſeeing we are falne, it can not but be more to our wiſdome and profite,
« not to depart from the confederation we haue with the Frenche king, then ouerru-
« led with a vayne feare, or hope of benefites vncertayne and hurtfull, to embrace a « warre, which alone and of our ſinguler power, we ſhould not be mightie ynough to « ſupport, and in thoſe conſociates and aſſiſtantes which we ſhould haue, woulde be « found more burden and charge, then aduauntage or profite.

Deliberation of the Venetians.

The opinions of the Senate were diuerſe in ſo great a varietie of reaſons: but in thende preuayled the memorie of thinclination whiche they knewe the king of Romains had long enterteined, to recouer vpon occaſion the townes holden by them, which he pretended to apperteine to thempire, or to the houſe of Auſtria: Their reſolution was to graunt him paſſage if he came without an armie, but comming armed with a power, they determined to denie him libertie to marche: And in the anſwere they gaue to his Embaſſadors, they ſeemed to perſwade, that that concluſion was made more by neceſſitie, hauing regarde to the condition of the time preſent, and confederation which they had with the Frenche, than by any diſpoſition or will to leaue him diſcontented for any matter: They alleaged that albeit they were conſtrained by the ſame confederation to ayde him in the defence of the duchie of Millan with a proportion of men expreſſed in the ſame: yet in this action they woulde proceede with a greater modeſtie, without exceeding in any ſort their limittes and boundes, and, except they were compelled to any action for the defence of Millan, they would not oppoſe agaynſt any other his aduauncement, according to the true meaning of their affection, who ſo farre as their power woulde ſtretche, woulde neuer fayle him with thoſe oblations and reuerences which became the Senate of Venice to beare to ſo great a Prince, with whom they neuer had any thing thē a perpetuall amitie and alliance: in commemoration whereof, they ſought not to enter into newe confederations and bonds with the French king, but deſired to communicate as litle as they could with the warres that ſhould be betweene them, hoping that Maximilian (not to increaſe his owne difficulties) would at leaſt leaue their frontiers in peace, & embracing their affections according to the ſimplicity & innocencie thereof, to turne his armies eyther againſt Burgonay, or the duchie of Millan. But as enterpriſes of high importaunce are full of imperfections, and drawe with them their proper impedimentes, ſo Cæſar beeing out of hope to ioyne with him the Venetians, many other difficulties began to fall vpon him, which albeit he labored to ſurmount with the greatnes of his ſpirite and conceptions, apte to promiſe him dayly more hopes then impedimentes, yet they delayed muche theffects of his reſolutions and purpoſes: for that, both of him ſelfe he had not ſufficient money to leauie his proportion of Swvizzers, and furniſhe the other expences neceſſarie for ſo great an enterpriſe, and alſo the treaſures that were promiſed to his ayde in the Dyot, were not ſufficient to furniſhe the leaſt part of the ſubſtance and body of the warre: And the fundation whervpon from the beginning he had layde his greateſt hopes, that the communalties & iuriſdictions of Italie would for terror of his name and comming, offer compoſition and contribution of money, grew euery day leſſe and leſſe: for, albeit in the beginning many ſhewed a certayne deuotion, yet the concluſions of the Dyot of Conſtance not anſwering thexpectation that was conceiued

ued that the enterprise ſhould rather be of the whole Empire, and almoſt of all Germanie, then his owne in peculiar, and ſeeing happly into the mightie preparations of the French king, and the newe declaration of the Venetians, euery one remayned in doubt, not daring (in miniſtring to him things whereof he had moſt neede) to offende ſo greatly the French king: Neither were the demaundes of Maximilian ſuch in the time when he was moſt feared, as with their facilitie they might induce men to adminiſter to his helpe: for, according to his conditions, he demaunded muche of euery one, wherein his rates impoſed vpon the duke of Ferrara (whome he pretended did owe to Blanche his wife the dowrie of his ſiſter Anne dead many yeeres before) were exceſſiue, and his proportions to the Florentins no leſſe intollerable, vpon whom the Cardinal of Brexe, managing his affaires at Rome, and hauing power to compounde with them, demaunded fiue hundred thouſande duckers: which demaunde, for the immoderation thereof, was the cauſe that they reſolued to temporiſe with him, till they diſcerned better what traine his affaires would take, and withall (foreſeeing not to offende him) they proteſted excuſes to the Frenche king demaunding men, which they ſayd they could not accompliſhe for thimpediments of the waſte and ſpoyle to be giuen this yere to the Piſans in great preparation, and for that the Genovvaies and other neighbours beginning eſtſones to adminiſter newe ſuccors, they were conſtrayned to ſtande continually prepared agaynſt them. In theſe regardes, themperour fayling (contrarie to his hope) to haue his turne ſerued with the money of Thitalians (hauing onely ſix thouſande duckets of them of Sienna) he made requeſt to the Pope, that at the leaſt he woulde ſuffer him to take the hundred thouſande duckets whiche had bene afore leauied in Germanie vnder cooller to make warre vpon the Turkes, and beeing for that effect preſerued in that prouince, they coulde not be conuerted to any other vſe, without licence of the ſea Apoſtolike: he offred him alſo, that where he could not ſatisfie his demaunde not to paſſe into Italie with an armie, that neuertheles, after he had reſtored to the duchie of Millan the children of Lodovvike Sforce, (the protection of whome he proteſted, both to make the peoples of that ſtate more fauourable, and his paſſage more eaſie and leſſe hatefull) he would go on to Rome without armes, to receiue the Crowne Imperiall, leauing all his bands in the duchie of Millan. But the Pope, in whom appeared no more affection to the one then to the other, refuſed alſo to ſatisfie him in this demaund, alleaging that in ſuche a condition and eſtate of affaires, he could not without his great daunger prouoke the armes of the French king agaynſt him: And yet Maximilian, according to the propertie of his inclination beeing carefull, credulous, and quicke to execute all things of himſelfe with paynes incredible, amidde ſo many difficulties forgate nothing that might enterteine the brute of his diſcending, and cauſing to marche thartilleries towards many places of the frontiers of Italy, he recontinued the practiſe to haue the twelue thouſand Svvizzers, who demaunding many thinges, and propounding ſtraunge exceptions, gaue him not any certayne reſolution: he ſolicited the bandes that were promiſed him, and trauelling in perſon from one place to an other for diuers expeditions, he brought mens mindes into many confuſions, their iudgementes varying more through all Italie then earſt had bene ſeene in any other action: for in ſome the opinion of thenterpriſe was greater then euer, and others ſuppoſed it to bee already in an eſtate declining, which incertentie of minde was increaſed by himſelfe, who being of nature ſecrete and particular, did ſeldome communicate his thoughtes with others, and to thende his intentions ſhoulde be leſſe priuate in Italie, he had ordeyned that the Popes

Now was come the day appoynted for the aſſemblie of Thalmain companies, of whō notwithſtanding there muſtred at Conſtance but a very ſmall crew, neither was ſeene any other preparations on his part, then remouing of artilleries, and ſtudying by what meanes he might recouer money: In ſo muche as beeing vncertayne with what forces, in what time, and on which ſide he would enter: ſuch as doubted him made mightie prouiſions in many places: ſome ſuppoſed he woulde make his entrie by Friul, and others thought he would marche by Trent into the countrey of Verrona, others iudged that comming by Sauoy, or by Coma, he would aſſayle the duchie of Millan hauing many of the exiles of that ſtate in his campe: others ſtoode in ſome doubt leaſt he would make ſome ſtirre on that ſide to Burgondie: In regarde of theſe feares, the French king ſent to the duchie of Millan many bandes of horſmen and footemen, and beſides other preparations leauyed for the defence of that ſtate, he diſpatched two thouſande fiue hundred Spaniſh footemen, vnder the fauour of the king Catholike, to whom Ceſar complayned greeuouſly of ſuche a ſufferaunce. Monſr de Chaumont doubting the fayth of the Boromei, ſurpriſed in the ſame time Arona, a Caſtell belonging to that familie ſtanding vpon the lake Maior: into Burgondie the king had alſo ſent fiue hundred launces, vnder Monſr Trimouille gouernor of that prouince: And to drawe away in many places the thoughtes and forces of Cæſar, he ſuccoured continually the Duke of Guelders, who moleſted the countreis of Charles the little ſonne of themperour. Beſides all this, he had ſent to Verona Iohn Iacques de Triuulce with foure hundred Frenche launces, and foure thouſande footemen, to the ſuccours of the Venetians, who had alſo ſent to Rouera the Counte Petillano with foure hundred men at armes, and many bandes of footemen, to thende to remayne there for the repreſſing of thoſe ſtirres that might ariſe towardes Trent: and to Friul were ſent eight hundred men at armes vnder Bartlemevv Aluiano, who long time before was entred into their payes. But the firſt daunger appeared on that ſide which was leaſt doubted, for that Paule Baptiſta Iuſtinian and Fregoſin exiles of Genes, ledde to Caſuola, a towne belonging to Lodovvike Gonſagna feodar of thempire, a thouſande Almain footmen, who marching ſecretly and with great diligence ouer the mountaynes and impaſſible places of the Venetian territorie, had an intention to go to Genes, after they had paſſed by the ryuer of Po along the mountaine of Parma: This expedition being doubted of by Monſr Chaumont, he diſpatched ſuddenly to Parma many horſemen and footemen, to giue impediment to thenemie, which ſo cut off all hope from Thalmains, to be hable to execute any thing againſt Genes, that they returned into Germanie by the ſame way, but not with the ſame diligence and daunger, for that the Venetians, reſpecting their common benefite, made a ſecret conſent to their retyring. There were at the ſame inſtant, many of the exiles of Genes in the towne of Bolognia, whiche driue the king into a ſuſpition, that this matter had bene wrought by the conſent of the Pope, of whoſe inclination and will, many other thinges put him in doubt, both for that Themperour was ſolicited to marche by the Cardinall S. Croſſe, notwithſtanding more of his proper motion and diſpoſition, then for any other occaſion: and alſo the exiles of Furly being by chaunce iſſued out of Faenza, and aſſaying one night to enter into Furly, the Pope complayned that it was a matter compact betwene the Frenche king and the Venetians. To theſe was added the conſpiracie of a Monke, who beeing priſoner in Mantua, had confeſſed that he had practiſed with the familie of Bentinole to empoyſon the Pope, and that he was ſolicited from Monſr de Chaumont to performe all his promiſes to the Bentiuolei: by reaſon whereof the Pope proceeding by examination in forme authentike, ſent it to the king by Achilles de Graſſi Biſhop of Peſera, and afterwardes Cardinall, to make requeſt that the trueth might be knowen, proceeding to the puniſhment of ſuche as ſhould be found guyltie in ſo great a wickedneſſe: In ſo much as Alexander Bentyuole, beeing ſuſpected more then the reſidue, was adiorned by the king to appeare and anſwere in Fraunce to ſuch things as he was to be charged withall: with theſe actions and incertenties, ended the yere 1507.

But in the beginning of the yére following, the trauelling minds of them of Bolognia, no longer diſpoſed to nouriſh their tranquillitie, drewe into conſpiracie, and being ledde by Anniball and Hermio Bentyuole, who had intelligence with certayne young gentlemen of the familie of the Pepolies, with others of race and yeres equall, they approched vpon the ſodayne, Bolognia: an enterpriſe not without perill, for that the conſpirators to thende to lette in the reſidue, had occupyed the gate of S. Mamola: But as it is eaſie to repreſſe a violence in the beginning, ſo the people taking armes in fauour of theſtate eccleſiaſtike, the young men abandoned the gate with more feare then vallour, and the Bentyuoleis retyred finding onely that ſafety in their aduenture. This inuaſion rather abated then inflamed the mynde of the Pope agaynſt the Frenche king, for that his Maieſtie ſhewing great tokens howe muche it did diſcontent hym, commaunded Monſr Chaumont to be readie to ſuccour Bolognia, and all that depended vpon it, in all neceſſities and occaſions: he gaue order beſides, that from thencefoorth the Bentiuoleis ſhoulde not be receyued into any parte of the duchie of Millan: by whiche reſtraynt, Iohn, one of the chiefeſt of them, dyed about that tyme of diſpleaſure, for that muche leſſe that he had bene accuſtomed afore he was expulſed Bolognia to feele the aduerſities or bitter blowes of fortune, ſeeing he had beene the moſte happie of all the other tyrantes of Italie, ſeruing a long time as an example of proſperous fortune: for, in the courſe of fortie yeres, during the which he commaunded as he woulde in Bolognia, muche leſſe that he was touched with any heauie affliction, ſeeing in all that race of tyme he felte not ſo muche as the death of any his friendes: he had alwayes for himſelfe and children, penſions, appoyntmentes, and great honours of all the Princes in Italie, beeing followed withall with this felicitie to eſcape eaſily out of all waightie and dangerous affayres: for all which graces & good ſuccedings, he ſeemed (beſides the conuenient ſituation of that Citie) to be principally beholding to fortune, for that according to common iudgement, he could not merit any thing by the propertie of his wit, or by his wiſdome, and much leſſe by any valour that was in his perſon.

Cæſar nowe minding no more to deferre the mouing of armes, diſpatched a Heralte to Verona, to publiſhe his reſolution to paſſe into Italie to take Thimperiall Crowne, and to require lodging for foure thouſande horſe: Whervnto the gouernors of Verona, hauing firſt communicated with the counſel of Venice, anſwered him, that if he would paſſe for no other occaſion then to receyue the crowne, they would honour him with all the offices and obſeruaunces they could, but they ſaw effects contrarie to his perſwaſions, hauing already brought and beſtowed vpon their marches ſo great proportions of men at armes and artilleries: In regarde of which aunſwere, meaſuring by thē the deuotion of others, Maximilian alſone as he was come to Trent, to giue beginning to the warre, made a ſolemne proceſſiō the fourth of Februarie, which he aſſiſted in perſon, hauing before him the Heralds of the Empire, & the Imperiall ſworde naked, and in the ende of the ſolemnitie, his ſecretary M. Lango afterwardes Biſhop of Gurce, being mounted into a high ſeate or theater, publiſhed in the name of Cæſar his determination to paſſe in warlike aray into Italie: he named him no more king of Romains, but Emperour elect, as are wont to be intituled the kings of Romains when they come to take the Crowne: And forbidding the ſame day that none ſhoulde iſſue out of Trente, after he had cauſed to be baked a great quantitie of Byskie, and made baskettes of wood, and ſent by the ryuer of Adice ſundrie boates and lighters loaden with prouiſions, he went out of Trente the nighte after a little before day with a thouſande fiue hundred horſe, and foure thouſande footemen: not of thoſe regimentes whiche were agreed to hym in the Dyot, but of the peoples of his Court and proper eſtates, taking the way that leades by thoſe Mountaynes to Vincenſe. At the ſame tyme the Marquis of Brandebourgh marched towardes Rouero with fiue hundred horſemen and two thouſande footmen of the ſame countrey bodies, with whom he returned the day after, with no memorie of other action then that he preſented himſelfe before Rouero, and demaunded in vayne to be lodged in the towne: But themperour elect being comen to the mountayne of Siagne, the foote whereof draweth within twelue miles of Vincenſa, after he had taken the landes of the ſeuen communalties (a people ſo named dwelling in the toppe of the Mountayne vnder many exemptions and priuiledges of the Venetians) and after he had filled vp many trenches whiche they had caſt for their defence, and to ſtoppe the waye, he cauſed to be drawen thither many peeces of artillerie. Heere it ſeemed that eyther his intention had imperfection, or his fortune was contrarie to the diſpoſition of the tyme, for, as mens mindes enterteined a wonderfull expectation of ſome good ſucceſſe, he retyred from this place the fourth daye after he departed from Trente, and returned to Boſſana, a towne further remoued from the confines of Italie, then Trente: wherein as it gaue occaſion to euery one to wonder at ſo greate an inconſideration, or rather inconſtancie: ſo, ſo weake a beginning reuyued eſtſones the myndes of the Venetians, in ſo muche that as they had already interteined many bandes of footemen, ſo they called to Rouera the Frenche companies whiche were at Verona with Triuulce, and beginning to make greater preparations, they ſtirred vp the Frenche king to do the lyke, who marching towardes Italie, ſente before an armie of fiue thouſande Svvizzers of his payes, and three thouſande payed by the Venetians, that Nation (for that Maximilian was not hable to miniſter paye to them) being ronne without any regarde to thintertainment of the Frenche: And yet after they were departed and payed, they woulde not go vppon the landes of the Venetians, alleaging for their reaſons, that they woulde not ſerue Cæſar in any other action, then for the defence of theſtate of Millan.

A greater ſtirre, but farre more wretched and vnhappie, as wherein was nouriſhed the beginning of greater thinges, was kindled in Friul, whither didde paſſe by the waye of the Mountaynes, and by Cæſars appoyntment, foure hundred horſe and fyue thouſande footemen, all bodies commaunded in his countrey of Tiroll: Aſſone as they were entred into the valley of Cadora, they tooke the Borowe and Caſtell, wherein was a verye ſlender garriſon, together with the Magiſtrate of the Venetians that was within, whiche beeing vnderſtande at Venice, they commaunded Aluiano and George Cornaro Superintendent remayning vppon the landes of Vincentin, to make ſpeedily to the ſuccours of that Countrey, and to keepe occupied the enemies on that ſide, they ſente towardes Trente foure lighte Galleys with certayne veſſelles of other nature: And at the ſame

tyme Maximilian, who was marched from Bolſano to Brunech, and turning to the waye of Friul for thoportunitie of the paſſages, and largenes of the countrey, ronne through certayne valleys more then fortie myles within the territories of the Venetians, with a ſtrength of ſix thouſand footmen leauied in thoſe quarters: and after he had take the valley of Cadora which leadeth to Treuiſa, leauing behind him the borow of Boſtauro lately apperteining to the Patriarks of Aquilea, he tooke the borow of S. Martin, the borow of Pieua, & the valley which was kept by the Countes of Sanorgina, with other places adioyning: he performed theſe incurſions rather in the propertie of an inferior capteine, then in the perſon & maieſtie of a king, more contented with victories of meane perſons & places, then ſeeking after actions of importance according to thexpectation of his name & vertue: And after he had ſpēt ſome dayes in theſe trifling ſeruices, he cōmaunded his cōpanies to draw to Treuiſan, and returned himſelf vpon the end of February to Iſpruch to lay Iewels in paune, & make other prouiſions for money, wherof being rather a prodigal waſter, then a temperat diſtributer, no reaſonable quantitie could ſuffice to furniſhe the neceſſitie of his affayres: for that his wantes could not be ſatisfied with thabundance of things, ſince he meaſured not his ſufficiencie according to the nede of kind, but after the rage of his opinion & prodigalities. But vnderſtanding on the way that the Svvizzers had taken the pay of the French, he was not a litle diſcontented with them, and ſo went to Vlma a Citie of Svvauia, to induce that ligne to ayde him as they had done in times paſt in the warre agaynſt the Svvizzers: he made alſo vehement inſtance to the Electors, that the aydes promiſed in the Dyot of Conſtance, might be yet recontinued for ſixe monethes more, alleaging that the action of great enterpriſes require a long and deliberate time. And about this ſeaſon the regiments of the eſtates which were abyding at Trent to the number of nyne thouſande bodies aſwell footmen as horſmen, had battred the caſtell of Baioquo, and ranged it to diſcretion within three dayes: it ſtandes right ouer agaynſt Rouero on the right hande, vppon the high way that leades from Trent into Italie, and betweene it and Rouero which is on the left hande, runneth the ryuer of Adica.

Aluiano departed in great diligence to ſuccor Friul, and paſſing along the mountaines laden with ſnowes, he came in two dayes neere to Cadora, where exſpecting his trayne of footemen, who coulde not marche with the ſame ſpeede and ſwiftneſſe, he occupied a paſſage not garded by the Almains, by the which is made the entrie into the valley of Cadora: And as in a generall perill a litle comfort profiteth muche, ſo at the comming of Aluiano, the men of the countrey affected to the iuriſdiction of Venice, taking newe courage, commaunded the other paſſages of the valley by the which the Almains were to retyre: who ſeeing themſelues incloſed, and no hope of ſafetie but by the ſworde, and iudging by the diſpoſition of Aluiano that he woulde dayly ſtrengthen himſelfe, marched out agaynſt him in great furie: he refuſed not the offer of the feight, taking no leſſe courage in the oportunitie of the enemie, then in the innocencie of the quarrell, wherevppon beganne betweene both parties a moſte cruell feighte, wherein the Almaines, who fought with great rage, more for deſyre to dye glorioufly, then that there was hope to ſaue their liues, and caſting themſelues in a groſſe ſquadron, their wiues in the middeſt, made a valiaunt defence for certayne howres: but as in actions of battell, God oftentimes giues the victorie, not to thoſe that feight beſt, but to ſuche as he fauoreth moſt, ſo the Almains, not hable to make long reſiſtaunce, both for the numbers and vertue of thenemies, were in the ende vanquiſhed, more then a thouſande

of them remayning dead on the place, and the reſidue falling to be priſoners according to thaduenture and fortune of the fight. After this victorie Aluiano ioyning diligence and expedition to his felicitie, tooke the caſtel of Cadora, which he aſſalted on two partes, Charles Malateſte one of the auncient Lordes of Rimini beeing ſlayne with a quarrell ſhotte out of a towre: And following ſtill the ſtreame of hys fortune and good ſucceſſe, he tooke Porto Nauona, and afterwards Cremonſa ſituate vppon the height of a hill, and ſo diſcended to encampe afore Goritia, ſtanding at the foote of the Alpes of Iulyan, ſtrong by ſituation, and no leſſe mightie by the munition it conteines, and hath a Caſtell of very harde acceſſe: and taking firſt the bridge of Gorstia, and planting afterwards his artilleries before the towne, he caryed it the fourth day by compoſition, being in great neceſſitie of weapons, watter, and vittells. After the towne was commaunded, the Caſtlekeper & companies within the Caſtell, eſchewing their proper calamities by the examples of their fellowes, came to rendring after they had receyued foure thouſande duckets. The Venetians erected there foorthwith many fortifications to ſerue as a bulwarke and brydle agaynſt the Turkes, and to holde them in feare for paſſing the ryuer of Liſonſo, ſince with thoportunitie of that place there might be eaſie impedimentes giuen to their retraites. From Goritia Aluiano marched to encampe before Trieſta, a Citie at the ſame time muche moleſted by the ſea, whiche he tooke eaſily, not without the diſcontentment of the Frenche king, who gaue counſell not to prouoke ſo muche the king of Romains: but for that it ſtoode vppon the gulfe of Venice, and by that reaſon very conuenient for their traffikes, they, made prowde by the proſperitie of their fortune, coulde not be diſcounſelled to followe the courſe of their victorie: In ſo muche as after the action of Trieſta and the Caſtell, they tooke Portonon, and afterwards Finme, whiche is a towne of Eſclauonia in the proſpect of Ancona, which they burned, for that it was the retraite of the ſhippes whiehe woulde paſſe by the ſea Adriatique, without paying the cuſtomes that were impoſed: And afterwardes, paſſing the Alpes, they tooke Poſſonia, which is vpon the marches of Vngrie.

Theſe were thenterpriſes that were done in the countrey of Friul: But on that ſide towardes Trent, the Almain armie whiche was nowe come to Calliano, a towne famous for the harmes of the Venetians, for that twentie yeeres afore Ro. S. Seuerin a notable Capteine of their armie was ouerthrowen and ſlaine, charged vpon three thouſande footemen of the Venetians, left for the garde of the mount Breſtonia, who notwithſtãding they were ſufficiently fortified, fled ſodenly into the next mountain, fearing more then was neceſſary the peril that was farre of & doubtful, which made the Almains, ſcorning the cowardiſe of Thitalian footemen, ryſe into more violent actions, burning many houſes, and after they had reuerſed many of their trenches and defences made in the mountaine, they returned to Calliana. By this ſucceſſe, the Biſhop of Trente taking ſtomacke according to the fortune of the time, went with an armye of two thouſande footemen, appoynted with parte of the people that were at Calliana, to beſiege Riua Trente, whiche is a great borowe ſtanding vppon the lake of Garde, whither Triuulce had already ſent a ſufficient garriſon: And after he had for two dayes battered the Churche of Saint Frauncis, and in the meane whyle made certayne incurſions vppon the villages that are about Lodrona, two thouſande Griſons ſeruing in the Almaine campe, fell into mutinie for a quarrell of ſmall importaunce concerning their paymentes, and made pyllage of the vittailes of the campe: by reaſon whereof all thinges beeing in diſorder, and moſte of the bandes of the Griſons forſaken the campe, the remainder of tharmie conteyning ſeuen thouſande men, was conſtrayned to retyre, the ſame miniſtring oportunitie and courage to the Venetian regimentes to make inuaſions vpon the next villages, of whom as three thouſand went in trowps to burne certaine townes of the Count d'Agreſte, they were charged and broken by the Paiſantes, and three hundred of them cutte in peeces, not remembring that in matters of enterpriſe it is an office as neceſſarie to foreſee perilles to come, as to execute when occaſion is giuen. For the retraite of Thalmains whiche were before Rine, almoſte all the bandes beeing ſeparate, and the horſemen (conteyning a body of twelue hundred) beeing retyred from their lodginges of Calliana to Trent, the regiments of the Venetians, on Eaſterday morning aſſayled Pietra, a place within ſix myles of Trent: But aſſoone as the ſtrength that was within Trent iſſued out to their ſuccours, they retyred, and afterwardes aſſayled the Rocke of Creſte, which is a peece of importaunce, and yeelded before the ſuccors that came from Trent were ariued: the ſame beeing the cauſe that the Almains, hauing eftſones reaſſembled & reordeined their footemen, returned with a thouſande horſe and ſix thouſande footmen to Calliana, diſtant from Pietra the ſhotte of a Crosbow: And two hundred horſemen of the duke of VVittenbourg beeing gone from them, the Venetians with foure thouſande horſmen, and ſixtene thouſand footemen, came & encamped before Pietra, planting there a proportion of ſixtene peces of artillerie: Pietra is a Caſtel ſeated at the foote of a mountaine, on whoſe right hand the way leades from Rouera to Trent, and out of the ſame comes a very ſtrong wall conteyning in length the ſhot of a Crosbowe, and ſtretcheth euen to the ryuer of Adice, and in the middeſt of the ſame is a gate, of the which who is not maiſter, can hardly hurt Pietra. The two armies were within a myle one of another, and they both had before them the Caſtell and the wall, and on the one ſide the ryuer of Adice, and on the other the mountaines, and eyther armie hauing at their backes, places of ſure retraite: And for that the Almains had the caſtell and the wall in their power, they might when they liſte driue the Venetian armie to feight, which was impoſſible to the Venetians, who for that they were inferiour in numbers muche leſſe that they durſt commit things to aduenture, ſeeing they deuiſed onely to rayſe impediments that thenemies ſhould not carie the caſtell which was continually battered by their artilleries: But the Almains, in whom was indifferent the vertue of celeritie and courage, perceiuing one day that their artillerie was ſlenderly garded, gaue a furious charge vppon it, and putting to flight the footemen that garded it, they wonne with great valour two peeces, and drew them to their lodginges. This accident abated the ſtomackes of the Venetians, who nowe iudging it but loſte tyme to enterteine the action of Pietra, whiche had deuoured many of their peoples, brake vp and retyred to Rouero, and the Almains returned to Trent, where within fewe dayes after moſte parte of the armie disbanded and were diſperſed: and the regimentes of the Dyot, whiche neuer conteyned aboue foure thouſande (for all thoſe in ſubſtance that aſſembled at Trent and Cadera, were of the Countreys thereabout) returned to their houſes, their tearme of ſixe monethes beeing ended, by whoſe example alſo moſte parte of the footemen that were leauyed, brake vp the ſeruice and departed. Maximilian himſelfe who was much troubled in going from one place to another to leauie prouiſions & practiſes, could neuer be preſent at thoſe actions, but for that the Dyot of Vlma was referred to a time more conuenient, beeing confuſed in himſelfe with the multitude of affaires, and ſhame of his ſucceſſes, withdrew himſelfe to Cologne, not being acknowen for many dayes where he was: And being not ſtrong ynough, neither in men, munition, nor money to reſiſt ſo great a ſtorme, hauing loſt al that he held in the countrey of Friuli, with the other peeces affronting, he found himſelfe abandoned of all ſuccours, and in greater perill to be depriued of Trent, if in the Frenche bandes had bene any diſpoſition to ioyne with the Venetian armie: But Trimulce, who by the kings direction was reſolued rather to pacifie then to prouoke, woulde paſſe no further then was neceſſarie for the defence of the Venetians: holding it as iuſt and honorable in the office he had, to forbeare to afflict further themperour, as to protect the Venetians.

Truce betweene Maximilian and the Venetians.

Maximilian ſtanding thus abandoned, and deſyring by ſome meane to put himſelfe out of daunger, ſent, ſince the ouerthrowe at Cadora, one of his Gentlemen to Venice, to demaunde truce for three monethes, of which the Senate made no accompt, hauing no diſpoſition to make truce for leſſe then a yere, nor yet to giue any conſent, if the Frenche king were not comprehended in it: But his daungers ryſing in encreaſing for the loſſe of Trieſta, and his calamities altering thinges into worſe condition, the Biſhop of Trent, as of his peculier motion, perſwaded the Venetians to truce, alleaging by that meane and fundation, a readie poſſibilitie and expectation of peace: The Venetians aunſwered, that their minds were not eſtraunged from it, ſo farrefoorth as they were not alone in the action, but that there were libertie for the Frenche king to communicate: In ſo muche as after this beginning there drewe to conference together the Byſhop of Trent and ſerentane ſecretarie of Maximilian, and for the Frenche king Trimulce, and Charles Geffray preſident of the Parliament of Millan, and for the Venetians Zacharia Contarin Embaſſadour particularly appoynted for that action: They agreed eaſily for other conditions, ſeeing, as touching the time, they were reſolued that it ſhould laſte for three yeres, and euery one to reteine that he poſſeſſed at that preſent, with power to buylde and fortifie ſuche places as they commaunded. This onely was the difficultie, that the French would haue had a generall truce, wherein ſhould be comprehended ſuche confederates as euery one had out of Italie, and eſpecially the Duke of Gueldres, but the Agents of Themperor ſtoode obſtinately agaynſt it, for that he had determined the ruine of the ſayd Duke: They alleaged beſides, that the warre being managed wholly in Italie, it was neither iuſt nor neceſſarie to communicate of any other things then ſuch as touched Italie: wherein albeit the Venetians did what they coulde to haue ſatisfied the deſire of the Frenche king, yet ſeeing little hope to diſpoſe the Almains, they were contented to embrace the truce in ſorte as they had conſented, eſpecially for a deſire they had to deliuer themſelues of ſuche a warre which was nowe brought wholly vppon their eſtate, and no leſſe to confirme in their obedience by the commoditie of the truce for three yeres, the townes which they had conquered in thoſe ſtirres: They excuſed themſelues to the Frenche with theſe reaſons no leſſe true then iuſt, that neither the one nor the other of them beeing not further bound then for the defence of the matters of Italie, and their confederation beeing grounded therevpon, they had not to do to thinke vpon matters beyonde the Mountes, which if they were not bounde to defende with armes, they were not alſo bounde to deuiſe to aſſure them with the truce. Vpon this controuerſie Trimulce wrote into Fraunce, and the Venetians to Venice, whoſe Senate returned aunſwere, that if there could not be admiſſion of other conditions, that they ſhould at leaſt conclude the truce for Italie, onely reſeruing time and place for the Frenche king to enter: wherevnto albeit neither Trimulce nor the Preſident would not conſent, complayning greeuouſly that they woulde not ſo muche as tarie for the kings aunſwer, and that notwithſtanding the Preſident proteſted that a ioynt and common enterpriſe ſhould not be determined but by ioynt

and common conſent, alleaging withall howe litle were reſpected the kings amitie and alliance, yet the Venetians forbare not to proceede and conclude with Maximilian, and the contract running ſimply in their proper names, they agreed that on the behalfe of Maximilian ſhould be named and holden as comprehended and nominated, the Pope, the king Catholike, the king of Englande, the king of Hungria, and all the Princes and ſubiects of the ſacred Empire in what place ſoeuer, together with all the confederates of Maximilian and the ſayde kings and ſtates of thempire, which ſhould be named within three monethes: And for the Venetians were named the French king, the king Catholike, with all the confederates and friendes of the Venetians, of the French king, and king Catholike in Italie onely, whom they ſhould likewiſe name within three moneths. Thus was the truce accorded the xx. day of Aprill, and with no leſſe expedition ratified by the Emperour and the Venetians, by which meanes ceaſſed the warre, with great hope that the regions of Italie ſhoulde nowe returne to a perpetuall concorde and peace.

After armes were layde aſide by the reſolution and couenantes of this peace, it ſeemed to the Frenche king that the Florentins would haue declared themſelues rather for Cæſar then for him, if Themperours affaires had had a more happie beginning: and knowing withall that that diſpoſition proceeded of no other thing then of a deſire they had to recouer Piſa in what ſorte they coulde, and of a diſcontentment that without reſpecting they had bene alwayes at his deuotion, and in the ſeruices they had done him, he had not onely not fauoured them, neither with authoritie, countenance, nor armes, but alſo had ſuffred that the Piſans were ſuccored by the Genovvaies that were his ſubiects: he determined in theſe regardes to deuiſe howe by ſome honeſt meane they might obteine that they deſired: wherein for that (for the benefite of his former purpoſes) he woulde do it to his proper profite, and that he thought that feare would be a better meane then hope to drawe from them a greater ſumme, he diſpatched M. Riccio to make complaint, firſt that they had ſent men expreſſe to accord with Cæſar his enemie, that vnder cooler to giue the ſpoile to the Piſans, they had aſſembled a mightie armie, without hauing regarde to the conditions of the time, and his ſuſpitions and daungers: that in ſo great a ſtirre and commotion which was prepared, they were neuer willing to expreſſe ſimply their intentions, wherin they gaue him iuſt occaſion to doubt to what ende tended thoſe preparations: And laſtly, that hauing deſired them to ayde him with their armies in ſo great perils, they refuſed it agaynſt all confidence and expectation. All whiche notwithſtanding, aſwell for the perpetuall amitie which he had alwayes borne to their commonweale, as for the memorie of the good offices and obſeruaunces they had done in tymes paſt for his ſeruice, he was very ready to pardon them all theſe newe iniuries, ſo farrefoorth, as to cut off all occaſions that might eftſones trouble the tranquillitie of Italie, they would not hereafter moleſt the Piſans without his conſent. To theſe complaynts the Florentins anſwered, that neceſſitie had induced them to ſende men to Cæſar, not with any intention to couenant with him agaynſt the king, but (if he paſſed into Italie) to aſſure their eſtate, which the king in the capitulation made with them woulde not be bounde to defende agaynſt Cæſar, according to the teſtimonie of an expreſſe clauſe, bearing theſe wordes, Sauing the rights of th'empire: That he could not reaſonably complayne of the armie leauied agaynſt the Piſans, for that it beeing no greater then of cuſtome, it miniſtred no iuſte occaſion of newe ſuſpitions, and beeing aſſembled for no other effectes then (as in other times) to giue impedimentes to the harueſt of the Piſans, there was no reaſo-

nable cauſe of doubt, if mens iudgementes were as indifferent as the matter was innocent: That for ſuche a matter, and for the ſuccors which the Genovvaies & other neighbours gaue then to the Piſans, it was not poſſible for them to ſende their ſouldiours to the king, wherevnto albeit they were not bounde, yet for the deuotion they had alwayes borne to him, they woulde not haue ſtucke to haue done it, yea though they had not bene required: That they marueiled greatly at the kings deſire, that the Piſans ſhould not be moleſted, whome he had no reaſon to eſteeme or value with the Florentins, if he had any impreſſion of their actions agaynſt him in the rebellion of Genes: And that he could not iuſtly forbidde them to moleſt the Piſans, for that the confederation which they had made with him did ſo import and beare it. Vppon theſe beginnings they conſulted afterwardes to reduce Piſa vnder thobedience of the Florentins: wherevnto it ſeemed this did ſuffice, if order were giuen that neither the Genovvaies nor Lucquois ſhould ſuccor it in ſuche a neceſſitie of vittels and forces, that the Piſans durſt no more iſſue out of their towne: adioyning withall, for the loſſe of the harueſt, the yll diſpoſition of thoſe of the playne countrey, being in greater number then the Citizens: In ſo muche as it was beleeued that they coulde not holde out, if they receiued not from Genovvay and Lucqua certayne quantities of money, by meane of which ſuch as gouerned kept within Piſa certayne forreine ſouldiours, and diſtributing the reſidue to the young men aſwel of the towne as of the plaine countrey, they aſtoniſhed with the armes of thoſe, ſuch as deſired to accorde with the Florentins, keeping by that meane the towne in peace and free from mutinie. To this practiſe begon by the French king, was added thauthoritie of the king Catholike, ielouſe belike that without him ſuch a matter could worke no effect: and therefore aſſone as he vnderſtoode that M. Riccio was gone to Florence, he diſpatched alſo an Embaſſador, who going firſt to Piſa, encoraged them in the name of his king to take comfort and holde out: not for other reſpect, then that remayning wilfull and obſtinate to yeelde to the Florentins, they might be ſolde for a greater price. A litle after theſe enterſpeeches by conſent of both kings, were caried into the Court of the Frenche king, where, without any regarde to the protection ſo oftentimes promiſed, the king Catholike ſolicited with great importunitie the reſolution of that buſines, both for that he knewe that Piſa beeing not defended, would neceſſarily fall into the power of the Florentins, and alſo he had at that time no diſpoſition to entangle him ſelfe with newe affayres, and chiefly agaynſt the will of the Frenche king: for, notwithſtanding he had immediatly vpon his returning into Spayne, reſumed the gouernment of Caſtillo, yet he ſtoode not well confirmed in it, both for the ſeparate wills and inclinations of the Barons, and alſo they had not iuſtified his conſent in the name of his nephew: But after the cauſe of the Piſans had bene long debated in the court of Fraunce, diuerſitie of affections hindring the ſucceſſe: At laſt, for many difficulties which hapned, but principally for that both the kings ſought to appropriate to themſelues the price of the ſale of it, the practiſe was diſſolued without any forme of concluſion.

The ende of the ſeuenth booke.

THE ARGVMENT OF THE EIGHT BOOKE.

MOST of the Princes of Chriſtendome drawe into league at Cambray againſt the Venetians, who being ouerthrowen by the Frenche king, render the townes of the Churche, and make ſubmiſſion to the king of Romains. Piſa returneth to the obedience of the Florentins. The Venetians recouer the towne of Padua, which is ſoone after beſieged by Cæſar: Afterwardes they make warre to the Duke of Ferrara. The Pope giues them abſolution of the Church cenſures.

THE EIGHT BOOKE OF THE hiſtorie and diſcourſe of Guicciardin.

THE diuiſions of Italie were not ſo tractable, as that they could be reconciled with little labour, nor the infirmities of the countrey ſo eaſie and priuate, as that they ſtoode ſubiect to be readdreſſed or recured with light medicines: But as it often hapneth, that in bodies repleniſhed with humors corrupt, the remedie that is applied to repurge the maladie of one parte, engendreth more daungerous infections: euen ſo the truce made betweene the king of Romains and the Venetians, in place of the vniuerſall expectation of tranquillitie, brought foorth to the Potentates and Communalties of Italie, infinite calamities and cruelties of warre, farre exceeding the examples paſſed: for, notwithſtanding the regions of Italie for fourteene yeres, had borne a perpetuall croſſe of warres and mutations: yet, quarrells beeing oftentimes ended without effuſion of blood, and battels and skirmiſhes falling for the moſte parte vpon the ſtraungers only, the peoples had leſſe ſuffred then the princes, and the naturall regions muche ſpared from the bloudie miſeries and actions of warre: But the gappe beeing opened to newe diſcordes in tyme to come, there followed throwout all Italie, and againſt Thitalians themſelues, a miſerable trayne of many calamities and cruell accidents, infinite murders, ſackings, deſtructions, and ſpoyles of cities, a libertie of warre no leſſe offenſiue to their friendes, then hurtfull to their enemies, and a lamentable violation of religion and all holy things, with leſſe reuerence and reſpect, then if they were prophane and popular, the lawe and equitie of things being meaſured by the wils of the ſouldiours, and nothing iudged vnreaſonable againſt him that was hable to alleage authoritie, might, or will: fruites ordinarie following diuill diſcorde, and by ſo muche the more perillous and working, by how muche they happen in a ſecond mutation, as all euils are more daungerous in a ſeconde degree then in the firſt. The cauſe of ſo many afflictions in a generall conſideration was, thambition and couetouſneſſe of Princes, of whom many of them coulde not brooke any limitation of power, imperie, or kingdome: But if they be weighed in a particular conſideration, they may be ſeene to take their beginning of the too raſhe and inſolent maner of proceeding of the Venetians, by occaſion whereof were ceaſſed thoſe difficulties which till that time had holden in ſuſpence and impediments the French king, and Cæſar from agreeing together againſt them: of whome, the one beeing greatly kindled, they put him in diſpaire, and at the ſame time moued the other to no ſmall indignation, or at the leaſt gaue him meane to diſcloſe vnder an apparant coolour, that which he had long deſyred: for Cæſar, beeing netled by ſo many infamies and harmes receiued, loaſing part of his proper inheritaunce, in place to conquer the ſtates of others, was not to omit any oportunitie wherein occaſion might be giuen him to recouer or repayre ſo great ſlaunders and loſſes: A diſpoſition which the Venetians vndiſcretly increaſed a newe, ſince the making of the truce: for that not ſparing to aggrauate his indignation no leſſe with vayne demonſtrations then worſe effects, they receyued into Venice Aluiano with publike pompe, almoſt reſembling a ceremonial triumph. And the French king, albeit at the beginning he gaue a certen hope to ratifie the truce that was made, yet expreſſing afterwardes the diſcontentment he tooke, he complayned of the preſumption of the Venetians to name him and include him as adherent, and prouiding for their proper tranquillitie, to giue him ouer and leaue him in the cares and trauels of the warre.

Theſe diſpoſitions of minde both of the one and the other, began to burſt out into ſpeedie and manyfeſt experience: for Cæſar hauing no further confidence in his proper forces, and leſſe expectation that the Princes or peoples of Germanie would take to heart the iniuries that had bene done to him, made as though he had a deſire to confederate with the French king againſt the Venetians, as the onely remedie to recouer eſtſones the honor and eſtates he had loſt: And the French king, following the courſe and oportunitie of the tyme, norſhed the ſame inclination, the new diſdayne renewing in him the memorie of ancient offences receiued in the warrs of Naples, enterteining alſo a working deſire to draw out of their hands Cremona, & other townes of the auncient poſſeſſions of the dukes of Millan: Therefore to thende that in remouing the impediments of things inferiour, they might withall procede to thoſe of higher degree, they began to debate how to reſolue the quarels betwene tharchduke and the duke of Gueldres, whoſe ſafetie the Frenche king helde muche for recommended, for thauncient alliance and commodities he had receyued by him: The Pope did alſo communicate in this motion, ſtirring vp at the ſame tyme the French king againſt the Venetians, beeing, beſides the auncient indignations newly kindled and made hatefull againſt them for an opinion he had that by their meanes the exiles of Furly, who were retired to Faenza, had made a tryall to enter that Citie, hauing withall receiued into their dominions the familie of Bentyuoleis chaſed by the king out of the duchy of Millan. To theſe was added this imputation, that in many things they had borne ſlender regarde to the authoritie of the court of Rome, and of late experience had ſlenderly reſpected it in this, which troubled not a litle the Popes minde: the Pope had tranſlated the Biſhoprike of Vincenſe, vacant by the death of the Cardinall S. P. ad Vincla his nephew, to Sixtus his nephew alſo ſuborned by him into the dignitie of Cardinall, and to thoſe benefices. But the Senate of Venice, making ſmall reckoning of this collation, choaſe a gentleman of Venice, who, the Pope refuſing to confirme him, tooke boldnes to name him ſelfe Biſhop of Vincenſe of the election of the moſte excellent counſell of the Pregati: But the Pope beeing not a litle kindled for theſe obſtinacies, diſpatched firſt to the king, Maximus ſecretarie to the Cardinall of Narbona, and afterwards the Cardinall himſelfe, who newly ſucceeding the late Cardinall of Achx in his Biſhoprike, was called the Cardinall of Achx: They were willingly receiued and heard of the king, and brought backe with them the deuiſe of many meanes and plottes to put in execution that which he deſired both without themperour, and without any confederacie with him. But the Pope ſhewed a more inclination to complayne, then to determine any thing, for that on the one ſide, the vnquiet deſire he had to make armes to be leauyed agaynſt the Venetians troubled his minde, and on the other, he ſeemed fearefull to be conſtrayned to depende too muche of the greatnes of an other: but muche more was he moued by an auncient ielouſie he had taken agaynſt the Cardinall of Amboyſe, in whoſe reſpect it ſeemed greeuous to him that the armies of the French king ſhould paſſe into Italie: Beſides, thaffaires of greateſt importance were ſomewhat troubled by the late preſumption of the Pope, diſpoſing a litle before without the kings knowledge, the Byſhoprikes of Aſt and Plaiſance, and withall, for that the king reſiſted the newe Cardinall of S. P. ad Vincla, to whom by the death of thother, the riche Abbey of Clerualt neere to Millan was transferred, to take poſſeſſion of it: ſo irreſolute was the Pope, wandring betwene feare and ambition, and ſo inconſtant the Frenche king, obſeruing to make his profite on the trayne & euent of things: for, albeit the Pope coulde not bee reſolued amyd ſo many difficulties, yet in the end the French king and Cæſar, both applying with the courſe and oportunities of times, determined to communicate ſecretly together agaynſt the Venetians, wherein for the better countenance and coolour to the action, and withall to giue perfection to thoſe things that ſhould be debated, there aſſembled in the towne of Cambray for Cæſar, the Lady Margaret his daughter Regent of Flaunders and of thoſe other eſtates which were diſcended to king Phillip by the mothers right, aſſiſted for the regarde of this action by Mathevve Longo a ſecretarie of great credite with Cæſar: And for the French king, was ſent the Cardinall of Amboyſe, followed with certayne other particulars, rather to furniſhe his trayne, then to communicate in thaction: They cauſed to publiſhe a brute that theſe eſtates aſſembled to ſolicit a peace betwene tharchduke & duke of Gueldres, betwene whom they had ſet downe a truce for fortie yeeres: And keeping alwayes vnknowen from the Venetians the true occaſion, the Cardinal aſſured by great othes to their Embaſſador, that his king would continue in the confederation he had with them, wherein alſo the Embaſſador of the king of Aragon folowed him, rather not denying then graunting, for that albeit that king was the firſt mouer of theſe conferences betwene themperour and the French king, yet hauing continuation afterwards without him, both the one and other of them, were perſwaded that the proſperitie of the French king would be intollerable to him, and as touching the gouernment of Caſtillo, would holde for ſuſpected the greatnes of Cæſar, and therefore his thoughtes in that action were not conformable to his words.

Thaſſembly of Cambray.

At Cambray things were reſolued in very few dayes, without cõmunicating with thembaſſador of the king Catholike, till after the concluſion, which the tenth daye of December was ſolemnly confirmed in the great Church, with the othes of Lady Margaret, the Cardinall of Amboyſe, and the Spaniſhe Embaſſador. In this publication they expreſſed nothing, but that there was eſtabliſhed betwene the Pope and eyther of thoſe Princes a perpetuall peace and confederation: but in Articles more priuate and ſecrete, were conteined clauſes of right great importance, which being full of ambition, and wholly contrarie to the couenauntes whiche Cæſar and the French king had with the Venetians, were couered with a preamble full of great pietie, and affection to religion, as though the diuerſitie of words were ſufficient to alter and chaunge the effects of things. It was expreſſed in that preamble, that, for a common deſire to beginne a warre agaynſt the enemies of the name of Chriſt, and thimpedimentes which the Venetians had giuen, occupying ambitiouſly the landes of the Church, which nowe they ment to remoue, to proceede with better conſent and agreement to ſo holy and neceſſarie an expedition: And by the perſwaſions and counſels of the Pope, the Cardinall of Amboyſe as his procurer, and with his authoritie, and as deputed and authoriſed by the French king, and by the perſonall ſolicitation of Lady Margaret aſſigned and authoriſed by the king of Romains, and as gouernes to tharchduke and theſtates of Flaunders: And laſtly by the conſent of thembaſſador of the king of Aragon as fully appoynted by his king: they were reſolued to make warre vpon the Venetians, euery one in his owne right to recouer the thinges they had vſurped vpon them, which for the Pope were Faenza, Rimini, Rauenna, and Ceruia: for the king of Romains, Padua, Vincenſa, and Verona apperteining to him in the name of Thempire, and the places of Friul and Treuiſan, beeing percell of thinheritance of the houſe of Auſtria: for the French king were Cremona, Quiaradada, Breſſe, Bergama, and Crema: and for the regarde of the king of Aragon, were the townes and hauens which had bene morgaged by Ferdinand king of Naples. Tharticles were theſe: that the French king was bounde to the warre in perſon, and to giue the firſt reall beginning the firſt day of the next Aprill, at what tyme alſo the Pope and the king Catholike ſhould enter into the action: That to thende the king of Romains ſhould haue iuſt cauſe not to obſerue the truce that was made, the Pope ſhould demaunde ſuccors of him as of the protector of the Churche, and that after that the king of Romains ſhould ſende to him at the leaſt a Capteine, and ſhould be bounde fortie dayes after the French king had begonne the warre, to inuade theſtates of the Venetians in perſon: That which ſoeuer of them ſhould recouer that which apperteined to him, ſhould be bound to miniſter ayde to the others, till they had made a full and ſufficient recouerie: That they were all bound to defende one another, in caſe the Venetians offred to oppreſſe them for any places that were recouered, and not one of them in particular ſhould compoũd or agree with the Venetians without a common conſent: that the Duke of Ferrara, and Marquis of Mantua, and who els would pretend the Venetians to vſurpe any place of theirs, had libertie to be named in the league within three moneths: and being once named, to enioy all the benefits and fauours of the confederation in as full power and nature as the principalles of the ſame, communicating with the fulneſſe of authoritie for the reconquering of thoſe things that they had loſte: That the Pope ſhould ſommon the Venetians vnder great paynes and curſes, to make reſtitution of ſuche things as they occupied of the Church: That he ſhould be iudge betweene Bianca Maria the king of Romains wife, and the Duke of Ferrara, touching the contention for an inheritance and ſucceſſion of Anna her ſiſter, and ſometimes wife to the ſayd Duke: That Cæſar ſhould inueſt the French king in the duchie of Millan, for him ſelfe, Frauncis & Angouleſme, and to their iſſue males, for whiche inueſtiture the Frenche ſhould paye to him an hundred thouſande duckets: That Cæſar and the Archduke ſhould not during the warre and ſix monethes after, make any innouation agaynſt the king Catholike for any reſpect of the gouernment and titles of the realmes of Caſtillo: That the Pope ſhould exhort the king of Vngria to enter into the confederation: That euery one ſhould name within foure monethes his confederates and adherentes, excepting expreſly to comprehende the Venetians and the ſubiects freeholders of the confederates, and that euery principall partie in the contract, ſhould ratifie all theſe articles within threeſcore dayes next following: To this vniuerſall league was adioyned ned the particular accorde betweene Tharchduke and the Duke of Gueldres, wherin was agreed that reſtitution ſhoulde be made of thoſe townes that were taken vppon Tharchduke in this warre, but not in lyke ſorte of ſuche as were taken vppon the Duke.

Aſſone as this newe confederation was concluded in this ſorte, (all things that concerned the Venetians being kept as ſecret as might be) the Cardinall of Amboyſe departed the day folowing from Cambray: the Biſhop of Paris and Albert Pio Counte of Carpi being firſt ſent to the king of Romains to receiue his ratification in the name of the French king: he made no delay to confirme al the articles with the ſame othe & forme of ſolemnities with the which it was publiſhed in the Church of Cambray, holding it but iuſt to ratifie the thing that ſo much tended to the confirmation of his eſtate and ſecuritie, as he helde it equall and reaſonable to iuſtifie that by publike approbation, which he had ſo long ſolicited by priuate deſire and intention: it is moſt certayne, that albeit the wordes of the publication bare, that thauthoritie of the Pope and king of Aragon did communicate in it, yet the confederation was made merely without their aſſiſtance and conſent: An action which Cæſar and the French king tooke wholly vpon themſelues, not doubting of the Popes and king of Aragons conſent, partly in regarde of their proper profite, and partly for that according to the eſtate and condition of things preſent, neither of them both durſt gainſay their authoritie, and particularly the king of Aragon, to whome albeit the Articles in their due conſtruction ſeemed both ielouſe and intollerable, for that fearing leaſt the greatnes of the Frenche king would encreaſe to muche, he preferred the ſuretie of the whole kingdome of Naples afore the recouering of one part which was holden by the Venetians: yet, expreſſing cunningly a readines diſſembled, and an inclination cõtrarie to the intentions of his mind, he made preſent ratification with the ſame ceremonies which the others vſed. But touching the Pope, he made a farre more doubt of things, wandring according to his cuſtome betwene a deſire to recouer the townes of Romania, ioyned to a diſdaine againſt the Venetians, and a troubleſome feare of the greatnes of the French king: he ſawe not howe dangerous it was to him for the power of Cæſar to begin to ſtretch farre in Italie, and therefore ſeeming that it was more for his profite to obteine by accorde part of that he deſired, then to recouer the whole by warre and ſword: He labored to induce the Venetians to render to him Rimini and Faenza: wherein he forgat not to laye afore them that thoſe daungers which threatned them by the vnion of ſo many Princes, would be of greater terror and importance, if he were concurrant with them in the confederation, as to whoſe authoritie and place it belonged to purſue them with armes ſpirituall and temporall: where, if they rendred the townes which they had taken vpon the Church ſince he was Pope, by which meanes he ſhould make a ioynt recouerie of honor & eſtates, he ſhould haue iuſt occaſion not to ratifie that whervnto he had no intereſt either in aſſiſtance, conſent, or authoritie: he debated with them that as the confederation communicating nothing with the holy and ſupreme authoritie woulde eaſily diſſolue and vaniſhe, hauing in it ſelfe many difficulties: ſo he ſayde it was not reaſonable they ſhould doubt that he would not vrge to thuttermoſt his authoritie and induſtrie to keepe repreſſed in Italie the power of ſtraungers, which brought no leſſe perill to the ſea Apoſtolike, then to their ſtate. In this perſwaſion he omitted nothing that might make aduaunced his cauſe, which he followed no leſſe with his authoritie and eloquence, then with liberalities and offers: Matters that moue not the leaſt in a caſe of perſwaſion, carying as they liſte

the minds of men affecting ambition or worldly desires. The Senat drew to counsel vpon this demaunde, some iudging it a thing of great importance, to separate the Pope from Cæsar and the French king, and others thought it an action vnworthy, and not sufficient to turne away the warre: At last, as in matters of debate and controuersie, opinion oftentimes commaundes reason, so the faction of suche as gaue the best counsell had caried it, had not bene the reasons and perswasions of D. Treuisan a Senator of great authoritie, and one of the procurers of the riche temple of S. Marke, an honor next to the dignitie of the Duke, of highest respect and reputation in the common weale of Venice: he discoursed with reasons ful of efficacie and authoritie, that it was an action contrarie to the dignitie & profit of that renowmed cõmon weale, to restore those townes which the Pope required, and that the estate of their dangers would neither much encrease or diminish for the coniunction or separation of him from the other confederates; for, albeit in the negociation of the accord they had vsed the Popes name, perhaps to make their cause seeme lesse dishoneſt, yet in effect they had agreed without him, hauing no necessitie of his consent and priuitie, and therfore would become neither the more colde nor the more hotte in the execution of things they had concluded: Of the contrarie, the armes of the Pope were not of that valor and importance, as to driue them to buy at so great a price the disposing of the same: seeing that albeit they should be assayled at one selfe time by the others, yet they might easily with a very slender garrison defende those cities which the regiments of the Church (the very dishonor of souldiers & men of seruice) were not sufficient to take of themselues, & much lesse import much as touching the substance of the warre: he sayd, that in the stirres and heates of temporall armes, men did litle respect either the reuerence or threatnings of armes spirituall, which they ought not to feare to be more able to hurt them in that warre, then they had done in many others, namely in the expedition agaynst Ferrara: In which the armes of the Churche coulde not let that they obteined not a peace honorable for them, and infamous for the residue of Italie, which with one vniuersall accorde, & in a time wherin it florished most with riches, power, and valour, was banded wholly agaynst them: And in reason & concordance of causes he alleaged, that it was not likely that the almightie & omnipotent God would suffer that the effects of his sueritie and his mercy, of his anger and his peace, should rest in the distribution and power of a man ambitious and proude, and by his subiection to wine, with many other dishoneſt & immoderat affections, would administer them not according to the consideration of iustice, & benefite of Christendome, but as he was pushed on with his vile, corrupt, and intemperat humors: Besides, he sawe not by what reason they might hope for a greater constancie of fayth in this Pope then in others his elders and predecessors, making for the most parte their authoritie subiect to their ambition, and their counsels alwayes running with the concurrance and course of times: Neither could he discerne howe they might be assured that the Pope hauing obteined Faenza & Rimini, would not knit with the residue to recouer Rauenna & Cerua, hauing a minde specially watchefull ouer oportunities and occasions giuen: That the experience of his actions and examples past, proued in him no greater staye or stabilitie of fayth, then agreed with the custome of other Popes, who, to giue a coollour of iustice and equitie to those thinges they dyd, lefte ordeined amongst their other lawes, that the Churche, notwithstanding all contract, promise, and benefites receyued, might retract and directly impugne any bondes or obligations which the selfe prelates had made: He alleaged that albeit the confederation

betwene Maximilian & the French king was made with a great vehemencie of diſpoſition, yet the willes and intentions of the other confederates did varie and differ, the king Catholike being brought in by meanes compulſiue and extraordinarie, and the Pope well expreſſing ſignes of his accuſtomed doubtes and ſuſpitions: And therfore the league of Cambray was not more to be feared, then the confederacie which the ſame Maximilian & king Lovvis had with the ſame importunitie treated aforetimes at Trent, & afterwards at Blois: for that many difficulties, which for their affinitie and nature, it was almoſt impoſſible to remoue or alter, did mightily reſiſt the execution of things determined: That for thoſe reaſons it touched the Senate in principal ſtudy, & diligẽce to deuiſe meanes to ſeparat Cæſar frõ ſuch coniunction: A matter of eaſie hope & expectation, no leſſe for the reſpect of his nature and neceſſities, then for his auncient hatred agaynſt the French: and beeing once deuided from it, the whole feares of the warre were taken away, for that the french king ſtanding abandoned of his ſociety and ſuccors, would beare no more ſtomack to inuade them then he had done in times paſt: That in al publike actions the beginning ought depely to be conſidered, ſince afterwards it was not in the power of men to temporiſe or leaue of without diſhonor and danger to their deliberations, wherin they had long conſulted: That as their elders, ſo they by ſucceſſion, had bene alwayes carefull in all occaſions to augment their dominion, and with a diſcloſed & open profeſſion to aſpire to great things: A matter which made them hatefull to many, partly for feare, and partly for diſpleaſure & diſdaine of that they had taken from them: wherin albeit it hath bene perceiued long time before, that that hatred might engender ſome great alteration, yet, as they haue not for all that forborne to embrace thoccaſions that had bene offred them, ſo it was not nowe a remedie to the daungers preſent, to beginne to leaue a part of that they did poſſeſſe, ſince it woulde rather kindle then quenche the humors of thoſe that hated them, taking courage vppon their fearefulnes: And ſeeing it hath bene a perpetuall Maxime amongſt the Potentates of Italie, that the Venetians neuer forſaked thinges that once were falne into their handes, who woulde not iudge that to breake nowe ſo honorable a cuſtome, proceeded not of a laſte diſpaire to be hable to defende the perills that threatned: That whoſoeuer began to giue place and leaue any thing howe little ſoeuer, was the firſt detector of the reputation and auncient honor of his common weale, which as it is a readie oportunitie to thaugmentation of daungers, ſo to that ſtate that beginnes to decline, it is farre more harde to conſerue agaynſt the leaſt perills that be, that which remaynes, then agaynſt an other ſtate, who caring to keepe his dignitie and degree, and making no ſigne to yeelde or giue place, conuertes his force readily againſt him that ſeekes to oppreſſe him: Vallour and courage reteine long thoſe things that of themſelues are weake and impotent: and as nothing doth more terrifie the enemie then to ſeeme to be reſolute, ſo to holde faſte that that hath bene gotten, is a cooler iuſtificatorie to enhable the tytle and intereſt of the thing: There can be no greater infamie to a prince or common weale, then by negligence or cowardiſe to loſe that whiche their aunceſtors haue gotten with diligence and valour: That it was neceſſarie eyther to reiect valiantly thoſe firſt demaundes, or in yelding to them, to looke to yeelde to many more, by which in ſhort time is to be expected the abſolute ſubuerſion of their eſtate, and by conſequent the irreparable loſſe of their proper libertie: That as their common weale both in the ages of their fathers, and in their dayes, had borne out many great warres agaynſt the Princes of Chriſtendome, of which they caried a glorious iſſue, for that they always ſhewed

one conſtancie and reſolution of minde: ſo,in the preſent difficulties, notwithſtanding they may ſeeme greater, may be hoped no worſe ſucceſſe, both for that their power and authoritie were greater,and alſo by experience that in warres managed in common by many princes agaynſt one alone,the terrors are wont to be more thē theffects,for that after the firſt furies be abated & baniſhed,there riſeth diuerſitie of opinion,which breedeth variation of faith and conſtancie,all things diſſoluing with a naturall facilitie,that grow into their being with an immoderate importunitie and fury:Laſtly,that Senat was to hope,that beſides the preparations & remedies which of their owne power they were hable to furniſhe,God the moſt ſoueraigne & righteous iudge,would not leaue abandoned a cōmon weale bred and noriſhed in a perpetuall libertie,and in whom did ſhine the very beautie and aſpect of all Europe: and muche leſſe would ſuffer to be oppreſſed with thambition of Princes vnder a falſe cooler to prepare warre agaynſt the infidels, that citie, which in ſo great pietie and religion, had bene for many yeeres the very protector and defender of the whole common weale of Chriſtendome. Theſe reaſons ſo wrought in the mindes of the moſt part,that according to thexample of the yere before,and being a thing fatal to that Senat,the worſt counſell preuayled, contrarie to thopinions of many Senators of greateſt wiſdome and authoritie: In ſo much as the Pope, who had deferred the ratification till the laſt day, ratified the league, but vnder this expreſſe declaration, that he would not enter into any action of an enemie agaynſt the Venetians, vntill the French king had begon the warre.

The Pope ratifieth the treatiſe of Cambray.

Thus the yere 1508.ended with many ſedes of great warrs, & fundations ſubtelly laied of many dangerous accidēts & mutations, which be the wretched & ordinary traynes of ambition,diuiſion,& ſecret hates. About this time alſo thaffaires of the Piſans ſuffering of late many declinations,ſeemed dayly to diuolue more and more into harder & ſtraiter tearmes: for,beſides that the Florentins the ſōmer before,had cut downe their corne,and with their men at armes made cōtinuall incurſions vpon the townes adioyning,euen to the gates of Piſa: yet, the better to cut of all paſſage and traffike of vittels by ſea,they enterteined in their pay the ſonne of Bardell of Portouenere with certen proportions of veſſels: by which impediment, the Piſans ſtanding as it were beſieged both by ſea & land,and not hable by reaſon of their pouertie and afflictions,to refurniſh themſelues neither with veſſels nor forrein ſouldiers, found themſelues in great diſpaire to holde out any longer,being very weakely ſuccored by their neighbors.And yet as God ſeldome giueth ſo greeuous a ſentence of theſtate of mans mortalitie,as to deny al compaſſion to men in miſerie: ſo the Genovvaies & Lucquois owing pitie to the afflictions of their neighbors,conſulted to conuey into Piſa certaine quantities of corne,which being fraughted in a great number of Barkes,folowed with two ſhippes of Genes, and two gallions,were tranſported to Spetia,& from thence to Voreggia, to thende they might be conueyed into Piſa with fourtene brigantins,and certen ſmal barkes,according to the direction of the Piſans: But the Florentins ſeking to oppoſe againſt this enterpriſe,as wherin conſiſted their hope or diſpaire to get Piſa for that yere, they ioyned to the nauy they had alredy, a ſhip of England, happly riding in the roade of Lyuorno,with certein other fuſtes and brigantins: And to miniſter to the Nauy at ſea with all the ſuccours and preparations they could make by lande, they ſent all the horſemen, with a great portion of the footemen which were haſtily leauyed in the Countrey, along all thoſe paſſages and ſhoares by the which the Nauy of thenemie might runne the courſe of Piſa, either by the mouth of Arna, or the ryuer called the dead Floodde entering into Arna:

Arna: The enemies ariued at the mouth of Arna, and the Florentin veſſels lying betwene the mouth and the dead ryuer, and the Landmen commaunding all the apte places, had planted their artilleries aſwell on this ſide as beyonde the brinke of the ryuer by the which they ſhould paſſe: In ſo muche as they ſeeing no poſſibilitie to paſſe further, retyred into the ryuer of Genes, with the loſſe of three brigantins laden with wheat. By thoccaſion of which ſucceſſe, the victorie ſeeming almoſt certayne for want of vittels, the Florentins to take away all oportunities for vittels to enter by the riuer, made a bridge of wood vpon Arna, which they fortified with baſtillions on both ſides the banks: And as when afflictions begin to fall, they thunder all at once, aduerſities hauing this in proper, not onely to oppreſſe, but alſo to depriue miſerable men of ordinarie comfort: ſo, in the ſame time, to cut of all ſuccours of their neighbours, the Florentins fell to compoſition with them of Lucquay: for, hauing aforetime, to repreſſe their inſolencies, ſent part of their footebandes that were within Caſcina, to ſacke the hauen of Voregge and the ſtorehouſes, wherein were many ſortes of ſilkes belonging to the marchantes of Lucquay: The inhabitants of Lucquay made timerous by thoſe rigorous exãples, ſent their Embaſſadors to Florence, where was accorded, that betwene both their common weales, there ſhould be a confederation defenſiue for three yeres, the Lucquois beeing namely and expreſly excluded from all power any more to ſuccor the Piſans. This confederation to be continued for twelue yeres further, if the Florentins ſhould recouer Piſa within a yere: and that during the tearme of this league, the Florentins (alway reſeruing the prerogatiue of their rights) ſhould not moleſt the ſtate of Lucquay, touching the poſſeſſion of Pietra Sancta and Mutron, A league opening the principall gap to the ruine of the Piſans: But that which was of greateſt importance to make eaſie the conqueſt of Piſa, was the capitulation which they made with the kings Catholike & French, which being ſolicited many moneths, had ſuffred many difficulties: for, the Florentins, by the experience of things paſt, feared leaſt it were a meane to draw from them a great quantitie of money, and yet the affaires of Piſa to continue in the ſame degree: and on the other part, the French interpreted that they deferred cunningly, in hope that the Piſans would make a willing reſtitution, their extremities beeing deſperate and nowe layde open to all men: The French king, vnwilling that they ſhould recouer it, vnles he did cõmunicat in the price, cõmaunded Bardell his ſubiect to leaue their pay, and to Monſr Chaumont to diſpatch from Millan ſix hundred launces for the ſuccors of the Piſans: which ioyned to other actions of feare and ſuſpition, occupied the Florentins with ſuch perplexities, that ceaſſing all difficulties, they entred couenant in this maner: That the French king & king Catholike ſhould giue no aide nor ſupport to the Piſans, & alſo to forbid that frõ no places of their ſubiection & obedience, nor likewiſe frõ any their confederats or others vnder their protection, ſhould enter into Piſa any ſuccors of vittels, money, munition or men, nor any other nature of releefe whatſoeuer: That the Florentins ſo farforth as Piſa were recouered within a yere following, ſhould pay to eyther of them within a certeine time fifty thouſand duckets: And that in the ſame condition there ſhould continue betwene them a league for three yeres, frõ the day that they recõquered Piſa. In conſideration of which league the Florentins ſhould be bounde to defende with three hundred men at armes the eſtates that they helde in Italie, receiuing in like ſort for their defence, of either of thẽ a proportion of three hundred men at armes. To this capitulation made in cõmon, it was neceſſarie for the Florentins to adde (without the priuitie of the king Catholike) newe bonds to pay to the French king vnder the ſame conditions and tearmes,

Contract betwene the French king, king of Spaine and the Florentins.

fiftie thouſande duckets, promiſing withall fiue and twentie thouſande more to the miniſters of both the kings, of which the greateſt portion was to be diſtributed at the diſcretion of the Cardinall of Amboyſe. Theſe couenantes albeit they were heauie and coſtly to the Florentins, yet, in the opinion of men, they brought no leſſe infamie to both the kings: the one for money abandoning the citie which many times he had aſſured to be in his protection, and which being willingly offred to him, the great Capteine had accepted in his name: And the other contrarie to the reputation of ſo many promiſes made to the Florentins, both ſolde for a vyle price the iuſte libertie of the Piſans, and conſtrayned the Florentins to buy of him the power and ſufferaunce to recouer that which iuſtly apperteined to them: So mightie now a dayes

The French king prepareth agaynſt the Venetians

But the affaires of the Piſans, vpon whom all Italie was wont afore to turne their eyes, were in this time of ſlender conſideration, for that the mindes of men depended on the expectation of greater things: for, after the league of Cambray was ratified by all the confederates, the French king began to make great preparations: And albeit he vſed not as yet any proteſtations or threates of warre, yet matters beeing no longer hable to be diſſembled, the Cardinall of Amboyſe in the preſence of the whole councell, complained with vehement words to the embaſſador of Venice, for that that Senate, deſpiſing the alliance and amitie of the king, cauſed to fortifie the Abbey of Cerreta in the territories of Crema, wherin had bene of olde time a Caſtel which was raſed by the capitulations of peace in the yere 1454. made betweene the Venetians and Frauncis Sforce newly duke of Millan, with couenaunt that the Venetians ſhould in no time make fortreſſe there: to the capitulations of which peace, was referred in this and in many other things, the peace made betwene them and the king. But now the king being within fewe dayes after come to Lyon, his regimentes marched towards the mountes, and ſix thouſande Swvizzers leauied and payed by him, prepared to diſcende at the ſame time into Italie: he obtained alſo of the Genovvaies, foure Carrakes, and of the Florentins fiftie thouſande duckets, beeing his moytie which they ſhould pay vpon the conqueſt of Piſa: And ioyning to the aydes of others, his owne ſuccors, he leauyed vppon the duchie of Millan, (deſirous to repoſſeſſe the townes which the Venetians helde) an hundred thouſande duckets, beſides the honorable deuotion of many particular gentlemen and free holders of that ſtate, furniſhing them ſelues with horſes and armes, to accompanie the kings perſon in the warre.

The Venetiãs looke to them ſelues.

On the other ſide, the Venetians prepared in one common and reſolute courage, to receiue and ſuſtaine ſo great a warre, labouring with money, with authoritie, and with the whole countenance and body of their territories, to leauie prouiſions worthy of ſo great a common weale: wherein their diligence was ſo muche the more importunate and reſolute, by howmuch it ſeemed likely, that if they ſuſtayned the firſt brunt or furie, the league of the Princes ſo yll compoſed and worſe confirmed, would eaſily decline and diſſolue: In which actions (to the glory of that Senate) was well expreſſed in thoſe that afore had counſelled in vayne to gouerne their good fortune modeſtly, the ſelfe ſame vehemencie of minde which had bene vttered by the others that had bene authors of the contrarie: for that preferring publike ſafety afore priuate ambition, they ſought not the increaſing of their authoritie in reproching to others their preiudiciall counſells, nor in obiecting agaynſt the remedies which

which were ordeined to the perils hapned by their indiſcreſſion: And yet conſidering that almoſt all the regions of Chriſtendome were banded agaynſt them, they ſommoned together all their wittes to breake ſo great a league, repenting euen now that they ſo lightly reiected thoccaſion to deuide the Pope from the reſt, hoping that he woulde not haue ſtirred, if onely they had made reſtitution of Faenza: In which regard, ioyned to the conſideration of their preſent condition and eſtate, they renewed with him the firſt negociation, and withall diſpatched meſſangers to Cæſar and the king Catholike, forbearing to make any practiſe with the Frenche king, in whom, what for hatred and other hindring reſpects, they had no hope of diſpoſition to conformitie: But the Pope had no power nowe to accept that whiche he had deſired afore: ſo vayne is the ſeconde offer of things that haue bene once refuſed: The king Catholike, though he had no want of will and inclination, yet he was vnhable to range the reſidue: ſo little power is left to him that is drawen into action by compulſion: And Cæſar poſſeſſed with a ſpirite of enuy againſt the name of Venice, would not onely not agree, but alſo diſdayned to vnderſtande with what nature of offers they tempted him, refuſing to ſee their ſecretarie whom they had ſent to him with very large commiſſions: In ſo much as beholding on all ſides nothing but a face of aduerſitie accompanied with a ſetled indignation of Princes, they diſpoſed all their deuiſes and ſtudies to defende themſelues by armes, enterteining frō all Regions great proportions of horſemen and footemen, and armed many veſſels to garde the ſhoares of Romagnia, and the townes of Pouuilla, and to thruſt into the lake of Guarda, and ryuer of Po, with other places by the which they feared to be moleſted by the Duke of Ferrara and Marquis of Mantua. But beſides the threates of men, they were aſtoniſhed with many aduentures eyther fatall or accidentall: for, a ſmall barke which they had ſent to tranſport money to Rauenna, was drowned with ten thouſand duckets: the caſtell of Breſſe was ſtriken with lightning: and the houſe where lay the charters of their common weale called Tharchiuio, fell ſodenly to the ground with a wonderfull ruine: But that which moſt filled them with feare & perplexity, was at the ſame time, & in the very houre that the great Counſel aſſembled, a fire kindled eyther by chaunce, or by ſome ſecrete treaſon, in their ſtoare houſe called the Arzenale, euen in the rometh where was their ſaltpeter: which burſt out with ſuche furie, that notwithſtanding the concourſe of men labouring with an vniuerſall diligence to quench it, yet, what by the force of the winde and nature of the matter proper to nouriſh and encreaſe fire, it conſumed to aſhes twelue bodies of gallies, with a wonderfull quantitie of munitions. This was alſo added to their difficulties, that hauing enterteined Iulio and Ranſe Vrſins, and Troillo Sauello with fiue hundred men at armes, and three thouſande footemen, the Pope, with ſeuere commaundementes as being ſubiects of the Church, compelled them not to depart out of the towne of Rome: inducing them withall, to retayne ſtill fifteene thouſand duckets, which they had receiued in preſt for their payes, promiſing to abare ſo muche of the debtes which the Venetians ought to the ſea Apoſtolike, for the frutes which they had receyued of the townes of Romagnia. The cheefe care of the Venetians was to prepare and make themſelues ſtrong on that ſide by the which the Frenche king was to make his enterpriſe, but they heard not of him neither ſo ſoone as they looked for, nor ſo mightily as the opinion went: for that from the king of Aragon, notwithſtanding he had made great promiſes to the other confederates, appeared only brutes and demonſtrations according to his cuſtome, executing nothing that was of any conſequence: And Cæſar being gone into Flaunders to induce the ſubiectes of his ſonne in lawe to make ſome contribution of money, it was beleued that he could not begin the warre ſo ſone as he had promiſed, beſides, it was ſuppoſed that the Pope hoping more in the victorie of others, then in his owne ſtrength, would be gouerned according to the proceedings of the confederates: It was not doubted that the French king would make his firſt action vpon Guiaradada, paſſing the ryuer of Adda neare Caſcina, and therefore the Venetian armie aſſembled at Pontuique vpon the ryuer of Oglia, the Count Petillano being their generall, and Bartlemevve Aluiano gouernour, and Commiſſioners in the name of the Senate, George Cornato and Andrea Gritti, gentlemen muche renowmed and honorable, aſwell for their ordinarie qualities, as for the glories they had wonne the yere before, the one returning victorious from Friul, and the other for expulſing the Almains from Rouera: Theſe two debating in what ſort the warre ſhould be managed, had not onely opinions diuers, but alſo euen betwene the generall and gouernor were contentions and ſeparation of councell: for, Aluiano beeing of a minde ſtirring, and made prowde by his fortunes of the yere before, apt to embrace occaſions, and of a wonderfull celeritie both to conſult and execute, perſwaded, that to plant rather the body of the warre in the countrey of thenemie, then to expect till it were transferred to their territories, it were good to make an inuaſion vpon the duchie of Millan before the French paſte into Italie: But the Counte Petillano, either for that the reſolution of his minde was abated by age (as Aluiano ſayd) or by his long experience conſidering with a deeper diſcretion the daungers that might happen, and not willing to tempt fortune without a manyfeſt hope of victorie, gaue this counſell: that diſpiſing the loſſe of the townes of Guiaradada, which imported not muche for theffect of the warre, the armie might encampe neare the towne of Orci, according to theexamples of Frauncis Carmignole and Iames Piccinin, capteines of great vertue and name in the warres betwene the Venetians and the Millanois: he alleaged that the place was ſtrong, hauing his ſituation betwene the ryuers of Oglia and Seria, and of ſingular oportunitie to ſuccour all the townes of the iuriſdiction of Venice, for that if the French men charged them in ſuch a nature & ſtrēgth of place, they nede not doubt an aſſured victorie, thopportunitie of the place miniſtring muche to thaction: But if they encamped at Cremona, or at Crema, or at Bergama, or at Breſſe, they might (for the defence of them) draw neare with tharmie into a place of ſuretie, and with their trowpes of light horſemen and eſtradiots, cut off their vittels and other commodities: A thing which as it would let them for taking any place of importance, ſo by this meane, without committing themſelues to the ſentence of fortune, the ſtate of Venice might be eaſily defended agaynſt ſo mighty a preparation of the french king. Of theſe counſels, neither the one nor the other was approued of the Senat: to the opinion of Aluiano was referred too muche raſhnes and boldnes: daungerous humors to direct a great enterpriſe, and in the Generall was noted too muche fearfulneſſe, not conſidering the nature of the daungers preſent. The Senate coulde haue bene contented, according to thauncient cuſtome of that common weale, that they had proceeded ſurely, and aduentured as litle as they could: but they conſidered on the other ſide, that if at the ſame time when almoſt all their forces were occupied to make head agaynſt the French king, Cæſar ſhould make any mightie innuaſion vpon their eſtate, with what armies, with what capteines, or with what bandes of ſouldiours could they oppoſe agaynſt him: In which regarde that way whiche of it ſelfe ſeemed moſt ſure and moſt certayne, remayned moſte vncertayne and moſte daungerous, their coniectures being confounded in the nature and condition of thenter-

thenterprise: And therfore, as it hapneth in opinions contrarie, they made election of the meane, determining to drawe the armie neare the ryuer of Adda, not to leaue Guiaradada in pray to thenemies, and yet not to come to hande stroakes with them without a great hope or vrgent necessitie, and that by expresse direction from the Senate.

But farre otherwise was the resolution of the French king, who desired to finde out thenemie, and giue him battell: And comming accompanied with the Duke of Lorrain and all the nobilitie of Fraunce, sent his Heralt Montioy (assone as he was passed the Mountes) to denounce warre to the Senate of Venice, charging him to make publication to the Magistrates of Venice, as he passed by Cremona, to thend the Senate might the rather take signification: And albeit, his whole armie being not yet assembled, he had determined no action to be done, till he were aryued in person at Casciana: yet, eyther to satisfie the Pope, complayning that the time set downe in the capitulation was passed, or els to hasten the time agaynst Cæsar, being bound to enter into the warre, fortie dayes after the French had begon, he chaunged his first resolution, and commaunded Monsr Chaumont to broache the warre: obseruing thoportunitie of the time, for that the regiments of the Venetians, expecting their full assemblies, were not yet departed from Pontuiquo.

The first actuall beginning to so great a warre was made the xv. day of Aprill, 1505. when Monsr de Chaumont passed the foarde of Adda neare Casçina, conueying by boates six thousande footemen, and the artilleries: from thence he marched to the towne of Treuy, which is within three myles of Casçina, wherein were Iulian Morosin gouernour of the Venetian estradiots, and Vitelli de citta de Castello, with Vincent de Naldo, who disposed the footemen whiche were to be distributed amongst the townes thereaboutes: They beleeued that those French bands which lay dispersed in many places in the countrey, were not men appoynted to assayle the towne, but to make incursions into the countrey, and therefore to make some experience of warre with them, they sent out an hundred of their footmen, who with certen estradiots enterteined the skirmish, & folowed the chase euen to the fortres of the gate: and being followed with their mainebattell and thartillerie, they began to play with suche Culuerins and Falcons as they had, so visiting the towers and places of the wall, that what by the terror of the shot, ioyned to the sodennes and importunitie of thaction, and vniuersall mutinies of the multitudes in the towne, made afrayde by thexamples of their chieftaynes and leaders, they yeelded wholly to the discression of Monsr de Chaumont, to whom in this first fortune were made prisoners Iustinian, Vitelli, and Vincent, and many others, with a hundred light horsemen, and a thousande footemen, all of the vale de Mone: only two hundred estradiots were saued by flying. After this good beginning Monsr de Chaumont, conquering also certayne places adioyning, repassed with all his people ouer the ryuer of Adda, carying with him by the felicitie of this first action, great hope of an absolute victorie to the residue of the warre. The same day the Marquis of Mantua, to whom the king had committed an hundred Launces, runne vp to Casalmaior, which without resistance was rendred to him by the inhabitants, together with Lovvis Bonne, Magistrate for the Venetians. The same day in like sort Rocabartin with an hundred and fiftie launces, and three thousande footmen, passing ouer a bridge made of boates vpon Adda as it entreth into Pavv, made roades vpon the townes of Cremona, as did also in an other part of the countrey, the souldiours of the garrison of Lodi building a bridge vpon Adda: besides, all the paisantes of the Mountaine of Briansa, made incursions euen to Ber- gama, ioyning to ſo common a fauor of fortune, an vniuerſal readines and reſolution of minde. But this generall inuaſion performed in one day, and in fiue ſeuerall places, the enemies preſenting no reſiſtaunce, bare more brute than matter of effect, both for that Monſr de Chaumont retyred immediatly to Millan, to abide the kinges comming, and alſo the Marquis of Mantua, who after the enterpriſe of Caſalmaior, had executed a vayne attempt vpon Aſola, abandoned Caſalmaior, hearing that Aluiano was paſſed on this ſide the ryuer of Oglio at Pontmolaro.

The Popes Bull agaynſt the Venetians

The Pope ſeeing ſuche a beginning giuen to the warre, publiſhed in forme of admonition a horrible Bull, wherein were declared all the vſurpations made by the Venetians vpon the townes apperteining to the ſea Apoſtolike, and the authoritie which they had attributed to themſelues, to the preiudice of the eccleſiaſtike libertie and iuriſdiction of Popes, both in diſpoſing Biſhoprikes, and other benefices vacant, in deducing in ſecular courſe cauſes ſpiritual apperteining to the iudgement of the Church, and alſo all other natures of diſobediences paſte. Amongſt thoſe declarations was not forgotten, that not long ſince, to the great trouble of the ſtate of Bolognia, and preiudice of the Church, they had called to Faenza the Bentyuoleis, who being rebels to the Church, were ſubiect aſwell in themſelues, as in thoſe that receiued them, to great cenſures: he admoniſhed them to make reſtitution within xxiiij. dayes next, of all thoſe townes of the Church which they occupied, together with the accompt of the frutes they haue receyued ſince the time of their poſſeſſion, and that vnder payne (in caſe of diſobedience) to incurre the paynes of curſings and interdictions, not onely to the citie of Venice, and all the townes of their obedience, but alſo to all ſuche, as being not ſubiect to their iuriſdiction, were yet receyuers or reskewers of the Venetians, declaring them attainted of crimen læſæ maieſtatis, & defied as perpetual enemies to all Chriſtians, to whom he gaue full power to take their goods where they were found, & to make their perſons ſlaues. Agaynſt this Bull not many dayes after, was brought into the towne of Rome, a writing by men vnknowen in the name of the Prince & Magiſtrates of Venice, wherin, after a long & bitter narration agaynſt the Pope & the French king, was expreſſed an appeale from the admonition to the next Councell, and for want of humaine iuſtice, to the tribunall of Ieſus Chriſt the moſt righteous and ſoueraigne iudge. To theſe ſpirituall thunderboltes, were ioyned temporall threates, for that the Frenche Heralt arriuing at the ſame time at Venice, and brought afore the preſence of the Duke & Senat, denounced in the name of the Frenche king, the warre already begonne, charging them to haue giuen many occaſions, more apparant then true or iuſt. The Duke, after ſome conſulting with the Senate, anſwered the Heralt in fewe wordes, that ſince the king his maiſter was determined to make warre vpon them, in a time when they hoped moſt for thobſeruation of thalliance whiche they had neuer violated, and for not breaking of it, had made Cæſar their enemie, they would ſtand vpon their defence, which they hoped to be hable to do with their forces accompanied with the iuſtice of their cauſe. This anſwere ſeemed to reſemble more the dignitie of their cõmon weale, then if they had vſed iuſtifications and complaintes to one that had alreadie aſſayled them with armes.

The Venetians armie.

The Venetian armie was at laſte aſſembled and moſtered at Pontuiquo, wherein were two thouſande men at armes, three thouſande light horſemen and eſtradiots, fiftene thouſande footemen, choſen and the very flower of ſouldiours in all the regions of Italie, no leſſe for their generall valour, then for the experience of the leaders, and fifteene thouſande other footemen of choyſe of the appoyntment of their countreis, countreys,accompanied with great quantities of artillerie: from thence the armie marched to Fonteuella, a towne within ſix myles of Lodi,and a retraite very commodious to ſuccor Cremona, Crema, Caranaga, and Bergama: where iudging they ſhould haue occaſion,for the retraite of Monſr Chaumont beyonde Adda, to recouer Treuy, the kings armie withall beeing not yet aſſembled,they tooke the feelds,folowing the deliberation of the Senate,but agaynſt the counſell of Aluiano, who ſayde they were counſels almoſt repugnant, to forbidde to feight with the enemie, and yet to draw ſo neare them, ſeeing happly it might eyther not be in their power to retyre, or if they did, it would be with a diminution of reputation hurtfull to the ſubſtaunce of the whole warre: In which regarde, and for his particular honor, and vniuerſall reſpect of all the men of warre of Italie, he had rather chooſe to commit his life to hazarde and fortune,then giue his conſent to ſo great an infamie. The firſt towne the armie took was Riuolce, where the French had left no garriſon, and hauing put into it fiftie horſe and three hundred footemen, they drewe neare to Treuy, a towne very neare the ryuer of Adda,hauing his ſituation ſomewhat high and bearing,and wherin Monſr Chaumont had left fiftie launces and a thouſande footemen,vnder capteine Imbault, Frontalle Gaſcon, and the white Knight: Thartilleries were planted on that ſide to Caſcina,where the wall was weakeſt, & making great execution,ſuch as were within yeelded the day following, the ſouldiers ſaued, but without armes, the capteines remayning priſoners, and the towne wholly at the diſcreſſion of the victors: The houſes and ryches of the towne were put to preſent ſacke,but with greater domage to the victors, then to thoſe that were vanquiſhed, for that the Frenche king vnderſtanding the campe of thenemie to be before Treui,ſuppoſing that that place beeing loſt almoſt in his ſight, would bring great diminution to his reputation, he aduaunced his armie, and with a ſpeede according to the neceſſitie of the perill, marched from Millan to reskew it: and arriuing the day after thexecution of Treuy, at the ryuer neare Caſciana, where were made before for thoportunitie of Caſciana without impediment, three bridges of barkes, he paſſed with his whole armie, his enemies making no countenaunce to reſiſt him: A matter which made many men of experience to maruell,that they ydely loſt ſo fayre occaſion to ſet vpon the former part of his armie which was paſſed: and Triuulce, enforcing the glory of that aduauntage, ſeeing the whole armie paſſe without reſiſtance, cryed to the Frenche king, The victorie vvas vvonne: Of ſuche force are occaſions beeing giuen by negligence of the one partie,and followed with reſolution and valour of thother: neuertheleſſe it is certayne, that the Venetian captaynes both diſcerned the benefite of thoccaſion,and would haue vſed it, ſauing it was not in their power, neither by authoritie nor by petition, nor with threates, to driue out of Treuy the ſouldiours occupied in pillage and pray: And albeit in a diſorder ſo generall, and a neceſſitie ſo deſperate, Aluiano had no other meane for their common ſafetie,then to compel the multitude of ſouldiers to iſſue,by ſetting the towne on fyre: yet it was a remedie too ſlowe and late, for that the Frenche vſing the fauor of their fortune, were alreadie paſſed, skorning with great ioye the cowardiſe and wretched counſell of thenemie. The king encamped within litle more then a myle of the Venetians, who laye in a place ſomewhat rayſed, and bearing ſuche ſtrength aſwell by the oportunitie of his ſeate, as by the rampiers and trenches they had caſte by their induſtrie, that there was no poſſibilitie to ſet vpon them without manyfeſt perill, the time, the place,and almoſt the diſpoſitions of men,with all other circumſtances apperteining to ſuche an action, beeing agaynſt them. As they drewe to counſell in what forme and maner they ſhould proceede, many were of opinion, ſtanding alſo vpon thexſpectation of the diſcending of Cæſar, that they ſhould temporiſe and deferre, for that the condition of him that expectes to be aſſailed, beeing better then he that ſeekes to ſet on an other, neceſſitie would compell the Venetian capteines to ſeke to offer the battayle, ſeeing they had no reaſonable meane to defend their iuriſdiction oppreſſed in ſo many places: A perſwaſion contrarie to the opinion of the king, who ſought chiefly to feight in a place, whoſe ſituation was not aboue the vallour of the champions, being moued therevnto eyther for feare that Cæſar woulde aduaunce too ſlowly, or elſe for that beeing really in the campe in perſon with the choyſe forces of his kingdome, he ſtoode not onely in an abſolute hope of the victorie, but alſo iudged it muche to his diſhonor, if he put not an ende to the warre of him ſelfe without the miniſtration of others: as of the contrarie he eſtemed it greatly to the glory and reputation of his name, if by his power and vertue, and in hys owne perſon, the reſidue of the confederates might come to communicate no leſſe then himſelfe in the rewards & fruites of the victorie: An ambition of glory much familiar with great princes, and oftentimes moſt hurtfull to great enterpriſes, ſpecially whē one particular power aſpireth to execute an action which in reaſon, counſell, and confederacie reſpecteth a ioynt aſſiſtance: on the other ſide, the commiſſioners and captaines of Venice, not forſtalling their counſels for any feare they had of Cæſar, were determined not to put themſelues into places equall or comparatiue with thenemie, but ſhifting alwayes into places of aduauntage and ſtrength, they ſought at one time to eſchue the neceſſitie of the battell, and withall to let that the French ſhould do nothing of importance, ſeeking to obey time, neceſſitie, and all other things to be reſpected in an action of that nature.

With theſe deliberations and counſels, neither the one nor the other armie made any mouing, but ſtoode encamped a whole day the one in the face of the other: And albeit in ſo neare aſpect of two mightie enemies equal in ambition, and in glorie nothing inferior, it is harde to conteine men of ſeruice, yet there was nothing executed betwene them, but certayne light skirmiſhes by horſmen, wherin though the French by aduauncing their artillerie, ſought occaſion to fight, yet the battell was not embraſed, mens counſels varying, and the reſpectes of things not reſolued. The day after, the king remoued towardes Riuolta, to trye whether a deſire to keepe that place would cauſe Thitalians to moue: who, not ſtirring, to obtaine at the leaſt a ſecret confeſſion that they had no ſtomacks to accept the battell, the king ſtoode foure long houres afore their lodgings with his whole armie aranged in battell, the Venetians doing no other thing then moue and ſhew themſelues in the front of the Frenchmen in good order, without abandoning their trenche. At this time the Artillerie beeing drawne by part of the kings ſouldiours to the walles of Riuolta, the place was forced and taken in fewe houres, where the king lodged that night with all his armie, being not a litle troubled with the maner of proceeding of thenemies, whoſe counſels he prayſed ſo muche the more, by howmuche they were framed agaynſt his intentions, and diſcontented him: But to drawe them by neceſſitie to that whervnto they bare a will eſtranged, after he had remayned a whole day at Riuolta, and ſet fyre in the place afore he departed, he remoued his campe to lodge at Vailo, or at Pandin the night following: he hoped that by the oportunitie of either of theſe places, he might eaſily giue impediment to the vittels comming from Cremona and Crema, and by that meane to put them in neceſſitie to leaue abandoned their lodgings wherein they had remayned to that howre. The Venetian capteines ſaw what were the thoughtes and intentions of the king, and did not doubt that it would not be neceſſarie to take a place ſtrong & neare thenemie, to continue to hold them in the ſame difficulties & impediments: But the Count Petillano coũſelled to deferre the mouing of the campe till the day following, notwithſtanding Aluiano made ſo great an inſtance to the contrarie alleaging howe neceſſary it were to preuent them, that in thend it was agreed to breake vp ſodenly (raſhnes preuayling more then maturitie of counſell.) There were two wayes to leade to the ſayde places, the one lower neare the ryuer of Adda, but a longer way and full of turnings: the other more remoued from the ryuer, but more ſhorte, and more ſtraight, the one making the ſtring, and the other the bowe, as the ſaying runnes: The lower way was taken by the kings armie, which conteined more then two thouſande launces, ſix thouſande Svvizzer footmen, and twelue thouſand of Gaſcoins and Italians, wel furniſhed with artillerie, and a ſufficient prouiſion of poyners. The Venetian armie marched by the higher way vpon the right hande towardes thenemie: in it were two thouſand men at armes, more then twentie thouſande footemen, with a great quantitie of lighte horſmen, partly Italians, and partly leauyed in Grece by the Venetians, who ranne before, but forbare to enlarge and ſpread according to their cuſtome, the buſhes and braunches whereof the countrey was full betwene both the one and other armie, being their impedimentes, as alſo they ſo ſhadowed both the campes, that they could not ſee one an other: But marching in this order, and the Venetians alwayes aduauncing, there drew neare together in one time the French vauward conteining fiue hundred launces, and the Svvizzer footemen, led by Charles d'Amboyſe and I. Iacques Trimulce, and the rearegard of the Venetians gouerned by Bar. Aluiano, wherin were eight hundred men at armes, with all the flower of the footemen of the army, but they kept no good order in their marche, Aluiano not thinking that the battell would be offred that day: But when he ſaw himſelfe in the face of his enemies, what by the renouation of his auncient valour, and that he was broughte into ſuche extremitie of place, that he was compelled to fight, he gaue preſent aduertiſement to the Count Petillano leading thother part of tharmie before, his neceſſitie, or els his reſolution demaunding his ſuccors: The Counte returned aunſwere that he ſhould continue his marching, and eſchew the fight, the reaſons of warre ſo requiring, and the reſolution of the Senate agreeing: But in the meane whyle, Aluiano hauing beſtowed his footemen with ſix peces of artillerie vpon a litle trench made to ſtop the furie of a lande flood, which at that time beeing almoſt dry of water paſſed betwene both the armies: charged thenemies with ſuch corage and furie, that he compelled them to giue ground, wherein this miniſtred not a little helpe to him, that the firſt charge was amongſt certen vines, where, by reaſon of the hedges and intricat branches of the vines, the French horſemen could execute litle: neuertheles the battel of the French armie, wherin was the kings perſon, being aduaunced for that daunger, the two firſt ſquadrons ioyned to charge the bandes of Aluiano, who entring into a great hope of the victory for ſo happy a beginning, was not ydle to labour to encourage the ſouldiours with vehement words: The battell was furious on all ſides, the French receyuing corage and comfort by the ſuccors of their companions, and for that the battell was drawen into a place open and diſcouered, where their horſemen had ſpace and skoape to manage at pleaſure: beſides, the preſence of the king did muche to ſtirre them, who bearing no more reſpecte to his perſon, then if he had beene a priuate ſouldiour, refuſed not to ſtande in the daunger of the artillerie, not ceaſſing where he ſawe neede, to commaunde, to encourage, and to threaten: on the other ſide, Thitallian footemen, who were full of reſolution for their firſt felicitie, fought with great conſtancie of courage and valour, Aluiano forgetting nothing that belonged to the office of an excellent captayne: At laſt, three howres beeing conſumed in this execution, the Venetian bandes receiuing by the playnneſſe of the place great diſtreſſe by the French horſemen, and not able withall to keepe firme footing for the rayne that fell during the battell, whiche made the ground ſlippery, but ſpecially for that they were not ſuccored by the reſidue of tharmie, began to fight with a great diſaduauntage, and yet made reſiſtance with great vertue, in ſo much as when they ſaw no hope to ouercome, it was well expreſſed in the effects of their valour, that more to winne glory then to ſaue them ſelues, they labored to make the victorie bloudy to the French, deſpiſing perills with the ſame minds wherwith they ſought for glory & monument: And albeit they kept the battell a long time in ſuſpenſion & doubt, yet at laſt, being more depriued of ſtrength then of courage, without turning their backes to thenemie, they paſſed almoſte all vnder the ſentence of the ſworde, leauing to the reſidue of the armie an example of right worthy imitation, and to poſteritie a perpetuall praiſe of their merite and vertue. Amongeſt the reſt that were ſlayne, many lamentations were made for one of the Marquiſſes of the Mount S. Maria de Tuskana, a captaine of great exerciſe in leading footmen in the warres of Piſa, when he liued in the pay of the Florentins, & now one of the Colonels of the Venetian footmen. The honorable reſiſtance which this only one part of tharmie made, bred almoſt a generall opinion, that if the whole Venetian campe had entred the battell, they had eyther caried the victorie, or at leaſt paſt it to thenemie with greater perill and bloudſhedding. But the Count Petillano, with whom was the greateſt part of tharmie, abſtayned from armes, eyther for that (thus he alleaged) as he prepared to aduaunce to the battell, he was yll aduertiſed by an eſquadron that fledde away, or rather (ſuche was the brute) ſtanding in no hope or poſſibilitie of the victorie, and no leſſe diſdayned that Aluiano contrarie to his direction had aduentured to feight, he eſteemed it a counſayle better aſſured, to keepe that parte of tharmie reſerued, then to referre the whole to hazarde for the raſhneſſe of an other, thextremitie of the perill making him more carefull then honorable. In this battell periſhed very fewe men at armes, the whole ſlaughter falling vppon the Venetian footemen, whereof dyed by good teſtimonie eyght thouſande bodies, notwithſtanding ſome reapport that the number of the dead men on both partes, could not paſſe ſix thouſande men: ſuche variation followeth brutes and rumors, being for the moſt part ful of incertenties and errours: Bartlemevv Aluiano remained priſoner, who receiuing a hurt in his eye, was by that misfortune half blinded with the blood of his wound, and in that araye (pitifull in a capteine of his merite) was ledde to the kings pauillion: The reſidue of tharmie being not folowed in chaſe, founde ſafetie in fleing, loaſing in all twentie peeces of great artillerie. This was the notable battell of Guiaraddada, or according to the opinion of ſome, the victorie of Vaile, which was fought the xiiij. day of Maye, and in monument of which the king cauſed to be edified in the very place where the battel was executed, a chappell, which he honored with the name of S. Maria de la victoria.

Defait of the Venetians.

Aluiano takē priſoner.

The king, with the felicitie of this victorie, not willing to corrupte by negligence the occaſion that had bene wonne with valour and fortune: marched the daye following to Caranage, where the Towne beeing ſodaynly rendred by compoſition, he battered the Caſtell with artillerie, which alſo within foure and twenty houres yeelded to diſcreſſion. abiding the comming of tharmie: where after the king had left fyftie launces and a thouſande footemen to batter the Caſtell, he aduaunced to Breſſia, but before he arriued there, the caſtel of Bergamo, after the cannon had executed a whole day, was rendred vpon condition, that Marin Georgio with the other Venetian Magiſtrates, ſhoulde be priſoners, for that the king, not ſo muche for hatred, as for hope to drawe money, had determined not to accept any compoſition of townes, by the which the gentlemen of Venice ſhould be ſaued, ſeeking to make the benefite of his warres to beare out the greateſt burden and expenſes of his armie. In all ages, tyme hath carried a power to vary and alter the humors of men, gouerning their inclinations according to occaſions that happen: the ſame beeing approued in the inhabitantes of Breſſia, in whom nowe remayned no more that auncient diſpoſition with the which their elders in the warres with P. M. Viſconte, had ſuſtayned a greeuous and great ſeege to preſerue themſelues vnder the iuriſdiction of Venice: And being nowe diſpoſed to take the yoke of the Frenche, partly for feare of their armes, and partly at the perſwaſion of the Count Ioh. Fea. de Cambara chief of the Gebelin faction: they ſeaſed vpon the gates of the towne the day after the battel, oppoſing manifeſtly againſt George Cornato, who being gone thither in great diligẽce, ſought to ſtrengthen the place with men: And beſides, the Venetian army which was very much diminiſhed in numbers, not only by the ſlaughter of the battell, but alſo for that many were gone away, as often hapneth when an armie falleth into aduerſities: they reſpected nothing, neither thauthority nor the petitiõ of Andre Gritti, who was entred into Breſſia to perſwade them to take it for their defence: therfore tharmie ſuppoſing no ſuretie in that place, marched towards Peſquiero, the citie of Breſſia yelding to the French king, & the caſtell within two days after doing the like, vnder this condition, that ſuche as were within ſhould depart in ſafetie, except the gentlemen of Venice.

Nothing is more greeuous then the reapport of an yll accident, & nothing more intollerable then when thexſpectation of things is chaunged by ſiniſter ſucceſſe: for that by howe muche the hope was likely and poſſible, by ſo much more deſperat is the euent falling in a courſe contrarie to that was exſpected. The newes of ſo great a calamitie was no ſooner vnderſtanded in the towne of Venice, then it was incredible to beholde the vniuerſall alteration that appeared: ſome afflicted with ſorrowe, but the moſt part perplexed with feare, the minds of thoſe being moſt confuſed and amaſed, who much leſſe that they had ben accuſtomed to feele ſuch aduerſities, but of the contrarie, had bene wont alwayes in other warres to carrie felicitie and victorie: and as men not accuſtomed to aduerſities haue little rule ouer their paſſions, ſo ſuche as neuer felte but proſperitie, can leaſt iudge of the worthineſſe of patience: for in this affliction they cryed out againſt heauen and earth, and accuſed iuſtely thinſtabilitie of mortall eſtate: their feare made them ſet before their eyes the loſſe of their whole dominion, with the latter ruine of their countrey and common weale, wherein their ſorrowe increaſed with the conſideration of the time ſeeming to depriue them of glory, power, and reputation, euen when they promiſed to them ſelues no leſſe then the imperie of all Italie: And in thoſe dolors and miſerable demonſtrations of minde, they ranne crying and complayning to the publike pallace, where the Elders and Senators taking counſel what to do in an aduerſitie ſo muche importing, after they had long debated with great diuerſitie of opinion, the counſell brake vp ouercomen with diſpaire: ſo weake and incertein were the remedies, and ſo ſlender the hopes of their ſafety and weldoing: Where the yll is common, there the diſcomfort is generall, nothing remayning to retayne the mindes of men but impreſſions of diſpayre and calamitie: they conſidered they had no other Captaynes nor men to imploye in their defence, then ſuche as remayned of the ouerthrowe, and in them was equall the wante of force, and diminution of courage: And for their popular multitudes, ſubiectes of their generall dominion, they ſawe them eyther inclined to rebell, or at leaſt ſo eſtranged from ſuffering, that there remained no diſpoſition to put them ſelues in further perill for their ſafetie. They behelde in the Frenche king, (no leſſe mightie for the greatneſſe and glorie of his armie, then inſolent for his late happineſſe and victorie) a reſolution to come on and followe the courſe of his fortune: They ſawe that the chaunce of the battell had made him maiſter ouer the hartes and courages of men, and giuen him commaundement ouer countreys and common weales: And if agaynſt him alone they were not hable to make reſiſtance, what would be their condition when Cæſar ſhoulde arriue, whome they vnderſtoode to be at hande, and to marche with ſpeede beeing drawne on by ſo great an occaſion: They ſawe from all partes great concurrance of daungers, with occaſions of diſpayre, and verye ſmall apparance of hope or comfort: They feared leaſt in their proper Countrey full of multitudes of men of warre, would ryſe ſome daungerous tumult, partly for a generall hatred agaynſt Gentlemen, and partly for deſire of pillage: Laſtely, in theſe contemplations of ſorrowe and calamitie, they made their myndes the very images of diſpayre, eſteeming as already hapned, all the aduerſities that their tymerous coniectures coulde imagine: Neuertheleſſe taking courage and comfort in ſo great a feare, ſuche as their preſent fortune woulde ſuffer, they determined, with the beſt diligence they coulde, to bee reconciled in what ſorte ſoeuer wyth the Pope, wyth Cæſar, and wyth the king Catholike, not looking any waye to appeaſe the mynde of the Frenche king, for that their diſpayre was no leſſe for the hate whiche he bare them, then they feared the power and mighte of hys armes. And yet omitting nothing whiche they ſuppoſed mighte miniſter to their defence, they ſtudyed to leauye treaſures and money, and gaue order to reſurniſhe and rayſe newe bandes. And for feare of the armie at ſea whiche was ſayde to bee rigged at Genes, they deuiſed to encreaſe their Nauie to fiftie galleys commaunded by Ange Treuiſan: But all their counſayles were preuented by the celeritie of the Frenche king, to whome ſince the conqueſt of Breſcia, was rendred the Citie of Cremona, the Caſtell holding good for the Venetians, whiche, notwithſtanding it was ſtrong, had followed the example of the others, together with that of Piſqueton yeelding alſo in the ſame tyme, if the king had conſented that euery one ſhould depart with ſafetie: but, for that there were within it many Gentlemen of Venice, as Zacharie Contarin, a man of great wealth and poſſeſſions, he would not receyue them but with condition to haue power ouer the Gentlemen: In which minde he ſent an armie to keepe them beſieged: And for that the Venetian armies encamping in the feelde of Mars neare Verona, and decreaſing continually, for that they of Verona would not receiue them into their towne, the king went before Peſquiero to gette the Caſtell, the towne being alreadie rendred: the battrie had not played any long time, but the footemen Svvizzers and Gaſcons entred with great furie through ſmal breaches & ruines of the wall, and making ſlaughter of almoſt foure hundred footmen whō they found at defence, they tooke priſoner the capteine of the caſtel, being likewiſe capteine of the towne, a gentleman of Venice, who by the kings cōmaundement was hanged vpon the battlements of the ſame caſtel: A cruelty which the king vſed for example ſake, that ſuche as defended the caſtell of Cremona, induced by this

punishment, might not continue in obstinacie to the extremitie: There is nothing more swift then victorie, specially where occasions are folowed, & the oportunities of times & other circumstances embrased: for the French king within fiftene dayes after the battel, had reconquered (except the castel of Cremona) all that apperteined to him by the diuision which was made at Cambray: A conquest no lesse honorable for the king, then of great commoditie for the Duchie of Millan, and augmenting the reuenues of the king to more then two hundred thousande duckets by yeare. About this tyme, albeit the armies of the king of Romains had appeared yet in no place neither in action nor showe, yet the Pope, ioyning him selfe to the fauor of the tyme, assayled the townes of Romagnia with foure hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horsemen, and eight thousande footemen, with thartillerie of the Duke of Ferrara, whom he had chosen Gonfalonier of the Churche, which is a title according to the practise of our tymes, that holdes more of dignitie then of authoritie: he recommended the charge of this armie ioyntly to Francisco de Castello de Rie Cardinall of Pauia bearing the name of the Legate Apostolike, and to Francis Maria de la Rouera, sonne to Iohn his late brother, who, being adopted for sonne by Guid. Duke of Vrbin his vncle by the mother side, the adoption also confirmed in the consistorie by the Popes authoritie, had succeeded the yeare before in the Duchie, the Duke of Vrbin beeing dead without other children. They ronne with this armie from Cesena towardes Sernia, and comming betweene Imola and Faenza, they tooke the towne of Solarola: and after they had beene certayne dayes at Bastida three myles from Faenza, they drewe to Bresiquella, whiche is the capitall towne of Val de Moue, wherein was newely entred Iohn Paule Manfron with eyght hundred footemen, and certayne horsemen: who issuing out to feight, were trayned into an ambushe, and so hoatly charged by Iohn Paule Baillon and Lodouvike de la Mirandola Capteines of the Churche armie, that as they woulde haue sought their safetie in the towne, the enemie entred Pelmell with them, and that with suche furie, that Manfron beeing felled from his horse, had scarse leasure to retyre to the Castell: afore the whiche thartillerie beeing brought and planted, the Munitions that were within were sette on fyre at the first blowe: An accident that so terrified the defendauntes within, that they rendred absolutely the place to the discression of the victor. After the whole valley was taken, the armie discended into the playne, and tooke Garanarola with all the other townes of the countrey of Faenza, and so went and encamped before Russi, whiche is a borowe situate betweene Faenza and Rauenna, but not easie to be taken, for that besides it was enuironed with very large and deepe trenches, it was defended with sixe hundred footemen forreiners: But that which made more vneasie the action of that towne, was that there was not in the Churche armie, neither that counsell, nor that concorde that was necessarie, notwithstanding it abounded in strength and forces, three thousande Svvyzzers payed by the Pope beeing there newely arryued: for which cause, albeit the Venetians were not strong in Romagnia, yet thinges had no great aduauncement on that side: onely Iohn Greeke capteine of the stradiots issuing out of Rauenna with his bands, was broken and taken prisoner by Iohn Vitelli, one of the Capteines of the Church: Lastly, after they had remayned ten daies afore Rossi, they tooke it by cõposition. And the victorie of the king hapning in the same time, the citie of Faenza, who stood now in her owne power, for that the Venetian strẽgth was now diminished, agreed to acknowledge the Pope for their Lorde, if they were not reskewed within fiftene daies: by the benefite of which conuention there issued out of Faenza vnder the fayth of the Legate, fiue hundred footmen of the Venetians, who were ſtripped by commaundement of the Duke of Vrbin: The Citie of Rauenna did the like aſſone as the armie approched. Thus, more by the reputation of the victorie of the French king, then by his proper forces, the Pope conquered in a litle time, thoſe townes which he had ſo long deſired in Romagnia, in the which as the Venetians helde no other peece then the caſtell of Rauenna, ſo, euer ſince the firſt ouerthrowing of their armie, there diſcloſed dayly againſt them newe enemies: for, the Duke of Ferrara, who till that day had not declared him ſelfe, chaſed out of Ferrara the Viſdomino, a Magiſtrate which the Venetians kept reſident there, according to the auncient conuentions, to miniſter equitie to their ſubiectes: And taking armes, he recouered without impediment Poleſina, and ſonke with Artilleries the Venetian Nauies floating vpon the ryuer of Addice. To the Marquis of Mantua were yeelded the townes of Aſola and Lunato, which the Venetians had taken in the warre they had againſt Phillip M. Viſconte, vpon Iohn Frauncis de Gonſagna his great grandfather. In Iſtria, Chriſtopher Frangipan occupied Piſinia and Diuinia: and the Duke of Brunſvvike, who by Cæſars commaundement was entred into Friul with two thouſande men trayned, tooke Feltro and Bellona: At his comming, together with the brute of the victorie of the French, Trieſta with the other townes (the conqueſt of which had bene the very welſpring and beginning of all the aduerſities to the Venetians) returned vnder thobedience of Cæſar. In like ſort the Counts of Lodron occupied certayne caſtels and borowes that were neare them, and the Biſhop of Trent vſurped Riua and Agreſta. But amid all theſe calamities and declinations of fortune, there was nothing that ſo much amaſed the Venetians ſince the battell, as the taking of the caſtell of Peſquiero, whoſe ſtrength and ſituation, with other oportunities of the place, they ſuppoſed would haue ſtayed the furie of the victor: So weake is the holde of hope where is nothing but daunger on all ſides, that the Venetians ſtanding amaſed amid ſo many perills, were fearfull that the king would paſſe further: And their condition being made ſo deſperate, that the feare that poſſeſt them, left them no libertie of counſell, together with their bandes whiche were retyred to Meſtre, (amongſt whom was neither obedience nor order) beeing reduced to a very ſmall number: They determined (and happly to ſoone) to abandon the iuriſdiction of the firme lande, to thende to haue no more enemies, and no leſſe to take from the French king all occaſions to drawe neare to Venice: for they were not without ſuſpition, that in that Citie would ryſe ſome tumult, eyther by the people that nowe were growen inſolent, or by thinnumerable multitude of ſtrangers that dwelt there: ſome for deſire of pray and pillage which makes men mutinous and diſordred, and ſome for that they would not endure their depriuation of honors, and in all things to beare ſuche a yoke of ſubiection to the Gentlemen, ſeeing they were Citizens borne by long ſucceſſion of times in libertie and freedome, and moſt of them of the ſame bloud and families: wherin in ſo great a diſpaire and loſſe of courage, this reaſon was alleaged in the Senate, that if willingly they abandoned the gouernment to eſchewe the perills preſent, they ſhould eaſily recouer it with the returne and oportunitie of a better fortune: for that the peoples and ſubiects, that willingly ſhoulde ſeparate them ſelues from them, would not make ſo ſtrong reſiſtance to returne eſtſones vnder thobedience of their auncient Lordes, as they would do if they deuided them ſelues from them by manyfeſt rebellion: for which reaſons the magnanimitie of the Venetians comming nowe to be defaced, together with the reputation of ſo glorious a common weale declining, they were content to kepe to them ſelues

the ſalt waters only, addreſſing to the Magiſtrates and officers gouerning at Padoua, Verona, and all other townes bearing intereſt to Maximilian, directions to retourne with ſpeede, and leaue the townes to the deuotion of the peoples: Beſides, to thend to obtaine peace of Maximilian vnder what cõditions ſoeuer, they ſent to him with great diligence, their Embaſſador Iuſtinian, who beeing admitted to his preſence in publike audience, ſpake very pitifully and with great humilitie and ſubmiſſion, but in vayne, for that Cæſar denyed to make any contract without the priuitie of the French king. But the better to make knowen howe muche the common weale of Venice was humbled and abated of courage, not feeling the like aduerſities in two hundred yeres before, it can not be impertinent to expreſſe heare the ſelfe Oration which their Embaſſador vttered afore Cæſar.

The oration of Anth. Iuſtinian to Cæſar.

In the auncient Philoſophers and firſt men of ciuility, it was a diſpoſition no leſſe honorable, then a iudgement equall and iuſt, to aſſure that that was the true, firme, eternall, and immortall glorie, which men got in conquering their proper affections: An action which they preferred aboue all kingdomes, triumphes, and vertues, for that in it was repreſented the very image and ſimilitude of that which they called the diuinitie in men: For this vertue Scipio caried more glory and reputation, then for al the victories he wonne againſt Affrike or Carthage: This was the reſpect for the which ages and poſterities do yet nouriſh thimmortalitie of Alexander, when Darius, ouerthrowne by him in a mightie battell, beſought God, that in caſe he had determined to diſpoſe his kingdome, he would ordeine him no other ſucceſſor then his enemie, whoſe victorie could not make him other then mercifull and gracious. Ceſar the dictator, of whom you beare the name, and communicates no leſſe in his fortunes and felicities, then in his liberalities, clemencies, and other vertues, was honored with diuine titles and glories, for that he fauored, reſpected, and pardoned: Laſtly the Senate and people of Rome, whoſe imperie in earth is onely reſembled in your perſon, as the maieſtie and greatnes hath there his perfect image, brought more peoples and prouinces vnder their ſubiection with clemencie, equitie, and mildnes, then with the rigor of Armes and warre. There is nothing more worthy then clemencie, nor any thing better beſeeming the maieſtie of a Prince, then to be eaſie to be appeaſed, and readie to forgiue, for that if it be holden iuſt & honorable to throwe downe an obſtinate enemie, it is no leſſe worthy and cõmendable to haue pitie on them that are already falne into misfortunes. In conſideration of theſe reaſons bringing iuſtification by vertue, I hope it ſhall not be the leaſt of your praiſes, if your Maieſtie, in whoſe handes ſtandes the victorie gotten ouer the Venetians, looking into the frayltie of worldly things, will vſe it with moderation and temperaunce, and encline rather to the deuiſes and ſtudies of peace, then to the doubtfull euentes of warre: For touching thinconſtancie of humaine things, how incertaine aduentures are, and howe doubtfull, howe mutable, howe deceitfull, and howe full of daungers is theſtate of men mortall. I neede not proue it by examples ſtraunge, forreine, or auncient, ſince the common weale of Venice ſtandes at this howre the true figure and repreſentation of thinfirmitie of humaine condition & kingdomes: It was not long ſince, neither leſſe mightie, leſſe floriſhing, nor leſſe renowmed, then that our name and reputation could not onely be celebrated and conteyned within the limittes of Europe, but with great pompe and magnificence, ronne throwe all Affrike and Aſia, and caried brute and terror euen to thextreme bounds of the earth: And nowe by the onely loſſe of a battell, no leſſe light and eaſie, then depriued of the prayſe and merit of armes, it is become diſpoyled of riches, deuided from ſtrength,

" defaced in renowme, ruinated of all things, and eſpecially of counſell, and ſo reuer" ſed and abated, that there remaynes nothing of our auncient vertue, but ſignes and " ſhadowes, all things beeing turned into deſolation, and nothing remayning but a

" guyle themſelues, if they make a glory of our ſpoyle, or attribute our aduerſities to " their vertue, ſince notwithſtanding we haue bene heretofore worne and trauelled
" by ſo many afflictions, waſted and conſumed with ſo many daungers and ruines, yet
" we neuer made our corage baſer then our fortune: yea euen in thoſe dangerous wars
" which we managed many yeres agaynſt the terrible enemie and tyrant of the Turks,
" of men vanquiſhed, we ſeemed victorious: And as there are no men miſerable, but " thoſe that eſteme themſelues ſo by the baſe reputation of their courage, ſo we had

" that the brute of the terrible name of your Maieſtie, together with the liuely and
" inuincible vertue of your ſouldiours, hath ſo abated the mindes of vs all, that there
" remaynes no hope, not to vanquiſhe and ouercome, no not to defende and reſiſte:
" an aduerſitie ſo lamentable to vs, that depriuing our ſelues of armes and weapons,
" we haue reappoſed the hope and remedie of our afflictions in the diuine pietie and
" clemencie of your Maieſtie, which we doubt not to finde euen in the greateſt diſ" paire of our affaires. In which reſpect aſwell on the behalfe of the Prince & Senat, as " of the people and communaltie of Venice, we pray, beſeech, and coniure you, to caſt
" the eyes of your mercy vpon our afflictions, and to cure our greeues with remedies
" of comfort and conſolation: we offer not to debate any articles of peace, but we " come accompanied with mindes to embrace all ſuche conditions as you thinke
" meete to impoſe, iudging them reaſonable, righteous, and iuſt: we are not worthy " to taxe our ſelues, or appoynt our owne rates, but vnder our free & voluntarie con-
" ſents we offer to you as true and lawfull lorde, reſtitution of all thoſe thinges which " will obey you in all your commaundementes, lawes, decrees, and impoſitions, and you

you forbeare to demaunde, our neceſſitie haſteneth vs to offer into your handes, our humilitie beeing the true interpreter of the fayth and deuotion of our mindes: we hope the extremitie of our perils wil not make vs the leſſe apt to receiue your fauors, for that he giues a greeuous ſentence agaynſt the ſtate of mans mortalitie, that denieth compaſſion to men in miſerie: And the law of honor & clemencie holdes vs ſo farre aſſured that you will not make vs reiected becauſe we are afflicted, ſince it is one cheefe office in your chriſtian pietie, to miniſter ſuccors to men in neceſſities. Compaſſion debates not cauſes and reaſons, but proceedes to the releeſe of ſuche as ſuffer and expect it then agreeing with true magnanimitie, when it miniſters comfort vpon free and liberall motions: The glory is greater to lende your hande to thoſe that are already falne, then by drawing your ſworde agaynſt your enemies, to carie the prayſe of their victorie and confuſion, the one beeing iuſt and neceſſarie, and the other a high action of charitie, which carrieth the doers into the fauor of God: if ambition and worldly inſpiration had not ſo commaunded our auncestors, that they had forborne to aſpire to the ſtates of others, our common weale might haue ſtande aduaunced aboue all the cities of Europe in glory, in nobilitie, in magnanimitie and riches, where nowe deformed altogether with infamie and reproche, it is torne and broken in a moment, and nothing remaining of ſo many honors and victories, but a perpetuall monument, ſcorne, and deriſion: And by howe muche our aduerſities are great, and our petitions lamentable, by ſo muche it concernes you in clemencie, as you are hable in power, to reeſtabliſhe the ſtate of the Venetians, an action that brings with it ſuche a reputation of name and honor, as in olde age no preſcription or antiquitie, no lawe of time, nor courſe of yeeres, ſhall be hable to wipe it out of the mindes and memories of mortall men: but as you ſhall merite with all peoples and nations the onely name of pityfull, iuſt, and pardoning, ſo for our parts, receiuing our ſafetie from your clemency, we ſhall attribute to your vertue, to your felicitie, and to your goodnes, that we liue, that we breath, or that we are reſerued to holde communitie with men.

The calamities of the Venetians made them of nothing ſo carefull, as to render thoſe peeces which ſo long they had occupied of others, their fortune giuing them at that time no better meanes either to appeaſe or aſſure their aduerſities: They ſent according to the ſame deliberation into Povvilla, to reſtore the portes to the king of Aragon, who knowing howe to enioy the frutes of other mens trauels without his owne expenſes or daunger, had diſpatched into Spayne, a ſmall Nauie at ſea, which had commaunded certayne places apperteining to thoſe cities and hauens of the ſea. They diſpatched alſo into Romagnia a publike ſecretorie, with commiſſion, to giue vp to the Pope all that they helde there, vpon condition that Iohn Paule Manfron and other priſoners might be reſtored, with libertie to drawe out their artilleries, and that the people that were within the caſtell of Rauenna ſhould departe in ſafetie: Which conditions whileſt the Pope made difficultie to accept, for that he would not diſpleaſe the confederates, the caſtell of Rauenna was rendred, the ſouldiours giuing it vp of them ſelues, notwithſtanding the Venetian ſecretarie that was entred, ſought to hinder it, for that ſuche as ſolicited for them at Rome, gaue hope that the Pope in the ende would conſent to the conditions, vnder the which they had offred reſtitution. But the Pope complayned muche that they had ſhewed a greater contumacie agaynſt him then agaynſt Cæſar or the king of Aragon: and therefore when the Venetian Cardinalls in the name of the Senate, demaunded abſolution of the Bull, as beeing due, for that they had offred reſtitution within the tearme of xxiiij. dayes, he made aunſwere, that they had not obeyed, becauſe their offer was not ſimple but ioyned to conditions limited: and for that they were admoniſhed ouer & beſides the reſtitution of the townes, to yeelde accompt of the frutes they had receyued, together with the benefits they poſſeſſed apperteining to Churches or to perſons eccleſiaſticall.

In this ſort was ouerwhelmed with a wonderfull furie, the eſtate of the common weale of Venice, one calamitie growing vpon an other, all their hopes declining, vayne and fallible, and no ſigne remayning by the which, after the loſſe of ſo great a dominion, they might hope for the preſeruation of their proper libertie. So great a ruine touched diuerſly the minds of Thitalians, of whom many receiued contentment, remembring that the Venetians, proceeding in too great ambition, without reſpect to iuſtice or obſeruation of fayth, aſpiring to all things that occaſion or oportunitie offred, had manifeſtly quarrelled the whole Monarchie of Italie, aſpiring to the vniuerſall ſubiection of all thoſe regions: things which made their names hatefull, and their gouernment intollerable by the conſideration of their naturall pride. On the other ſide, many looking without paſſion into the preſent eſtate of things, and howe wretched and fowle it were for all Italie to be brought wholly vnder the ſeruitude and yoke of ſtraungers, felt no little griefe that ſuche a maieſtie of citie, the auncient ſeate of libertie, and the very glory of Thitalian name through all the world, ſhould fall into ſuche extremitie, that ſo worthy a member ſhould be cutt of, which more then all the reſidue had bene the protector of their common glory and renowme. But aboue all ſo great a fall and declination began to be greeuous to the Pope, who doubting the powers of Cæſar and the Frenche king, deſired to alter their thoughtes from oppreſſing him, by intangling them with affayres. In whiche regarde he determined (but ſecretly) to do all he coulde that the aduerſities of the common weale of Venice ſhould haue no further courſe: And in that good diſpoſition of minde, he accepted the letters written to him in the name of the Duke of Venice, by the which he beſought him in great ſubmiſſion, to receiue the ſix Embaſſadors ſente to him of the principalles of the Senate, to ſue for pardon and abſolution. Theſe letters beeing read, with their petitions publiſhed in the conſiſtorie, he conſented to admit them, after he had ſh fewe words proteſted that it was the auncient cuſtome of the Churche, not to ſhowe it ſelfe harde or rigorous to ſuch as with repentance of their faultes, ſought for reconcilement and pardon. Thembaſſadors of the Emperour and the Frenche ſtriued what they could agaynſt it, putting him in memorie that by the confederation of Cambray, he was expreſly bounde to perſecute them with armes ſpirituall and temporall, till euery one of the confederates had recouered that which apperteined to him. To whom the Pope made aunſwere, that he had conſented to admit them, with intention not to giue them abſolution, if firſt Cæſar (who only had not recouered all) had not obteyned the things that belonged to him. This gaue ſome beginning to the hope and comfort of the Venetians, but that which aſſured them moſt in their lateſt feares, was the reſolution of the French king, to obſerue ſimply and in good fidelitie, the capitulation which he had made with Cæſar: and hauing reconquered all that was his, to paſſe no further with his armie, nor breake his limittes: And therefore albeit it was in his power after he had taken Peſquiero, not onely to accept Verona, which had ſent Embaſſadors to yeelde to him, but alſo to occupie Padoa without any impediment, together with all the other townes abandoned by the Venetians: yet he would in any ſort that the Embaſſadors of Verona ſhould preſent the keyes of their towne to thembaſſadors

dors of Cæſar whiche were in his armie, and for that cauſe he ſtayed with all his campe at Peſquiera, which he retayned for himſelfe for the commoditie of the place, notwithſtanding it apperteined to the Marquis of Mantua, who durſt not refuſe it to the king, leauing to him the reuenues of the towne, with promiſe of recompence. At the ſame time the king had alſo by accorde the caſtell of Cremona, vnder condition that all the ſouldiours ſhould depart with goodes and lyfe ſaued, except ſuch as were his ſubiectes, and that the gentlemen of Venice ſhould remayne his priſoners, to whom he gaue his fayth for their ſafetie. Vincenſa & Padoa followed the example of Verona, as alſo other townes, except the citie of Treuiſa, which being abandoned by the Magiſtrates and ſouldiours of Venice, had runne alſo that courſe, if Cæſar had ſent thither neuer ſo ſmall a force, or at the leaſt any perſonage of authoritie: But Leon. De Dreſſino one of the exiles of Vincenſa, went thither to receiue it without ſtrength or armes, and without any maieſtie of imperie, receiuing Padoa in the like ſort: and beeing entred and admitted, the exiles of the ſame citie newly reſtored by the Venetians, for which benefite they were become faythfull louers of their name, began to drawe into tumult, by whoſe example the people of no leſſe affection to the gouernment of Venice, roaſe and conſpired with one called Marke ſhoemaker, publiſhing himſelfe chiefe, and with great cryes and cõcourſe of the commons, carying into the principall places the banners of the Venetians, they cryed with one voyce, S. Marke, aſſuring that they would acknowledge no other Emperour nor Lorde. To this action was muche helping and concurrant an Embaſſador of the king of Hungarie, who in his way to Venice, paſſing by Treuiſa, and beeing throwne happily into this tumult, perſwaded the inhabitantes not to rebell: In ſo much that after they had chaſed out Dreſsina, and put into the citie ſeuen hundred footemen of the Venetians, the armie alſo entring a little after, whiche was nowe increaſed with bandes of footemen comming from Slauonia, with the remaynders of the armie, returned from Romagnia, hauing an intention to encampe in ſome ſtrong place betwene Margueta and Meſtra: They fortified the towne in great diligence, and made their horſemen skoure the places of the countrey thereaboutes, procuring from all partes great releefe of vittels, aſwell for the neceſſitie of that citie, as for the vſe of the towne of Venice, wherein they gathered great quantities from all ſides, ioyning an incredible diligence to the ſodayne fauours which their fortune ſeemed to recomfort them withall. The principall occaſion of this accident, & to confirme in the Venetians a hope to reteine yet ſome parte of their dominion, together with many other great aduentures that followed, was the negligence and diſordred gouernment of Cæſar, of whom in ſo great a courſe of victorie there was heard no other thing then his name, notwithſtanding by the meane of the French armes, and for their feare, ſo many townes had bene rendred to him, which was very eaſie for him to keepe: Onely, after the confederation made at Cambray, he occupied certayne time in Flaunders, to leauye of the people a loane of money to furniſhe his warres, which he had no ſooner got into his poſſeſſion, then, according to his cuſtome, he ſpent it vnprofitably: And albeit at his departing from Macklin with all pompes and ceremonies imperiall, and beeing come very neare to Italie, he made publication that he woulde beginne the warre at the tearme appoynted to him in the capitulation: yet beeing oppreſſed with his accuſtomed difficulties and confuſions, he aduaunced no further, notwithſtanding the Pope egde him with great importunities, for the feare he had of the French armes: wherein to giue him a more lyſe to thenterpriſe, and to make him no leſſe hable to thaction, he ſent to him by

Conſtantin of Macedina fiftie thouſande duckets, conſenting withall to the hundred thouſande duckets which had bene leauyed certayne yeres afore in Germanie, and reſerued to make warre vpon the infidels: Beſides all this, he had receyued of the French king, an hundred thouſande duckets for thinueſtiture of the duchie of Millan, and was aduertiſed of the fortune of the battell of Vailo as he drewe neare to Iſpurch: and notwithſtanding he diſpatched with great diligence the Duke of Brunſvvike to recouer Friul, yet he moued not (as in ſuche a concurrance of occaſions had bene conuenient) for want of money (the taxes whiche he had impoſed and drawne from ſo many places not beeing hable to ſuffice his prodigalities:) At laſte he arriued at Trente, from whence writing letters congratulatorie to the king, he gaue many thanks that by his meane he had recouered his townes: and aſſured him, that the better to expreſſe the good will he bare to the king, and withall to wype out all memories of offences paſt, he had cauſed to be burned a booke which was kept at Spires, conteining an authentike regiſter of all the iniuries which the French kings in times paſt had done to thempire and nation of Germanie, confeſſing that ſince the king had accompanied his promiſe with ſuche honor and fidelitie, that he could do no leſſe in common office, then for his part to diſſolue all remẽbrances of things that might miniſter occaſions to be vnthankfull to ſo great an affection. The Cardinall of Amboyſe came to him to Trent the thirtenth day of Iune, to communicate of their common affaires, who beeing receyued with demonſtrations well teſtifying the amitie he bare to his king, promiſed him on the kings behalfe, a ſuccor of fiftie launces. In ſo muche that after they had with great agreement giuen directions for other affayres, it was reſolued that Cæſar and the king ſhould ſpeake together in plaine feeld neare the towne of Gard, vpon the Marches of both the one and others countreys: For which cauſe the Frenche king prepared to be there at the day appoynted, and Cæſar, in the ſame regarde came to Riua de Trente, bringing in neither of their mindes any ſuſpition, the one allured by good experience of benefite and fidelitie, and the other aſſured by the conſideration of the ſame. But ſuche are the variations of Princes, and their ordinarie ſubiection to ſuſpitions and ielouſies, that themprour, after he had bene there onely two houres, returned immediatly to Trenta, ſignifying to the French king, that by occaſion of new accidents hapned at Friul, he was conſtrayned to departe ſodenly, deſiring him to ſtay at Cremona, till he returned to giue perfection to the enterview determined. This varietie (if notwithſtanding it be poſſible in a Prince ſo inconſtant to finde out the truth) many attributed to his credulitie & lightnes of beleſe, ſome men blowing into his eares ſomething that made him enter into ſuſpition: Others made this thoccaſion, that hauing ſo ſmall a Court, accompanied with a trayne ill appoynted, he thought he coulde not preſent himſelfe with that dignitie and reputation, as might holde compariſon with the pompe and greatnes of the French king: who for his part deſiring to diſſolue his armie to be deliuered of ſo great a burden, & no leſſe to returne with ſpede into Fraunce, tooke his way to Millan, not tarying for themperours ſignification, notwithſtanding the biſhop of Gurce, whom themperour had ſent for that effect, following him euen to Cremona, ſolicited him muche to tarrie, making promiſe that without all exceptions themperour would returne. The diſcamping of the armie and perſon of the French king from the confines of Cæſar, diminiſhed greatly the reputation of his affayres: And yet albeit he was accompanied with ſuche multitudes of men, that he might eaſily refurniſh Padoa and the other townes, yet he forbare to ſende garriſon thither, either for thinconſtancie of his nature, or that he thought thoughte afore hande to sette vppon some other enterprise: or lastely that he interpreted it more to hys honour to discende into Italie wyth a greater armie: And whiche more is, he pretended (as thoughe the former actions had had their due perfection) that together wyth the ioynt forces of the whole confederates, they should assayle the Citie of Venice: A matter very plausible to the French king, but greeuous to the Pope, and no lesse impugned with open reasons by the king of Aragon.

About this tyme, the Florentins put their laste hande to the warres agaynst the Pisans: for after they had cutte off all succours and entrie of graynes into Pisa, they leauyed newe bandes, to thende by aduauncing all thindustrie they coulde, to choake all their course of vittelles bothe by sea and lande: A matter that was subiect to difficultie for the neighborhood of the countrey of the Lucquois, who when they coulde secretly doo it, obserued wyth a verye negligent fayth their accorde newly made with the Florentins: the necessities of their neighbours preuayling aboue the bonde of their promise, othe, or fidelitie. But notwithstanding the secrete succours of those good neighbours, the wante of vittayles more and more encreased within Pisa: an affliction aboue all others leaste tollerable, and most contrarie to the kinde of man, expressing in that aduersitie a peculiar frayltie. The souldiours of the playne countrey could not endure it, which made those principalls of the Citizens, in whose handes rested al publike resolutions, being followed with the greatest part of the youth of the Citie, the better to loll the countrey souldiours with deuises accustomed, to introduce by the meane of the Lorde of Plombin, a practise of accorde with the Florentins: An action wherein were artificially consumed many dayes, and for whiche the Florentins sent to Plombin, Nicholas Machiauel their secretorie, the Pisans electing for Embassadors both Citizens and countrey men. It was very harde to enclose Pisa, for that it stoode in a felden large, and full of dytches and marris, neyther coulde the entry of vittelles be hindred by any easie meane, speciallye by nighte, bothe for the faythfull industrie of the Lucquois to refurnishe them, and the desperate myndes of the Pysans, refusing no perill wherein was anye oportunitie of prouision: But to ouercome those difficulties, the Florentine Capteines determined to deuide their armie into three partes, bestowing one parte at Messana withoute the gate of Plagei, the seconde at Saint Peter de Rene and Saint Iames ouer agaynst the gate of Lucquay, and the thirde was appoynted to the auncient Temple of Saint Peter d'ingrado, standing betweene Pisa and the mouth of Arna: In euery campe, beeing well fortified, they bestowed a thousande footemen, with conuenient numbers of horsemen: And to let that none shoulde passe ouer the mountaynes by the waye of the vale of Osola, whiche leadeth to the mount Saint Iulian, they buylded towardes the great hospitall, a Bastillion capable of two hundred and fyftie footemen: By these impedimentes the Pisans fell more and more into want of vittelles, who seeking to gette by pollicie that whiche they dispayred to obtayne by force, deuised that Alphonso Mutulo a young man of Pisa, but of base condition, who beeing aforetyme taken prisoner by the Florentin souldiours, and receiuing many pleasures of his keeper, shoulde offer to bee thinstrument to make them surprise the gate that goeth to Lucquay: Their deuise bare this meaning, that at the same tyme that the campe whiche was at Saint Iames shoulde go by nighte to execute thenterprise, they woulde not onely oppresse it when one parte was entred, but also woulde charge the other campes of the Florentines, whiche according to the reſolution, were to approache more neare the Citie: but for that they made not their approche raſhely nor in diſorder, the Piſans wonne no other thing by this practiſe, but the lyues of certayne particulars, who at the ſigne giuen were come to the firſt gate, thinking to enter the Citie, amongſt whom was ſlayne with a ſhotte Paule de Parana captayne of a companie of lighte horſemen to the Florentins, and Canaio de Pratovechio, to whome Alphonſo Mutulo had bene priſoner, and vnder his aſſuraunce had managed the practiſe. This hope being thus diſappoynted, and verye ſmall quantities of corne entring into Piſa, and that to the great daunger of ſuche as carried it, the Florentins withall not ſuffering that the vnprofitable mouthes ſhoulde departe out of Piſa vexing them with many aduerſities, thinges neceſſarie for the lyfe of man were boughte at deare rates, yea many periſhed by famine, for that there coulde not enter a proportion to ſuffice the generall numbers: An affliction more lamentable then anye other that the courſe of warre draweth with it: And yet thoſe neceſſities were ſurmounted by the obſtinacie of thoſe Citizens whiche were magiſtrates and principalles in the gouernment, who diſpoſed to beholde rather the extreme ruine of their countrey, then to yeelde to ſo horrible a neceſſitie, deferred from daye to daye to negociate or conſulte, entertayning as well as they coulde the commons, ſometymes with one hope, ſometymes with an other, but ſpecially with this, that ſince there was exſpectation of the comming of Cæſar into Italie, the Florentins would bee conſtrayned to retyre from their walles. But one parte of the countrey men with ſuch as had bene at Plombin where they ſawe into their intentions, drew into conſpiracie, and conſtrayned them to introduce newe conſultations with the Florentins, whiche beeing followed wyth Alaman Saluiat commaunder of that parte of tharmie whiche laye at Saint Peter d'ingrado, after many diſputinges (the principalles oppoſing many impedimentes) were at laſte reſolued and concluded. Thaccorde was made with conditions very fauourable for the Piſans, ſeeing that not onely all their faultes bothe publike and priuate were pardoned, but alſo many exemptions accorded, beeing alſo abſolued from all reſtitution of moueable goodes whiche they had rauiſhed from the Florentins at the tyme when they rebelled: So great was the deſire of the Florentins to repoſſeſſe it, and ſo great their feare leaſt themperour (naming the Piſans in the league of Cambray) or from ſome other parte, there hapned no impediment vnlooked for: And albeit they were well aſſured that the Piſans woulde bee conſtrayned within fewe dayes to giue place to hunger, yet they ſought rather to aſſure the Towne with harde conditions, then to obteine it without conuention, to put anye parte of the certayntie in the power of fortune, holding it more honorable to winne peace by pardoning offences, then to publiſhe their bloudy deſires by thextreme execution of warre. This accorde beeing begonne to be negociated in the campe, was afterwarde tranſlated and concluded at Florence by thembaſſadors of the Piſans: An action wherein the fayth of the Florentins is worthy of memorie, who notwithſtanding their iuſt hatreds prouoked by ſo many iniuries, were no leſſe conſtant to obſerue things promiſed, then eaſie and tractable to thagreement.

Piſa rendred to the Florentins.

The king of Romains (no doubt) receiued a great diſpleaſure by the rendring of the Piſans, for that he was perſwaded, that eyther the demayne of that Citie mighte ſerue him to manye occaſions, or els by according it to the Florentins, he ſhoulde drawe from them a great quantitie of money, for wante whereof he lette ſlipp and loſte many fayre occaſions that were offred to him without his paynes and induſtrie induſtrie. But whyleſt he ſtoode ſo negligent in oportunities offred, that neyther at Vincenſa nor at Padoa was almoſte anye ſouldiours for him, and whyleſt withall hys delayes abated thaffection of the inhabitantes of townes, hym ſelfe wandring with a verye ſmall companie, ſometymes to one place, ſometymes to an other: The Venetians forgatte not to followe the fauour of the tyme, and taking thaduauntage of hys negligence, they embraſed all opportunities that offred to recouer Padoa, whereunto they were induced by many reaſons: for the reteyning of Treuiſa made them knowe, howe vnprofitable it was to them, with a counſell ſo raſhe and preiudiciall, to abandon ſo ſoone the dominion of the firme lande, the lingring preparations of themperour beeing the cauſe that they helde hym in leſſe feare dayly: Beſides, they were not a little moued, for that ſeeking to bring to Venice the reuenues of the landes which diuerſe particulars of the towne of Venice helde in the countrey of Padoa, thoſe of Padoa made manyfeſt reſiſtance: In ſo muche that the diſdaynes of certayne particulars beeing ioyned to a publike profite, concurring withall the weake prouidence and furniſhmentes of ſouldiours at Padoa, together with the conſideration of thinſolencies whiche the Gentlemen of Padoa vſed towards the populars, and many remembring the eaſie and moderate gouernment of the Venetians, beginning eftſones to deſire their auncient yoke: they determined to make an attempt to recouer it, wherein they were aſſiſted with this ready occaſion, that thoſe of the playne countrey of Padoa ſtoode yet at their deuotion. They deuiſed that Andrewe Gritti one of their Commaunders, leauing behinde the campe, wherein were foure hundred men at armes, more then two thouſande light horſemen, and fiue thouſande footemen, ſhoulde go to Noualo vppon the frontiers of Padoa, and taking in his waye a parte of thoſe footebands, which, with many trowpes of paiſantes were ſent to the village of Mirana, he ſhoulde drawe towards Padoa to aſſayle the gate of Codalonga: And the more to terrifie ſuch as were within, they gaue directions at the ſame time, that two thouſande of the popular ſouldiours, with three hundred footemen and certaine horſemen, ſhould execute vpon the bulwarke of the water ſtanding in the contrary part of the citie: And laſtly, the better to couer this enterpriſe, Chriſto. Moro the other cõmaunder, was likewiſe appoynted to encampe afore the towne of Citaaella: The directions and plots of this enterpriſe were no leſſe well layed and obſerued, then the iſſue happie, for that the footmen arriuing at full dayes, found the gate of Codalonga halfe open, certayne payſantes a litle before beeing entred by chaunce with cartes loaden with haye: In ſo muche, as commaunding the gate without any great difficultie, and exſpecting without any noyſe the comming of their other ſtrength whiche was at hand, their fortune did not only carry them into the towne, but alſo almoſt to the market place, afore the Citie, which conteines a long circuite, and is not much peopled, was touched with any aduertiſement of thaccident, the feare of the Citizens helping no leſſe to aduaunce the enterpriſe, then the ſecrete induſtrie or valour of the Venetians. The knight la Volpe marched firſt with hys light horſemen, together with Zirolo de Perouſa & Lactance de Bergamo, with one part of the footmen: And the alarme being come to the Citadel, Dreſtina gouernor of Padoa for Maximilian, prepared himſelf to ſailly out with three hundred Almain footmen which he had there only for his garde: the like did Brunault de Serge with fiftie horſmen, who ſuſteining the furie of the enemies, exſpected that the gentlemen of Padoa fauourers of th*Almains* would take armes with thē: But that hope was vaine with all the reſidue, for that in the Citie falne into this ſurpriſe and ſodayne oppreſſion of tumult, was founde no diſpoſition of reſiſtaunce, eſpecially many bandes of thenemie being entred and gouerning thoſe partes of the towne, wherein laye their chiefeſt protection: In ſo muche as ſtanding thus abandoned of fortune and hope, they were conſtrayned, with the loſſe of many of their men, to retyre with ſpeede into the caſtell and Cytadell, and they but weakly manned, were by the neceſſitie of the preſent perill, yeelded to diſcreſſion within a fewe howres after, they beeing no leſſe vnhable to repulſe a violence offred, then they were negligent to foreſee it afore it hapned. By this meane, the Venetians being eftſones made Lordes of the whole, labored to appeaſe the tumult, and ſaue the Citie, whereof the greateſt parte, by the inſolencies of the others, were ranged to their deuotion, nothing receyuing ſpoyle or harme, but certayne houſes and ſtoare places of the Ievves, whiche were afore declared enemies to the name of the Venetians. This accident hapned the daye of S. Marina, a daye ſolemnly celebrated at Venice by publike decree, as a firſte daye of their felicitie, and beginning of the reſtoring of their common weale. The brute of this victorie dyd muche to moue the whole countrey thereaboutes, whiche had found imitation in Vincenſa, if Conſtantin de Macedonia had not entred with a very ſmall ſtrength: But as there is no worldly thing more mightie then the courſe of fortune, ſo by the felicitie of this conqueſt, the Venetians became with a preſent diligence, maiſters of the whole countrey, the commons of townes and popular multitudes ioyning fauor to the felicitie that folowed thē. They recouered by this meane the towne and caſtelles of Leguagno, a place of great conueniencie to trouble the countreys of Verona, Padoa, and Vincenſa: They made attempt alſo to take the tower Marquiſano within eight miles of Padoa, a paſſage of ſingular oportunity to diſtreſſe the countrey of Mantua, but by the reskewes which the Cardinall of Eſte ſent, their enterpriſe was defeated.

It was thought that the taking of Padoa did nothing ſtay the French king from returning beyond the Mountes, and as he was vpon his diſcamping, he made in the towne of Biagraſſe newe conuentions with the Popes Legat, by the which the Pope and the king bound eche other to a mutuall protection, with libertie that either of them might contract with any other Prince, ſo farre forth as it was not preiudiciall to the preſent confederation: The king promiſed not to holde in his protection, nor to accept into the ſame hereafter, any ſubiect, homager, or dependant, eyther directly or indirectly of the Churche, cancelling expreſly all articles of protection vntill that daye: A promiſe not muche agreable to the honour of ſo great a king, for that a little before he had taken into his protection the Duke of Ferrara, for a conſideration of thirtie thouſande duckets: beſides, it was agreed that the Pope ſhoulde diſpoſe by his diſcreſſion the Biſhoprikes that then were voyde in all the landes of the kings obedience, but for ſuche as ſhoulde fall voyde within a certayne tyme, they ſhoulde be at the nomination of the king, for whoſe better ſatiſfaction, the Pope ſent the Bulles of Cardinalſhippe to the Biſhop of Alby, promiſing to indue him with the Hatte aſſone as he came to Rome. Immediatly vppon the concluſion of this contract the king haſted out of Italie, carrying with him into Fraunce no ſmall glory for ſo great a victorie gotten, with ſo ſwift a courſe vpon the Venetians: And yet he caried home by this victorie, neyther the more tranquillitie of mind, nor greater aſſurance for his affayres: A matter that often hapneth, that in things obteined, after they haue bene long deſired, men finde neither that contentment, nor that pleaſure which they imagined before: yea men might diſcerne matter prepared to greater daungers and innouations, together with a manifeſt incer-tie of his minde, by the deliberations he had to make by reaſon of thoſe accidentes newely hapned: for, if thinges had good ſucceſſe with the king of Romains, his feare was farre greater of him then of the Venetians: And if the greatnes of the Venetians beganne eftſones to be readreſſed, he muſte be conſtrayned to dwell in continuall ſuſpitions and expences, to keepe the things he had taken from them: beſides, he muſt needes contribute to Maximilian bothe in men and money, for that in abandoning him, he was to feare leaſt he would knitte with the Venetians agaynſt him, and withall, leaſt the king Catholike would not be of the faction, and happly the Pope: Beſides, meane aydes and ſuccors would not ſuffice to interteine him in amitie with Cæſar, to whome he muſt miniſter ſo liberally, as by them he might obteine the victorie agaynſt the Venetians: and on the other ſide, if he ſent him ſtrong and hable ſuccors, beſides that it coulde not but drawe with it intollerable expences and harmes, yet he confirmed his owne daungers touching the greatnes of Cæſar: The king waighing theſtate of theſe difficulties, ſtoode in the beginning in doubt touching the mutation of Padoa, whether he ſhould holde it agreable or troubleſome: But conferring the ſuretie which the depriuation of the firme land frō the Venetians might bring to him, with the perplexities and daungers which he feared to ſuffer by the greatnes of Cæſar, and with hope to obtayne of him by money in regarde of his neceſſities, the citie of Verona, which he deſired muche, as a place of ſinguler oportunitie to ſuppreſſe the mouinges on the ſide of Germanie: he iudged it at laſt more to his profite and ſuretie, to haue things remayne in that eſtate, then, for that there was great apparance of a long warre betweene Cæſar and the Venetians, both the one and other beeing made wearie by ſo continuall expenſes, would become more weake. In this nature of opinion he ſtoode better confirmed, when he had contracted with the Pope, with whom he hoped to haue a confederation well aſſured and reſolued: And yet he left vppon the limittes of Verona, Monſr de Paliſſa with ſeuen hundred launces to be diſpoſed by Cæſar, no leſſe for the preſeruation of things gotten, thē to obteine that which the Venetians ſtil poſſeſſed, And becauſe by the commaundement of Cæſar, they being conueyed into Vincenſa, the citie of Verona was aſſured, which was in great daunger and ſuſpicion for the ſmall numbers of men of warre that were within it: and by that meane the Venetian armie which lay encamped before the Citadell, was retyred.

After the kings departure, this good aduenture fell alſo to the Venetians: Their horſmen which were within Leguagna, made continuall incurſions ouer the whole countrey euen to the gates of Verona, doing many violences and harmes of warre, agaynſt whom the garriſon of Verona could make no great reſiſtance, being but two hundred horſmen, & ſeuen hundred footmen: by reaſon wherof the Biſhop of Trent, whom Cæſar had appoynted gouernour ouer it, determined to plant his campe there, and for the better execution, he called to thaction the Marquis of Mantua, who expecting the preparations that were in hande, laye incamped with thoſe bandes whiche the French king had giuen him, in the yle of Eſcalo, a great paſſage vpon the countrey of Verona, neither inuironed with walles, nor made ſtrong with other fortifications: But whyleſt he laye there without iealouſie or doubte of anye thing, he ſerued as a notable example to all Capteines, howe muche it importes them in all tymes and all places to bee vigilant, and ſo manage their affayres with care and induſtrie, that they maye haue confidence in their proper forces, without reappoſing in this vayne imagination, that eyther their enemies bee farre of, or that by an opinion of their weakneſſe they maye thinke their eſtate to ſtande in more ſecuritie: for, as the Marquis had couenaunted with certaine eſtradiots of the Venetian armie to come to him in that place to take his paye and followe his enſigne, who from the beginning of the conference had manifeſtly communicated the deuiſe with their capteines: And as the capteines, vpon this occaſion had ordeined to aſſayle him vnprouided: So Luke Maluezzo with two hundred light horſmen, and Zitolo de Peroufa with eight hundred footemen, whiche were ſecretly come from Padoa to Leguagno, beeing ioyned to the bands which were within, and fiftene hundred men of the countrey, and ſending before certayn horſemen, who cried Turko, Turko, (that was the Marquis name) making as though they were thoſe eſtradiots that were exſpected: they conueyed them ſelues in the peepe of the daye without that there was any doubt made, to the yle of Eſcalo the ſame morning that was appoynted, where, finding no reſiſtance they entred, and finding all the ſouldiours without gard and ſuche as followed the perſon of the Marquis ſleeping in their owne negligence, they put them to the ſpoyle, and tooke priſoner amongſt others, Monſr de Boyſſi lieftenant to the Marquis, and nephew to the Cardinall Amboyſe. The Marquis vnderſtanding thalarme, leaped naked out at a windowe, and hidde himſelfe in a tuffe of corne: but he was diſcouered to thenemies by a paiſant of the ſame place, who reſpecting more theſtate of the Venetiãs, thẽ his particular profit, made as though he would ſaue the Marquis for the offers he made, but did the contrarie: for that the Marquis not hable to lye hidden in ſo yll a fortune, was preſented afore the generall, and ſo ledde to Venice, and there put priſoner in the litle tower of the publike pallace, to the wonderful reioyſing of euery one.

Cæſar till this day had giuen no impediment, nor medled to hinder the proceedings of the Venetians, for that he had not yet leauyed a force ſufficient to put him ſelfe in the feelde: He was hardly beſtead many dayes in the mountaine of Vincenſe, where the countrey men bearing deuotion to the Venetian name, and reappoſing muche in the difficulties of the place, were drawne into manifeſt rebellion agaynſt him: And after Padoa was recobtayned by the Venetians, he diſcended into the plaines, where beeing encountred with multitudes of the mountaine men and payſantes in a paſſage of good ſituation and ſtrength, his caſe was in no little perill: But after his valour and pollicie had remoued the daungers that were oppoſed, and by their proper diſorder had put the mountayne men to the chaſe, he came to Eſcalo vpon the frontier Vincentin, where the Venetian armie had recouered a great part of the countrey of Vincenſe, and taken Seranallo, a paſſage of importance, where they executed many cruelties vpon the Almains, which was recompenſed with like example of ſlaughter by Maximilian vpon the Italian footmen and mountayne men, winning vpon them the paſſage not many dayes after: A matter which ought not " to finde ſo ready imitation amongſt Chriſtians, notwithſtanding the lawes of armes " are full of ſeuerities, for that in actions of reuenge the vertue is greater to pardon,
" then to puniſhe, and to a Prince by ſo muche more honorable is his victorie, by
" howe muche he vſeth his clemencie aboue his iuſtice: But as yet his forces beeing not ſo great as the neceſſitie of his affayres required, he occupied the time in ſmall enterpriſes, ſometimes beſieging this borough, and ſometime that paſſage, with very litle honor and reputation for the name imperiall: and as alwayes his conceptions were farre greater then his forces or occaſions, ſo he ſolicited at the ſame time with the confederates the vnion of all their forces, to make an action vpon the citie of Venice, making his commoditie, ouer and aboue the preparations by lande, of the ſea armies of the French king, the king of Aragon and the galleys of the Pope beeing

at that time cõioyned and assembled into one Nauye: To which demaũd, notwithstanding no mencion was made in the confederacion of Cambray, the French had cõsented, if the condicions had bene such, as the benefit of the conquest had turned to a common profitte: so readye is thinclination of Princes to embrace enterprises which depend vpon benefit: But it was a thing greeuous to the Pope, with whom, both then and at other times when it was commoned vpon more amplie, the king of Aragon ioyned to deteste it for that it seemed to bring particular profitte to the French, vsing this cooller that it was both vniust and dishoneste.

The calamities of warre are hardly lymited, and lesse seldome conteyned in one place certeine, for whileste the contreys of Padoa, Vincensa, and Verona, suffred these tormentes by the armies of th Almains and Italyans, the contrey of Fryul and those places which were for the Venetians in Istria, were afflicted with more miserable persecutions and ruines: for that the Prince of Hanau being entred by Cæsars direction into the contrey of Fryul with ten thousand men trayned, after he had attempted in vaine to take Montfalcon, caryed by force the towne and castell of Cadore, with a pityfull execucion and boucherie of those that defended it: And on the other syde, certeine light horsemen and footebandes of the Venetains folowed with many of the contrey men, tooke by force the towne of Valdisera, and by accord, the towne of Bellona, where was no garrison for th Almains. The Duke of Brunsvvik, whom themperour had likewise sent thether, being repulsed at Vdnia the principall towne of Fryul, was marched to Ciuital d'Austrich, a towne situat in a high place vpon the ryuer of Natisona, where Federik Contarino laye in garrison with a verye small companie, reapposing much in the forces of the people who had myndes well resolued to defend them selues: to his succors, as Ioh. P. Gradiuio Magistrat of Fryul was cõming with eight hundred horsemen and fyue hundred footemen, he was put to flight by certeine bandes of th Almains: And yet, notwithstanding they had shaked Cyuitall with their artillery, they could not cary it, neither with the furious assalts which they gaue, nor with the rumor they spred that they had defeated the succors that came to reskew them, so great a resolution dothe the defence of libertie, aboue all other respects, breede in the mynde of men: In Istria, Christopher Frangypan defeated nere the borough of Vermes, the cõmissaries of the Venetians accõpained with the bãdes & soldiours of the contrey: A successe that put into his handes the new castell & the towne of Raspruch, to the great terrifying of the whole contrey with the domages, ruines, and burnings that he made: In this perill the Venetians sent thether Angeo Treuisan capteine of their sea armie, with sixtene gallies, who taking vpon his ariuall the towne of Fiumo, addrest himselfe to occupie the towne of Triesto: But the successe falling contrarye to thexspectacion of thaduenture, he torned his strength to Raspruch, and recouered it by force, and afterwards retyred with his gallyes to Venice, Fryul and Istria remeyning in a pityfull estate, for that some tymes the Venetians cõmaunding, and sometimes th Almains preuailing, those townes which the one parte had taken and sacked, being eftsoones recouered & prayed vpon by the other, there was no action which tended not to the ruine of the miserable contrey, wherein the lyues and goods of men being in continuall pillage, the frutes and welth of the contrey were horribly wasted by all those sorts of oppressions which so bluddye a warre may draw with it.

During those accidents of temporall armes, there was disputation at Rome touching spirituall armes, six Embassadors of Venice (since the reobteyning of Padoa) being gon thether in habyt and show miserable: for where affore they were wont to come in with great pompe and magnificence, and receiued with a reuerence of the whole Court: nowe, muche leſſe that they were followed or accompanied, ſeeing they were not admitted to enter but by night: Suche was the pleaſure of the Pope, who denying them the preſence of his face, referred them to negociate in the houſe of the Cardinall of Naples with him and the other Cardinalles and Prelates appoynted, thembaſſadors of Cæſar, the Frenche, and Spaniſhe hindring as muche as they could that they ſhoulde not obtayne thabſolution of the Churche paynes, and of the contrarie a Biſhop of Englande whom the king of that Nation, Henry the eight had ſent thither in their fauor, ſoliciting manifeſtly for them with all the labours and deuiſes he could vſe: So full of quarrell is aduerſitie, and ſo infinite is the malice of the worlde, that to him that is ouerthrowne there are fewe that will lende their handes to helpe him vp agayne, and to ſuch as are in wealth and fauor, euery one ſtudieth to caſt ſtumbling blocks to make them fall.

But about this time, an exſpectation of farre greater things occupied the mindes of euery one, for that as Cæſar on the one ſide leauying all the power he was hable of him ſelfe, with ſuche as he could gather of his aydors and friendes, prepared to beſiege Padoa with a puiſſant armie: ſo the Venetians on the other ſide, iudging their vniuerſall ſafetie to conſiſt in the defence of the ſame Citie, labored to ſtrengthen it with all prouiſions neceſſarie for their defence: They cauſed to enter, beſides the bands appoynted for the garde of Treuiſa, their whole armie, with all the forces they coulde gather from all partes: they conueyed thither infinite numbers of all ſortes of artilleries, and all prouiſions of vittelles, ſufficient to nouriſhe them for many monethes, and refurniſhed the towne with proportions of laborers, workemen, and artificers, by whoſe helpe they made many mountes, and ſluces of wood and yron, to thende they ſhould not be depriued of the water that was brought to Padoa. And albeit the prouiſions and munitions were ſuche as greater could not be deſired, yet in an action of ſo great importance, the care, diligence, and induſtrie of the Senate were incredible, omitting no oportunitie wherin occaſion was giuen to reconquet their loſſes, and defende their libertie that remayned: They ſet before their eyes the conſideration of all things that they iudged to be eyther neceſſarie or profitable, and brought into iudgement all accidentes that eyther feare, perill, or coniecture could deuiſe, wherin as they were in open conference of things, in open counſell, Leonard Loredan their duke, a man muche reſpected for his age, and of no leſſe reputation for the dignitie of his place whereunto he was called many yeres before, reaſoned at large in this maner.

In caſes of aduerſities, more doth it hurt to be doubtfull in counſel and wandring, then the multitude of ylles that can happen, for that when perill and daunger be at hand, it is to late to turne confidence into feare, and leſſe declaration of vertue to be deſperat in chaunces, ſeeing there is no accident that hapneth which comes not accompanied with his proper remedie: And as follie and raſhnes haue no ſocietie with wiſedome, nor fortune any communitie with good counſell: ſo when the laſt neceſſitie haſteneth, to liue in coniectures, is to drawe on the yll that threatneth, and to be irreſolute, is not to temper fortune, but to tempt her. I feare nothing leſſe in you then want of wiſdome and valour, for that in mindes ſo well inſtructed, the reſpectes to common honor and libertie can not but be farre aboue the conſiderations of our preſent myſeries and fortune. But I wiſhe by the way of warning, that we be not too muche amaſed in the contemplation of our calamities, nor more fearefull of harmes that are yet but in ſhowes and ſhadowes, then mindfull to forſee that that they reſolue not to bodies, and happen through our proper negligence and weaknes. If it be true (right worthy Senators) that not onely the hope we haue to recouer our dominion, conſiſtes in the well defending of Padoa, but alſo all thexpectation that remaynes to maynteine our vniuerſall libertie: And if on the contrarie, it be moſt certayne, that of the loſſe of Padoa will diſcende the laſt deſolation of our countrey, we muſt neceſſarily graunt, that the prouiſions and preparations whiche hithervnto we haue made, notwithſtanding they were great, haue not yet bene ſufficient, eyther for that that apperteineth to the ſuretie of that Citie, nor for that which reſpecteth the dignitie of our common weale: for in an action of ſuch danger and importance, it ſufficeth not ſo to order things, as there may be a bare hope of the defending of Padoa, but we muſt ſo prouide that with all our forces there may be ſuche concurrance of all diligence and induſtrie poſſible to the wit of men, that it may ſtande aſſured agaynſt all the accidentes of fortune, who beeing mightie ouer all the things of the world, hath yet her greateſt power ouer thactions of warre: It is not a reſolution worthy the ancient glory of the Venetian name, to commit wholly the publike ſafetie, our vniuerſall honor, and the proper liues of our wyues and children, to the vertue of forreiners, and fidelitie of marcenarie ſouldiours: it better agreeth with the extremitie we are in, and with the auncient reputation and valour of this Citie, to ronne thither with our bodies, and ſtretche out our armes for the defence of that wherein is incloſed the ſafetie of the communitie of this populous dominion: for if we now looke not to the preſeruation of that Citie, there remaines no tyme hereafter to make vs aſſured, no fortune to hope in, no place to giue vs comfort, nor no action wherein to ſhowe our vertue, or to expende our treaſure for our libertie and ſafetie. Time is thankfull to ſuche as followe it, and fauoreth occaſions with oportunities conuenient, which if we will apply to our ſelues afore the ſeaſon of our remedie and reskew be paſt, we muſt not leaue vnproued any policie, any example, nor any action that may reſpect our ſuccor and ſafetie, and muche leſſe expect, till we remayne a pray to thoſe that ſeeke to ſacke our goods, and waſhe their couetouſneſſe in our blood. The conſeruation of our countrey comprehends not onely a publike good, but together with the ſafetie of the common weale, is reſpected the ſecuritie of euery particular, ſuffring ſuche affinitie and coniunction together, that the one can not conſiſt without the other: for the common weale falling into ſeruitude, it can not be auoyded that the ſubſtance, the honors, and lyues of priuat men, become not alſo a pray to the couetouſneſſe, to the voluptuouſneſſe, to the cruelties, and to the vile affections of the enemies. Though there were no other reſpect or intereſt in the defending of a common weale, then the preſeruation of a countrey, is it not a thing worthy of noble Citizens full of glory and reputation in this worlde, and meritorious alſo afore God? the ſame ſo working with the people gentils and heathen, that they helde it as a religion, that in heauen is determined a place particular for the perpetuall fruition and comfort of ſuche, as eyther ſuccored, preſerued, or augmented their countrey: And what countrey did euer deſerue to be better reskewed and ſupported by her children then this, who in all ages hath retayned a ſoueraigne principallitie ouer all the cities of the worlde, and by whome the Citizens receiue infinite commodities, profites, and honours. It is wonderfull, whether you cõſider it in the gifts which it hath receyued of nature, or in the things which declare her perpetuall greatnes and happie fortune: or laſtly, in thoſe effects which expreſſe her vertue, together with the nobilitie of the wittes of her inhabitantes: her ſituation makes men amaſed, beeing the onely citie in the worlde ſeated

" amongeſt the ſalt waters, and hath all her parts ſo conioyned, that at one time men
" may enioy the commodities of the water, and pleaſures of the lande: It is aſſured a-
" gaynſt thinuaſions of the lande, for that it ſtandeth not on the firme lande, and it is " free from inundations of water, for that it is not ſeated in the plaine and deepe ſea.
" I maye alleage to the dignitie and reputation of this Citie, the wonderfull maieſtie
" of publike pallaces and priuate manſions buylded at incredible charges, and repoli-
" ſhed with ſtraunge Marbles and ſtones of ſingularitie, brought hither from all parts " of the world, together with a ſtately aſpect of excellent purtraites, imageries, ſcul-
" ptures, pillors, and other workmanſhippes of worthy regard: No citie of the world
" comparatiue with this for the concourſe of all ſtraunge nations comming hither,
" partly for the ſuretie and freedome of habitation in this climat ſo wel tempered, and
" partly for thexerciſe of their traffike and negociations, whereby our common weale
" doth drawe more plentie of reuenues and ryches of things conteined onely within
" the circuit of this Citie, then many abſolute kings receiue of their large and whole
" kingdomes. Great is the affluence of men of faculti and ſcience, reuerent for their " grauitie, doctrine, and learning, and no leſſe wonderfull for their ſingularitie & qual-
" litie of witte, and other vertues of men, from the which, ioyned to other conditions,
" is diſcended the glory of actions which by this common weale and her diſcendants,
" haue bene made more great, then (ſince the imperie of the Romains) by any other
" principallitie or ſtate in the world. It may be holden not one of the leaſt wonders,
" to ſee ſo great abundance of things, in a Citie wherein nothing groweth, and yet
" ſubiecte to ſuche multitudes of inhabitantes. At the beginning our towne was " ſtrayted and incloſed, and we conſtrayned to retyre our ſelues into little rockes and
" caues, barraine and naked of all things, and yet the vertue of our elders, ſtretching
" out firſt into the next ſeas and townes adioyning, and afterwardes riſing encrea-
" ſing by degrees of ſucceſſe vpon the ſhoares and prouinces further of, yea euen to
" the vttermoſt limittes of the Leuant, they got both by ſea and lande ſo great an em" pire, and power, that beeing redowted to all the other townes in Italie, it was neceſ-
" ſarie to call in the vnitie, pollicies, and forces of other Chriſtian princes to helpe to " abate and depreſſe it: Matters aſſuredly hapned by the ayde and fauor of the omni" potent God, who with ſuche graces hath bleſſed and ſanctified the lawes and obſer-
" uations of iuſtice indifferently adminiſtred in this citie: thoſe reſpects alſo making
" many peoples and nations to offer willing ſubiection to our gouernment. What
" citie, what empire, or what principalitie giues place to our countrey, for matter of " religion, pietie, and workes of good example? Where maye be ſeene ſo many Mo-
" naſteries, ſo many Temples full of ſo many precious ornaments and thinges of ad" miration dedicated to the ſeruice of God? Where may be founde ſo many Hoſpi-
" talls and places of pitie, prepared for the perpetuall comforte of the afflicted, and " continuall exerciſe of charitie? Great (ſure) is the recõmendation of our Citie for " theſe fauours and bleſſings, but farre more worthy are her prayſes for the glory of " this onely, that our countrey being from the beginning begot and brought forth in " libertie, there was neuer ſeene any man borne or dye in Venice, which died not a free
" man, and was neuer troubled in his libertie: A felicitie mouing principally by " thexerciſe of ciuill concorde, which hath ſtande alwayes ſo rooted and confirmed
" in the hartes of men, that at the inſtant when they enter into our Senate and our " counſells, they ſhake off all diſcordes and priuat quarrels: Of this is the cauſe the " forme of gouernment, which hath ſuche temperature and communitie with all the " beſt ſortes of publike adminiſtration, and compounded of ſuche a well conſenting armonie

armonie agreeing in it ſelfe, that it hath remayned for many ages vndefiled without partialities, without ciuill ſedition, without armes, and without effuſion of blood amongſt Citizens: the ſame beeing the onely prayſe of our common weale, excelling in this propertie of vertue both Rome, Carthage, Athens, and all other names of common weale of auncient commendation: yea, we proue in our ſelues ſuche an effect of this kinde of gouernment and pollicie, that all thoſe auncients, who in ages paſt haue made profeſſion of Ciuill wiſdome, could not deſcribe or inſtitute a better. Let not then the children, the offspring, and preſent people of ſo glorious a countrey, in whom for ſo many worlds and ages, hath bene ſo worthily expreſſed the very ſtrength and defence of the fayth and the beautie of the whole Chriſtian common weale, bee ſlowe in the execution of their duetie, the neceſſitie of their owne ſafetie ſo requiring. Let no man refuſe to cõmit to danger the life of himſelfe and children, for the protection of that wherin conſiſts our vniuerſall ſafetie, which beeing comprehended in the onely defence of Padoa, let no man refuſe to put his perſon to aduenture: And albeit we haue certentie that the forces that be there already are ſufficient for the defence of it, yet it apperteines to our honor, it is a iuſte office of our common vertue, and it concernes the glory of the name of Venice, to make the world ſatisfied, that we are runne thither in perſon, both to defend and preſerue: The deſtinie of that Citie hath permitted, that in fewe dayes ſo great an eſtate of imperie ſhould fall out of our handes, wherein we haue not to complayne ſo muche of the malice of fortune, for that ſuche nature of aduentures are common to other countreys and kingdomes, as, for that fayling of that conſtancie which till this day hath bene inuincible, and without all memorie of the glorious examples of our elders, we haue with too ſodayne diſpaire, giuen place to the mightie blowes of aduerſitie, and are not hable to repreſent to our children that valour & vertue, which our fathers haue left well teſtified to vs. In matters of enterpriſe occaſion is of great force, and time doth now returne vpon vs thoccaſion to recouer that notable ornament & member which is not yet loſt, if we ſhow the minds of men, but only altered without any perill of abſolute ruine. Let vs go agaynſt the fortune that enuieth vs, and make willing proſtitution of our bodies to the daungers that are offred, ſo ſhall we not onely redeeme thinfamies that we haue receyued, but alſo the world beholding yet that our auncient magnanimitie and vertue is not loſt, men will rather attribute the diſorders paſt to a certaine fatall tempeſt, which neither the counſels nor conſtancie of men could reſiſt, then to impoſe vpon vs eyther blame or diſhonour, fulfilling all things that our condition can afforde for our ſuccor. In this reſpect, if it were reaſonable that we went altogether to the reskewe of Padoa, and if for certaine days we might leaue this citie abandoned without preiudice of her defence & other publike affayres of importance, my ſelfe, without exſpecting your reſolution, would be the firſt that ſhould open the way, not ſeeing wherein I might better cloaſe vp the lateſt dayes of my olde age, then in my preſence to participate with ſo glorious a victorie which is required of my office and birth, or els not to remayne on liue after the ruine of my countrey: A calamitie which my minde hath horror to expreſſe. But for that Venice, neither can, nor ought to be depriued of her publike counſels, wherein conſiſteth no leſſe the defence of Padoa, then in the force and armes of ſuche as be there alreadye: And ſeeing that the vnprofitable trowpes of olde perſons will ſtande in that citie rather as a charge and burden, then as a ſuccour and ayde neceſſarie: And ſeeing withall it is not conuenient, for things that may happen, to diſfurniſhe Venice of all her youth: My aduiſe is, reſpecting theſe reaſons

" with the regarde to accidentes that maye occurre, that there bee made a choyſe
" of two hundred gentlemen of the flower and principalls of our youth, and euery of " them to go to Padoa, with ſuch proportion of his freends, followers, and ſeruaunts,
" as his riches and habilitie will beare, and to continue there ſo long as ſhall be neceſ-
" ſarie for that defence: My two ſonnes with their retinues ſhall be the firſt in this " example, of whoſe lyues and perſons in ſo great a daunger, I make a willing offer to " the ſuccor of their countrey: By their preſence in thaction the citie of Padoa ſhall
" be more aſſured: by their example the marcenarie ſouldiours that be there will be " more reſolute, ſeeing a ready courage in our honorable youth aſſiſting all actions " that concerne that ſeruice. And ſeeing our ſonnes and kinſmen ioyned with them, " their ſuretie will be the greater to haue no want of vittelles, munitions, nor anye o" ther thing conuenient to their comfort: The reſidue of our youth not put to this
" execution, ſhall beſo much the more encouraged by this example, to commit them
" ſelues in all times of neceſſitie, to all trauayles and daungers importing the ſeruice
" of their countrey: It is an honeſt emulation to ſtriue in vertue, but it is more hono" rable to contende to excell one an other in the defence of our countrey: By this
" I exhort you, noble Senators, (whoſe wordes and doings ſerue as an example and " doctrine to the whole Citie) to moſter your ſonnes, and make them of the number " of thoſe that ſhall communicate in ſo great a glory: for from them will not onely " proceede the aſſured & certayne defence of Padoa, but in this action is alſo brought " to vs with all nations, a peculiar reputation, that we our ſelues are they, who with " the daunger of our owne lyues do defende the libertie and ſafetie of the moſte wor" thy and floriſhing countrey that is in the whole world.

The gentlemē of Venice go to the ſuccors of Padoa.

This counſell of the Prince was heard with great affection of the reſidue, to whō nothing appeared more conuenient for their common ſafetie, then to ioyne it to practiſe and execution: And as the nature and operation of the time, and the neceſſitie of their affayres, could not without preiudice endure delayes, ſo the flower and choyſe bodies of their youth of Venice, moſtred and drewe to them ſo many of their friends and followers as were apt to armes, and with them went with ſpeede to the ſeruice of Padoa, beeing accompanied to their embarquing with all the other gentlemen and communitie of people, euery one celebrating with many prayſes, and with vowes and deſires full of deuotion and affection, ſo great a readynes to ſuccor the countrey: An example of right worthy and honorable imitation, ſeruing to inſtruct all poſterities and ages, that when perill and daunger be at hande, euery one to be touched with the intereſt of his countrey: They were welcomed at Padoa with an vniuerſall gladnes of the captaynes and ſouldiours, much recommending the valour of thoſe noble perſonages, who not trayned in the trauelles, experiences, and daungers of warre, ſtucke not to preferre the loue of their countrey, afore the reſpect of their proper lyfe: In ſo muche as miniſtring comfort one to an other, not as men trauelled in calamities, but with mindes reſolute, they exſpected in great fidelitie the comming of Cæſar: who for his parte labouring to reaſſemble and receiue the bandes of ſouldiours that came to him from all partes, was by this time come to the bridge of Brento three myles from Padoa, and hauing taken Limini by force, and cut off the courſe of the water, he tarried the comming of thartillerie whiche was ſent out of Germanie, which was no leſſe terrible for the quantitie then for the qualitie: of this proportion of artilleries one parte being arriued at Vincenſa, and Phillip Roſſe and Federike Gonſague de Boſſole beeing gone with two hundred light horſemen to be his garde, they were charged with a ſtrength of fiue hundred light horſemen, who,

ledde by certayne peiſantes that during the warre dyd muche ſeruice to the Venetians, and beeing then iſſued oute of Padoa, they ouerthrewe them fiue miles from Vincenſa, where Phillip remayned priſoner, and Federike by the fauour of the nighte eſcaped in his ſhirte. From the bridge of Brenta, Maximilian enlarged and ſtretched out his bandes about twelue myles, drawing towardes Poleſina de Rovvigua, the better to open to him ſelfe the commoditie of vittayles, and taking the borowe of Efte by aſſaulte, and putting it to ſacke, he went to encampe at Monſelice, where the towne ſtanding in the playne, being abandoned, the ſeconde daye he caried the caſtell ſtanding on the toppe of a highe rocke: Afterwardes he tooke by compoſition Montagnana, and ſo returning towards Padoa, he incamped at the bridge of Baſſanello neare Padoa, where he proued in vayne to turne the ryuer of Brenta whiche from thence hath his courſe to Padoa. At this place did ariue all thartilleries and munitions which he exſpected, and hither did reſort all the regimentes of men of warre which lay diſperſed in diuers places, with whom in forme and title of a mayne armie, he approched neare the towne: and hauing beſtowed foure thouſand footmen in the ſuburbes which are called S. Croſſ. his opinion was to aſſayle it on that ſide, but being afterwards aduertiſed that it was a parte of the towne moſte ſtrong by ſituation and by walles, and alſo that there he ſtoode moſt ſubiect to the harmes of thartilleries, he determined to diſcampe and remoue his armie to the gate which is called the Waterfort, bearing his aſpect to Venice: The cauſe why he remoued to this place, was an opinion that there the towne was moſt weake, and withall to giue impediment to the ſuccours which were to come eyther from Venice to Padoa both by lande and water: But for that he could not go thither for the diſcommoditie of certayne mariſhes and wattrie channells ouerflowing the countrey, but by fetching a great circuite, he came to the bridge of Bouolento within ſeuen myles of Padoa, where be paſtures and feeding groundes vpon the banke of Baguillon towards the ſea, betwene Padoa and Venice. To this place, enuironed with waters, & in the moſt ſure part of the countrey of Padoa, were withdrawne three thouſande peiſantes with great heardes of cattell, who beeing forced by the footebandes of the Spaniſhe and Italians that were in the vauwarde, were almoſte all taken or ſlayne, the victors employing the two dayes following in praying the whole countrey, euen to the ſea, dryuing away infinite heardes of cattell feeding in that quarter. There were alſo taken vppon Brenta diuerſe barkes, whiche laden with vittayles were running vp to Padoa: At laſte, the fyftenth daye of September, after he had conſumed muche tyme vnprofitably, and giuen good leiſure to thenemie both to fortifie and refurniſhe the towne with vittayles, he approched the wals of Padoa on that ſide towards the gate of the waterfort. There hath not bene ſeene in Italie neither in the age preſent, nor haply long time before, a beſieging of more great exſpectation, nor wherein the myndes of men were more buſily occupied, then this, not ſo muche for the nobilitie and maieſtie of the Citie, as for thimportance that was in the loaſing and keping of the ſame: For Padoa, a citie ſo aunciently recommended for the vniuerſitie of ſtudies and ſciences, is ſeated in a countrey very fertill, and vnder a climat temperat and wholſome: it is incompaſſed with three orders of walls, and bearing a circuit and circumference as large as any citie in Italy, it hath paſſing by it the ryuers of Brenta and Baguillon: And albeit the Venetians won it out of the poſſeſſion of the familie of Carrato more then two hundred yeres ſince, yet it retaines many proude aſpects and ſhowes of ſtately buildings, with many monuments & ſignes of antiquitie wel expreſſing her ancient greatnes & beautie: And of the conquering and defending of ſo great a Citie depended, not only the confirmation or diminution of the Almain imperie in Italie, but alſo the verye eſtate and felicitie of the Citie of Venice: for Padoa beeing defended, it was eaſie for the common weale of Venice abounding in great wealth, and of one vnitie of mynde and readineſſe of witte, ſubiect to no ſuche variations as thaffayres of Princes are, to hope to recouer in ſmall tyme ſo great a part of her iuriſdiction: wherein they were ſo muche the more aſſured, by howmuche the moſt parte of thoſe ſubiects whiche had thirſted after mutations, neither finding effects agreable to their conceptions, and knowing by cõpariſon what difference was betwene the moderate gouernment of the Venetians, and the tyrannie of th Almains farre eſtraunged from the maners and cuſtomes of th Italians, and laſtly being greatly diſordred by the confuſions and domages of the warre, they beganne to call into reſpect and affection their auncient yoke: And of the contrarie, if Padoa were committed to violence and ſacke, muche leſſe that the Venetians coulde hope to reſtore the glorie and magnificence of their common weale, ſeeing there were danger that the very citie of Venice made naked of ſo large a member, and diſpoyled of ſo many treaſors both by diminution of publike reuenues, and loſſe of ſo many natures of goodes moueable poſſeſſed by perſons priuat in the firme lande, would not be hable to mainteine defence agaynſt the armies of the Princes confederat, or at leaſt would not in time become a pray to the Turkes, to whom they are neighbours in many places, and with whom they haue had alwayes eyther warre or peace vnfaythfull and yll aſſured: But wyſe men were occupied with no leſſe doubt and perplexitie, the mightie preparations that were made on all ſides keeping wonderfully in ſuſpence the common iudgementes, which were very vncertayne on whether part the better fortune would fall, eyther to the aſſaylantes, or to the defendantes: for in the Armie of Cæſar, beſides the ſeuen hundred French launces, which Monſr la Palice commaunded, there were two hundred men at armes which the Pope had ſent for his ſtrength: two hundred men at armes appoynted by the duke of Ferrara vnder the charge of the Cardinall of Eſte, notwithſtanding the quarrels that were betwene them were not yet reconciled, and ſix hundred Italian launces vnder ſundry captaines leauied by him: he had xviij. thouſand Almain footmen, ſix thouſand Spaniſh, ſix thouſand aduenturers of diuers nations and languages, and two thouſande Italians, leauied and paied by the Cardinall of Eſte vnder the ſame title. There followed him a wonderfull proportion of all ſortes of artilleries, with great quantities of munitions, wherof the French king had ſent him one part: And albeit for the moſt part his owne ordinarie bandes were not payed, yet, what with the conſideration of the greatnes and authoritie of ſuch a leader, and the hope to pray and ſacke Padoa, and to haue at their deuotion all thoſe peeces which the Venetians poſſeſſed, much leſſe that they abandoned his ſeruice, ſeing they flocked to him dayly in greater nũbers, being caried chiefly by this inducement, that he that of his owne nature was moſt liberall and full of humanitie to his ſouldiours, would not fayle of their payment by couetouſnes or will, but by diſhabilitie or want. This was the ſtrength of Cæſars armie, compounded wholly of his owne forces, but made mightie by the ayde of ſtrangers & marcenaries. But for that which concerned the defence of Padoa, the army which the Venetians had in that citie, was no leſſe mightie: for there were ſix hundred men at armes, a thouſande fiue hundred lighte horſemen, a thouſande fiue hundred ſtradiots, all commaunded by theſe notable capteines, the Count Petillano generall of the whole, B. de Montono, Anth. de Pic. Luke Maluazzo, Iohn Greeke, with other inferiour leaders: There were twelue twelue thouſande footemen of the beſt experienced and trayned in Italie, vnder the charge of Denis Naldo, Zitole de Perouſa, Lactan. de Bergamo, Sacco de Spoleto, with many other officers: ten thouſande footemen aſwell Slauonians, Greekes, and Albanois, whome they had drawne from their galleis, of whome albeit many were not muche profitable to the ſeruice, yet ſome of them were well trayned and hable to execute neceſſarie office: Beſides, they had the youth of Venice in whome was no little importaunce touching the felicitie of the ſeruice, and albeit they were muche reſpected in caſes of daungers, yet their example ſerued no leſſe to the aduauncement of the ſeruice, then them ſelues wonne greate merite for their diſpoſitions and pietie to their countrey: There was alſo a wonderfull abundance and ſtoare of all prouiſions neceſſarie, great quantities of artilleries, and a plentyfull proportion of all ſortes of vittels, the people of the platte countreys beeing no leſſe carefull to bring in prouiſions for their common ſuretie, then the magiſtrates and officers of Venice to giue order for their continuall refurniſhing: There were alſo many multitudes of paiſantes, who beeing leauyed at a certayne price, were imployed in the labours of their fortifications: In ſo muche as to the valour and numbers of thoſe that were appoynted to defende it, they ioyned wonderfull rampiers and fortifications in that circuite of walles that enuironeth the whole Citie: for they hadde almoſte filled vp all the waterdiche whiche runneth along the walles, and at euery gate of the towne and other places conuenient, buylded many fortes and cloaſe baſtillions without, but ſo as they were annexed to the walles, and had entries and conueiaunces into the towne, and beeing well repleniſhed with artilleries, they bett ſuche as entred into the trenche: And becauſe the taking of thoſe baſtillions ſhould bring no daunger to the towne, they had ſunke in them all vnderneath, hollowe vawtes or caues filled vp with barrelles of gonnepowder, to blowe them vp into the ayre, when they were no longer hable to defende them: And reappoſing not altogether in the greatneſſe and goodneſſe of the olde wall, notwithſtanding they had ſearched it diligently, and renforced it where neede were, filling vp all the cranelles and ruines: yet they made rounde about the Citie within, a couer, or pauiſſe, or fortification of pales, trees, and other peeces of wood, ſo farre diſtaunt from the wall as it was in thicknes, and with a wonderfull diligence, had filled vp to the toppe of the wall with good earth, and well rammed all the voyde place that was betweene them. This fortification no leſſe wonderfull in theffect, then of a labour and trauell ineſtimable, thinfinite diligence of men beeing continuallye imployed, ſeemed not ſo to ſatisfie the exſpectation of the defence of that Citie, but that they caſte a deepe diche of ſixteene fadome breadth, whiche drawing leſſe and narrower in the bottome, and ſtanding thicke with mordring houſes and little towres full of ſhotte, ſeemed impoſſible to bee forced. Theſe natures of fortifications were made with hollowe vawtes and caues, according to thexample of the baſtillions, hauing conueiances to be ouerthrowen by fyre when they woulde: And becauſe they would be thorowly prepared to all things, they rayſed behinde the diche a rampier of the ſame or greater largeneſſe, whiche ſtretched out as farre as the circuite of the towne, except in certayne corners and places, wherein they knewe it was impoſſible to plant artillerie: and before the rampier they caſte a parapet of ſeuen faddome, whiche was a defence to thoſe that fought vppon the rampier, that they coulde not bee ſtryken with the bullet of the enemie. And to thende that the courage of the ſouldiours and menne of the towne, might equally aunſwere thoſe rates of prouiſions and fortifications, the Count Petillano aſſembling the whole armie in the place of S. Anthony, encouraged them with ſpeches of great grauitie and perſwaſion, to conſider vpon what termes ſtoode their common ſafetie & honor: wherin for the better fidelitie and ſurety of the ſeruice, he proteſted his owne othe, and bound likewiſe in the ſame ſolemnitie all the captaynes, all the armie, and the particulars of the towne, to followe the defence of the citie vntill death. In a perill ſo generall, there was none refuſed to giue his othe to the defence of that wherevnto he ſo frankly offred his lyfe, and where the life is offred vp to daunger, it is nothing to giue an othe to aſſure the fidelitie. Thus the armie of Cæſar beeing drawne neare the walles of Padoa with ſo great a ſtrength, and agaynſt ſo mightie preparation, he ſtretched out his campe from the gate of the waterfort, vntill the gate of All ſaintes which leades to Treuiſa, and from thence enlarged it to the gate of Codalonga which goeth to the Citadell, ſo as it conteined in largeneſſe three myles: Maximilian him ſelfe was lodged in the Monaſterie of S. Heleine, within a quarter of a myle of the citie walles, encamping as it were in the middeſt of th Almain footemen: And after he had imparted to euery one his charge according to the diuerſitie of nations and places of their encāping, he began to plant his artilleries, wherin albeit in his perſon being inuincible in mind and of a body hardned with paine & trauels, he performed a wonderfull diligence to accompliſh that action, yet it could not be atchieued but with longnes of time and great difficulty, aſwell for the quantitie and intollerable greatnes of ſome natures of it, as alſo for that the whole campe, and ſpecially thoſe places where they ſought to plant them, were continually tormented and diſtreſſed with thartilleries of the towne: At laſt the perpetuall induſtrie of Maximilian ioyned to the valour of his ſouldiours, made way to plant his artilleries, and the ſame day the Frenche with the footemen of th Almains, gaue an aſſaulte to the tower of the gate on that ſide where Monſr la Palice had charged, but more to ſounde and proue their countenaunce, then with intention to fight in good appoyntment: and therefore finding the reſiſtance valiaunt and well furniſhed, they retyred eftſones to their tentes: The day after the charge recontinued, thartillerie not ceaſſing to thunder with terrible furie: ſome of them by their incredible hugeneſſe and vnmeaſurable quantitie of powder that was vſed, pearced thorow the rampiers, & reuerſed the houſes that ioyned neareſt the walles: A furie which in ſhort time ſhaked downe to the grounde many places of the wall, the baſtillion alſo buylded vppon the gate of All ſaintes beeing diſmantelled and razed, without that the defendantes afflicting the campe with continuall volleys of ſhotte, ſhewed any ſigne of feare: So reſolute is the vertue that feightes for honour and libertie. The ſtradiots that in great valour encamped in the ſuburbes refuſing alwayes to retyre into the towne, and the light horſemen making continuall incurſions in all places, skirmiſhed with their enemies ſometimes before, and ſometimes behinde, driuing them euen to their tentes, ſometimes they diſtreſſed ſuche as were gardes to the forraigers and vittellers, and ſometimes ouerrunning the whole countrey with pray and pyllage, they ſpoyled all the wayes, except that which goeth from Padoa to the mount of Aban: And yet there was in the campe a wonderfull abundance of vittelles, euery houſe and place beeing plentifullye furniſhed, for that neyther the feare of the payſantes, nor the carefull diligence of the Venetians, nor the infinite harmes of the ſouldiours on both ſydes, coulde not drayne or drye vppe the incredible plentie of that moſte fruitefull and fertill countrey. At the ſame tyme alſo Luke Maluezzo iſſued out of Padoa with certayne trowpes of horſemen, for the conuey of fortie

thouſand duckets which were ſent thither from Venice, and albeit in his returne the enemie charged him vpon the tayle, yet his vertue brought in the treaſure in ſafetie, without any other loſſe then one of his men at armes. By the nynth day thartillerie had executed ſo well, that it ſeemed there was no further neceſſitie to ſhoote, and therefore vſing all benefites that the tyme offred, the day following the whole army appeared in order of battell to approch the walles: but finding that the ſame night they within the towne had made ſwell and ryſe the water of the ditche, whiche afore was abated and falne, Cæſar gaue order that euery bande ſhoulde returne to his place, holding it neither honorable nor neceſſarie to commit his ſouldiours to a daunger ſo manifeſt: The next day, the water eftſones abated and retired, when embraſing thopportunitie, they gaue an aſſault (but with ſlender ſucceſſe) to the baſtillion which was made vpon the point of the gate of Godalonga, wherin themperor diſpoſed to do what he could to force it, cauſed to be turned thither thartilleries that were planted in the quarter of the Frenche, encamping betweene the gates of All Saints & Codalonga: And with thoſe artilleries, hauing done great execution of that place, he folowed it with an aſſalt two daies after with the footmen of th Almains and Spanish, accompanied with certaine men at armes on foote, who in the furie of the fight aſcended the baſtillion, and ſet vp there two enſignes: But the fortreſſe of the diche was ſuche, and the vertue of the defendants nothing inferior, and ſo plentifull thinſtrumentes of defence not onely concerning artilleries, but alſo of ſtones and wildfires, that they were conſtrayned to deſcend by heapes, many remayning dead on the place, and ſome falling into the fortune of impriſonment: In ſo much as tharmie that ſtoode in readines to giue thaſſalt, immediatly vpon thaction of the baſtillion, retired, and diſarmed without making any other attempt, iudging it no ſtayne to their honor to abandon thenterpriſe wherin was no hope of their ſafetie. By this experience Maximilian loſt wholly all hope of the victorie, in which conſideration he determined his labor with his fortune, & breaking vp his campe, after he had beſtowed his artilleries in places ſure, he retyred with his armie to the towne of Limini towards Treuiſa. This was the ſeuententh day after he was encamped before Padoa, and ſo with many baytes & reſting places, he came at laſt to Vincenſa, from whence after he had taken of that people the othe of fidelitie, and almoſte diſmiſſed his whole armie, he drew toward Verona, being not a litle diſcontented that his deliberations had taken no better ſucces, but more touched with perturbation, for that they bare blame and ſlaunder both in his armie and throughout all Italie, for that the execution of things were in deede no leſſe infamous then the counſels: for both for that he had miſſed of the taking of Treuiſa, and alſo that he had loſt Padoa, no man doubted that it was not his fault, and alſo that his too late arriuing afore Padoa made the action more hard, for that in that negligence the Venetians tooke oportunitie and good aduauntage of time to make prouiſion of ſouldiours, to refurniſhe Padoa with vittels, and to rayſe wonderfull fortifications to reſiſt thexecution that was determined: And albeit himſelfe could not denie that in that propertie of error conſiſted not the defence of the citie, yet cloaking the vice of his owne varietie and proper diſorders, he laide the fault from him ſelfe, and complayned of the Pope and French king, for that the one had ſuffred the Embaſſadours of Venice to go to Rome, and the other had bene too ſlowe to ſende ſuccours, the ſame giuing occaſion to the world to beleue that they were eſtranged from him, and had likewiſe encoraged the countreymen of the mountaines of Vincenſa to draw to rebellion: for the ſubduing of whom after he had conſumed many dayes, he founde afterwards in regarde of the ſame occaſion, the ſelfe ſame difficulties in the playne countreys: Alſo the better to open to him ſelfe a way to reuittell his armie, and to aſſure his prouiſions, and withall to deliuer his companies from many incommodities, he was conſtrayned to take all the townes of the countrey: Herein the ſlowe marching of the Frenche had not onely muche hurt him, but alſo if they had come in due ſeaſon and time, the reuolt of Padoa had not hapned: He complayned alſo that aſwell for theſe hinderaunces, as for that the French and king of Aragon had diſmiſſed their armie at ſea, the Venetians had the better oportunitie and meane to refurniſhe and refortifie Padoa ſtanding deliuered from all other feares: Laſtly, he complayned that thoſe difficulties were acceptable to the king of Aragon, as meanes to induce him to conſent more eaſily that thadminiſtration and gouernment of the kingdome of Caſtillo ſhould be to him. But theſe complayntes did nothing better his fortunes, and much leſſe recouered his authoritie loſt, for that he was negligent to vſe ſo rare occaſions: for it did nothing diſcontent the Frenche king that the worlde was poſſeſſed wyth ſuche an opinion of him: and in the Pope was leſſe care or affection, for that beeing of his proper inclination ſuſpicious and diſtruſtfull, and weighing withall thempererours continual neceſſities and wants of money, with his importunities to demaund it, he was vnwilling that his name ſhould encreaſe in Italie. At Verona he receyued the othe of fidelitie, & in that citie Pe. Guicciardin father to the author of this booke, with the other Florentin Embaſſadors, couenanted with him in the name of the cõmon weale, (induced, beſides their owne reſpects, by the perſwaſions of the French king) to pay him in a ſhort time xl. thouſande duckets: for which promiſe, they obteyned of him in moſt ample maner, many priuileges, for the confirmation aſwell of the libertie of Florence, as of the dominion and iuriſdiction of the townes and eſtates which they helde, together with remiſſion and acquittance of all dueties and demaundes for times paſt. Thus Cæſar, reſting determined to returne into Germany, to giue order (as he ſayde) for the warres which he entended in the ſpring time, ſent for Monſr Chaumont to come and communicate with him of the preſent affayres: he layed afore him by demonſtration the perilles of the tyme, and what daunger there were that the Venetians would recouer Citadella and Baſſana, places of greate importance, which they prepared to aſſayle, beeing made proude by the defence and ſucceſſe of Padoa: he feared the ſame opinion of their fortune would encorage them alſo to the like action againſt Monſelica, Montagnana, and Eſte, the felicitie of victorie making men inſolent, and carying their mindes into enterpriſes aboue the proportion of their proper power and habilitie: He alleaged howe neceſſarie it were to conſider, not onely of the protection of theſe places, but alſo to enter into practiſe howe to recouer Leguague, wherein being of himſelfe not ſufficient enough to leauie prouiſions neceſſarie for ſuche effects, it touched the king in good pollicie to miniſter ayde to him, whoſe places were to fall into manyfeſt perill, if the peces which he held were not ſupported. To theſe demaunds, Monſr Chaumont, in whom was no power to make any certayne reſolution, gaue aunſwere, that he woulde ſee the king aduertiſed, on whoſe behalfe he aduouched a minde conformable to his deſires, being all that apperteined to his place to promiſe well, hauing no authoritie to aſſure. After this conference, Cæſar went to Chiuſa, leauing the Marquis of Brandebourg for the garde of Verona: And a little after Monſr de Paliſſa remayning with fiue hundred launces vpon the countrey of Verona, alleaging the difficulties and incommodities of the place where he laye, gate leaue with great importunities to retyre to the frontiers of the duchie of Millan: for that the kings intention was, that if his men of warre ſhould remeine in garriſon and do nothing, they ſhould not abide vpon his eſtate, but ſhould returne to the ſeruice of Maximylian to exſpect ſuch enterpriſe as he would embraſe, but chiefly the action of Leguagua, which notwithſtanding it was much deſired and ſolicited by him, yet it was ſo long differred by his accuſtomed difficulties, that the raines fell ſo faſt by the propertie of the ſeaſon, that it was impoſſible to incampe in that contreye being for his lownes much ſubiect to waters: for theſe impediments, Caſar was driuen to deſire truce for certaine moneths with the Venetians, but they riſing into courage by his diſorders, and ſeeing how ſlowly the confederats miniſtred to his ayde, had more regard to the fortune that followed them, then to the mocions he made, iudging it not for their profite to conſent to any ceaſſing of armes.

Amyd theſe ſuſpicions and ielowſies of thinges, th Emprour at laſt returned to Trente, leauing thoſe places that he held in great daunger, and all the gouernments in Italy in generall dout: for, there began to appeare betwene the Pope & the french king, a new contencion, the foundacion whereof, albeit ſeemed to be layd vpon light occaſions, yet, there was feare leſt it was intangled with more ſecret practiſe & cauſes of greater importance then ſuch as were expreſſed: The outward cauſe appearing, was that a Biſhoprik being void in Prouence by the death of thincumbent dying in the Court of Rome, the Pope had diſpoſed it againſt the wil of the frēch King, who pretended ſuch action to be contrary to the capitulacion which the Cardinal of Pauya had made betwene them, wherein albeit the wordes bare not expreſly that there ſhould be equall reſpect and obſeruacion touching the Biſhoprikes falling in the Court of Rome, as of ſuch as fell vacant in other places, yet he was aſſured no leſſe by the mouth and promiſſe of the Cardinall, which the Cardinall confeſſed not to be true, more perhaps for feare, then for other occaſion: The Pope affirmed the contrary, alleaging that he tooke no knowledge of any thinge promiſed in priuitie and ſecret, onely in the ratificacion he had regarde to that that appeared in the writing and particular articles, wherein he had ſet downe diſtinctly all the contents of the capitulacion, chapter by chapter, And tharticle concerning the dying of the Byſhops in the Court of Rome being not comprehended, he was not bownde to thobſeruation of that that was not expreſſed: This did ſo much aggrauate the diſcontentement of them both, that as the Kinge, reiecting contrary to his cuſtome the councells of the Cardinall Amboiſe, who had alwayes aduiſed him to enterteyne agreement with the Pope, made ſequeſtracion of the frutes of all thoſe benefices which the Churchmen reſident in the Court of Rome held in the Duchie of Myllan: So, the Pope refuſed to indue the Biſhop of Alby with the hat, who, according to the promiſſe made to the King, was gone to Rome to receiue it: And albeit the Pope, ouerruled by the importunities of many friendes, was brought in the ende, to diſpoſe of the Biſhoprike of Prouence according to the Kinges minde, And albeit there was eftſoones agreed betweene them a new forme of proceeding in benefices that hereafter ſhoulde fall in the Court of Rome, and in that regarde the ſequeſtracions to ceaſſe on the one ſide, and on the other part the hat to be transferred to the Biſhop of Alby: yet theſe agreements ſufficed not to moderat the minde of the Pope, who was not a litle kindled for many reaſons, but ſpecially for that, hauing from the beginning of his Popedom, transferred very vnwillingly the legacion of the Realme of Fraunce to the Cardinall of Amboiſe, A matter hurtfull to the Court of Rome, and bearing preiudice to his authoritie, it was now moſt greeuous to him to be conſtrained (to auoid diſpleaſure with the french King) to continue it to him: he was ielous

Max. returneth into Germany.

alſo that the ſame Cardinal aſpired with all his thoughts & meanes to the ſouereign ſeat, & therefore he ſtoode in feare & dout of euery aduauncement and riſing of the frenche: Theſe were the apparant cauſes of his diſcontentment, but as farre as could be afterwards coniectured by his thoughts and diſpoſicions, he layed greater plots and aſpired to farre greater endes, deſiring vehemently, eyther for greedines of glorie, or for ſome ſecret hatred againſt the french Kinge, or at leaſt for the libertie of the Genouuais, that the Kinge might loſe all that he poſſeſſed in Italy, iudging his greatnes a bridle to his ambicion, and his power in Italy an impediment to his authoritie: he ceaſſed not alſo to complaine againſt him and the Cardinall of Amboiſe indifferently, but with ſuch temperature and cunning, that it ſeemed his diſcontentment proceeded chiefly of feare: And yet, as he was of a nature obſtinate and inuincible, and for the moſte parte accompanied the diſpoſicion of his minde with outward demonſtracions: So, albeit he aſpyred in his ſecret thoughts to an end of ſo great conſequence and hard to obtaine, reapoſing onely in him ſelfe and the reuerence and authoritie which he knew Chriſtian Princes bare to the ſea apoſtolike, yet he would not enter into alliance nor depend of any: but expreſſing both in ſpech and working, how litle account he made of all, he forbare to ioyne with Maxymylian, & refuſed to enter ſecret intelligence with the kinge catholike, but eſtraunging him ſelfe from euery one, he inclined onely to the part of the Venetians, expreſſing daily more and more a confirmacion of will to abſolue them, iudging it a thing very conuenient for the common ſafety of Italy, and for his perticular ſewertie and greatnes, not to ſuffer them to periſh: Againſt this, did make great reſiſtance th Embaſſadors of Maximylian and the french, concurring alſo with them in publike practiſe th Embaſſador of the king of Aragon, notwithſtanding he ſolicited the Pope ſecretly to the contrary, fearing no leſſe the greatnes of the french in regard of the kingdom of Naples, and reapoſing litle in the diſpoſicion of Ceſar for the ſlender ſtabilitie that was in him: Theſe Embaſſadors alleaged that it was not reaſonable that the Pope ſhould doe ſo great a benefite for thoſe, whom he was bound by equitie & promiſſe to purſue by armes, ſeeing by the confederacion of Cambray, euery confederat was bownde reciprocally to ayde one an other till there was abſolute recouerie of all thoſe places which were named for euery perticular partie: So that ſeeing Ceſar had not yet conquered Treuiſa, neither one of them ſtoode acquited of ſuch bond and promiſſe: beſides, they vrged that he might iuſtly refuſe th abſolucion, both for that they had not reſtored to the Churche the townes of Romagna, neither frankely nor willingly, nor within the tearme ſet downe in the monicion: and alſo for that euen then their obedience was not perfect & abſolute, for that albeit, beſides the rēdring of the townes, they had bene admoniſhed to reckon for the frutes, which they had not accompliſhed: To theſe obiections the Pope made aunſwer, that ſince they were returned to penance, & had ſued for abſolucion in due humilitie, it could not ſtande with the office of the Viccar of Chriſt, to perſecute them any further with ſpirituall weapons to the preiudice of ſo many ſoules, ſpecially hauing obteined of them, the townes, & by that meane the occaſion ceaſſing, for the which they had bene ſubiect to the cenſures of the Church: That concerning the reckoning or reſtitucion of the frutes, it was but a matter accidental and vrged more to aggrauat their diſobedience, then for any neceſſary reaſon, & therefore not iuſt that it ſhould ſtand againſt them as a matter of importance: That it was an action of an other nature to purſue them with tēporall armes, wherein (determining to perſeuer in the league of Cambray) he offered him ſelfe to be ready and concurrant with the others, notwithſtanding that euery

one

one of the confederats might iuſtly leaue of, for that if Cæſar had not Treuiſa, it happned by his proper error, refuſing the firſt offers which the Venetians made to him by their Embaſſador, both to leaue him all that they poſſeſſed in the firme land, and alſo to ſet him downe a ſufficient allowance and recompenſe in exchaunge of Treuiſa: And thus not being reteined by any contradiction or impedimēt of th Embaſſadors, he onely was ſlow to this action by the diſpoſicion of his minde, wherein albeit he eſteemed the abſolucion of the Venetians to be profitable to him, and to the plots he had layd, yet he determined not to giue it to them but with great regard to the dignitie of the ſea apoſtolike, and ſo, as all thoſe thinges which were dependant vpon the Church were wholy deliuered from their oppreſſions: the ſame being one cauſe that he deferred to abſolue them, together with their vnwillingnes to conſent to theſe two condicions: the one that they ſhoulde ſet at libertie to the ſubiects of the Church, the traffike & nauigacion of the ſea addriatike, which they reſtrained againſt all ſuch as would not aunſwer a kind of tribute for the marchandiſe they brought: the other, that they ſhould continue no longer at Ferrara (A citie depending vpon the Church) the office of Vecedomino: The Venetians alleaged, that they of Ferrara had conſented to it, Clement the ſixt giuing no impediment, who at that time remeyned with his Court in the citie of Auignion: They proued beſides, that Alexander the fourth had giuen them the iuriſdiction and gard of the goolfe vnder very large priuileages, whereunto they were induced, for that with their armies, with their vertue, & with their exſpenſes they had defended it againſt the Sarazins and pirats Turkiſhe, & made that nauigacion aſſured to the Chriſtians: To theſe reaſons it was aunſwered on the Popes behalf, that they of Ferrara could not in preiudice of the eccleſiaſtik iuriſdiction, conſent, that any other ſhould hold office or exerciſe dominion in Ferrara, & that the people of Ferrara had neuer willingly conſented, but were forced by a long and heauy warre, & after they had in vaine called the aide of the Pope, whoſe cenſures the Venetians contemned, were conſtrained to accept peace with condicions at the diſcreſſion of thoſe that could doe more with them by armes then by reaſon: Touching their authoritie alleaged of Pope Alexander that he had graunted it to them, it neither appeared by hiſtorie, nor other authentike tradicion, neither was there any faith to be giuen to it but by the teſtimonie of the Venetians, A thinge of iuſt ſuſpicion in their owne cauſe, eſpecially carying ſo great importance: And be it, there were ſome apparance of matter, yet it was more likely, that he, who they ſayd had accorded to ſuch thinges in Venice, had done it by threatnings or by feare, then that a Pope of Rome to whom affore all others apperteineth the defence of iuſtice and the recourſe of the oppreſſed, would haue conſented to an action ſo cruell and impudent, and bearing domage to the whole world.

The Venetian armie at Vincenſa.

In this eſtate of affaires, in this diuerſitie of intencions of Princes, in this ſlender power and reputacion of Cæſar, the Venetians, vnder the leading of Andrea Gritti, ſent their armie to Vincenſa, where they knewe the people, in a generall diſpoſicion deſired to returne vnder their iuriſdiction: And making their approches in the entrey of the euening, they wonne the ſubburbes of P. after they had made great batteries with their artilleries: Touching the citie, albeit there were as yet within it very fewe ſouldiers, yet the Venetians had no great fewertie to carie it: Onely the townelmen, by the incenſing of Fracaſſe as the brute ronne, after they had ſent their Embaſſadors to them about mydnight, put them into the citie, the Prince of Hanaw and Fracaſſe retyring into the caſtell: And, (ſuch is the propertie of victorie) it was aſſuredly beleeued that if the Venetian armie obteining Vincenſa, had without delaye approched Verona, that towne had done the like, examples beinge of greate effect in the alteracion of fortune: But the Capteines were of aduiſe not to yſſue out of the towne til the caſtel were commaunded, which they had at their deuocion the ſourth day, the P. of Hanavv and Fracaſſa diſtruſting their owne weakenes, leauing it abandoned: In matters of enterpriſe nothing is more hurtfull then delayes, and nothing more hindreth the felicitie of victorie then not to ioyne oportunitie to occaſion and fortune: for, in this meane while and reſpit, new regiments of Cæſar entred Verona, together with three hundred launces of the french King, vnder the enſeigne of Monſr d'Aubigny: In ſo much as conteining a ſtrength of fiue hundred launces & fiue thouſand footemen ſpaniſh and Almains, it was now no more eaſie to take it: Not longe after, the Venetian armie approched Verona & was deuided into two partes, in either of which were three hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſemen, and three thowſand footemen: They hoped that vpon their approching, there would be ſome cõmotion in the citie, but becauſe they appeared not affore the walls all in one time, thinhabitants within the towne, going to meete with the former part which came beyond the riuer of Adice and was already entred the ſubburbes, conſtrained them to retire, Luke Maluezze comming a litle after on the other ſide of the riuer with the other part, retiring alſo: And both they ioyning together, incamped in the village of S. Martyn within fiue miles of Verona: Where vnderſtanding that two thowſand Almain footemen iſſued out of Baſciana, were gone to make pillage of the places about Citadella, turning that way, they incloſed thẽ in a valley called Fidato: But th Almains, ſuccored by thoſe of Baſciana, made their way by force, though with ſome hurt for the ſtraite paſſages, & leauing Baſciana abandoned, the Venetians tooke it: from Baſciana, one part of tharmie went to Feltro and Cyuitall, which places after they had recouered and commaunded, they preſented them ſelues before the rocke of Eſcalo, which they commaunded after thartillerie had ſomewhat executed: At the ſame time Anthonie and Hierome Sauorguiana, gentlemen that followed the Venetian faction in the contrey of Fryull, tooke new caſtell ſtanding on a rough mountaine in the middeſt of the patrimonie, (ſo is called that part of Fryull which is beyond the riuer of Taillemont) And all this while there was heard no other thing of Cæſar then vaine rumors, and how being moued with the action of Vincenſa, was immediatly come to Pietra, he trauelled from one place to an other vſing great diligence with very ſmall effect.

The Venetian armie vpon the contrey of Ferrara.

After this, the Venetian armie drew towards Monſelice and Montagnana, both to recouer Poliſena and to charge the places of Ferrara togither with their nauie, which the Senat, reiecting the councel of the moſt wiſe Senators who iudged it to raſhnes to be intangled with new enterpriſes, had determined to ſend againſt the D. of Ferrara, well furniſhed with ſtrength & munition along the riuer of Pavv: To this maner of action they were induced, not ſo much for the profite of thaffaires preſent, as for thincredible hatred they bare to him: it ſeemed to them that they could not iuſtly complaine, of that he had done to ſhake of the yoke of Vicedomino, and to recouer Poliſena, but they ſuppoſed it neither to their honor nor profite to ſuffer, that being not content to chalenge that which he pretended to apperteine to him by right, he aſpired to reteine that whereunto he had no way any cooller of intereſt, for that at ſuch time as Cæſar leauied his ſeege from before Padoa, he receiued of him in fee, both the borow of Eſte (from whence is ſpronge the name and familie of Eſte) and alſo the borow of Montagnana for pawne and aſſurance of the money that had bene lent him: to which places he pretended no right at all, onles he reapoſed equitie in his ambi-ambicion and tyrannie: There were added to this the remembrance of many actions of insolencie and violence, and other execucions done by his people in the recouerie of Polesina, who pushed on with an incredible hatred against the name of the Venetians, had executed great harmes and cruelties vpon the gentlemen, yea euen to reuerse their houses and put fire in them: In these respects it was agreed, that their nauie and sea armie, commaunded by Ange Treuisan, compounded vpon seuenteene light gallies with a large furnishment of meaner vessells and able bodies for seruice, should saile toward Ferrara: This fleete entring into Pavv by the mouth of the furnaces, and burning Corniola with certaine other villages neare to Pavv, went pilling & spoyling the cuntrey vp to the lake of Scuro, from which place the light horsemen who followed them as a strēgth by land, made incursions as farre as Ficherolo: which albeit is rather a house of pleasance then a castell, yet it is not without his reputacion and name, for that Ro. S. Seuerin lay long time before it, being Capteine to the Venetians in a warre which they had against Hercules father to Alphonso: The comming of this nauie togither with the rumor of tharmie by land that was to follow, brought no litle amaze to the Duke, who, hauing but a slender strength of souldiours, & thinhabitants of Ferrara either for their small numbers, or for their ignorance in warre, not sufficient enough to oppose against such a daunger, had no other meane to defend him selfe, vntill he were comforted with the succors which he exspected from the Pope and french king, then to let with force of shot bestowed vpon the brinke of Pavv, that thennemies should passe no further: for these impediments Treuisan, after he had in vaine assaied to passe, seeing he coulde aduaunce nothinge without he were succored by land, came to an anker in the middest of the riuer of Pavv behind a litle Ile right ouer against Pulisselle: A place within xj. miles of Ferrara and very apt to torment the towne and make many hurtfull execucions vpon the contrey: his intencion was to exspect there the armie who had gotten without great difficultie all Polisena, hauing first recouered Montagnana by composicion, by the which the Magistrates of Ferrara were deliuered to them as prisoners, togither with the Capteines of the footemen that were within: In this time of exspectacion of tharmie, for the more safe riding of the nauie in the place where it lay, Treuisan beganne to raise two bastillions vpon the bankes of Pavv, the one on that side to Ferrara, the other vpon the shoare right against it, casting withall a bridge vpon the vessels to haue the more oportunitie to succor that bastillion that was on Ferrara side: Affore this worke was accomplished, the Duke deuised either to reuerse it or at least to hinder it, and with a councell happly more courageous then discreete, he called together all the youth of the towne with such companies of souldiours as were come to his paye, and sent them out to assaile the bastillion: but it was an enterprise in vaine, for that the defendants receiuing succors of their peoples which issued out of the vessells, beganne to disorder the ennemie and put them to flight, wherein albeit the Duke him selfe came to the medley with a fresh succor of horsemen, and with his presence brought a newe hart to most of his people not trayned in warre, yet such was the furie of the ennemie, for whom the sewertie of the place fought being manned with many peeces of small shot, that in the ende he was constrained to retyre, leauing many of his people either deade or taken, and that not so many of the inexperienced and base multitudes, as of the most braue souldiours and nobility of Ferrara: Amongest them was Herc. Cantelmo, a younge man of greate hope, and whose Auncestors affore tyme were Dukes of Sore in the kingdome of Naples: The fortune of this man was more tragicall then of any of the residue, for that as certaine Slauonian souldiours led him priſoner into a gallie, and contending amongeſt themſelues for the intereſt of his body, there was one of them, who, with a new example of barbarous crueltie, miſerably ſtricke of his heade: for theſe perills ioyned to the manifeſt apparance of extremity to the towne of Ferrara, Monſr Chaumont ſent to the ſuccors of it the lord of Chaſtillion with an hundred and fifty french launces: And the Pope being kindled againſt the Venetians for entring into that action without any regard to the ſuperioritie which the Churche hath there, appoynted the two hundred men at armes which he had ſent to Cæſar, to be conuerted to the defence of Ferrara: But it might haue hapned that theſe ſuccors had bene to ſlow, if the Venetians had not bene compelled to looke to the defence of their owne eſtate: it hath bene declared before how the french King was not diſcontented with the difficulties of Maxymylian, partly for the continuall feare he had of his proſperitie, and partly for that burning in deſire to make him ſelfe Lord of Verona, he hoped by his neceſſities to haue it on him at laſt either by purchaſſe or by ingaging: on the other ſide he was not a litle ielous ouer the Venetians, and no leſſe was his diſcontentment that their greatnes was eſtſoones reeſtabliſhed, which would nouriſh continuall perill and perplexitie for his Duchie of Myllan: And therefore Cæſar not hauing ſufficiently refurniſhed Verona for want of money, the french king was conſtrained to enter into care of thinges, and, in ſending new companies beſides thoſe men at armes which were entred there already, to foreſee that that citie returned not to their obedience: To this Monſr Chaumont gaue beginning, who, after the loſſe of Vincenſa, being drawne vpon the marches of Verona, reteyned in the french Kinges pay two thowſande ſpaniſh footemen, which were within Verona, who beganne to draw into tumult for want of payment: he ſent thether for a greater ſewertie, other bandes of footemen according to the aduice of Tryuulce, who, for that Monſr Chaumont feared leaſt the Kinge would be diſcontented with ſo great expenſes, made aunſwer, that it was a leſſe euill that the King charged him with thexſpenſes of his money, then by ſparing his treaſor, to loſe or put in daunger his eſtate, the one bringing ſaffetie to the Kings thinges, and in the other no honor nor reputacion to the place he held vnder the Kinge: Beſides this, he lent to Cæſar eyght thowſand duckats to pay the ſouldiours that were within Verona, receiuing in pawne both for the repayment of that ſumme and others which hereafter he ſhould aduaunce for his affayres, the towne of Vallegge, a place which the king eſteemed muche for the ſewertie of Breſſe, both for the nearenes beinge within ſix miles of Breſſe, and for thoportunitie of the paſſage ouer the riuer of Myncia which is alwaies commaunded by ſuch as are Maiſters of Valegge and Peſquiero: The marching of Monſr de Chaumont being followed with the moſt part of the launces in the Duchie of Myllan, together with the companies which he had put into Verona, and the rumor that ronne of his preparacion to beſege Vincenſa, were the cauſes that the Venetian armie, leauing for the defence of Poliſena and to ſuccor their nauie, foure hundred light horſemen and foure hundred footemen, retyred from the contrey of Ferrara, deuiding them ſelues into Legnago, Soaue, and Vincenſa: And being careful to aſſure Vincenſa, & to prouide that the contrey there about were not diſtreſſed by the garriſon of Verona, they fortified it with a wonderfull trench full of water enuyroned with a rampier whereon were diſperſed many baſtillions: it began from the foote of the mountaine which lieth aboue Soaue, & reaching about fiue miles along the plaine that leades from Rouigne to Montfort, it ended at a corner of certain mariſhes which ioyne to the riuer of Adice: They alſo fortefied Soaue and Legnague, by which meane ſtanding vpon their gard all the winter, they aſſured the whole contrey: And albeit,

by the retyring of the Venetian regiments, the daunger of Ferrara was somewhat diminished, yet, it was not altogether taken away, for that though they were acquited of all feare to be forced, yet they were troubled with a suspicion least the people for the great harmes they receiued would decline to an vtter weakenes, or els fall into the last despeire: for, the souldiours of the nauie and their followers ronne vp euery day euen to the gates of the towne, and other vessells of the Venetians which had on an other side distressed the state of the Duke of Ferrara, had taken Comache, And putting diligence to their fortune, they were troublers of those places in many sortes of afflictions: About this time arriued the companies of the Pope & the french king, by whose cõfort the Duke who being warned affore by the harmes receiued in thassalt of the bastillion, was incamped in a strong place neare to Ferrara, began to make many incursions & proffers, to draw thennemies to battel, who hoping that their army would returne, refused to feight before: And as there can be no action of warre without his proper fortune & calamity: so, in these entercourses of saillies & skirmishes, it hapned one day the Cardinal of Este hauing ronne vp neare to the bastillion, as he returned backe, a shot came out of one of the vessels of thennemies which caried away the head of the Count Lodouyk de la Mirandola, one of the Capteines of the Church, none other in so great a multitude being hurt either with that or any other shot: At last the knowledge & experiẽce of the cõtrey, ioined to the nature & oportunity of the riuer, made easie that which in the beginning had semed so hard & daũgerous: for, the Duke & Cardinal, hoping to be able to defeate the nauy with the artillery, if they had meane to make it discẽd in sewerty vpon the banke of the riuer, the Cardinal returned to charge the bastillion with one part of the bandes, wherein his fortune was so equal with his vallour, that giuing the repulse to thennemy which were issued out to the skirmish, & making slaughter of some of them, he occupied & fortefied that part that was next to the rising, & so without all priuitie & knowledge of thennemie, vpon the beginning of the night, he drew thartillerie to the banke side right ouer against them, & breaking it & planting it with a wonderful silence, he began to execute vpon thẽnemies with a wõderful furie: making terrible to them that aduauntage which he had wonne of them by his industrie and vallour: The vessells would haue sought sauetie by flying, but because there was a long traine & ranke of great artilleries, which managed by men experiẽced, bet a farre of, they chaũged rather the place of peril, then auoided the daũger, hauing withal the presence & labor of the dukes person, who knew both how to force artilleries, & how to manage thẽ: by thaffliction of so many shots of artillerie, notwithstanding the ennemies for their parts ceassed not to shoote but in vaine, for that they that plaied vpõ the brinke were couered with the rising of the hil, their vessels fel into diuerse fortunes & were consumed with sundry miserable aduentures: some of them that had no more abilitie to gouerne their ships & defend their bodies against the furie of the shot, yelded them selues without respect of condicion: some, whose destiny was driuen with a more violẽce, were miserably burnt with the men that were in them: & others, gouerned by desperat resolucion, gaue them selues a pray to the bottõ of the waters, for that they would not fall into the mercie of thennemie: And the Capteine, leaping into a litle skyff almost in the beginning of the skirmish, founde sauetie by the swiftnes of his oares, his gallye being galled thorow both sides, was sonke after he had fled aboue 3. miles vsing cõtinual defence against the aduersitie of her fortune: In this discomfeyture, all things being ful of blud, ful of fire, & dead bodies, the calamitie of thennemy brought to the power of the Duke, fiftene gallies, certain great ships, many foystes, with infinit ſmal veſſels: There died about two thouſand bodies, ſome by ſhot, ſome by fire, & ſome by water: three ſcore enſeignes were taken, but not the principal ſtandard which was ſaued with the general: And as in a general calamity euery one hath his fortune, ſo, many winning ſhoare & land, were gathered vp by the Venetian light horſemen, in whoſe vallour they found ſauety for their liues: others that could not auoid the perſecution of thēnemy fell into thaduēture of impriſonment, & others in flying, hapned into many harmes by the paiſants, & eſcaping from the daunger they feared moſt, they were driuē into perils which they douted leaſt: The priſe of the veſſells was caried to Ferrara, where, in memorie of ſo great a victorie, they were kept many yeares vntil Duke Alfonſo made reſtituciō hauing deſire to gratifie the Venetians: Immediatly after the ouerthrow of this nauy, Duke Alfonſo diſpatched with expedicion 3. hundred horſemen & 5. hundred footemen to defeat the other army that had takē Comachio, who recouering Loretto which the Venetians had fortefied, it was thought they had brokē the whole army, if, ſeeing into their daūger, it had not retyred to Bob. finding more ſewerty to auoid the peril, then to hope in fortune: This was the ende of the ſeege of Ferrara which continued about a moneth, the euent & iſſue wherof (which ordinarily is the true touchſtōe by the which mē may iudge of worldly things) did wel declare how much wiſer were the coūſels of a few, who perſwaded that leauing all other enterpriſes, & reſeruing their treaſors to be employed in actions more conueniēt & profitable, they ſhould only looke to the preſeruacion of Padoa, Treuiſa, with other places recouered: thē of ſuch, who though more in nūbers yet inferior in diſcretiō repleniſhed with paſſions of hate & diſdain, were eaſie to be intāgled with thoſe enterpriſes, who as their begining was bred in raſhnes, ſo their cōcluſion brought forth at laſt incredible exſpēſes, with no leſſe infamies & harmes to the cōmon weale: ſuch cōmōly are the frutes that follow enterpriſes begō with light councels, being gouerned by a fortune equal to the condicion & nature of thaction.

But on Padoa ſide, matters ſucceeded rather to the furtherance of the Venetians then others: for, notwithſtanding Cæſar kept vpon the contrey of Vincēſa with fower thouſand footemen, yet one part of the regiment of the Venetians, (and that neither ſtrong nor great) ioyning with them thaide of the peiſants of that quarter, tooke almoſt before his eies, the paſſage of Eſcale, Cogolo & Baſciana, a place of ſo much more importance, by how much it is conuenient to hinder the diſcending of thalmains into Italy: And as him ſelfe, cōplaining much that for the departure of Monſr la Paliſſe many diſorders were hapned, went at laſt to Bolſane to aſſiſt the dyet which by his ordenance was to be kept at Tſpruch: So according to his example, Monſr Chaumont left there all his thoughts and great deſires to performe thenterpriſe of Vincenſa and Legnague: And ioyning to this diſpoſicion to depart, theſe reaſons and conſideracions that both thoſe places were well manned and fortified, & alſo the ſeaſon of the time very contrary, he retyred to Myllan, leauing good garriſon within Breſſe, Peſquiero, & Valegge: And within Verona, for that Cæſar of his ſinguler forces was not able to defend it, he beſtowed ſix hundred launces and foure thouſand footemen, who being ſeperat from the ſouldiours of Cæſar, were lodged in the ſubburbes of S. Zeno, hauing yet in their power the Citadell for their greater ſewertie.

Deſcription of Verona.

The citie of Verona of great name and antiquitie is deuided by the riuer of Adice, a riuer both large & deepe comming from the mountaines of Almany, and as it falls into the playne, it goeth crooking on the left hande touching vppon the foote of the mountaines, & ſo entreth into Verona, And when it yſſueth out, he ronneth from the mountaines and ſpreadeth into a goodly playne and very fertill: That parte of

Verona

Verona which hath his ſituacion vpon the coaſt and ſomewhat into the playne, is beyond Adice towards Almanye: the other part which is on this ſide Adice, and all in a goodly plaine, hath Mantua for his proſpect: vpon the mountaine neare S. Georges gate, ſtandeth the caſtell of S. Peter, and within two bowes ſhooting from thence drawing againſt the hil, is the caſtel of S. Felix, the one ſtanding vpon the very toppe of the hill, and they both no leſſe ſtronge by ſituacion then by walls: And yet to loſe them, for that by the aduauntage of their ſituacion, they commaunde the citie, were to put Verona in manifeſt daunger: Theſe caſtells were kept by the launceknights: But in the other parte which is ſeparat from this by the riuer, is the olde caſtell looking towards Peſgara, and hath his ſituacion almoſt in the middeſt of the citie, going thorow the riuer with a bridge: Not three bow ſhootings of, drawing towards Vintenſa, ſtandes the Citadell, and betwene them both, the walls of the citie ioyne without, in forme of halfe a circle: but within, is a wall going from the one to the other which is in the middeſt of two great ditches, the ſpace betwene both the wals being called the ſubburbes of S. Zene, which, with the garde of the Citadell was appoynted for the lodging of the french: Whileſt armes were there as it were in reſt, Maxymylian ſolicited continually to make truce with the Venetians, the Pope alſo interpoſing very diligently by the working of Achilles de Graſſi Biſhop of Peſero, and his Nuncio: And to this ende his Embaſſadors went to thoſpitall which is aboue Eſcalo, to negociat with John Cornaro and Lovvys Monſeuigno Deputies for the Venetians: But as all matters of ſtate haue their proper difficulties and impediments, ſo, in this action the demaundes of Caſar were ſo exceſſiue, that this conference tooke no effect, to the great diſcontentment of the Pope, who wiſhed that the Venetians were deliuered of all trouble, and with whom he had wrought ſo much, to thende there ſhould be no matter of queſtion to rẽder to the Duke of Ferrara the towne of Comacho which they had burned before: withall they had promiſed him to vexe no more the ſtate of the Duke of Ferrara, to whom he gaue great fauor & ſupport, both to make him beholding to him, for that he had obteyned and was to obteine by his meane, and alſo he had hope that for theſe reſpects he would depend more vpon him then of the french king: Againſt whom, being in continual ſtudy to lay foundacions of right great importance, he had ſecretly diſpatched a Meſſenger to the king of England, and begon to worke the Svvyzzers at that time inclining to ſome quarell with the french king: To this action and for this reaſon came to him the Biſhop of Sion (whom the Latins call Sedunenſis) enemy to the french kinge, and vnder that cooller pretending to be Cardinall, and for that reſpect was receiued of him with great ioy.

About the ende of this yeare, were accorded the king of Romains & kinge Catholike, betwene whom was ſome difference touching the gouernment of the Realmes of Caſtillo: This controuerſie was long debated in the Court of Fraunce, & albeit it ſuffered many great perplexities & difficulties, yet in the end it was guided to perfection by the meane & vndiſcreete councel of the Cardinal of Amboiſe, who not conſidering how much this vnion was hurtful to the affaires of his king, was caried perhaps by this ambicion, that if by his working there might be ſtabilitie & agreement betwene them, it would be a degree to lift him to the Popedom, being in this, a daũgerous councellor to reſpect more his proper intereſts, then the ſafetie of his contrey: Such then was the power of his diligence and authoritie, that he induced Maxymylian to conſent that the king Catholike, in caſe he had no yſſue males, ſhoulde be gouernor ouer thoſe Realmes vntil their litle ſonne Charles were come to the age of maioritie, to whom ſhould be no power to take vpon him the title of king during the life of his mother bearing the prerogatiue and iuriſdiction of Queene, for that in Caſtillo the iſſue males exclude not the general iſſue: That the king Catholike ſhould pay to Cæſar fifty thowſand duckats: that he ſhould ayde him according to the treaty of Cambray, vntil he had recouered all that apperteined to him: And laſtly to pay to Charles euery yeare forty thowſand duckats: By this conuention, the king of Aragon was confirmed gouernor ouer the Realme of Caſtillo, & ſtanding nowe in ſtate to haue faith & credit with Cæſar, ſince both the controuerſies were determined, & they both had equal intereſts touching their Nephew: he might now more boldly looke into the meanes by the which he might hinder the greatnes of the frēch king, which he held alwaies ſuſpected for the regard of the kingdom of Naples: About this time alſo, the Pope entred into ſuſpicion that the pronotary Bentyuolo remeining at Cremona, labored ſecretly to returne into Bolognia, againſt which accident he cauſed to be reteined in the pallaice of Bolognia for certaine daies, Iulian de medicis: And attributing all things to the ill diſpoſicion of the french king, he made knowne the feare he had that he would paſſe into Italy to ſubdue it, & make Pope by violence the Cardinal of Amboiſe: And yet at the ſame time, he ſpake without any regard in derogacion of the honor of Cæſar as of a perſon incapable of ſuch a dignitie, & by his incapacity had brought the name of the Empire into great contempt: About the ende of this yere, died the Count Petillano general ouer the Venetian armies, a man for his age and graue experience in actions of warre, of great name & worthines, & with the Venetians, of that credit and truſt, that they neuer feared he would put their ſtate in daunger, by raſhnes or want of councell.

The yeare after which was 1510. the ſame dowts & ſuſpicions continuing, warrs began to ſtirre on all parts, but coldly & according to the ſeaſon: for the Venetian army lying encamped at S. Boniface vpon the contrey of Verona, helde Verona as it were beſeged: from whence Charles Baillon, Federyk de Boſſole & Sacromoro Viſcounte, comming to their ſuccors, were charged by the ſtradiots, who ouerthrew them, & taking priſoners Charles & Sacromoro, Federyk foūd ſauety in the reskew of the french which iſſued out of Verona for their ſuccors: An other time they brake an other bād of frēch horſemen, amongeſt whom Monſr de Cleſy was taken priſoner: on the other ſide (fortune can both ſmile & laugh) two hundred frēch launces yſſuing out of Verona with three thowſand footemen, forced by aſſalt a baſtillion towards Soaue, which was garded by a band of ſix hundred footemen, & in their returne, they ouerthrew a great multitude of paiſantes: But whileſt the warre was occupied with theſe cold proceedings, the minds of Princes were in great paine and care, but ſpecially Cæſar had his perplexities, who douting howe he might cary the victorie of the warre againſt the Venetians, & poſting ouer (according to his cuſtome) his affaires from one diet to an other, had cauſed to be publiſhed the dyet at Auſpurge, and being kindled againſt the Pope for that the Electors of th Empire puſhed on by his authoritie, made inſtance to negociate in the dyet rather for peace with the Venetians then for prouiſions for the warre, he had cauſed to departe from Auſpurge the Biſhop of Peſero, his Nuncio: he conſidered alſo that the deliberacions of dyets were vncertaine, tedious, and full of difficulties, the ende of one breeding the beginning of an other: he ſawe withall, that the french king excuſed him ſelfe daily of the demaundes and enterpriſes that were tendred to him, ſome times alleaging the ſharpnes of the ſeaſon, ſometimes requiring aſſignacion certain of the exſpēces which were to be made, & eftſones proteſting that by the traity of Cambray he was not bownd to ayde him alone, but ioyntly with the Pope & king of Aragon, with whom it was reaſonable that the proceedings were mutuall and common,as the confederacion and bond were ioynt & generall: for theſe reaſons, he entred into reſolucion that there was no remedie more readye for his affaires,then to induce the french king to embraſe thenterpriſe to take Padoa, Vincenſa,and Tremiſa,employing his owne forces,and taking ſufficient recompenſe: This demaund was wel liked by many of the kings councel,who conſidering that till the Venetians were wholly chaſſed out of the firme lande, the Kinge ſhould dwell in continual exſpenſes and daungers,perſwaded his Maieſtie vpon thoſe reaſons,to deliuer him ſelfe of them at one blow,and in one action making but one exſpenſſe. The Kinges minde was not altogether eſtraunged from this councell, being caried happly with the ſame reaſons, and therefore albeit he inclined to paſſe in perſon into Italy with a mighty armie,which he called mighty and puiſſant as often as he had in the ſame more then a thowſand ſix hundred launces, with his gentlemen & penſioners: yet,harkening to other councels by the cõſideracion of other reaſons,he ſtood ſuſpended in mind,expreſſing a confuſion more then he was wont,for that the Cardinal Amboiſe,A man of great authoritie and ſtomacke,afflicted with a long & greeuous maladie, forbare to manage his affaires which were wont to be diſpatched wholy by his direction: The king beſides that of his natural diſpoſicion,he loued not much matters of exſpenſes, was reteined alſo by a deſire he had to Verona for thaccompliſhing wherof it ſeemed to him a good meane to haue the king of Romains intangled with continual warres,for which regard he had newly lent to him eighteene thowſand duckats to pay the launceknightes that lay in garriſon in the citie,and was bound to make it vp a further ſumme of fifty thowſand,with cõdicion that he ſhould not onely hold the Citadell for his ſecuritie and pawne,but alſo the old caſtel ſhould be ſet ouer to him,together with the next gate of the towne, the better to haue free entrey and yſſue: And laſtly,for want of reſtoring the money within one yeare, the towne of Valeggo ſhould remeine to him in perpetuall gouernment, with power to fortefie aſwell the towne as the Citadell at the charges of Caſar: Theſe conſideracions drewe the Kinges minde into no ſmall perplexities, but muche more was he troubled with feare,leaſt the Popes intencions would wholly varie and alter, if he ſhould either leade or ſende into Italy a newe armie: for,the Pope,no leſſe full of ſuſpicion,then alſo ill contented that he ſhould impatroniſe vpon Verona, beſides that he ſtill kept a will enterteyned to abſolue the Venetians, did alſo all that he could to ioyne him ſelfe with the Swyzzers: for confirmacion of which diſpoſicion,he had ſent backe agayne into that contrey,the Biſhop of Syon,with money to diſtribute amongeſt them,and promiſſe to indue him ſelfe with the holy cappe: he ſought alſo with all his diligence,by what meanes he might eſtraunge the Kinge of England from the amitie of the frenche Kinge, whome albeit his father at the inſtant of death had aduiſed,for his ſecuritie and benefite, to continue in aſſured league with him,and for that reſpect was yearely payed to him fiftie thowſand duckats: yet, being caried ouer with hotte humors of youthe and the great habilitie of treaſor that his father had left him, it ſeemed he had no leſſe in conſideracion the councells of thoſe, who for the deſire of newe thinges ioyned to an auncient hatred which the Engliſh doe ordinarily beare to the french nation, made perſwaſions to him for the warre, then the wiſedome and diſcreete example of his father, who refuſing all contencions with the frenche, had gouerned his kingdome in great obedience and tranquilletie, notwithſtanding he had aſpyred to a ſtate newe and full of troubles: All theſe conſideracions vexing not a litle the minde of the frenche Kinge, who, the better to deuiſe for the affayres of Italy,was nowe gone to Lyon: he feared leaſt

his marching into Italy, which the Pope deteſted openly, would ſtirre vp ſome new innouacions by his meanes: beſides, he ſawe that the Kinge of Aragon diſſwaded him from it, but vnder demonſtracions of a friende and an indifferent louer of the common tranquillitie: In ſo much as amyd thoſe multitudes of dowtes which trauelled him on all partes, he ſawe no more certeine nor preſent councell, then with great labor and diligence, to ſtudie ſo to appeaſe the minde of the Pope, that at the leaſt he might ſtande aſſured that he were not his enemie and againſt him: Wherein it ſeemed that occaſion fauored him greatly, for that it was beleeued, that by the death of the Cardinall Amboiſe, who was extremely ſicke, he ſhoulde be eaſed of thoſe ſuſpicions, from whence it was ſuppoſed his ill contentments did principally proceede: And for that the King was aduertiſed by good intelligence, that the Cardinall of Auchx, Nephewe to the Cardinall Amboiſe, with others that managed his affayres in the Court of Rome, had with great raſhnes both in deede and wordes labored more to quicken and kindle, then to appeaſe and mollefie the Popes minde: he woulde no more vſe their ſeruice in thoſe actions, but ſent to Rome in poſte the Lorde Albert Pie Count de Carpy, A perſonage in whome was indifferent the greatnes of his minde and expedicion of his witte: he caried very large commiſſions not onely to offer to the Pope the Kinges forces and authoritie to ſerue his turne in all accidents and vpon all occaſions, but alſo in inclining as much as he could to his wil and nature, he was to communicat with him frankely and ſimply the ſtate of all thinges that were practiſed, together with the requeſts that Ceſar made to him, and finally to referre to his arbitracion and wil whether he ſhould paſſe into Italy or not, and whether he ſhould miniſter to th Emprour ſpeedely or ſlowly: he had alſo in charge to diſſwade the abſolucion of the Venetians, but before he ariued, it was reſolued and promiſed by the Pope: the Venetians after long diſpute and abode of their Embaſſadors there, conſenting at laſt to the condicions whereupon the difficulties ſtoode, not finding any other remedie for their ſauetie, then to be ioyned with him: The condicions for the which thabſolucion was to be giuen, were openly publiſhed in the cõſiſtorie the xxiiij of February in preſence of the Venetian Embaſſadors, who confirmed them by writing according to thauthentike direction from their common weale: Theſe were the particulars: That they ſhould not in any ſort diſpoſe the benefices or dignities of the Church: and that they ſhoulde make no reſiſtance or difficultie touching the frutes & prouiſions deriuing of them to the Court of Rome: That they ſhould not gainesay that in that Court ſhould not be perſecuted the cauſes for benefices with others appertaining to thecclesiaſtike iuriſdiction: That they ſhould not charge the goods of the Church, and exempt places of their temporall dominion, with tenthes or any other ſortes of impoſicion: That they ſhoulde renownce from thappellacion againſt thadmonicion, and from all intereſts & rightes gotten vpon the Church landes in what ſort ſoeuer, but ſpecially from all thoſe prorogatiues and rightes by the which they pretended to holde the office of Vicedomino in Ferrara: That the ſubiects of the Church and their veſſels may freely traffike thorough their goolfe, and that with ſuch ample facultie, that the marchandiſe of other nations brought in their bottoms, ſhoulde not be troubled nor ſubiect to pay tolls: That it ſhould not be lawfull for thẽ in any ſort to medle with Ferrara, or any townes of that ſtate which were dependant on the Church: That al couenantes & contracts which they had made to the preiudice of the Church, with any the ſubiects or vaſſalls of the ſame, ſhould be cancelled and made voide: That they ſhould not receiue any Duke, Baron, or other ſubiect or vaſſall of the Churche, that ſhould be an enemie

mie or rebell to the ſea Apoſtolike: That they ſhould be bownd to make reſtitution of all the moneys which they had exacted vppon the reuenues of the Churche, together with reparation of all the harmes which the Church had ſuffred.

Theſe obligations with the promiſes and ſufficient renouncements, being receiued in the conſiſtorie, the Venetian Embaſſadors at a day appoynted according to thauncient examples of tymes, were brought vnder the portall of the great Church of S. Peter, where falling at the Popes feete, being ſet in his pontificall ſeate neare the brazen gates, and honored with thaſſiſtantes of all the Cardinals and college of Prelates, they asked him pardon in great humilitie, confeſſing their contumacie and faultes paſt: After this, according to the cuſtome of the Churche, were pronounced certaine prayers, and ſo proceding to all the other degrees of ceremonies, the Pope receyuing them into grace, gaue them abſolution, and enioyned them for penaunce to go viſite the ſeuen Churches: After the action of abſolution was done they entred into S. Peters Churche, beeing guided by the great penitencier: And after they had heard Maſſe which was denied to them before, they were very honorably accompanied to their howſes by many prelates and Courtiers, not as perſons excommunicated and interdited, but as reconciled Chriſtians and deuout children to the ſea Apoſtolike. Soone after they returned to Venice, more loaden with the ceremonies, then made bleſſed with the vertue of their abſolution, leauing behinde them at Rome, Hieronimo Donato one of their number, and who by his vertues and ſingular facilitie of witte and learning, becomming very agreable to the Pope, did afterwards great ſeruice to his countrey in things which he negociated with him.

THE NINHT BOOKE OF THE hiſtorie and diſcourſe of Guicciardin.

THE mindes of men of their proper inclination are mutable, bearing no ſmall ſubiection to paſſions of enuie, ambition, and glorie: And to great Princes aſpiring to high actions, by ſo muche leſſe tollerable is the ſtroake of reuolution and chaunge, by howmuche more thoccaſions are wrought directly contrarie to their exſpectations, and do conclude preiudicially agaynſt their proper imperie and greatnes: for, as this abſolution whiche the Pope gaue to the Venetians, brought no litle greefe to the minde of Maximilian, beeing

ſo muche the more vexed, by howmuche thaction was accompliſhed with a will reſolute, and touched him more particularly and principally then all the reſidue: So alſo the French king, hauing no leſſe intereſt in the harmes that might happen, did equally communicate in the perplexities of this alteration, for that he deſired for his priuate profite that the greatnes of the Venetians ſhould not be eftſones reeſtabliſhed: Neuertheleſſe he coulde not finde out what were the intentions and laſte endes of the Pope. And therefore feeding himſelfe with vayne hopes concerning the difficulties of thaffayres that were prepared againſt him, he perſwaded himſelfe that the Pope ſtirred onely for ſuſpicion of his vniting with Maximilian, and that temporiſing with him, and giuing him no occaſion of greater feare, he would paſſe no further, but reſt ſatisfied with thabſolution he had giuen: A perſwaſion muche abuſing the kings affayres, and no leſſe farre from the reſolution of the Pope, who growing more and more confirmed in his deliberation, and litle reſpecting the declarations and impedimentes of the confederate Embaſſadors, ſuffred the ſubiects and dependantes of the Churche to enter into the pay of the Venetians, who receiued into intertainement John Paule Baillon as generall of their whole companies, ſtanding without a gouernor by the death of the Count Petillano: they tooke alſo into their wages John Levvis and John Vitelli, ſonnes to the late John & Camilla, and made Ranſo de Cere colonell of their footmen, (holding it a iuſtice as reaſonable to fauour them with this libertie for their temporall ayde, as to acquite them of the paynes of the Churche, both the one and other reſpecting one meaning and matter:) And as in this action he made open declaration that he tooke the Venetians into his protection, ſo he laboured alſo to bring them to agreement with Cæſar, hoping vnder that meane not onely to ſeperate him from the French king, but withall to knitte him with himſelfe and with the Venetians to make warre vpon him: wherein, for the more eaſie ſucceding of this deuiſe, taking his oportunitie vpō the neceſſities of Cæſar, he interpoſed his authoritie to the electors of thempire and the free townes, to thende that in the dyet of Auguſt there ſhould be no conſent of contribution: But the more he aduaunced and vrged this practiſe, the more he founde it of harde operation, for that on the one ſide, Cæſar would not harken to any motion of agreement, vnleſſe Verona might remayne to him: and on the other ſide, the Venetians (in whom the Pope had hope of a greater facilitie) perſwading them ſelues to be hable to defende Padoa in all fortunes, and that keeping that citie, time would fauour them with more occaſions, demaunded reſolutely the reſtitution of Verona, offring to pay in recompence a huge ſumme of money. To a minde diſpoſed to troubles, nothing
" is more ſweete then the ſtudie of vexation: and by howmuch more plentifully doth " abounde the humor of ambition, by ſo muche leſſe is limited the deſire of oppreſ-
" ſion, which in mindes corruptly inclined, holdes nothing vnlawfull that may ſerue
" to thaction pretended, nor any thing vnreaſonable that agreeth with the humor of " their paſſion, in whom this is one natural cuſtome, to conuert all things to his owne
" propertie & working. The Pope omitting neither meane nor matter that might giue furtherance to his purpoſe, made ſecret ſolicitation to Henry the eight then king of Englande, to rayſe warre againſt the French king, wherein enforcing the memorie of thauncient emulations of thoſe two kingdomes, he ioyned to the facilitie of thenterpriſe, this occaſion of the felicitie and ſucceſſe: that if he would begin to leaue armes againſt Fraunce, thaction would take imitation in many others, to whom the puiſſance and greatnes of that crowne was either ſuſpected or hated: he forgat not to encourage him to embrace with that deuotion which in other times had bin proper

proper to the kings of Englande, the glorie that was offred him to be protector and preſeruer of the ſea Apoſtolike, which, without the ayde of his authoritie and reſkewe, ſtoode in manifeſt daunger by thambition of the French king. In this practiſe the king of Aragon did communicate with the Pope, but ſecretly and not really, vſing perhaps this moderation of minde, not to ſuffer his deſires to be greater then his fortunes. But that which was of greateſt importance, the Pope enterteined ſtill with the Svvizzers the negociations which were begonne by the Biſhop of Syon, by whoſe authoritie (being great with that nation) and perpetuall importunitie labouring their aſſemblies and councels, and preaching in their Churches: he obteined at laſt that the Svvizzers, receiuing euery yere a thouſande Florins of Rhein for euery Canton, ſhoulde be bounde to the protection of him and the eſtate of the Churche, with permiſſion to the Pope for his defence agaynſt all men that would vex him, to leauie certayne proportions of footmen: The occaſion that moſte helped forwarde this matter, and made his requeſt more eaſie and plauſible, was the diſagreement that began to kindle betweene them and the Frenche king: For the Svvizzers being of nature proude and weening, became more rayſed and lifted vp in minde by the eſtimation that others had of them, and chalenging to them ſelues peculiarly the glorie of the French victories, were caried into this preſuming, that all the conqueſts and honorable actions which eyther the king raigning, or his predeceſſor had obteined in Italie, proceeded principally of their valour and the feare of their armes: And therevpon inſiſting vppon merites, as though the crowne of Fraunce ought much to them, they demaunded (the French king ſoliciting to make renouation of thalliance that nowe was determined) that he would augment their penſions, being then threeſcore thouſand frankes by yere, ouer and aboue the mercenarie contributions which were ſecretly diſpearſed amongſt priuat perſons, penſions which had ben begon vnder Lovvis the eleuenth, and continued vnto the preſent time: But for that they accompanied their demaundes with a preſumptuous audacitie which the king conſtrued to manifeſt inſolencie, and for that of paiſantes and mountayne men (ſuche was his phraſe) they ſought imperiouſly to impoſe and taxe him being a king, he began ſo to ſhake them of with wordes and countenaunces, that they might diſcerne how muche he diſdayned them, more reſpecting hys dignitie royall, then regarding the preſent vtilitie of things: He was the more induced to this, for that at the ſame ſeaſon by the ſolicitation of George Sopreſſan, the peoples of the valleys ſubiects of Sion, who were gouerned in ſeuen communities which they call courtes, being corrupted by publike promiſes and priuate penſions, were not onely confederate with him, but alſo bounde to giue paſſage to his people, and refuſe it to his enemies, and withall to enter into his payes with ſuch numbers of footmen as their forces were hable to beare. In the ſame ſort did enter confederacie with him, the Lordes of the three leagues, whom they call the Griſons: and albeit one part of the men of the valley had not yet approued it, the king was not without hope to induce them to ratification by the ſelfe ſame meanes: In ſo muche as he began to perſwade him ſelfe that the amitie of the Svvizzers was nowe no more neceſſarie to him, hauing determination to ſupplye his warres with Almain footmen, ouer and beſides thoſe proportions of ſouldiours whiche the valley men and Griſons ſhould furniſhe him of: Beſides, he feared little their ſtirres or preparations, and leſſe exſpectation that they were hable to aſſayle the duchie of Millan but by the ſtraites of Ballinſona, and other paſſages of great difficultie: through the which, if they ſhould march in great trowpes and numbers, he made his reckoning that they would be eaſily reduced into neceſſitie of vittels by a ſmall armie: And if they came but in ſmall companies, a ſlender ſtrength woulde likewiſe ſuffice to " make them retyre: Wherein he made his coniectures at random, and ſeemed to ly-

" mit the fortunes of them whoſe forces he yet knewe not, flattering himſelfe with his " proper greatnes: An humor preiudicially mouing in Princes, in whom there ought " to be no parcialitie of compariſon, when there is queſtion of enterpriſe and action:
But becauſe he ſtoode reſolute not to graunt them augmentation of penſions, he coulde not obteine in their councells a renouation of thalliance, notwithſtanding there were manye euen in the middeſt of them, who did earneſtly perſwade it, to whom in particular were retributed no ſmall rewardes: And for that cauſe they conſented more eaſily to the confederation which was demaunded of them by the Pope: By which newe confederation the Pope ſeeming to haue laied a great fundation for thaduauncing of his purpoſes: and hauing a perpetuall nature to proceede in all thinges as ſupreme and ſoueraigne aboue all men, and as though the whole world were in neceſſitie to receiue lawes of him, he began to ſowe ſeedes of newe controuerſies with the Duke of Ferrara, eyther puſhed on by the cauſe that was in diſputation betweene them, or els by an auncient hatred, for that hauing receiued of him ſo many honors, benefites, and gratifications, he ſeemed neuertheleſſe to depende more vpon the French king then vpon him: A dealing whiche he conſtrued preiudicially and farre contrarie to the recompence of his merites. But whatſoeuer was the cauſe, ſearching a beginning of the quarrell, he commaunded imperiouſly Alfonſo Duke of Ferrara to forbeare to continue the working of ſalt at Comacchio: he alleaged that it was not reaſonable that that which was not lawfull to him when the Venetians helde Cerua, ſhould nowe haue ſuffraunce being poſſeſſed by the ſea Apoſtolike, to whom apperteined the abſolute gouernment of Ferrara and Comacchio: Beſides, it was a matter of great profite, for that the working ceaſſing at Comacchio, the ſaltpittes of Cerua miniſtred traffike to all the townes thereaboutes. But Duke Alphonſo, who reappoſed more in the coniunction which he had with the French king and in his protection, then he feared the Popes forces, gaue ſmall obedience to this commaundement: he complayned that he ſhoulde be conſtrayned not to reape the fruite which grewe to him in his proper houſe with ſmall labour, and to be driuen to buye of an other for the vſage of his peoples, the ware whereof he had enough to repleniſhe forreine countreis, alleaging withall that that ought not to be enforced for an example which the Venetians had made him conſent vnto, more by compulſion of armes then by condition of iuſtice: Whiche reaſons little auayled to content the Pope: who eftſones ſent to proteſt to him vnder great paynes and accurſings to diſcontinue that worke: ſuche were the thoughtes and actions of the Pope, inclined altogether to rayſe vp and ſupport the Venetians:

The league of Cæſar and the French king againſt the Venetians.

But on the other ſide Cæſar and the French king thirſted not a little after their embacement, with deſire to diminiſhe their authoritie and greatnes: And beeing muche diſcontented with the demonſtrations which the Pope expreſſed on their behalfe, they drew into a more ſtrayte alliance and intelligence one with an other, concluding to inuade the Venetians that ſommer with huge forces: for the better aduauncing of which expedition, the contracte bare that the Frenche king for his parte ſhould ſende Monſr Chaumont with a ſtrong armie, wherevnto ſhould be ioyned the Launceknightes that lay at Verona: And Cæſar for his parte, ſhould make entrie into the countrey of Friul with thoſe leauyes of men and munitions which he hoped to obteine of thempire in the dyet of Auſpurge: and hauing accompliſhed

that action, he was to proceede to other enterprises according to the estate of occasions and tyme. They solicited the Pope to ioyne with them according to the bonde of the league of Cambray, holding it but iuste to sommon him to performe that which he had so willingly promised: But he who was no lesse discontented with that motion, then hauing a capacitie searching aboue the witte of other men, made aunswere that he was no more bound to that confederation which hath had already his perfection, seeing it had bene in the power of Cæsar to haue first Treuisa, and afterwards a satisfaction & recompence in money. Cæsar likewise solicited to haue succours from the king Catholike, both by vertue of the same capitulations of Cambray, and also vnder couenantes and promises made particularly with him, at suche time as he consented to him the gouernment of Castillo: But this solicitation, as it bare a forme of requeste to ayde him rather with money then with men, so the king of Aragon whom it imported muche not to disfurnishe him selfe of the thing whereof he had moste neede, made aunswere that he would sende him foure hundred launces: A strength of little profite for Cæsar, for that aswell in the Frenche armie, as in his owne campe, the seruice on horsebacke was plentifully furnished. About this time the Citie of Verona liued in great afflictions vnder the souldiours that garded it, who, for that they were not payed, drewe into secret conspiracie with certayne Venetian bandes, by whom they thought to worke some trayterous stratageme: for which purpose the Venetians issuing out of S. Boniface, approched the Citie by night to skale the Castell of S. Peter: and as they were entred S. Georges gate, whyleste they taried to fasten their ladders together (for that being single they sufficed not to reach to the height of the wall) eyther they were heard by the warders of the castell of S. Felix, or in their feare they seemed to heare a brute of armed men: And as in matter of enterprise imagination abuseth muche, so whether they feared their owne shadowes, or whether they doubted that to be in deede which was but a vision in their timerous fantasies, they sodenly retyred, leauing behinde them their ladders as testimonies of their feare and intention, leauing to thenemie to doubt muche of their vallour, that in so fayre an oportunitie forsooke the felicitie that their fortune had prepared. The armie retyred forthwith to S. Boniface, and at Verona the conspiracie comming to detection, many were passed ouer to iustice and punishment, though some found fauour more by clemencie then their proper innocencie.

In this season the Pope expressed certayne inclinations to be eftsones reunited with the french king, not of goodwill, but for feare: for that Maximilian sommoned him with braue messages to lende him two hundred thousande duckets, threatning that otherwise he would ioyne with the French king agaynst him: An other reason of his feare was a brute that was spread, that in the Dyet of Auspurge it was agreed to minister to him a strong succor, and also the peace had bene newely established betweene the kings of Englande and Fraunce, and published with great solemnitie. By reason of these feares, he began to trayte with great diligence with Albert de Carpy, whom till that day, he had interteined with wordes and hopes generall, vsing in all his actions of negociation more art then true meaning, and lesse fidelitie then fayre resemblaunce: But besides the mutabilitie of his owne nature, the variation of occasions made him not dwell long in that resolution: both for that the Parliament of Auspurge (without the forces and aydes of which there was no great reckoning to be made of the threates of Cæsar) not aunswering exspectation, determined for him no other succours, then a supply of three hundred thousande Florins of Rhein, whereof his prodigalities had already made great wastes: And also the king of Eng- land signified that he had set downe an article in the peace, expressing that it should be no peace as often as the French king should offend the state of the Churche: In regard of these things, the Pope reentred into new stomack, and returning eftsones to his former thoughts, he began to heape new cõplaintes agaynst the Duke of Ferrara, who, he sayd, that since it was suffred to the subiects of the Church to sayle and traffike frankly through the gulfe of Venice, had imposed newe tributes vppon the goods which were brought to Venice by the riuer of Pau: A taxation which the Pope alleaged that the vassall coulde not leauie (according to the interpretation of the lawes) without licence of the Lorde paramount, and withall it was a thing that brought great preiudice to the people of Bolognia, who were his subiects: for which consideration he made instance that they might be deposed, threatning that otherwise he would bring warre vpon him. Wherin to giue him a greater feare, he caused to marche his bands of men of warre into the countrey of Bolognia and into Romagnia. These things troubled not a little the mind of the French king, beeing loath on the one side to fall at oddes with the Pope, and on the other side he felt him selfe touched in honor and conscience to leaue abandoned the Duke of Ferrara, to whose protection he had bound himselfe by receiuing thirtie thousande duckets. No lesse was he moued with the regarde of his proper profite, for that duke Alfonso depending wholy vpon him, and fleeing so much the more to his deuotion, by howmuch he sawe him persecuted by the Pope, he esteemed it his proper interest to preserue him, and for that cause he interposed his deputies with the Pope to solicite some accord betwene them: But it seemed iust to the Pope that the king should withdraw himself from that protection, alleaging that he had taken it vppon him agaynst the capitulations of Cambray, by the which (made vnder cullor to render to the Church that which was vsurped) it was forbidden that none of the confederates should take into protection any that was named by an other, and that for his part, he had named the Duke of Ferrara: and moreouer it was defended that no one of them shoulde haue any action with things apperteyning to the Church: He alleaged that the like also was confirmed in the confederation made particularly betweene them at Biagrasso, wherein was expresly prouided that the king shoulde not take into his protection any estate depending of the Church, and shoulde aswell refuse to take them hereafter, as also cancell and make voyde all protections whiche he had accepted heretofore. To which adiections notwithstanding it was aunswered for the king, that by the same conuention it was prouided that the king shoulde haue power to dispose of the Bishoprikes on this side the Mountes as he listed, which the Pope had violated in the first auoydance that fell, as likewise he had broken in fauor of the Venetians, the capitulations made at Cambray, by which euasions the king was at libertie not to obserue the things he had promised: yet because he would not come to armes with the Pope for the quarrell of the Duke of Ferrara, he offred conditions by the which, not offending directly his honor, the Pope in a great parte might rest satisfied touching thinterestes which the Churche and he pretended agaynst Duke Alfonso: And besides, he was contented to binde himselfe by promise (according to the Popes request) that the Frenche armies shoulde not passe the ryuer of Pau, but for the protection of the Florentins wherevnto he was bounde, and to molest P. Petruccio and Iohn Paule Baillon, vnder coollour of money promised by the one, and detained by the other.

The Pope threatneth the duke of Ferrara.

Whilest these things were in action, Monsr de Chaumont aduaunced with an army of fiftene hundred launces, and ten thousande footemen of many nations, amongst whom

whome were certayne regimentes of Svvizzers priuatlye leauyed, and not by permiſſion of the Cantons, and followed with great proportions of artilleries, with certayne bridges prepared to paſſe ryuers: hauing alſo ioyned with him the duke of Ferrara with two thouſande men at armes, fiue hundred light horſemen, and two thouſande footmen: With theſe companies he tooke in the meane while without any impediment, Poliſena de Rouigno, a peece which the Venetians had abandoned, & taking alſo the tower Marquiſano ſtanding vpon the riuer of Adice towards Padoa, he marched on to Caſtelbaldo, and had at the firſt ſommon the townes of Montagnano and Eſte, the one apperteining to Alfonſo d'Eſte by graunt from Maximilian, and the other giuen to him in gage. Alfonſo after he had recouered theſe townes, ſent backe his regimentes vnder coollour to encounter certayne galleys of the Venetians whiche floated vppon the ryuer of Pavv. By the imitation of Chaumont, the Prince of Hanavv Maximilians lieftenaunt, marched in like ſort out of Verona with three hundred French launces, two hundred men at armes, and three thouſand Almain footmen, and ioyning with Chaumont, he followed him alwayes within one remoue of his campe: They left behind them Montſelice holden for the Venetians, and marched towards the countrey of Vincenſa, where Lonigua and the whole countrey yelded without reſiſtance: for that the Venetian armie conteining ſix hundred men at armes, foure thouſand light horſmen and ſtradiots, and eight thouſand footmen vnder Iohn P. Baillon generall, and Andrevv Gritti treaſorer, hauing firſt abandoned Svvano, and alwayes retyring into places of ſuretie according as thenemie aduaunced, and laſtly hauing beſtowed ſufficient garriſon within Treuiſa, and a thouſande footmen within Meſtro, they were retired to the Brentelli, a place within three miles of Padoa, and of great ſuretie for their incamping, both for that the countrey is ful of hills and riſings, & the place it ſelf ſtandeth inuironed with the waters of theſe three ryuers Brento, Brentello, and Baguillon: Suche is the frayltie of mans nature, that the „ ſoddennes of perill is more terrible then the daunger it ſelfe: and by howmuche it „ happneth to a multitude vngouerned, by ſo much it ſeemes more deſperate, for that „ when their minds are once poſſeſſed with feare, there is no place for confidence and „ reſolution, and all hopes are turned into doubtes, their extremitie making them ty- „ merous, which ought to make them reſolute. The poore people of Vincenſa, for „ that the armie was thus retyred, finding them ſelues no leſſe abandoned, then altogether vnhable to defende their eſtate, and ſeeing that their fortune had left them no other hope then ſuche as they might exſpect in the mercy of the victors, whiche they ſuppoſed they might more graciouſly obteine by the meane and working of Monſr de Chaumont: they ſent to him to demaunde ſafeconduit to addreſſe embaſſadors to him and the Prince of Hanavv, which being graunted, they preſented them ſelues in forme and aſpecte pitifull and full of ſorrowe and feare afore them bothe being then at the bridge of Barberano ten miles from Vincenſa: Their attyre repreſenting the lamentable condition of their fortune, and their other dolefull circumſtances, bearing a preſence of ſorowe and languiſhing mindes, moued pitie in ſuche as came prepared to ſpoyle them, and inclined to grace euen thoſe that afore had determined their deſtruction: So effectually worketh the conſideration of miſerie in mindes tractable to compaſſion. The cheefe of the Embaſſage, beeing the mouth of the reſidue, was licenſed to ſpeake in this ſorte in the preſence of all the capteins and principalls of tharmie.

This Queſtion maye bee asked in the conſideration of our preſent condition, „ whiche is leaſt hurtfull, eyther to bee extreme miſerable, without the threates and „

" feare of fortune, or to be in full prosperitie whiche alwayes standes subiect to di-
" minution and falling: And since there is a diuine power that hath bene appoynted
" from the beginning to guyde all our mortall accidentes, methinkes that that man

" he that perswadeth that they are alwayes firme and stable: The same beeing a " comfort to earthly men (if any thing coulde moderate their frayle passions) not to " holde those thinges greeuous whiche both can not be auoyded, and also are sent " for our better reformation & necessarie correction. If it were knowen to any of this " honorable presence (at whose feete I speake) howe muche this Citie of Vincensa
" (heretofore enuied of her neighbours for her riches and felicities) hath suffred, since
" more by error and rashnes of her inhabitantes, and happly more by a certaine fatall
" disposition then through other occasion, she returned vnder the iurisdiction of the " Venetians, together with the intollerable harmes and domages she hath receyued:
" We beleeue (and your gracious aspects assure no lesse) that in your hartes will be of our miſeries, not ſparing to ſpoyle thoſe goods that were left vs for our releeſe & ſuccor: And without, we haue not bene free from all thoſe ſortes of harmes which warre and hoſtilitie are wont to drawe with them, our afflictions being ſo much the more greeuous and great, by howmuche the warre hath bene continuall without intermiſſion: we haue nothing remayning in this miſerable countrey which carieth any memorie of the riches, delite, or felicitie thereof: All the houſes of our poſſeſſions are burned, all our woods cut downe and waſted, all our feelds & gardens defaced, and all our infinite heards of cattell driuen away and deuoured: This is the ſeconde yeere that we haue bene driuen to reape our harueſt afore the time, that we haue had no ſecuritie to ſowe our ſeedes, and leſſe ſeaſon to gather our fruites, yea the ſeueritie of the time hath left vs no hope that this contrey ſo generally deſtroied, can be euer readdreſſed: Our miſeries are come to theſe deſperate tearmes and limittes, that what with the needefull ſupportation of our lyues, and to furniſh thintollerable exactions whiche our neceſsities haue impoſed vppon vs, all that remayneth either of our hidden treaſure or common ſtoare, is farre inſufficient to nouriſh the lyues of our wyues, children, and our ſelues, to whome remayneth nothing but a miſerable ſpectacle of the happineſſe wherein we haue lyued: If the preſent ſtate of our countrey were nowe obiected to anye that had ſeene and knowen it before, and our calamities preſent meaſured with our felicities paſſed, I knowe it woulde ſtirre vp motions of pitie and compaſsion euen in the myndes of enemies, conſidering ſpecially that this Citie (albeit it hath ſmall circuite) whiche was wont to bee repleniſhed with inhabitantes, ſtately in maieſtie and preſence, riche through magnificence of buildinges and pallaces, an aſſured and free retraite for all ſtraungers, a Citie reioyſing in friendſhippes, ſocieties, and gratulations, to be nowe made voyde of dwellers, poore in the preſence and countenaunces of men and women, no place lefte for hoſpitallitie, no one man hable to feede his familie for one moneth, and in place of ſtately feaſtes, meetinges, and banquettes, nothing left but penurie, deſolation, and feare to ſhowe friendſhippe, men ſighing in the ſorrowes of their wyues and children, whome they can not comfort, and women wayling the ſeueritie of their common deſtinie. And theſe calamities (oh gracious Prince of Hanovv) woulde bee yet greater, if we conſidered not that on your vertuous wyll dependeth eyther the laſte deſolation of oure afflicted countrey, or the hope that once agayne vnder the winges of Cæſar, guided by your highe wiſedome and clemencie, we mighte lifte vp oure heades, not to be reſtored (for that agreeth not with our merite and fortune) but conſuming our lyues to thuttermoſt, to auoyde at leaſt an extreme and haſte deſtruction: A grace whiche wee ſo muche the more exſpecte and hope for, by howmuche your affabilitie and eaſineſſe is knowen to vs, wherein we doubt not but you wyll reſemble and immitate Cæſar, with whoſe examples of clemencie all Europe is repleniſhed. All our wealth is conſumed, all our hopes determined, all our fortunes layde at your feete, there remayneth nothing elſe to vs but our lyues and perſons, agaynſt the whiche to vſe crueltie, were neyther profite to Cæſar, nor prayſe to you: for, as that benefite is vniuſt that is purchaſed with the hurte of an other, ſo that glorie can not be without infamie, that is wonne with the puniſhment of men in miſerie. Clemencie is as greate a vertue as iuſtice, and Nature hath ſowen in men aſwell ſeedes of pitie and forgiueneſſe, as of crueltie and reuenge, and hath enioyned Princes aboue all other creatures, to beare an infinite regarde to the dignitie of vertue. We beſeeche you with teares, which it may pleaſe you to imagine

" to be mingled with the miſerable complaintes of euery ſex, of euery age,& of euery
" order that is within this Citie, to make the wretched and deſolate ſtate of Vincenſa
" an example to all others of the clemencie of th Almain empire: Call to your hono" rable memories the pitie and magnanimitie of your renowmed elders, who beeing " victorious in Italie, preſerued the Cities that were vnited and confederate, many of " them chooſing thoſe ſeates for their proper dwellings, and from thence, to the ſin-
" guler glorie of th Almain race, are diſcended ſo many noble houſes in Italie, as Gonſa-
" guo, Catraro, and Eſtalo who ſometimes were our Lordes, Let Vincenſa ſerue at one " time for example, both that the Venetians ayded and ſupported by vs in our leſſer
" daungers, haue cowardly and diſhonorably left it abandoned in the greateſt perills
" and neceſſitie of defence that euer coulde happen: and on the other ſide that the " Almains, in whom was ſome reaſon to diſtreſſe vs, haue ioyned remiſſion to our of" fences, and both frankely and gloriouſly preſerued vs whome by due iuſtice they " might haue put to puniſhment. The puniſhment of one onely is not crueltie, but " the calamities of many: That Prince that lookes ſtrictly vppon the offences of his " people, cannot be called mercifull, but rigorous: and hauing an example in the dea" ling of God with ſinners, if he looke ſtraitely vpon offendors, who can abyde it? We " appeale alſo to you oh inuincible Lorde Chaumont, to take vs into your protection:
" looke backe to the example of your king, whoſe clemencie was greater to them of
" Millan and Genovvay drawne into reuolte without neceſſitie, then was their faulte " which was both voluntarie and vaine: but after they had found his clemencie grea" ter then their tranſgreſſion, and that his pardon preuayling aboue their offences, he " had reclaymed them by ſo great a benefite as to gyue them lyfe, he coulde neuer
" after finde any fault in their fidelitie and ſeruice. Seueritie keepes men in obedience
" but it is by compulſion, which is ſeruile: but clemencie winneth the heart and af" fection, whiche confirmeth the ſuretie of the Prince. Oh Prince of Hanavv, if the " preſeruation of Vincenſa turne nothing to the profite of Cæſar, at the leaſt it will

Suche is the obſtinacie of a mynde once iuſtly iniuried, that neither the pitifull

phraſe

phraſe of this Oration, nor the ſorrowfull aſpect of the ſpeaker lying proſtrate at his feete, and muche leſſe the compaſſion of ſo wretched a Citie, coulde moderate the mynde of the Prince of Hanovv, whoſe felicitie making him inſolent, and hys authoritie cruell, he coulde not ſo muche commaunde ouer his paſſions, as to make hys words leſſe cruell then his deedes, making by the mouth of a Doctor this rigorous and vncomfortable aunſwere.

Thinke not that eyther the power of your perſwaſions, or other reſpect of your diſſembled ſorrowes, can ſuffice to wipe out of memorie the faultes you haue committed agaynſt the maieſtie of the name of Cæſar, without any regarde to his greatneſſe or dignitie, and leſſe reſpect to the honor wherein you were receiued by him: you haue by common councell & conſent of the whole citie, called into your towne the Venetian armie, who forcing the ſuburbes with great difficultie, diſtruſted to take it, and beganne to go away: you called them in agaynſt the will of the Prince that repreſented the perſon of Cæſar: you conſtrayned that prince to retyre into the Caſtel, & in the furie of your rebellion haue ſacked the artilleries and munitions of Cæſar: you haue torne in peeces his pauillions diſplayed in honor of his victories in ſo many warres and triumphes. Theſe inſolencies were not done by the ſouldiours of the Venetians, but the people of Vincenſa haue defyled their loyaltie, diſcouering their violent thirſte after the blood of th Almains: It was not long of you that the Venetian armie tooke not Verona, whiche they had done, if knowing thoccaſion, they had followed the victorie: This happned not by the counſayle or perſwaſion of Fracaſſo, who abuſed by your ſlaunders, hath expreſſed clearely hys innocencie: it was an effect of your wicked mindes, it moued by a poyſoned impreſſion of hatred, which without cauſe you beare to the Almain name: your offences are ſo haynous, as there is no place leſte for pardon or merite: the deſpite of the iniurie you haue done, maketh double the deſyre of reuenge: it was not your errours that made you offende, but your wicked inclinations, and therefore to vſe clemencie to you, woulde bee both hurtefull and infamous, for that you woulde returne to your vomite vppon euery occaſion: And the harmes you haue receiued, haue not bene for a puniſhment and skourge of your faults, but for that you would obſtinately perſeuer in rebellion: And nowe that the Venetians haue abandoned you, you haue no other remedie to defende you, but to implore the pitie of Cæſar, whom you haue betrayed. The Prince was determined not to heare you, following thintention and commiſſion of Cæſar, and yet he hath not denied you audience, ſatisfying the will of the Lord Chaumont: but he will not chaunge the ſentence, which ſince the firſt daye of your rebellion hath remayned fixed in the minde of Cæſar: he will not receyue you otherwiſe, then to diſcreſſion for your goodes, your honours, and your lyues: And hope not that he will do that to ſhowe you the more clemencie, but the better to make you ſerue for example of puniſhment to ſuch as accurſedly breake their faith to their ſoueraigne Prince.

The ſeueritie of this aunſwere dyd not a little amaze the aggreeued people of Vincenſa, who ſeeming to ſuffer a generall priuation of all ſence and feeling, began eſtſones with a newe eſtate of teares and ſorowe, to recommende them to the mercy of him in whom they diſcerned nothing more ready then a diſpoſition to reuēge: But being repulſed by the ſame Doctor, rebuking them with words more bitter and fierce then the firſt, they ſtood more deſperat then before, expreſſing by their lookes which they caſt vpō Mōſr Chaumōt, howmuch they hoped in him, & how greuouſly wrought in them the ſharpe anſwers of the Doctor: Chaumont encouraged them to obey neceſſitie, and in giuing them ſelues wholy vp to the wil of the Prince, to ſeeke to appeaſe his wrath: he comforted them in the ſingular humanitie and curteſie of Cæſar, in whome beeing a Prince of ſo noble race and an excellent Captayne, was not to be exſpected that he woulde doe a thing vnworthy of his name and vertue: he wylled them not to bee amaſed with the ſeuere aunſwere that was made, but ſayde it ſerued better for their turne that noble and free myndes ſhould ſometymes burſte oute ſharpe and byting wordes, for that deliuering by that meane ſome parte of their anger, the rygour of their dooings was thereby ſomewhat the more abated: he offred to doo all that he coulde to moderate the minde of the Prince, ſo farre foorth as they woulde preuente the worſte by humbling them ſelues ſimply to his diſcreſſion: by whoſe counſayle and conſideration of their owne neceſſitie, the poore afflicted Vincentins falling eſtſoones proſtrate on the grounde, referred abſolutely both their honours, lyues, and citie to the power of him in whome they coulde yet diſcerne no hope of mercy: Then Monſr de Chaumont beganne to ſolicite for them, declaring to the Prince, that in chaſtiſing them he was to reſpect more the greatneſſe and glorie of Cæſar, then the qualitie of their offence: That he ſhoulde not ſet downe ſuche an example to others that were to fall into the lyke faultes, leaſt diſpayring to obteyne mercy, they woulde become obſtinate to thextremitie: That clemencie had alwayes brought foorth to Princes goodwill, ſuretie, and reputation, where crueltie was the cauſe of diſobedience, diſtruſte, and conſpiracie, not taking awaye (as manye vndiſcretly beleeue) impedimentes and difficulties, but rather ſerued as working inſtrumentes to redouble them and make them greater: laſtly he tolde him that it was worthy the vertue of a noble Prince, to forbeare to ſtrike when he had power to do it, and not by correction to encreaſe thafflictiion of ſuche as are ſufficiently puniſhed with the remorſe of their proper tranſgreſſions: his authoritie accompanied with the petitions of many others, together with the miſerable waylings of the Vincentins, ranged the Prince at laſt to this moderation, to promiſe them ſafetie of lyfe, the diſpoſition of all their goods remayning wholly at hys will: A bootie greater in opinion then in effect, for that the Citie was lefte almoſte no leſſe deſolate of men then of goods. The Almains in this licenſe of warre ſearching after praye and ſpoyle, vnderſtoode that many of the towne and countrey were withdrawne with their goodes into two caues in a certayne mountayne neare to Vincenſa called the gutter of Maſano, where by the ſtrength of the place, and difficultie to enter, they ſuppoſed to finde ſecuritie, or at leaſt to be free from the furie of the ſouldiours: Thither went many trowpes of the Almains to make pillage of the Caues, and beeing not hable after long tryall and many harmes, to force ſuche as were within the great Caue, they went to the leſſer, where making a vayne experience of their ſtrength, they vſed at laſte the meane of fyres, and by the benefite of the ſmoake carried it, with the loſſe of more then a thouſande perſons: Suche are the " inſolencies of ſouldiours when is no authoritie to bridle their furie, and libertie hath " lawe to ouercome diſcipline.

Vincenſa being taken in this maner, greater difficulties appeared in other thinges carying more reſpect and importance then was exſpected in the beginning: for, not onely Maxymylian did not ſtirre againſt the Venetians as he had promiſed, but alſo the regiments which he had in Italy diminiſhed continually for want of paye: In ſo much as Monſr Chaumont was conſtrained to ſtay him ſelfe vpon the garding of Vincenſa, much leſſe that he was able to execute any other enterpriſe, thincertenties of thempe-

th Emprour ſtanding as great impediments to his vallour, and moſt preiudiciall to the common fortune of them both: Neuertheleſſe he determinde to goe incampe before Leguagno, A towne of ſuch ſpecial regard, that if it were not taken, all that had bene done till that day ſerued to nothing. The riuer of Adice paſſeth by the towne of Leguagno, and the leſſer part of the ſame which they call the hauen is towards Montagnana, where the Venetians not reapposing ſo much in the ſtrength of the towne & vallour of the defenders, as in thopportunitie & impediments of the waters, had cut the riuer in one place: And in an other porcion of the banke where is the greater part of the towne, they had cut it in two places, ſo as the riuer comming falling through thoſe trenches and ſo ſpred it ſelfe by many armes into the loweſt places, had ſo couered the contrey about, that ſtanding drowned for many monethes, it was almoſt become a marriſhe: it hapned that the raſhnes and diſorder of the Venetian bandes, partly made theſe difficulties leſſer: for, Monſr Chaumont comming to incampe with his armie at Minerua three myles from Leguagno, and hauing ſent before certeine of his horſemen and footemen, who as they would haue paſſed the laſt arme of the water which was within halfe a mile of Leguagno, they encowntred the bandes of footemen which kept the warde of Porto who were yſſued out to ſtoppe them of paſſage: But the foote bandes of the Gaſcons and Spanyardes ruſhing reſolutely into the water vp to the breſt, repulſed them and purſued them with ſuch vallour & furie, that they entred with them pellmell into Porto, very fewe of the footemen of that place being ſaued, for that as ſome were ſlaine in flying, ſo the greater parte that fought into Leguagno were drowned as they would haue paſſed the riuer of Adice: This ſucces cauſed Monſr Chaumont to leauy his campe at Minerua, going the ſame night to lodge within Porto: And after he had cauſed to trayle vnder the water, the great artilleries which the firme bottom of earth did ſuſteine, he cauſed the laborers and poyners the ſame night to fill vppe and choke the trench of the riuer: And knowing that on that ſide to Porto, Leguagno was inexpugnable for the largenes of the riuer, ſo great, that ſcarcely could they fight on that ſide, (notwithſtanding betwene Leguagno and Porto for that it is incompaſſed with the hills, it is not ſo large as below) he cõmaunded to prepare a bridge for thartillerie and greateſt part of tharmie to paſſe on the other ſide: but finding the boates & barkes which he had cauſed to be brought thether, not to ſuffice for the largenes of the riuer, he incamped neare the riuer vppon the oppoſit of Leguagno making to paſſe by the benefit of the boates and barkes to thother ſide of Adice, Capteine Molard with fower thowſand Gaſcon footemen and ſix peeces of artillery, aſſoone as they were ouer the riuer, they began on both ſides the riuer to batter the baſtillion which was vppon the riſing of a hill at the poynt of the towne, on that ſide aboue: And hauing battred a great parte of it, notwithſtanding the defendantes expreſſed great office and vallour in renforcing, yet the night following, the treaſorer of the Venetian campe, hauing more feare of his ennemie then hope or confidence in his owne people, withdrew him ſelfe ſuddeinly into the caſtell with certeine Venetian gentlemen: Aſſoone as it was day and their retyring vnderſtanded, the Capteine of the footemen that garded the baſtillion, rendred it to Molard, their liues and goods ſaued, which neuertheleſſe was not obſerued, for that when he was come out, he and his footemen were ſtripped by the ſouldiours of the campe: A licence contrary to the law and reputacion of armes. By the example of the baſtillion the towne was immediatly put to ſacke by Capteine Molard, & the bands of footemen who garded an other baſtillion made on the other point of the towne, fled through the mariſh, leauing their armor & weapons in entring the water: Thus

Leguagno by the cowardiſe of ſuche as were within it, was conquered with a more ready facilitie and ſpeede then either was exſpected or imagined, the cowardiſe on the one parte giuing as great oportunitie to the victorie, as the vallour of the other ſide: The caſtell made no greater reſiſtance then the towne, for, the bulwarkes and defenſes being executed the daye following by the artillerie, and beginning to vndermyne one ſide of a tower with intencion afterwards to giue fire to it, they within fearing the perill which yet was but in demonſtracion, yeelded them ſelues with condicion that the gentlemen of Venice remeyning in the power of Monſr Chaumont, the ſouldiours ſhoulde departe with a white rodde in their hande: fortune in this victorie mixed the felicitie of Monſr Chaumont with ſome bitter compoſicion, for that in that place he had aduertiſement of the deathe of his Vncle the Cardinall Amboiſe, by whoſe great authoritie and regiment with the french kinge, he, hauing bene already rayſed to high promocions and honors, hoped ſtill to be lifted vp higher, and receiue farre greater aduauncements: ſuche a buſie humor is ambicion, for that in whome it ruleth, it makes them hard to be contented with thinges that they haue, ſince that which they haue gotten doth not content them, ſo longe as they hope to haue better: for that the Almains had not then ſufficient ſouldiours to leaue within Leguagno, Chaumont reſupplied their garriſon with an hundred launces and a thowſand footemen, And ſo giuing licence to the Griſons and Valeſiens (footemen marcenarye in this ſeruice) he prepared to returne with the reſidue of his armie to the Duchie of Myllan, following the commaundement of the king who woulde no more enterteyne ſo great exſpenſes: of this armie, for that the prouiſions on Ceſars part aũſwered not the promiſes that were made, there came no effect of importãce (their fortune offring to bring to paſſe the things that either their policie could not foreſee, or their vallour durſt not attempt:) Neuertheleſſe the king ſent a new commaundement to Chaumont to ſtaye yet for the whole moneth of Iune, for that Ceſar, being thẽ come to Tſpruch, no leſſe repleniſhed with difficulties according to his cuſtom, then perplexed with plots & hopes, made inſtance that he ſhould not depart, promiſing from hower to hower that he would paſſe into Italy: About which time the Almains deſiring to reconquer Marоſtiquo, Citadella, Baſciano & other peeces there abouts, to make the diſcending of Ceſar more eaſy on that ſide, Monſr Chaumont with his armie encamped at Lungaro vpon the riuer of Baguillon, to thende to ſtoppe the Venetian companies for entring into Vincenſa (very weake in garriſon) and that they ſhould not oppoſe againſt the Almains: But, being there aduertiſed that the Venetians were retyred to Padoa, the Almains ioyning them ſelues of new with him, they went to the Torricelli vppon the high waye that leadeth from Vincenſa to Padoa, And from thence leauing Padoa on the right hand, they marched to Citadella with no litle diſcõmoditie of vittels, being troubled by the light horſemen that were within Padoa, and much more by ſuch as were at Monſelice: Citadella yelded without reſiſtãce, by whoſe exãple alſo Marotiſto, Baſciano, with other peeces thereabours abandoned by the Venetians, came to compoſicion: In ſo much as thinges being diſpatched on that ſide, the armies returned to the Torricelli, and leauing Padoa on the right hand, and taking towards the mountaine on the left hand, they encamped aboue Brenta neare to the moũtaine within ten miles of Vincenſa: the chief reaſon why they went to that place, was, for that the Almains deſired to occupy Eſcalo, A paſſage very conuenient for the regiments that were to come out of Germanye, And a peece that onely of all other places from Treuiſa to Vincenſa, remeyned in the handes of the Venetians: from this place the Prince of Hanavv being departed with his Almains and an hundred french launces, launces,tooke the way of Eſcalo which was xxv. miles from thence: But he coulde paſſe no further,for that the paiſants and contrey people, bearing an incredible affection to the Venetians, and ſuch as being priſoners ſtucke not to offer their bodies to torments and death rather then to deny them or to ſpeake ill of them, had taken many paſſages in the mountaine: And after he had obteyned by compoſicion new-caſtell which is alſo a paſſage of the mountaine,he returned to the incamping place about Brento,hauing ſent by an other way towardes Eſcalo, many of his footemen, who,according to his direction forſooke the way of Baſciano,to auoyd Couolo which is a ſtronge paſſage in the mountaines there, And taking the tower more lowe by the waye of Feltro,they founde a very fewe people within Feltro, which they ſacked and burned,and ſo tooke the waye to Eſcalo, which, with the paſſage of Couolo,they founde abandoned: About that tyme alſo the ruynes were nothing leſſe in the contrey of Fryul, for that being ſometymes aſſayled by the Venetians, and ſometymes inuaded by the Almains,nowe defended and eftſoones pillaged by the gentlemen of the contrey,this daye aduaunſing, and that daye declining according to occaſions and tymes: there was ſeene in euery place nothing more then dead carcaſſes of men,townes ſacked,and fortreſſes burned: And as the calamities that a warre draweth with it be infinit, ſo it hapned often tymes that the places which had bene firſt ſacked by one armie,was eftſoones burned by the other,& except certayne ſtronge peeces, all the reſidue of the contrey put to miſerable deſtruction: But becauſe in thoſe actions there was nothing done worthy of memory,it would be no leſſe ſuperfluous to recompt the perticularities,then troubleſome to vnderſtande ſo many variable reuolucions which brought forth no effect importing the ſubſtance of the warre.

The time nowe approching that the french armie ſhould depart, there was made this newe conuencion betwene Ceſar and the french king, that his armie ſhould yet continue for the moneth following,with couenant that the extraordinary exſpenſes ſuch as ronne ouer and aboue the payes of the bandes which the king had defrayed till that time,ſhould be payed hereafter by Ceſar,together with the regiments of the footemen for that moneth: But becauſe Ceſar was not then prouided of money, the rate and ſumme ſhoulde be ſette downe of thoſe exſpenſes, and the Kinge to make it vp by way of loane to the ſumme of fifty thowſande duckats: which if Ceſar did not repaye within one yeare following together with the other fifty thowſande which were lent him before,the king ſhould reſume into his handes Verona with all the territories,and keepe it poſſeſſed til he were ſatisfied: Chaumont hauing the kings commaundement to follow ſtill thoſe warres, turned all his wits and deuiſes to take Monſelice,In which diſpoſicion aſſoone as foure hundred ſpaniſh launces led by the Duke of Termyny were arriued,who,being ſent by the king Catholike to the ſuccors of Maxymylian,had according to their cuſtom marched very ſlowly: The armies after they had paſſed the riuer of Brento,and afterwards the riuer of Baguillon at the village of Purlo within fiue myles of Padoa,arriued at Monſelice, not without ſuffering a wonderfull ſcarcetie of vittels and forrages by thincurſions of horſemen that were within Padoa and Monſelice,who beſides thoſe domages,tooke S.Benzone de Cremo, A Capteine for the french king being gonne with a very ſlender ſtrength of horſemen to view the ſkowtes: This Capteine,for that he was the Author of the rebellion of Cremo, Andrea Gritti reſpecting more that he was a ſubiect to the Venetians, then a ſouldiour of thennemies,cauſed him to be executed preſently.

In the towne of Monſelice which ſtandeth in the plaine, is a riſing as it were a ſto-

ny hill,(by that reaſon it is called Monſelice) which is very high,in the top whereof is a caſtel,And at the backe of that hil which goeth alwaies leſſening be three waſtes of walls,the loweſt wherof embraſeth ſo much ſpace that it well needeth two thowſand men to defend it againſt a whole armie: The enemies abandoned ſuddeinly the towne wherein the french being beſtowed, planted their artillerie againſt the firſt waſt,and after they had wel battred it in many places,the footemen of the Gaſcons & Spanyards began to approch the wal in diſorder,ſtriuing to enter by many breaches: There were within for the defence of it, ſeuen hundred men, who ſuppoſing it had bene an aſſalt appointed and ordered, and ſeeing their diſabilitie to make reſiſtance if the aſſalt had bene followed in ſondry places,after they had made a ſmall defence, began to retyre according to an agreement made amongeſt them ſelues before as was beleeued: But they made their retraite in ſuch diſorder,that thennemy that began but now to enter,interteyning with them the ſkirmiſh & chaſſe,entred pelmell with them at the other two waſtes & ſo to the caſtel: There the greateſt part of them were ſlaine,and the reſidue which were withdrawne to the dungion offering to yeld vpon ſewertie of life,were not accepted by the Almains, whoſe furie ioyned to their fortune,led them at laſt to put fire in the dungeon: ſo as of ſeuen hundred footemen thexecucioners reſerued very few,euery one bearing leſſe compaſſion to their calamities for the cowardiſſe they ſhewed in their owne defenſe: There were amongeſt them fiue Conſtables & Mareſhals wherof Martyn de Bourg of Tuskane was the principall,who being parties in the confuſion, they founde ſeuerally their perticular fortune: The crueltie of th Almains was ſhewed nothing leſſe againſt the buildings and walls,for,not hauing ſufficient companies to gard them,they did not onely diſmantel the fortreſſe of Monſelice,but alſo conſumed the towne with fire,holding nothing vnlawfull which was within the compaſſe of their furie to accompliſh: After this iorney,thoſe armies did nothing of importance, ſauing that foure hundred french launces ronne vp to the gates of Padoa,rather declaring their goodwil,then doing any action worthy ſo great vallour: About this tyme the Duke of Ferrara departed from the campe,and Monſr Chaſtillon with him,whom Chaumont ſent with two hundred and fifty launces for the gard of Ferrara where the people liued in great ſuſpicion,for that the bands of the Pope were not farre from thence: The Almains perſwaded much Monſr Chaumont (vrging the traitie that was made betwene them before) to goe incampe before Treuiſa, laying affore him that the actions which had bene done with ſo great exſpenſes,were of litle importance,if Treuiſa were not taken: for, touching Padoa,there was no hope to be able to haue it: Of the contrary,Chaumont replied that Cæſar was not diſcẽded againſt the Venetians with ſuch forces as he had promiſed,as alſo ſuch as were ioyned to his armie were reduced to a very ſmall number: That within Treuiſa, where the Venetians had made very great fortificacions, there were ſtrong companies of ſouldiours: laſtly he alleaged that the ſtore of vittels was worne out of the contrey, and no leſſe the difficultie to bringe prouiſion to the campe from farre places for the continual vexacion of the light horſemen and ſtradiots of the Venetians,who being aduertiſed by the diligẽt eſpiall of the contrey men of euery litle mouing that they made,and being beſides in great number,diſcouered themſelues alwaies in euery place where they thought they might endomage them: Theſe diſputacions ceaſſed by a newe commaundement that came from the french king to Chaumont,that leauing in the armie of th Almains foure hundred launces and fifteene hundred ſpaniſh footmen of the kings pay, beſides thoſe that were in garriſon in Leguagno,he ſhould ſuddenly returne with his armie to the Duchie of Myllan:

The taking of Monſelice

for that many troubles & daungers began to discloſe by meane of the Pope: by reaſon whereof Monſr Chaumont leauing the gouernment of thoſe companies to Monſr Perſi, followed the kinges commaundement, And the Almains diſtruſting to be able to doe any thing of importance, put them ſelues into Lonigno.

The Pope had of longe time ſet downe in his minde an obſtinate reſolucion not only to repoſſeſſe the Church of many eſtates which he pretended to apperteine to him, but alſo to chaſſe the frenche kinge out of all that he helde in Italy: The matter that induced this diſpoſicion was either a ſecrete and auncient ill will that he bare him, or els a ſetled ſuſpicion and ielowſie which he had nouriſhed a longe time and now was conuerted into extreame hatred: or happly it might be an ambicion of glorie to be the deliuerer (as he boaſted afterwards) of Italy from forreine nations: To theſe endes he had abſolued the Venetians of the Churche cenſures: To theſe endes was he entred into intelligence and ſtraite alliance with the Svvyzzers, making ſemblance to proceede in thoſe thinges more for his proper ſewertie, then for deſire to offend an other: And to theſe endes not being able to withdrawe the Duke of Ferrara from the deuocion of the french king, he was determined to doe all that he could to occupie that Duchie, blaſing his deuiſes with this cooller, that he ſtirred onely for the quarrell of the ſalt and ſalt pits: And yet to thende not to diſcloaſe the plaineſſe of his thoughts vntil he were better prepared, he had continuall negociacion with Albert Pio, to haue agreement with the french king, not ſparing to proteſt openly, though he kept his intencions diſſembled: The kinge for his parte interpreting all his diſcontentment to come for that he had taken the Duke of Ferrara into his protection, and hauing a carefull deſire to auoyde his ill will, conſented to contract with him newe couenants, referring him ſelfe to the capitulacions of Cambray, wherein was expreſſed that not one of the confederats ſhoulde intrude into the thinges apperteyning to the Church, and did inſert with all ſuch wordes and clauſes as might make it lawfull to the Pope to proceede againſt the Duke of Ferrara ſo farre forth as concerned the perticularitie of the ſalt and ſalt mynes, to which endes the kinge ſuppoſed that the Popes thoughtes did chiefly aſpyre: wherein he made ſuch interpretacion of the protectiom which he had taken of the Duke of Ferrara, as though there was left to him a lawefull libertie to contract with the Pope in that manner: But the nearer the king approched to the demaundes of the Pope, the further was he eſtranged and ſeperate from him, inclining nothinge the more for the newes he heard of the death of Cardinall Amboiſe: for, to ſuch as perſwaded him to the peace, and tooke their argument vppon this, that his ſuſpicions were nowe finiſhed, he aunſwered that the ſame king liuing, the ſame ielowſies did yet endure, confirming his opinion by this that the accord made by the Cardinall of Pauya had bene violated by the king of his proper deliberacion contrary to the will and councell of the Cardinall Amboiſe: yea ſuch as looked deepely into the intencions of the Pope and his manner of dealings, founde that his ſtomacke and hopes were ſo much the more increaſed and not without occaſion: for, the qualities of the kinge being ſuch as he ſtoode in more neceſſitie to be gouerned, then that he was able or proper to gouerne, it is without dout that he was much weakened by the death of the Cardinal, ſince that beſides his longe experience, his abilitie of witte was great, and ſtoode withall in ſuch grace and authoritie with the kinge and had ſuch power ouer his directions and councells, that he would often tymes take vpon him to giue of him ſelf aforme and reſolucion of affayres: A matter which could not be founde in ſuch as ſucceeded him in the gouernment, who durſt not communicat with the kinge in af-

faires which they thought would displease him, much lesse that they had authoritie to deliberat: Besides, he reaposed not the same faith & confidence in their councels, and being a body of a councell compounded vpon many persons, & they respecting one an other without any great trust in their new authoritie, they proceeded both more coldly and careleslly then either thimportance of the present affaires required, or was necessary against the heate and importunity of the Pope: who not accepting any of the offers that were made to him by the king, required him at last to renoūce, not with condicion and limitacion, but absolutely and simply, the protection which he had taken of the Duke of Ferrara, not weighing to aduaunce his owne purposes with the kings dishonor: And albeit the king perswaded him much that such a renunciacion would bring him great infamie, yet it was in vaine to labor to stay him with wordes and reasons, whose ambicions were infinit and his intencions full of malice, with which propertie of minde he aunswered the king, that seeing he refused to renownce simply, he would also take libertie not to contract with him, nor yet to be against him, and not binding him selfe to any person, he woulde studye to mainteyne the state of the Church in peace, beginning euen then to complayne more then euer of the Duke of Ferrara: whose friendes waighing wisely with what aduersary he had to doe, perswaded him to giue ouer the working & making of sale, which he aūswered he could not do without preiudicing the rights of th Empire to whom the iust iurisdiction of Comacho apperteyned: many entred into a certeine dout and opinion which tooke increasing with time, that Albert Pio the french kings Embassador, not proceeding sincerely in his lagacion, stirred vp the Pope against the Duke of Ferrara, for a burning desire he had (wherein he continued till his death) that Alfonso should be deposed from the dukedom of Ferrara: The reason was for that Hercules, father of Alfonso, hauing had certeine yeares affore, of Gilbert Pio, the moyty of the dominion of Carpy, giuing him in recompense the borow of Sassola with certeine other landes, Albert feared least in the ende the other moytye eyther by compulsion or corrupcion woulde deuolue to him, thexperience often hapning that the neighbour lesse riche and able yeldeth to the couetousnes of the most welthye and mightie: A matter which in all common weales hath bene seene to minister no
" small troubles, and therefore it hath not bene thought good that the poore and rich " should dwell neare together, for that as in the wealth of the rich man are sowne the " seedes of enuie in the mind of the poore man, so of the wants of the poore, & super-
" fluities of the rich, are nourished the disorders of a whole people: But what so euer was the simplicitie and truth of it, the Pope expressing tokens of a person vnappeasable against Alfonso, and hauing a full resolucion to leauye warre against him, prepared first to proceede with thauthoritie and censures of the Church: Wherein seking to giue some iustification to the groundes of this action, he gaue it out that he had founde amongest the recordes of the chamber apostolike, thinuestiture of the towne of Comacho, giuen by Popes to the house of Este: These were the publike and manifest behauiours of the Pope, but in secrete he solicited to sette abroache farre greater mouinges, wherein he seemed to haue giuen a good foundacion to his affaires in contracting amitie with the Swyzzers, and to haue at his deuocion the Venetians who nowe were vppon their feete: Besides, he sawe that the kinge of Aragon respected the same ende that he did, or at least was not sowndly ioyned with the french kinge: That the forces and authoritie of Cæsar were so weakened that there was left no occasion to feare him: And lastly that he was not without hopes to procure the king of England to stirre: But that which should most haue appeased him,

he made to ſerue moſt to ſtirre vp & kindle his ſtomacke, which was the knowledge he had that the frēch king hauing no diſpoſicion to make warre againſt the church, nouriſhed a ſetled deſire to haue peace, In ſo much as it ſeemed that it would alwaies remeyne in his power, to drawe him to peace yea though he had leauyed armes againſt him: The reaſon of theſe matters making him riſe dayly more inſolent, and redoubling openly his complayntes and threates agaynſt the Frenche Kinge and Duke of Ferrara, he refuſed in the feaſte of the celebracion of S. Peter (A day wherein accordinge to auncient cuſtome are offered the tributes which are due to the ſeege Apoſtolyke) to accept the tribute of the Duke of Ferrara, ſaying that the euaſion of Alexander the ſixt who in marying his Daughter had from foure thowſande duckats reduced that offeringe to a hundred, coulde not take example to the preiudice of that ſea: Beſides, he woulde not affore this tyme giue licence to the Cardinall of Achx and other frenche Cardinalls to returne into Fraunce, and vnderſtanding that daye that the Cardinall of Achx was gone to take the pleaſure of the fieldes with certein greahowndes, he entred into a vayne ſuſpicion that he would ſecretly ſtart away, and therefore ſent ſpeedely after to take him and helde him priſoner in the caſtell S. Ange: Thus diſcloſing openly his manifeſt contencion with the Frenche Kinge, and for that cauſe ſeeing him ſelfe ſo much the more conſtrayned to laye great and aſſured foundacions, he graunted to the King Catholike thinneſtiture of the kingdome of Naples vnder condicion of the ſame tribute with the which the kings of Aragon had obteyned it, notwithſtanding he had refuſed affore to beſtow it otherwaies then for forty thowſand duckats, A rate affore time impoſed vpon the french when he obteined it: In this action the Pope reſpected not ſo much the bond which in other inueſtitures of the ſame kingdom, was wont to be made to him to enterteyne euery yeare for him as often as neede required 3. hundred men at armes for the defence of the Churche as the deſire he had to make him his friend, ioyned to a hope that his aydes (vpon occaſion) might doe much to leade him into open contencion with the french king: Whereof were already diſcerned certeyne feedes and beginnings for that the king Catholike, ſuſpecting much the greatnes of the french, and no leſſe ielous of his ambicion, for that not content with the limits of the league of Cambray, he aſpired to draw to his obedience the citie of Verona, and beſides all this, being puſhed on by the memorie of auncient quarrels, deſired greatly that there might be found ſome impediment in his affayres, And therefore ceaſſed not to councell a peace betweene Ceſar and the Venetians, which was not a litle deſired by the Pope: And albeit he proceeded ſecretly in thoſe actions, yet he was not able altogether to couer his thoughtes: In ſo much as his armie by ſea beinge ſalne vpon Sicile, which he ſent to aſſayle the Ile of Gerbes (an yland auncīemly called by the Lattins the great Sirta) the king was entred into ſuſpicion, and the mindes of men that were well acquaynted with his ſuttletyes, were occupied with many dowtes.

But as in worldely dealinges it often hapneth that the thinge that is feared leaſt, doth ſooneſt chaunce, and hurteth moſte, ſo troubles and perplexities beganne to riſe to the Frenche Kinge, from thoſe partes which he dowted leaſt, and in a tyme wherein he had no exſpectacion of any mouing of armes to be prepared agaynſt him: for, the Pope betweene whoſe ſuttletye and ſecrecye was no difference, working alwayes vnder hande, ſolicited that at one tyme Genes might be aſſayled both by ſea and lande: That twelue thowſande Swyzzers might diſcende vppon the Duchie of Myllan: That the Venetians ſhoulde take the fielde to recouer their townes holden by Cæsar: And that his owne armie should enter vpon the contrey of Ferrara, with intencion to passe afterwards into the Duchie of Myllan if things begā to succeede happely to the Svvyzzers: he hoped that Genes being assailed vpon the suddein, there would easily arise some mutacion or mutinie, both for that there were many that bare no sownd affection to the french, and also that the faction of Fregosa would minister ayde, going thether vnder cooller to make Duke, Octauian, whose father and Vncle had possessed the same dignitie: That the french men amased for the commocion of Genes and inuasion of the Svvyzzers, woulde reuoke to the Duchie of Myllan, all the bandes which they had with Cæsar and the Duke of Ferrara, which would be a cause that the Venetians should easily recouer Verona, and afterwards set vpon the Duchie of Myllan: lastly that his regiments shoulde doe the like after they had made an easie conquest of Ferrara beinge abandoned of the french, making a iudgement vpon these computacions, that the state of Myllan would haue no abilitie of defence against so many enemies, and so suddeine a warre: he began at one time the warre against Ferrara and against Genes: And albeit the Duke of Ferrara (against whom he proceeded the more to hasten the execucion as against a notorious offender) offered to giue him the saltes that were made at Comacho, with obligacion that hereafter there shoulde be no more made: yet (nothinge can satisfie a mind possessed with malice) after he had licensed his Embassadors he caused his armie to march against him, which with the onely somonce of a trompet, and no defence appearing, obteined Cente & Pieua: Which borowes apperteining first to the bishoprike of Bolognia, Pope Alexander in marying his Daughter, had annexed them to the Duchie of Ferrara recompensing the bishoprike with other reuenues: Against Genes were sent eleuen gallies of the Venetians guided by Grillo Conterin, and one speciall gallie of the Popes, carying Octauian Fregosa, Ieronimo Dorea with many other of the banished men of that state: And by land at the same time and for the same expedicion was dispatched M. Anth. Colonno with a hundred men at armes and seuen hundred footemen: This Capteine hauing left the pay of the Florentyns, and being interteyned by the Pope, aboade vpon the territories of Lucqua vnder cooller to furnish his band, giuing out a brute that he was afterwards to goe to Bolognia: And albeit Monsr Chaumont entred into some suspicion of Genes by reason of his abiding, yet not knowing that the armie by sea was to come, and the Pope spreading a suttle and dissembling brute that the preparacions of the Svvyzzers and houering of M. Anth. were to execute some surprise vpon Ferrara: Chaumont made no other prouision for Genes then a certeine smal crew of footemen whome he sent thether.

The Popes armie against Ferrara and Genes.

Marke Anth. marched with his companies vp to the vale of Visagna within a mile of the walls of Genes, notwithstanding he was not receiued (according to the Popes hopes) either into Serezana or into the towne of Spetia: and at the same time the armie by sea which had occupied Sestria and Chiauara, was come from Rapalo to the mouth of the riuer Entelle which falleth into the sea neare the porte of Genes: But there were entred into Genes for the french kinge at the first brute that thennemies approched, the sonnes of Io. Lovvys de fiesque with eight hundred mē of the contrey, with whom was ioyned the Cardinalls Nephew of Finalo with an equal proporcion of souldiours, which both assured the towne, and kept suppressed all sturres & commocions: By this succor and prouidence, the Pope and the exiles being deceiued of their principall hope, seeing besides a continuall flocking and concurse of people, out of Lombardye and the riuer of Ponant together with six great gallies entring the hauen guided by Prestan, they thought that to tary longer there could not but bringe more more perill then profit: And therefore both the nauie by ſea, and tharmie by lande returned to Rapalle, where in aſſaying to take Portofino dyed Francisco Bolani a patron of one of the Venetian gallies: from thence their armie by ſea hoyſſing ſayle to goe to Cinita uechia, M. Anth. Colonno dowting his ſewertie to paſſe by land for the commocions of the contrey men and popular furie alwayes raging againſt ſouldiours that retyre in diſfauour, embarked him ſelf in the gallies with three ſcore of the beſt horſemen, ſending the reſidue by lande to Spetia, who were all ſtript aſwell vpon the contrey of Genes, as vppon the marches of Lucqua, and frontyers of the Florentyns: This attempt was done with very ſmall honor to Grillo and Octauyan, for that of feare they abſteyned to charge the veſſells of Preian, who being inferior, it was beleeued that before he entred the hauen they would haue ſet vpon him with a great aduauntage: Aſſoone as they had weied anker and gone, Preian iſſued out of the hauen with ſeuen gallies & foure ſhips, taking his courſe to purſue the Venetian nauie which was ſtronger then he in gallies, but weaker in number of ſhips: Both the one and other fell with the Ile of Elbo, the Venetians in the port of Luigano, and the french men in the hauen of Perrat, who returned eſtſoones to Genes after they had accoaſted thennemy to the Mount Argentaro: About this time the Popes ſouldiours were entred into Romana vnder the Duke of Vrbyn againſt the Duke of Ferrara, where hauing taken the towne of Lugo, Vagnacaual, and all the reſidue that the Duke held on this ſide Pouo, they held the caſtell of Lugo beſeeged: And whileſt they lay there both in diſorder and without effect, being ſuddeinly aduertiſed that the Duke of Ferrara with the french bands, & a hundred & fifty men at armes of his owne, with many trowpes of light horſemen, was marching to the reſkewe of it, they leauied their ſeege, and leauing in praye to the enemie 3. peeces of artillerie, they retyred to Imola nothing being able to aſſure them whom feare had compelled to flee: Alfonſo taking thaduauntage of this occaſion, recouered with a wonderful facilitie al that they had take from him in Romagnia: But the campe Eccleſiaſtike being eſtſoones reaſſembled & reaſſured, reconquered eſtſoones the ſelfe ſame places, and immediatly after forced the caſtel of Lugo hauing battred it many dayes: And after the taking of it, their fortune preſented to them an occaſion of greater ſucceſſe: for, being no garriſon in Modona, for that the Duke being occupied in defending other places where the daũger was neareſt, was not able to refurniſh it of him ſelfe nor obteine of Monſr Chaumont to ſend thether two hundred launces, The Cardinal of Pauya paſſing with tharmy to Frank caſtell obteined by compoſicion that citie, whether he was inuited to come by Gerrard and Fraunceis Maria Rargons gentlemen of Modona, whoſe authoritie was ſo great as they were able to diſpoſe of it as beſt liked them, And in this action it was beleued that they were puſhed on more by ambicion and deſire of innouacion, then by any other occaſion: The loſſe of Modona was a warning to the Duke againſt other harmes, who fearing leſt the like would happen to Regge, beſtowed preſent garriſon there, as alſo Chaumont, doing after the hurt receiued that which woulde haue profited more in the beginning, ſent thether two hundred launces, notwithſtanding he had many impediments for the diſcending of the Swyzzers.

The deſcending of the Swyzzers to the Duchie of Myllan.

The confederacion betwene the french king and the Swyzzers was determined many moneths before, the king continuing his reſolucion not to augmẽt their penſions, contrary to the coũcel of al his Nobles, who aduiſed him to cõſidẽr of what importãce it would be to make thoſe armies his enemies with the which he had before achieued his greateſt fortunes: And they already drawn into armes vnder thauthority of the Popes promiſes, but ſpecially made angry with the kings obſtinacy in denying their demaundes, were reſolued by an vniuerſal conſent of the Communalties in an aſſembly holden at Lucerna, to conſpire againſt him: But Monſr Chaumont looking into the perill of theſe leauies and ſtirs, let good gard vpon the paſſages towards Coma, tooke away from the riuers all boates & barkes, withdrew into places of ſtrength all vittels and prouicions, and laſtly cut from the mylles their inſtruments to grinde by, leauing nothing that might be imployed to the ſeruice of thennemie but the riuers and lande which he coulde not remoue: And being vncerteyne whether the Svvyzzers would make their diſcending vpon the Duchie of Myllan, or els paſſing the Mount S. Barnard, to enter into Pyemont by the vale of Auguſto, and ſo goe to Sauona, with intencion to endomage Genes; or els from thence paſſing the Appenin, to make inuaſions vpon the Duke of Ferrara: he had alſo induced the Duke of Sauoy to deny them paſſage, and for their more impediment, he ſent with his conſent fiue hundred laūces to Turea, not ceaſſing neuertheleſſe to do all that he could to corrupt with preſents & promiſſes the chiefe cōmaunders of that nation to draw them from their riſing, holding it but iuſt to obiect practiſe againſt them in whom was ſo great lightnes to ſtirre vpon ſo ſmal occaſion: But in vaine did he labor and ſolicite thoſe communalties whoſe mindes did not reteyne any thing more willingly then the memory of the kings denial, being growne from a hatred to a violent deſire to be reuenged of the french nation: In ſo much as the Commons (thinking it to be their propet cauſe) notwithſtanding the difficulties that were in the Pope to ſend thē money for that the Fookers bankiers of Germanye who had promiſed to defraye it for him ſhronke backe for feare to offend Cæſar, 6. thowſand of them leauyed by the Pope entred really into thaction in the beginning of September: Amongeſt whom were 4. hundred horſemen, halfe armed with ſhot, 2. thowſand fiue hundred footemen with halfacques, & fifty harquebuſiers, without artillerie or other prouiſion of bridges or veſſels: In this forniture, they marched turning to the way of Belinſone, & taking the bridge of Treſa, with a garriſon of 5. hundred french footemen left abandoned, they incamped at Vareſa exſpecting there (as they ſaid) the Biſhop of Sion with new companies: Albeit theſe beginnings troubled much the mindes of the french, both for an ordinary feare they had of the Svvyzzers, & alſo perticularly reſpecting their owne weaknes hauing at that time in Myllan a very ſmal number of men at armes, for that part of them were diſtributed for the gard of Breſſa, Legnagno, Valegge & Peſquiero, 3. hundred launces ſent to the ſuccors of the Duke of Ferrara, & 5. hundred being ioyned with the armie of Almains againſt the Venetians: yet Monſr Chaumont aſſembling his forces & expreſſing his vallour euen amyd his hard fortune, marched with 5. hūdred launces & 4. thowſand footemē, & tooke the plaine of Chaſtillon within 2. miles of Vareſa, hauing ſent to the Mount of Brianſa Ioh. Ia. Triuulce, to thend that not ſo much with the bands which he brought with him which were in very ſmal number, as with the fauour & further ſtrength of the men of the contrey, he might be an impediment to the Svvyzzers for taking that waye: The Svvyzzers aſſoone as they were ariued at Vareſa, ſent to demaūd paſſage of Monſr Chaumont, ſaying they would goe to the ſeruice of the Church: By reaſon whereof it was douted that they would paſſe to Ferrara, either by the Duchie of Myllan, by which way, beſides thimpediments of the french companies, they ſhould haue found difficultie to haue paſſed the riuers of Pauy and Oglia: or els by taking the left hande and coaſting by the hils belowe Coma and Lecque, And paſſing the riuer of Adda which there is narrow and not rough, from whence they might haue bene guided by the hill of the contrey of Bergamo and Breſſia to the riuer of Oglio: And hauing paſſed ouer there, they might haue haue diſcended eyther by the contrey of Breſſa or by Guiaradda vpon the marches of Mantua, which is a contrey large & beareth no places of force to haue reſiſted them: So great was the reputacion of the vallour and order of that nation, that in all euents Monſr Chaumont had no intencion to ſet vpon them, although they made their diſcending into the plaine, but with his horſemen & footemen ioyned together & with his field peeces, to accoaſt and houer vppon them to cut of their vittells, and to giue them as many impediments as he could without aſſaying the fortune to paſſe the riuers: And in the meane while, for that the places neare Vareſa were well furniſhed with horſemen and footemen, he viſited them often times with falſe alarms keeping them in breath all the night: At Vareſa, where the Swyzzers ſuffered great want of vittells, A new ſupply of foure thowſand came & ioyned with them, And the fourth day after their comming, they marched altogether towardes Caſtillon keeping vpon the left hande a long the hills, marching alwaies in cloaſe ranke, in good order, more reſpecting to march in ſauetie then to make ſpeede: They were in euery eſquadron foure ſkore or an hundred, the laſt ranks being all halfaques & harquebuſiers: Their obſeruacion was ſuch in marching, that much leſſe that thēnemy could auoid them by any aduaūtage, but of the contrary they made a valiant defenſe againſt the french army which alwaies accoaſted them & put them to the ſkirmiſh both behind & before, yea ſome times they would draw out of their ſquadrons an hundred or fiftye to enterteine the ſkirmiſh, ſome times aduauncing, ſome times ſtaying, ſome times retyring, not that there coulde be diſcerned in their doinges the leaſt diſorder: They thought it no diſhonor to retyre, when by giuing of place they might profit them ſelues & endaunger thennemy: In this order they arriued the firſt day at the paſſage of the bridge of Vedan, which was garded by Capteine Molard with certeine Gaſcon ſotemē, who being driuē back with the ſhot of their halfaques, they lodged the ſame night at Appyana eight miles from Vareſa, & Chaumont encamped within Aſſaron towards the hil of Brianſo ſix miles from Appiano: The day following, they drew along the hils, towards Cantu, Chaumout accoaſting them alwaies with two hundred laūces, for that by the ſharpnes or ſteepenes of the places, thartilleries remeined more lower together with the footemen that garded them: And yet in the halt way eyther for the domages which the frenche had giuen them that day (whereof Chaumont made not a litle glory) or for that ſuch was their reſolucion, leauing the way of Cantu, and turning more on the left hand, they went retyring by the high places towards Coma, encamping for that night in a ſubberbe of that citie and in the villages thereabout: from the ſubberbe of Coma, they made an other lodging at Chiaſſo three myles more forward, keeping the french men in dout whether they would returne to Belinſone by the valley of Lungaro, or draw towards the riuer of Adda, where, albeit they were not furniſhed with bridges, yet many ſuppoſed that their vallour would opē them a way to paſſe, neceſſitie making them to vſe plankes in ſteade of bridges. But putting them out of dowt the daye following, they went and harbored at the bridge of Treſe, and from thence retyred by trowpes into their houſes, being reduced into the vttermoſt extremitie of vittells and wantes of money: it was beleeued that this retraite ſo ſuddeine was done for want of money, for the difficulties to paſſe the riuers, but much more for the neceſſitie of vittells, impediments of great importance to hinder both the fortune, the vallour, and felicitie of an armie: In this ſorte the frenche men were deliuered for this tyme of a daunger which they eſteemed not litle, notwithſtanding the kinge making thoſe thinges greater then they were in deede, affirmed that he coulde not but holde it profitable for his affayres to ſuffer them to paſſe, making this queſtion whether of theſe two thinges would make the Pope more weake eyther to be without ſouldiours, or to haue an armie that came to offend him as did the Svvyzzers whome, with ſo many forces and ſo much treaſor, he had had all the paine in the world to manage.

The perill of the french had bene farre greater if at one tyme they had bene aſſayled in many places according to the deuiſes of the Pope: But as thenterpriſe of Genes was affore the mouing of the Svvyzzers, ſo the armie of the Venetians aduaunced not ſo ſoone as was determined, notwithſtanding they had a ſinguler occaſion and commoditie, for that the Almain bandes within Vincenſa with whom were the Spaniſh footemen and the fiue hundred frenche launces, beinge muche diminiſhed ſince the departure of Monſr Chaumont, the Venetians yſſuing out of Padoa recouered without great trauell Eſte, Monſelice, Montagnano, Mareſtiquo, and Baſciana: And ioyning vallour to their fortune they paſſed further, & taking aduauntage of the retyring of th Almains drawing the way of Verona, they entred into Vincenſa which they had abandoned: except Leguaguo, they reconquered with this felicitie all thoſe peeces which with ſo great exſpenſes & trauel of the french men, they had loſt in the whole ſommer: And ſo they came to S. Martyn fiue miles from Verona, into which city thennemies retyred, their retraite not being without daunger by the doutful valour of Luke Maluezzo: who being then their general for that Io. P. Ballon had left their pay, ſhewed a courage inferior to the reputacion of the place which he held: for, the Venetians being come to the village of Tovvre, thennemies leauing great prouiſion of vittells in their lodgings, tooke the way to Verona, being followed with the whole Venetian armie, & continually ſuffering by their light horſemen: And yet the french ſuſteining valiantly the rearegard chiefly with their ſhot, they paſſed the riuer of Appan and marched without daunger to Nevv tovvne, the Venetians incamping within halfe a mile of them: who, forbearing to followe the daye after, with that diligence they did before, for that their footemen were not able to hold chaſſe with the horſemen, they retyred in ſauetie to Verona: from S. Martyn, after they had remeined there certeine dayes, approching neare Verona not without being blamed for the vnprofitable ſtay they had made, they began to employ their artilleries (which they had plãted vpon the other mountaine) againſt the caſtell of S. Felix and the next wall: perhaps they made choiſe of that place for the difficultie to be refortified, and that the horſemen could not execute but with great diſcommodities.

Verona beſeged by the Venetians.

The Venetian armie conteined eight hundred men at armes, three thowſand light horſemen, the moſt part eſtradiots, & ten thowſand footemen with a great trayne & quantitye of peyſants that followed: And within Verona were three hundred ſpaniſh launces, one hundred launces of Almains & Italians, and foure hundred french launces, fiue hundred footemen paied by the king, and foure thowſand Almains, no longer vnder the guiding of the Prince of Hanevv who was dead certeine daies affore: The people and inhabitants of Verona very ill diſpoſed to the Almains, were vp with their weapõs in their hands, A matter wherin the Venetians had much hoped, whoſe light horſemen paſſing at the ſame time the riuer of Adice at a foard vnder Verona, ronne ouer the whole contrey: Thartilleries of the Venetians battred the wall in great furie, notwithſtanding the artillerie planted within by the french and couered with defenſes, did greatly diſtreſſe thoſe that were without who had no rampiers: Lactance Bergame A Colonell of the greateſt account with the Venetians, was ſtriken with a ſhot of thartillerie, of which he died within few dayes after: At laſt thartillery without hauing done a wonderful execucion and diſmantled a great part of the wall, euen to the beginning of the skarpe, and ſo diſmounted and broken their cannons that thartillerie within was of little ſeruice, th Almains were not without feare to loaſe the caſtell notwithſtanding it was well rampired: To which loſſe, to thende the loaſing of the citie were not ioyned, they determined in caſes of neceſſities to retyre to certayne rampiers which they had made in a place neare, to beate vpon the ſodayne with their Cannons which they had already planted, the face of the inner parte of the caſtell, hoping to make ſuche an opening, that thenemies ſhould finde ſmall ſafetie to tary there. But the vallour of thoſe that were within, was farre aboue the vertue of the other, for that in the Venetian armie were no other bandes of footmen then Italians, who beeing ordinarily payed euery fortie dayes, followed that ſeruice more for that they founde in other places very ſlender preferment, then for any other reaſon: Beſides, th Italian footmen not accuſtomed to the order of ſeruice beyonde the Mountes, neither aſſured in holdes nor reſolute in the fielde, were at that time almoſt reiected of euery one that had meane to furniſhe their ſeruice with footemen ſtraungers, ſpecially with Svvizzers, Almains, and Spaniards. Therefore the towne beeing defended with a greater vallour then it was aſſaulted, there iſſued out one night about eightene hundred footemen with certayne Frenche horſemen to charge the artillerie, and the footmen that garded it beeing eaſily put to flight, they choaked two great peeces, ſtriuing to draw them into the towne: The Alarme was ſodenly through all the campe, when Zitolo Perouſe bringing a reskewe of footmen, and making haſte more then others to the misfortune that attended him, in fighting valiauntly finiſhed his life with great glorie; But Denis de Naldo comming on with the greater part of tharmie, thenemie was compelled to reabandon thartillerie and retyre, notwithſtanding with great prayſe, for that in the beginning they brake the garde that defended thartillerie, and after made ſlaughter of a great parte of ſuche as came firſt to the reskew, and laſtely retyred almoſt all in ſafetie. This accident brought great diſcouragement to the Venetian capteines, who ſeeing the inhabitantes made no mutinie, and iudging withall that their abyding there would be no leſſe vnprofitable then full of perill for the yll ſuretie of their campe (their footemen beeing lodged in the mountayne, and their horſemen in the valley) they determined to retyre to their olde lodging at S. Martin, wherein they made ſo muche the more ſpeede, by howmuche they vnderſtoode that Monſr. Chaumont woulde come to the reskew of the towne, hauing already auoyded the perill of the Svvizzers. At ſuch time as the campe leauyed and brake vp, the forragers of Verona accompanied with a great ſtrength entred the valley of Poliene ioyning to the mountayne of S. Felix: but many light horſemen of the Venetians being ſent out for reskew, and ſeaſing firſt of the entrie of the valley, put them all to the ſworde, or to the fortune of priſoners. From S. Martin the Venetian armie drewe to S. Boniface, beeing fearefull of the comming of Monſr Chaumont. About this time the garriſon within Treuiſa tooke by compoſition the towne of Aſola neare the ryuer Muſone, wherein were eight hundred Almain footmen: The caſtell alſo ſuffring the ſame fortune: And in the countrey of Friul they proceded with the ſame variations and cruelties accuſtomed, not ſeeming to make warre vpon enemies, but proſecuting on all parties the extreme deſtruction of buyldings, places, and whole countreis: The like calamities alſo conſumed Iſtria, the libertie of the warre making all things lawfull to the furie of the ſouldiours, whoſe inſolencies left no other comfort to any ſortes of people, then ſuch as may be exſpected in an vnbridled furie of warre.

About this time the Marquis of Mantua was deliuered out of priſon by a ſtrange

deuise practised by the Pope, wherevnto he was induced by an auncient affection which he bare to him before, ioyned to a desire to serue his turne of him, and the cõmoditie of his estate, in the warre against the French king: It was spread throughout all Italie, that in these respects he was the worker of his deliuerie, and set him at libertie: But it was credibly knowen by an Author worthy of fayth, and through whose handes at that time passed the whole gouernment of the state of Mantua, that his libertie was wrought by an other meane: There was great doubt least the Venetians, either for the hate they bare him, or for the suspicion they had of him, woulde not hold him a perpetuall prisoner: and therefore after there had bene vsed in vaine many tryals and remedies, it was determined in the councell of Mantua to haue recourse to Baiazet Prince of the Turkes, whose amitie the Marquis had enterteined many yeres, by visiting him oftentimes with many presentes and other offices of goodwill and honor: Assoone as he vnderstoode the calamitie of the Marquis, he sent for the gouernour of the Venetian Marchaunts lying at Constantinople, & commaunded him to make him promise that the Marquis should be deliuered: The gouernour aunswered, that it was not reasonable he should promise that whiche was not in his power to performe, onely he offred to write to the state of Venice, who he doubted not would set downe a resolution conformable to his desire. But Baiazet speaking in the person and authoritie of a tyrant, replied proudly that it was his wil that he should make an absolute promise, wherevnto he was constrayned to condiscende, obeying the will of the tyrant as a lawe forced and vnrighteous, whiche he signified with expedition to te state of Venice, who considering that it was not nowe time to stirre vp so mightie a Prince, determined to set him at libertie. But he, to hide his dishonor, and to reape some frute of his deuise, inclined to the desire of the Pope, by whose meane being concluded (but secretly) that to assure the Venetians that the Marquis should not moue agaynst them, his eldest sonne should be put into the Popes handes. The Marquis was conueied to Bologna, where after he had deliuered ouer his sonne to the Agents of the Pope, he went to Mantua, excusing himselfe both to Cæsar and the French king by the necessitie he had to go redresse his owne estate, that he visited not their armies to do them seruice, as freholder to the one and souldiour to the other (the French king holding him alwayes in the number of his pensioners) notwithstanding his intention in deede was to remayne a newter.

The Pope determineth to assaile Genes.

The yll successe of things no lesse rashly attempted then vainely prosecuted, had nothing diminished the hopes of the Pope, who promising himselfe more then euer of the mutations of Genes, determined to assayle it of new: By reason whereof the Venetians following him more by necessitie, then that they allowed of his furious dealing, augmented their Nauie which was at Ciuita vecchio by foure greate shippes, to the which after the Pope had ioyned one of his Galeasses with other vessels, and perswading that by the publication and authoritie of his name, the Genouoaies would be the more easie induced to rebell, he gaue publike benediction to his banners with ceremonies Pontificall as though in that maner of celebration were power eyther to worke effect to his intentions, or to make better his fortune. It was maruelled that nowe that his thoughtes were made manifest and discouered, and that within Genes were many souldiours, and a strong Nauie within the hauen, howe he could hope to obteine that which he was not hable to winne when the hauen was disarmed, the garrison very weake within the Citie, and when there was no doubt at all of him: But as nothing can satisfie the ambition of man, so the mind

that hath malice mixed with the desire of glory, is alwayes made more apt to hope for honor then hable to get it. To the armies at sea which were followed with the banished faction, and also with the Bishop of Genes sonne of Obietto de Fiesque, were to be ioyned the forces of the lande: for Federike Archbishop of Salerne brother to Octauian Fregosa, leauied with the Popes money companies of footmen and horsemen, John de Sassatelle and Reinold de Sassete his captaynes hauing commaundement to be readie with their regimentes at Bagno, to make an approche to Genes as occasion should require. The warning of a mischiefe brings with it his remedie, and the harme that is looked for before hurteth little when it commeth: for in that Citie had bene made mightie prouisions both by sea and lande, In so muche as at the first brute that the Nauie of the enemie approched wherein were fifteene light galleys, three great galleys, one galeasse, and three Biskain shippes, the Frenche Natiy launcing out of the hauen of Genes with xxij. light galleys, went proudly to meete them at Portouenere: The diuersitie of vessels was to them a suretie, for that beeing inferiour to thenemies being vnited together in one strength, but at least equall with him in force touching galleis, they might alwayes finde safetie in their swiftnes, and by dispersing, they might make an easie euasion from the shippes. The two Nauies approched one another aboue Portovenere within daunger of artillerie, and after they had exchaunged betwene them certayne vollies of shot, they brake of, the Popes nauie going to Seitry which is in the coast of Leuant, from whence they presented themselues afore the port of Genes, (John Fregosa entring within the port with a Brigantin:) but the towne beeing so straitely garded that the contrarie faction coulde not rise, and thartillerie of the towre of Godifa thundring without ceassing, they were constrayned to retyre, their fortune beeing inferiour to their valour: Afterwardes they sayled to Portovenere, where they spent certaine howres afore it without commendation, vnlesse they sought prayse in an action wherevnto they had no possibilitie of power to preuayle: And so beginning to expresse a manyfest dispayre of the successe of the whole enterprise, they returned to Civita vecchia, from whence the Venetian vessels departing with the Popes consent to returne into their owne seas, they fell distressed at Far de Messina with suche a furious tempest, that fiue of their gallies being lost, the others were cast vppon the coast of Barbarie, from whence, being brused and broken, they fell at last with many harmes with the hauens of the Venetians. The forces that shoulde haue come by lande, were not concurrant in this action, for that the companies that were leauyed in the contrey of Lunigano, stirred not, iudging it an enterprise full of perill to enter the coast of Leuant, for the preparations which the French had made: And suche as were ready at Bagno making excuse by the Florentins that would not suffer them to passe, marched no further: But entring into the mountaine of Modena which yet obeyed the Duke of Ferrara, they assayled the towne of Fauana, which though they founde difficult to obtayne at the beginning, yet they compelled it in the ende to come to rendring (the mountayne men bearing no minds to expresse further fayth to their Duke, in whom they sawe so small apparance or hope of succours.)

Thus till this day did nothing succeede to the Pope of all that he had attempted agaynst the French king: for, neither was there any mutation at Genes as he did assuredly promise himselfe, neither did the Venetians after they had in vayne assayed to take Verona, hope for any aduauncement on that side: neither did the Suvizzers accomplish any thing, their action being rather in demonstration and shewes then in matter and effect. And touching Ferrara, what by the ready succours whiche the French had ſent, and the oportunitie of the winter already come on, there was no apparance of any daunger: onely he had taken Modena, which was no recompence worthy of ſo great a mouing. But ſuche is the nature of hope, rather to prolong then to ſatisfie, and guyding a minde vayne and glorious, it noriſheth him in infinite exſpectations. And touching this Pope (diſappoynted of ſo many hopes) we may lay him in compariſon with that which is written by the Poets, of Antæus, that beeing tamed by the forces of Hercules, as often as he was throwen to the grounde, ſo often did appeare in him a greater ſtrength and courage: Suche weening had the Pope amidde his aduerſities, for when he ſeemed moſt abaſed and oppreſſed, it was then that he did moſt lift vp him ſelfe with a ſpirite more conſtant and reſolute, promiſing better of his fortune then euer: And yet he had almoſt no other foundations then of him ſelfe, and he would openly ſay, that albeit he was made naked of valiant and loyall armes, hauing no other aſſured friendes then the Venetians, yet for that his enterpriſes moued not of any particular intereſt, but of an onely franke deſire to ſet Italie at libertie, he doubted not with the ayde of God to manage them to an iſſue honorable, happie, and commendable. He could not hope muche of the Venetians, for that they were already drayned of money, and oppreſſed with many difficulties and afflictions: And touching the king Catholike, he ſeemed rather to counſel him ſecretly, then to ayde him openly, vſing his ordinarie ſutteltie, to keepe enterteined on thother ſide Maximilian with the French king: And albeit he made him many promiſes, yet he helde them ſuſpenſed with many conditions and impedimentes: And for the trauell he had vſed to ſeperat Cæſar from the French king, and to make him agreed with the Venetians, it ſeemed euery day no leſſe doubtfull then vnprofitable: for that Cæſar, at ſuche time as the Pope had ſent out an armie agaynſt the duke of Ferrara, had ſent an Herald to charge him not to moleſt him: And Conſtantin de Macedonio, being gone in the Popes name to ſolicite an accorde betwene him and the Venetians, he did not onely refuſe to heare him, but alſo giuing to know that he would more firmely knitte with the Frenche king, he determined to ſende into Fraunce the Biſhop of Guret to negociate with him of all their affayres: Alſo the electors of thempire, notwithſtanding they bare great inclination to the name of the Pope, and to the deuotion of the ſea Apoſtolike, would not heare ſpeake of the expences: in ſo much as being addicted onely to thaffayres of Germanie, they were not to do him any great ſeruice in thoſe actions: And laſtly, it ſeemed he could not hope muche more of the king of Englande, notwithſtanding he was young and deſirous of innouations, & had made profeſſion to affect the greatnes of the Church, and heard his Embaſſadors not without ſome inclination of minde: for that beeing ſo farre remoued from Italie aſwell by lande as ſea, he was not hable of him ſelfe to embaſe the French king, hauing withall ratified the peace with him, and by a ſolemne embaſſage ſent to that ende, receiued the full confirmation. Sure there is no man buylding vpon ſo weake fundations, and encountring ſo many great impedimentes and aduerſities, who would not haue abated and reſtrayned his courage, ſeing withall he had meane to obteine peace with the French king with ſuch conditions as a conquerour could not in reaſon deſire greater: For the king conſented to abandon the protection of the Duke of Ferrara, though not directly (in regarde of his honor) yet indirectly to ſatisfie the Pope, referring it to the arbitration of the lawe, but vnder thauthoritie of ſuche iudges as would haue pronounced according to the Popes will: And albeit he was certayne that he might obteine this forme of peace to his quiet and honor, yet he added that ouer and beſides theſe, he woulde haue haue the king to leaue Genes in full libertie, proceeding in theſe actions with ſuche an implacable obſtinacie, that not one of his deareſt familiars durſt once aduiſe him to the contrarie: yea thembaſſador of Florence offering to ſound him according to the kings commaundement, purchaſed by his labour more diſpleaſure then profite: His reſolution that way coulde ſuffer no counſell to the contrarie, for a meſſanger whom the duke of Sauoy had ſent to him about other affayres, offring that his prince (if it ſo lyked him) would enterpoſe in the working of the peace, he cryed out that he was ſent to eſpie, and not to negociate, committing the meſſanger to priſon, and to be examined with tormentes: his ſinguler courage carying him euery day into higher weenings, made him alſo confirmed in the difficulties that appeared, that not reſpecting the impediments nor daungers, and determining to laye aſide all his other thoughtes ſauing ſuche as tended to the taking of Ferrara, he reſolued to go in perſon to Bolognia, both to haſten things by his preſence, to giue more authoritie to his affayres, and to encreaſe the courage of his captaines, whoſe vallour ſeemed farre inferiour to his furie: he aſſured himſelfe that to take Ferrara his owne forces ſuffiſed ioyned with the Venetians, who laboured to feede him in that perſwaſion, for feare leaſt in the ende loaſing all hope of good ſucceſſe, he came not to accorde with the French king.

On the other ſide, the French king being nowe made certayne by ſo many experiences of the affection and intention of the Pope, and ſeeing howe neceſſarie it was to prouide againſt other dangers that might happen to his eſtates, determined to defende the duke of Ferrara, and keeping eſtabliſhed the amitie he had with the king of Romains, he reſolued to perſecute (by his conſent) the Pope with armes ſpirituall, and in the meane while to enterteine and ſupport things vntill the ſpring, when he would paſſe into Italie with a puiſſant armie both by ſea and lande, to make warre eyther vpon the Venetians, or againſt the Pope, as the eſtate of affayres ſhould require. He perſwaded the king of Romains that he would enter into action againſt the Venetians, not onely as he was wont to do, but alſo to ayde him (knowing well his auncient deſire) to occupie Rome together with the whole eſtate of the Churche as apperteineth of right to thempire: and likewiſe to diſpoſe all Italie except the eſtates of Millan, Genes, Florence, and Ferrara: By theſe alluremẽtes he ranged him eaſily to his opinion, but ſpecially that by their authoritie, ioyning with them the conſent of the nations of Fraunce and Almain, they might call a generall councell, wherein they hoped would be concurrant the Spaniſhe regions and the king of Aragon, not daring to do any thing againſt their will. To theſe was added an other moſt great fundation, that many Cardinals of Italie & beyond the Mountes, hauing minds ambicious and ſtirring, promiſed to make open profeſſion to be the authors of the councell. The king for the better direction of theſe things exſpected with no ſmall deſire, the comming of the Biſhop of Gurci whom Cæſar had determined to to ſende to him: And in the meane while, to laye a beginning to the inſtitution of the councell, and to remoue preſently from the Pope the obedience of his kingdome, he made ſomonce to all the prelates of Fraunce to aſſemble at Orleans in the middeſt of September. Suche were the reſolutions and preparations of the French king, not altogether approued by the wiſe men of his councell and his Court, who ſeeing howe vnprofitable it would be to giue leaſure to thenemie, perſwaded him not to deferre the mouing of armes to a newe time, whoſe counſell if it had bene followed, the Pope had bene eaſily brought to ſuche neceſſitie, and his affayres ſo confuſed, that he had not bene hable with that fortune and facilitie to ſtirre vp agaynſt him ſo many Princes as he did after: But ſuche was the deſtinie of thoſe affayres, that the counſell of wiſemen were of leſſe credit with the king then his owne opinion, who ſeemed to ſtande confirmed either through couetouſnes which ouerruled him, or by feare that other princes would be ielouſe of his greatnes if he onely made warre againſt the Pope: or perhaps he abhorred ſuch an action as contrary to the ſurname of Right Chriſtian, & vnworthy of that profeſſion to defend the Church wherwith his predeceſſors had bene honored of long time.

The Popes armie and the Venetiās vpon the countrey of Ferrara.

The Pope made his entry into Bologna vpon the ende of September, with reſolution to inuade Ferrara aſwell by water as by land, vſing only his owne forces and the ſupplies of the Venetians: who at his requeſt ſent out two fleetes armed againſt Ferrara, & they entring into the ryuer of Pavv, the one by Fornaci, and the other by the port of Primaro, began to do many domages to the people of Ferrara, as did alſo at the ſame inſtant the Popes companies, who ouerranne and pillaged the whole contrey, but not comming neare to Ferrara, in which citie was a ſtrength of two hundred and fiftie French launces, beſides the Dukes garriſons: for albeit the campe eccleſiaſtike was payed for eight hundred men at armes, ſix hundred light horſemen, and ſix thouſand footmen, yet, beſides that they were bodyes vntrayned & taken vp at random, the numbers were farre leſſe, (the Popes hauing by cuſtome to be very ill ſerued in warres:) Beſides Monſr de Chaumont hauing ſent, after the loſſe of Modena, to Regge and Rubiero two hundred and fiftie launces, and two thouſande footemen: Mark Anth. Colonno and Iohn Vitelli were departed from tharmie by the Popes commaundement with two hundred men at armes and three hundred footmen, to go to Modena: For theſe reaſons the Pope made inſtance that of the Venetian army, which now that the forces of Cæſar were ſo diminiſhed at Verona and euery where, had without great difficultie recouered almoſt all Friull, he might paſſe one part of it vppon the countrey of Ferrara, where they had newly recouered Poleſina de Rouigno, left abandoned by the neceſſitie of thaffayres which the duke had about Ferrara: The Pope alſo exſpected three hundred launces Spaniards, whome the king of Aragon ſhould ſend to him vnder the leading of Fabritio Colonno whenſoeuer he would demaund them, according to the bond & contract of the inueſtiture: Aſſone as they ſhould arriue in his armie, he made his purpoſe to ſet vpon Ferrara on his ſide, & the Venetians to do the like on their part. He perſwaded himſelfe that aſſone as the people of Ferrara ſaw the armie approch the walls, they would take armes againſt the Duke, notwithſtanding his capteins tolde him that the garriſon within was both hable to defende the citie, and kepe the people conteined, what diſpoſition ſoeuer they had to runne into tumult: Neuertheles his deſire raging aboue all reaſon or counſel, he forbare not to leauie with an incredible care in many places, many bandes of footmen: But the Venetians were more ſlowe in comming forward then eyther the Pope exſpected, or ſtoode agreable with the plottes he had layde, for that hauing brought by water vpon the marches of Mantua many barkes to make a bridge, the duke of Ferrara charging them vpon the ſodayne with certayne french bandes, did not onely take them from them and defeate their paſſage, but alſo within certayne Creekes of Poliſena tooke many barkes & other veſſels, together with the treaſorer of the Venetian armie. About this time vpon the diſcloſing of an intelligence which the Venetians practiſed within Breſcia to make it rebell againſt the French king, the Counte Iohn Maria de Martinengo was committed to iuſtice, and payed the price of the practiſe with the loſſe of his head. But farre more ſlowe in marching were the companies of the Spaniards, who being arriued vpon the frontiers of the kingdome

of Naples, refuſed, according to the direction of their king, to paſſe the ryuer of Tronto, vnleſſe he woulde firſt deliuer to his Embaſſadour the Bull of inueſtiture whiche had bene promiſed: The Pope on thother ſide woulde not preſent the Bull, but at ſuche time as the bandes of ſouldiours were come to Bolognia, doubting leaſt after he had diſpoſſeſſed him ſelfe of it, the companies that were promiſed woulde not be ſent at all: And yet, neither for any declaration that his Captaynes coulde make to him, neither for the preſent difficulties, did his hope diminiſhe that he was hable to carrie Ferrara with his owne ſtrength onely: But as one whoſe priuate deſire was ſtronger then all the reaſonable perſwaſions that coulde be made, he looked into all thexpeditions of warre with a wonderfull trauell and affection, notwithſtanding that at the ſame time he fell into a great maladie, whiche (gouerning his body contrary to the counſayle of Phiſitions) he diſpiſed no leſſe then the other difficulties, promiſing no leſſe to ouercome that, then he aſſured him ſelfe of the victorie of the warre, hauing this firme perſwaſion, that it was the conſent and will of God that Italie ſhoulde be reſtored to libertie by his meane: Suche was the greatneſſe of his minde, and ſo muche reſpected his authoritie, that it was daungerous to giue him counſel agaynſt his will and lyking, and that which in other men might be called fury and raſhnes, was vnder the terror of his authoritie holden for temperance and wiſe proceeding: He brought to paſſe likewiſe that the Marquis of Mantua, whom he had called to Bolognia & honored him with the title of Gōfalonnier of the church, ſhould take pay of the Venetians vnder the name of their capteine generall (the Pope participating for an hundred men at armes, and xij. hundred footmen. This matter was kept ſecrete vpon the requeſt of the Marquis for this reaſon, that it was neceſſarie that he prouided firſt for the ſtay and order of his owne countrey, to thende to withſtande the harmes of the frenchmen: But in truth this was his meaning, that taking this charge vpon him, not of goodwill, but by neceſſitie of the promiſes he had made, he ſought to defer thexecution, the better to deliuer himſelf of it by ſome occaſion or helpe of the time.

The great deſire which the Pope had to offend others, was turned into a neceſſity to giue defence to his owne things: and this deſire had bin yet both more ready and more greater, if new accidents had not conſtrained Chaumont to defer his purpoſes: for after the Venetian army was broken vp frō before Verona, Chaumont being comē as far as Peſquiero to march to the reskew of that citie, determined to returne ſpeedily, and employ his army in the recouery of Modena: in which quarter, his bandes that were at Rubiero had taken by aſſault the towne of Formingo: if he had gone forwarde in this action, it was thought he might haue eaſily obteined it, bothe for that the garriſon was ſlender, the towne not fortified, and thinhabitantes nothing brooking the iuriſdiction of the Churche: But it happned as he thoughte to go his way, that the Almain footemen that were within Verona began to drawe into tumulte, for that they were yll payed of Cæſar, by reaſon whereof, leaſt that Citie ſhoulde remayne abandoned, Chaumont was conſtrayned to abyde there tyll he had reaſſured them, diſtributing nyne thouſande duckets for their preſent pay, and promiſing the reſidue the moneth following. In warre one misfortune draweth on an other, for he had no ſooner giuen order to theſe diſorders, then there happned an other accident, for that the Venetian bands beeing retyred towards Padoa, & Grotto the gouernor of Legnaguo thinking now that thoccaſion offred to ſack the town of Montagnana, he cauſed to march thither al his men at armes & foure hūdred footmen: againſt whom whileſt they of the towne (who could not be without feare of a ſacking) made defence, many trowpes of the Venetian light horſemen finding them in diſorder, brake them eaſily to their great harmes, for that the meane to flee was taken from them by thenemie that had battred & beaten downe a bridge. By this aduenture Leguaguo being almoſt made naked of men, it is without doubt that if the Venetian bãds had put diligence to their fortune, they had made it a glory of their valour, and a reward of their victory. But as in al worldly things, ſo chiefly in actions of war, fortune continueth not all one: this oportunitie paſſed away foorthwith, for that Chaumont being aduertiſed of all that was hapned, diſpatched thither in great diligence other bands, preſeruing that by his policie whiche thenemie had miſſed to take by their vertue. But by theſe impediments he loſte thoccaſion to recouer Modena, into the whiche in this reſpite of tyme, were entred many footebandes, and many fortifications had bene made with great deuiſe and ſtudie: And yet for his comming to Rubiero, the Pope was compelled to addreſſe to Modona that armie that was appoynted to go agaynſt the Duke of Ferrara: There all his forces beeing aſſembled vnder the Duke of Vrbin Captayne generall, and the Cardinall of Pauia his Legate, and vnder Iohn Paule Baillon, M. Anth. Colonno, and Iohn Vitelli, all Capteines of name and authoritie, he made requeſt to giue battell to thenemies: A matter which all his capteines did impugne, as knowing that the forces of the Frenche were without all compariſon both greater in numbers, & more approued in valour: both for that the footemen of the Church had bin leauyed in haſt, and in the armie was no ſuch obedience and diſcipline as apperteined: and betwene the duke of Vrbin and the Cardinall of Pauia a manifeſt emulation & diſcorde, the ſame extending ſo farre, that the Duke accuſing him of infidelitie to the Pope, ledde him priſoner to Bolognia, eyther of his proper authoritie, or by the Popes commaundement: But the Pope eftſones holding him purged from all crimes and imputation of crimes, helde him in better degree of fauor and authoritie then before. Whileſt the two armies laye one right agaynſt the other, Chaumont lying with his horſemen at Rubiero, and his footemen at Marſaglio, and on the other ſide, the Eccleſiaſtikes keeping at Modena in the ſuburbes of Rubiero, many skirmiſhes and enterchaunge of feates martiall paſſing betwene them. The Duke of Ferrara, who a litle before had recouered without reſiſtance Poliſena de Rouigno, ioyning to him the Lorde Chaſtillion and the French launces, recouered without impediment Finale, & from thence entring into the towne of Cento (which the Pope had taken before) by the Caſtell that helde for him, he ſacked it and burned it, preparing himſelfe to go ioyne with Chaumont. The Churche armies fearing muche by theſe behauiours, retyred within Modona, beſtowing one part of their footmen in the ſuburbe that is towarde the mountayne: But ſuche is the variation of warre, not carried alwayes with one fortune: the Duke was no ſooner remoued then he was conſtrayned eftſones to abide for the defence of his own, for that the Venetians cõteining three hundred men at armes, many light horſmen, & foure thouſand footmen, to win the paſſage of Pauv, & ſo to ioyne with the Popes armie, were encamped before Ficquerolei, which is a litle & weake borow vpõ Pauv, but of great renowme, both for the lõg time that Robert of S. Seuerin was afore it in the warre which the Venetians had with Hercules duke of Ferrara, & alſo for the defence made by Federike Duke of Vrbin, captaynes of great vallour in that time. The Venetians tooke it by compoſition, and afterwards forced the towne of Stellate which is vpon the ſhore oppoſite: And cõmanding in that ſort the paſſage of Pauv, there reſted no more to marche ouer but to caſte the bridge, whiche, Alfonſo after the loſſe of Stellate beeing come with his army to Bondin, hindred with his artillerie
